96167

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

http://archive.org/details/nation159julnewy

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE, DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED 1865

96167

VOLUME 159

JULY 1, 1944, to DECEMBER 30, 1944

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK 7

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

INDEX TO VOLUME 159

JULY 1, 1944, to DECEMBER 30, 1944

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
CH	Chart
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 28	July 1	393-420	October 7
29- 56	July 8	421-448	October 14
57- 84	July 15	449-500	October 21
85-112	July 22	501-544	October 28
113-140	July 29	545-572	November 4
141-168	August 5	573-600	November 11
169-196	August 12	601-628	November 18
197-224	August 19	629-672	November 25
225-252	August 26	673-700	December 2
253-280	September 2	701-728	December 9
281-308	September 9	729-756	December 16
309-336	September 16	757-784	December 23
337-364	September 23	785-812	December 30
365-392	September 30

A PAGE

A. F. of L. See American federation of labor
AMG. See War, European—Allied military government
Abrams, Charles
  Government and housing; S.............. 498
Adam, T.
  French quislings believe the Anglo-Americans will welcome their aid in France; S 297
Adams, Frank M., Jr.
  Chides The Nation for inaccuracy in reporting; C........419; see also........ 91
Aeronautics. See Aviation
Agee, James
  His film criticism appraised. M. L. Lamer; C..........167; see also.........251; C 628
  Reviews of motion pictures:
    And now tomorrow.................... 725
    Bathing beauty...................... 24
    Battle for the Marianas, the.......... 389
    Bride by mistake..................... 569
    Candlelight in Algeria................ 107
    Canterville ghost, the................ 107
    Casanova Brown....................... 334
    Christmas holiday.................... 24
    Dangerous journey.................... 569
    Dark waters.......................... 725
    Days of glory........................ 24
    Double indemnity..................... 445
    Dragon seed 165
    1812 569
    Farewell, my lovely.................. 753
    Forty-eight hours 81
    Frenchman's creek 445
    Hail the conquering hero.............. 361
    Home in Indiana...................... 24
    Impatient years, the.................. 334
    Jamming the blues.................... 753
    Lost in a harem...................... 725
    Mademoiselle Fifi 698
    Man in Half moon street, the.......... 753
    Marine raiders 53
    Meet me in St. Louis................. 670
    National velvet 781
    None but the lonely heart.........670, 698
    Once upon a time..................... 107
    People's avengers, the................ 53
    Rainbow, the 624
    San Diego I love you................. 569
    Seventh cross, the................... 334
    Since you went away.................. 137
    Summer storm 107
    Tall in the saddle................... 569
    They met in Moscow................... 24
    Thirty seconds over Tokyo............. 698
    Thunder rock 569
    To have and have not................. 569
    Together again 725
    Two girls and a sailor................ 24
    V-1 725
    Very thought of you, the.............. 725
    Wilson........221; see also EP........ 171
    Youth runs wild...................... 389
Agencies, governmental. See United States; names of agencies
Agriculture
  Farmer and the presidential campaign, the P. Sifton; S.......................... 488
  Rural electrification administration, the. J. King; S 41
Air power. See Aviation
Akers, Milburn P.
  Missouri election trends; S.............. 464
Albeneri trio. B. H. Haggin; M.......... 699
Alexander, General Sir Harold L. G.
  Evaluates the Italian campaign. E. Sevareid; S.........713; see also......... 706
Allen, Jay
  Iberia, 1944; S.......................... 517
Allied control commission. See Italy
Allied military government. See War, European Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
  Destroy Franco now! S..............556; see also 548
  Duties of world citizenship, the; S....... 500
  Free Spain fights on; S..............318; see also EP............................339
  Goodbye to the revolution! S............ 65
  Leadership in Europe; S....688; see also EP 602; 683
America. See United States
American federation of labor
  In New York state refuses to endorse R. F. Wagner for reelection; EP......367; see also...........507; EP........... 575
  Refuses British trade union invitation to world labor conference; EP........... 630
American federation of musicians. See Labor unions
American Mercury
  Its advertisements in The Nation attacked. J. L. Brod; C....................... 447
Amery, Leopold S. See Great Britain—Anglo-Indian affairs
And now tomorrow. J. Agee; MP........ 725
Anderson, Marian, recital. B. H. Haggin; M 699
Angels, the. R. Humphries; P............ 687
Anti-Semitism. See Jews
Anti-trust laws. See Monopolies
Aquino, Benigno. See Philippine islands
Aranha, Oswaldo. See Brazil
Argentina
  Ambitions of its military clique threaten the democracy of all Latin America. J. W. White; S.......9; see also....... 609
  Cernuschi, F., announces the early creation of an Argentine resistance junta in Uruguay; EP....394; see also EP.... 759
  Election designed to make Perón president; EP 759
  Hull accuses regime of aiding the axis; reply of foreign minister O. L. Peluffa. R. Josephs; S....................148; see also EP.........142; EP......... 311
  Its nazi-phalangist dictatorship. F. Cernuschi; S.......614; see also 615
  Our policy toward, criticized by S. Welles; Stettinius, E. R.. replies; EP.......... 198
  Reaction to Roosevelt's denunciation of the present regime; EP............... 394
  What the policy of the United States should be. W. Frank; S............. 471
Argus
  Articles on Germany:
    All-out military defense creates industrial paralysis 410
    Anti-nazi underground activity....801; see also EP ....310; C........ 727
    "Battle supplement" for front-line troops 745
    Berlin people's court in action, the..... 519
    Christmas. 1944 801
    Coal shortage 561
    Defeatism in action....382; see also... 325
    Defense rallies ......184; see also...... 130
    Festung Europa becomes Festung Deutschland 46
    Foreign "volunteers" in the army...... 774
    Goebbels's Reich film bureau plans for post-war theaters 17
    Himmler prohibits the alteration of party uniforms 212
    Himmler pushes the campaign for an increase in births.................. 17
    Hitler and a staff of architects plan the Berlin of tomorrow............. 17
    Hitler mystery, the...............745; see also EP........601; Ct........ 689
    "Map psychosis" in eastern Germany.. 184
    Nazis store funds in neutral countries to finance post-war Nazi party....... 46
    Officers' plot, the; S......156; see also E....115; 128; EP....141; 152; 240; 295, 437, 745
    Propagandists report a regime of terror under American military occupation.. 616
    Robot bombs, the; other secret weapons 73; see also....................... 561
    Three-front war drives morale to new low 101
    Total mobilization .... 212; see also EP....141; EP....449; 690; EP 729
    Transportation difficulties 645
    "Unconditional resistance".........353; see also EP......449; EP......450; 473; 643 744
    Value of the mark drops following the Normandy invasion 46
Arkansas
  Fulbright, J. William, wins senatorial nomination; EP. 143
  N.A.M. sponsors amendment to outlaw closed-shop contracts; EP......546; see also EP......603; C................ 754
Armaments. See War effort
Army, United States. See United States—Army
Art (articles by C. Greenberg)
  Exhibitions:
    Art of this century.................. 598
    Baziotes, William 598
    Delacroix, Eugène 617
    Eakins, Thomas 24
    Guadaloupe Pasada, José.............. 389
    Hartley, Marsden 810
    Homer, Winslow 539
    Motherwell, Robert 598
    Rattner, Abraham 445
    Tunnard, John 626
  Surrealist painting 192, 219
  Taller de grafica popular. E. Wilder..... 299
Atlantic charter
  Clarifying the principle of self-determination. K. Loewenstein; S............... 235
Auden, W. H.
  Praises J. Agee's film criticism; C........ 628
Australia
  Post-war prospects and problems. B. Penton; S 11
Austria
  Otto of Hapsburg returns to Europe; has State department assurance that he can return to Austria; EP................ 576
Avanti. See Italy
Aviation
  American-Spanish reciprocal pact; EP.... 730
  Effectiveness of the robot bomb; EP....57; see also 73
  Post-war:
    International civil aviation conference, the; E....504; see also EP.....502; E....577; EP....576; EP.....602; 605; EP....674; 681; EP.......... 701
  Uses of air power in war, the. J. R. Cuneo; S 93

B

Bailey, Josiah W.
  Senate defeats his amendment against regional power authorities on TVA model. I. F. Stone; S...................... 678
Balanchine, George, choreographies. B. H. Haggin; S 418, 541
Balkan states
  Churchill-Tito-Subasich meeting presages new military developments; EP........ 225
  Hitler's satellite empire collapses; EP.... 253
  Possibilities for democratic post-war organization. B. Raditsa; S........267; see also EP..........253 EP......... 254
  Tito seeks a federal union including Bulgaria; E 505
Ball, Joseph H.
  Announces support of President Roosevelt; EP 502
  Attacks Dewey's foreign policy; EP..423; see also 463
Ballet international. B. H. Haggin; S..626; 753
Ballet russe de Monte Carlo. B. H. Haggin; S 418, 483
Ballet theater. B. H. Haggin; S......483, 541, 571, 753
Barnes, Morgan
  Questions definition in cross-word puzzle by J. Barrett; C....392; see also...... 280
Barrett, Jack
  Cross-word puzzles....28, 56; C....139, 84, 112, 140, 168, 196, 224, 252, 280, C....392, 308, 336, 364, 392, 420, 448, 484, 544, 572, 600, 628, 672, 700, 728, 756, 784, 812
Barth, Alan
  Television comes of age; S.............. 125
Bathing beauty. J. Agee; MP............. 24
Battle for the Marianas, the. J. Agee; MP. 389

96167

PAGE
Baxter, Rufus
  Purged press for France, a; S.......... 287
Baziotes, William, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A 598
Beichman, Arnold
  Willkie's choice; S..................... 70
Belgium
  Allies support Pierlot government against the popular will; E..................... 676
  Allies threaten to disarm the Belgian resistance forces. F. Kirchwey; S...... 632
  Patriots ask allies for arms to help repel nazi offensive; EP..................... 785
Bell for Adano, a. J. W. Krutch; D....... 781
Bellini, Mario
  Allies and the Italian partisans, the; S 324, 559; see also C.....627; EP..... 630
  We save Italy's king; S................. 743
Bennet, Augustus W. See New York state
Berelson, Bernard
  Columnists and commentators and the national election; S 515
  Fortune presidential poll, the; S........ 515
Bidault, Georges. See France
Biddle, Francis. See Department of Justice
Black, Hugo L.
  His record on the Supreme Court. I. M. Engel; S.............................. 404
Black international. Sagittarius; P........ 800
Bloomer girl. B. H. Haggin; M.......... 483
Bolivia
  American-Bolivian agreement on tin prices; EP 758........see also.............. 791
Bolté, Charles G.
  Air power in the European and Pacific war theaters; S 454
  Allies break out from the Normandy beachhead; S 62. 146
  Battle of France, the; S................ 202
  Battle of the Cologne plain; S........... 680
  Chances of defeating the nazis this year, the; S.................258, 370, 399, 634
  Criticisms of the Normandy offensive; S.. 146
  Day of the heroes; S.................... 733
  European war seen extending well into 1945; S 577
  Future of aviation, the; S.......605; see also EP 602
  German counter-offensive, the; S....790; see also EP...757; E...760; EP...785, 800
  Hold on Saipan puts Americans within striking distance of Japan, Formosa, and the Philippines; S....6; see also EP.... 2
  How to read the war news; S............ 174
  Japan's fleet strength cut by 50 per cent in second battle of the Philippines; S 551; see also 580
  Japan's "basic sea area"; S.........286; 314
  Job opportunities for returning veterans; S 493
  Landings in the Philippines, the; S...... 506
  Nazis' situation on Normandy peninsula critical; S 6
  Netherlands campaign: Arnhem paratroop action, the; S....................370, 399
  Offensive and defensive strategy on the European fronts; S.................. 706
  Russian drive on Vitebsk; S............ 6
  Russian break-through from Polotsk to Kovel; S 62
  Saipan and Hengyang; S............... 34
  Soldiers aren't supposed to think; S...90; see also EP...115; C...195; E...199; C..223; EP..226; C....306;......EP 603
  Role of the British and Canadian armies in the battle of western Europe; S........ 342
Bonomi, Ivanoe. See Italy
Books of 1944............................ 662
Bor, General. See Poland
Borgese, G. A.
  Of Trieste and other headaches: the Yugoslav-Italian border problem; C.....391; see also EP........................... 254
  Pope and the peace, the; S............. 429
Bose, Subhas Chandra. See India
Boyle, Kay
  Battle of the sequins; S................ 770
Boyle, Kay and others
  Protest article on France by K. Cannell in the Reader's Digest; C............... 363
Bracken, Brendan. See Great Britain
Brazil
  Aranha, O., liberal foreign minister, resigns; E....269; see also EP.......... 254
  Vargas names a pro-nazi, C. de Goes, as chief of police; E...269; see also EP... 254
Breitscheid, Rudolf. See Germany
Bretton Woods conference. See Finance, public
Bride by mistake. J. Agee; MP.......... 569
Britain. See Great Britain
British empire. See Great Britain
Broadcasting. See Radio
Brod, Jacques L.
  Protests against The Nation's acceptance of advertising from the American Mercury; C 447
Brodie, Bernard
  Second battle of the Philippines; the; its effect on Japan's naval position; S..... 580

PAGE
Brookings institution
  Issues pamphlet on post-war national income. I. F. Stone; S................ 452
Brotherhood of locomotive firemen and engineers. See Labor unions
Broz, Josip (Tito). See Yugoslavia
Budapest quartet. B. H. Haggin; M....... 726
Budget, public. See Finance, public
Bulgaria
  Approaches the western allies for peace terms; EP 253
  New anti-fascist cabinet formed friendly to Russia and Yugoslavia; E............ 505
  On the spot. B. Raditsa; S............. 155
  Partisan activities. B. Raditsa; S....... 155
Burdick, Usher L.
  Loses to Nye in North Dakota primary; EP....30; see also EP................ 545
Bureau of applied social research
  Polls, propaganda, politics:
    Bias in the phrasing of questions...... 294
    Campaign facts and controversies. P. F. Lazarsfeld; S 435
    Checking the accuracy of the various presidential polls. P. F. Lazarsfeld; S 557
    Columnists and commentators and the national election. B. Berelson; S..... 515
    Fortune presidential poll, the. B. Berelson; S 515
    It looks like F. D. R. G. Watson; S... 469
    Negro vote, the. P. F. Lazarsfeld; S.. 379
    Newspaper bias 348
    Polish-American vote, the............. 323
    Post-mortem on the election. P. F. Lazarsfeld; S 613
    Predicting doubtful states......266; see also 550
    Reliability of public-opinion polls...181; see also EP....................... 144
    September samplings show an increase in Roosevelt's probable majority. G. Watson; S 407
    Trends between the elections.......209, 234
    Vice-presidency the: Wallace is the popular choice. F. Kirchwey; S..89; see also 91
    Women in the election................ 234
Burma
  Ba Maw, Japan's Burmese quisling. S. C. Menefee; S 99
  See also Chinese-Japanese war
Burns, Eveline M.
  Government and social security; S....... 499
Business
  Post-war:
    British to be aided through new Anglo-American lend-lease agreement; EP 701; see also EP.................. 254
    Economic prospects of the west coast. C. McWilliams; S 263
    F. D. R. proposes to help private enterprise finance the expansion of industrial plants. I. F. Stone; S.......... 578
    International conference at Rye, the; E. 632
    National planning association reports on American world-trade opportunities; EP 702
    United States seen as a backward area in post-war economic world. I. F. Stone; S ....117; see also............ 175
    What about the economic peace? S. Chase; S......................711; 768
  Price-control extension bill passed; OPA enforcement powers weakened; EP.. 3
  Profits:
    Corporation earnings under the New Deal; EP 546
  Tariffs and American opportunities in world trade; EP 702
    See also Trade agreements
Butler, George. See Texas
Byrd, Harry F.
  May be nominated for the presidency; EP 31
Byrnes, James F. See War mobilization, office of

C

C.C.F. See Canada
C. E. D. See Committee for economic development
C.I.O. See Congress of industrial organizations
Caen. See War, European
Caffery, Jefferson. See Franco-American relations
Caldwell, William J.
  Soldier's letter to Mrs. Luce, a; S....35; see also C 139
California
  Is for Roosevelt. C. McWilliams; S..... 461
  Wartime upsurge makes this area of first importance in the political campagn. C. McWilliams; S....................... 263
Canada
  Conscription crisis, the; E......675; see also EP 576
  Duplessis, M., elected premier of the province of Quebec; EP.................. 199

PAGE
  Liberal party's power at low ebb; C.C.F. seen gaining enough strength to carry the federal election; EP ....199; see also EP......................... 142
  McNaughton, General A. G. L. succeeds Ralston as minister of national defense; EP 576
  Quebec and Alberta provincial elections, the; EP....142; see also EP.......... 199
  Role of the Canadian army in the battle of western Europe. C. G. Bolté; S....... 342
Candlelight in Algeria. J. Agee; MP...... 107
Cane, Melville
  Alexis Carrel; P........................ 512
Cannell, Katherine
  Article on France in the Reader's Digest protested. K. Boyle and others; C..... 363
Canterville ghost, the. J. Agee; MP....... 107
Carey, James B.
  Labor's stake in the post-war world; S.. 488
Carrel, Alexis, death. M. Cane; P........ 512
Carretta, Donato. See Italy
Cartels. See Monopolies
Carter, Michael
  It's hard to seduce a Turk; S........177; see also EP......................... 170
Cartoons
  Cooperation conundrum. Low 703
  Diplomatic courtesy in China. Low...... 638
  Evacuee train from Paris. Low......... 258
  Hitler mystery. Low 689
  Horse is dead, the. Long live the horse! L. Quintanilla 759
  Little man, what now? E. Herrmann.... 551
  Neutrality at Rome. Low 430
  Not here—there's the spot for the picnic. Low 727
  On the western front. Low 738
  "Patience, pals. Let's get it focused." Low 231
  Sleepless nights. Low 129
  Study in self-restraint. Low 511
  War of movement in Italy. Low......... 42
  "What about stopping 'em up right now?" Low 405
Casanova Brown. J. Agee; MP............. 334
Casualties, war. See War, European
Catherine was great. J. W. Krutch; D.... 194
Catholic church. See Roman catholic church
Catlos, General Ferdinand. See Czechoslovakia
Censorship
  And the Taft amendment to the soldier-vote act; EP..115; see also 90; C..195; E....199; C......223; EP.......226; C.......306; EP 603
  Postmaster general's second-class mail ban against Esquire is upheld by federal district court; EP....................... 115
  Sex and the censor. P. Wylie; S....39; see also C..........110; C.......... 195
Cernuschi, Felix
  Argentina's nazi-phalangist dictatorship; S....614; see also 615
  Reports formation of Argentine resistance junta in Uruguay; EP....394; see also EP 759
Chamber of commerce, United States
  Its views on American post-war economics. I. F. Stone; S 117
Chapiro, Joseph
  Have faith in France; S................ 68
Chase, Stuart
  Democracy under pressure:
    1. Will it be peace? S............... 711
    2. Are monopolies inevitable? S....... 768
Chavez-Scanlon bill. See Fair employment practices committee
Chennault, General Claire L. See Chinese-Japanese war
Chiang Kai-shek, Generalissimo. See China
Chicago symphony orchestra. B. H. Haggin; M 25
Chile
  Democracy in danger. R. Josephs; S..... 609
China
  And the United States:
    American military mission arrives in Yennan; EP 311
    Mission of D. M. Nelson, the. Pacificus; S..588; see also EP..575; EP..629; 637; E 705; 708
    Reports of American observers on conditions in the partisan areas. M. S. Stewart; S 637
    Wallace's tour; EP.................. 2
    What the United States can do to help China. K. L. Mitchell; S.......708; see also E 705; 637
  At Dumbarton Oaks and Quebec. L. Fischer; S.....340; see also 312; 315
  Bumper crops restore economic stability; EP 311
  Chiang Kai-shek's popularity wanes. B. Graham; S.....373; see also E........ 368
  Government's economic polices favor landlords at the expense of industrialists and jeopardize its war effort. B. Graham; S 373
  Kuomintang-Communist impasse. Pacificus; S....588; see also EP........2; E....61; EP......142; EP.......311; E....368; EP......575; EP......629; 637; E.......705, 708; EP.......730, 731

PAGE

  - Progressive speeches by Sun Fo seen affecting public opinion; EP...... 311
  - Recent cabinet shifts, the; E....705; see also EP........629; EP...... 730
  - Removal of General Sheng Shih-tai as governor of Sinkiang may result in improved Sino-Russian relations; EP...... 311
  - Russo-Chinese problems. L. Fischer; S.... 453
  - Stilwell, General J. W. recalled; EP..546; see also EP....575; 588; EP....629; 637; E 705; 708
  - Visit to the Communist-controlled area; E.. 61
  - Wang Ching-wei, Japan's puppet premier. S. C. Menefee; S...... 99
- Chinese-Japanese war
  - And the recall of General J. W. Stilwell; EP..546; see also EP..575; 588; EP 629; 637; E......705; 708
  - China's inability to prevent a junction of the Japanese Central China and Indo-China armies. B. Graham; S......373; see also E...... 368
  - Chinese aided at Henyang by General Chennault's air force; EP...... 88
  - Chinese capture Tengchung; EP...... 338
  - Demoralization in the Chinese army. B. Graham; S.......373; see also E....... 368
  - Henyang and Saipan. C. G. Bolté; S..34; see also EP...... 88
  - Japanese capture Changsha; seek to block supply ports; EP..2; see also...... 6
  - Japanese columns converge at Kweilin and Liuchow; EP...... 629
  - Japanese seize advanced bases of the American air forces; EP..629; see also EP.. 338
  - Keeping China in the war; E..705; see also 708
  - Ledo-Burma road threatened by the Japanese advances; EP...... 629
- Christmas holiday. J. Agee; MP...... 24
- Church, Roman catholic. See Roman catholic church
- Churchill, Winston. See Great Britain
- Civilian production. See War effort
- Clark, Bennett Champ. See Missouri
- Clark, Michael
  - Greek politics and puppets. S....765; see also EP......758; 772
  - Maquis's plan for the reconstruction of France, the; S...... 15
- Clayton. Will
  - Disapproves the Texas anti-fourth-term Democrats; EP...... 58
  - Hope held that he will resign as Surplus war property administrator; E...... 228
  - Nominated as an assistant secretary of state. I. F. Stone; S..735; 762; see also EP 758; 791
  - Proposed as assistant secretary of state in charge of the foreign economic administration; E....703; see also...... 678
- Coffee, John M.
  - Urges severance of diplomatic relations with Spain; EP..4; see also EP...... 311
- Colijn, Hendrik, death; EP...... 631
- Colmer bill. See United States—Post-war
- Commerce. See Business
- Committee for constitutional government
  - Rumely, E. A., secretary of Gannett committee, refuses to produce subscription list for House committee investigating campaign expenditures; E...... 424
- Committee for economic development
  - Business group offers a post-war tax program; E 311
  - Versus Brookings institution. I. F. Stone; S 452
- Committee of one hundred
  - Virginia group opposes any electoral college maneuver to circumvent a popular vote for Roosevelt; EP...... 31
- Commonwealth cooperative federation. See Canada
- Communications
  - Television comes of age. A. Barth; S.... 125
- Communist party
  - Red scare fails to win votes for the Republicans; EP...... 603
- Congress
  - Adjourns without action on a number of reconversion problems; EP...... 367
  - Composition of the new Senate and House; E 604
  - Record of the 78th; E...... 787
  - See also Presidential campaign of 1944
- Congress of industrial organizations
  - Accepts British trade union invitation to world labor conference; EP...... 630
  - Plans for labor's post-war needs. P. Murray; S...... 554
  - Political action committee:
    - Activities in the midwest. I. F. Stone; S 371, 425
    - Anti-New Deal press blames it for the defeat of its favorite candidates; EP... 170
    - Attorney general Biddle rejects Dies committee demand for an investigation of its activities; EP...... 197
    - Battle for Wallace at Chicago, the. F. Kirchwey; S...... 118
    - Hillman's statement before the House committee to investigate campaign expenditures; EP...... 282
    - Its registration work in industrial areas surpasses expectations. I. F. Stone;S. 455
    - Its role in the reelection of Roosevelt; EP..575; see also E...... 573
    - Right-wing counter-offensive against its activities. F. Kirchwey; S...... 369
    - Success of its educational campaign on election issues among the Negroes. H. L. Moon; S...... 640
    - To continue its activities. F. Kirchwey; S..677; see also...... 607
    - Will a third party grow out of it? F. Kirchwey; S.....145; see also C.... 279
- Conscription. See Selective service
- Cooperative commonwealth federation. See Canada
- Cooperatives
  - Celebrate the hundredth anniversary of the movement; EP...... 760
- Corcoran, Thomas G.
  - Campaigns for Justice W. O. Douglas for vice-president in place of Wallace. I. F. Stone; S...... 7
  - His role in the Littell-Biddle dispute. I. F. Stone; S...... 707
  - Hostility to Wallace may be due to latter's anti-cartel stand; Corcoran's connection with Sterling drugs. I. F. Stone; S... 7
- Cot, Pierre
  - Russia rebuilds; S...... 408
- Cox. Captain, and Lt. Box
  - Civil affairs comme il faut; S...... 321
- Crary, Eleanor C.
  - Praises The Nation for its coverage of the presidential campaign; C...... 139
- Crowley. Leo T. See Foreign economic administration
- Cuneo, John R.
  - Uses of air power, the; S...... 93
- Currie, Laughlin. See Foreign economic administration
- Czechoslovakia
  - Catlos, General F., quisling among the quislings. J. W. Gerber; S...... 559
  - Post-war aspirations. J. Masaryk; S.... 683
  - Project of a Czech-Polish confederation. J. Masaryk; S...... 683
  - Relations with Russia. J. Masaryk; S... 683

D

- Dance, the
  - Balanchine's choreographies. B. H. Haggin; S......418; 541
  - Ballet international. B. H. Haggin; S..626, 753
  - Ballet russe de Monte Carlo. B. H. Haggin; S......418, 483
  - Ballet theater, the. B. H. Haggin; S..483, 541, 571, 753
  - "Bloomer girl." B. H. Haggin; S....... 483
  - Bourgeois gentilhomme. B. H. Haggin; S 418
  - Dancers and choreographers. B. H. Haggin; S...... 362
  - Dances concertantes. B. H. Haggin; S... 418
- Dangerous journey. J. Agee; MP...... 569
- Dark hammock. J. W. Krutch; D...... 810
- Dark waters. J. Agee; MP...... 725
- Davila, Charles
  - Toward a socialist Europe; S...... 611
- Davilla, José, Mexican agricultural worker killed by sheriff in Michigan. C. McWilliams; S...... 687
- Davis. Harold S.
  - Sees The Nation on the side of totalitarianism; C...... 306
- Davis, Michael M.
  - Government and medical care; S...... 498
- Days of glory. J. Agee; MP...... 24
- Dear Ruth. J. W. Krutch; D...... 810
- DeBerry, William
  - Negro union leader at the R. J. Reynolds plant is jailed; EP...... 631
- Defauw, Désiré. B. H. Haggin; M...... 25
- Defense, national. See War effort
- De Gaulle, General Charles. See France
- Del Vayo, Julio Alvarez. See Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
- Delacroix, Eugène, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A 617
- Delman, Minna
  - Comments on "Mr. Hull's bad dream"; C.. 278
- Democratic party
  - Anti-Roosevelt movement in the south collapses; hope now is to block Wallace and name Truman as vice-president; EP.... 58
  - Battle for Wallace at Chicago, the. F. Kirchwey; S..118; see also...... 91
  - Chicago convention renominates Roosevelt; EP 85
  - Electoral college conspiracy; EP..31; see also ......EP..58; EP.. 339
  - Hague's boss rule in New Jersey is a liability for Roosevelt. J. Kerney. Jr.; S.. 232
  - Liberal protests boss rule, a. R. W. Pence; C..250; see also C...... 307
  - Platform, the; EP...... 114
  - See also Presidential campaign of 1944
- Denmark
  - Danish resistance to the nazis. G. Leistikow; S...... 72
  - General strike in Copenhagen; EP...... 30
  - Nazis disband the Danish police. G. Leistikow; S...... 644
- Department of justice
  - Biddle rejects Dies committee demand for an investigation of the CIO-PAC; EP.. 197
  - Files anti-trust suit against forty-seven western railroads; EP...... 255
  - Littell versus Biddle. I. F. Stone; S..... 707
- De Valera. Eamon. See Ireland
- Dewey, Thomas E.
  - And the peace. M. S. Stewart; S...... 375
  - And the Republican governors; EP..143; see also E...... 171
  - Campaign speech on labor problems. F. Kirchwey; S...... 369
  - His cross-country campaign trip. J. A. Wechsler; S...... 398
  - His program on jobs and taxes. M. S. Stewart; S 457
  - History hogs his spotlight; E...... 340
  - In search of a campaign issue; E..171; see also EP...... 143
  - Little man, what now? E. Herrmann; Ct 551
  - Looks at Dumbarton Oaks. I. F. Stone; S..230; see also 261; E......340; 369
  - Opens campaign at Philadelphia with call for a return to Hoover economic policies; EP 310
  - Pledges an "able" cabinet; Hutcheson, W., rumored as his choice for Secretary of labor; EP...... 59
  - Refuses the use of the federal ballot to New York soldiers; EP..87; see also EP..114; EP...... 143
  - "Unwilling" candidate for the presidency, the; EP..31; see also EP...... 1
  - See also Presidential campaign of 1944
- Dies committee
  - Attorney general Biddle rejects its demand for an investigation of the CIO-PAC; EP 197
  - Will probably not be continued by the new Congress; EP...... 630
- Dittmar, General Kurt. See Germany
- Dodecanese islands. See Greece
- Dooman, Eugene Hoffman. See United States—State department
- Double indemnity. J. Agee; MP...... 445
- Douglas, William O.
  - Backed for vice-presidential nomination by T. Corcoran. I. F. Stone; S...... 7
- Draft, the. See Selective service
- Dragon seed. J. Agee; MP...... 165
- Drama. See Haggin, B. H., Krutch, J. W., Marshall. M., for reviews
- Dulles, John Foster. See Presidential campaign of 1944
- Dumbarton Oaks conference. See World war
- Dunn, James Clement
  - Nominated as an assistant secretary of state. I. F. Stone; S..735. 762; see also EP......758; 791
- Dutch East Indies
  - Soekarno, Ir., Japan's Javanese quisling. S. C. Menefee; S...... 99

E

- E. A. M. See Greece
- E. L. A. S. See Greece
- Eakins, Thomas, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A 24
- East, far, middle, and near. See names of countries
- Ebright. Frederick
  - Home is the soldier; P...... 397
- Ecuador
  - Present political situation. J. W. White; S 9
- Eden, Anthony. See Great Britain
- Edge, Walter Evans. See New Jersey
- Edman, Irwin
  - To Henry David Thoreau; P...... 346
- Education
  - Class of 1944, the. O. Tead; S...... 97
  - Rainey, H. P., dismissed from the University of Texas; EP..603; see also C... 754
  - Stimson rejects proposal to educate German prisoners about democracy; EP...... 702
- Eicher, Justice Edward; death brings the mass sedition trial to a standstill; EP.... 702
- Eighteen hundred and twelve. J. Agee; MP.. 569
- Eire. See Ireland
- Eisenhower, General Dwight D.
  - Relations with the Free French for civil rule in France; EP..29; see also ..255: 312
- Elections. See Presidential campaign of 1944
- Embezzled heaven. J. W. Krutch; D...... 598
- Emigrés. See Refugees
- Employment. See Labor
- Engel, Irving M.
  - Justice Black after seven years; S...... 404
- England. See Great Britain
- Eritrea. See Ethiopia

PAGE
Esquire
  Postmaster general's mail ban upheld by the federal district court; EP......... 115
Ethiopia
  Post-war prosperity requires restoration of Eritrea and other territories annexed by Italy. E. S. Pankhurst; C............. 55
European war. See War, European

F

FEPC. See Fair employment practices committee
F.F.I. See France
F. G. L.
  Pennsylvania's G.O.P. is worried; S...... 289
Fair employment practices committee
  Philadelphia strike shows why it should have statutory recognition; E.......... 172
  President urged to ask for passage of the Chavez-Scanlon bill to make the committee permanent; E....285; see also C.... 83
  Receives appropriation, with restrictive provisions, despite opposition from the southern bloc; EP........................ 2
Far east. See names of countries
Farewell, my lovely. J. Agee; MP......... 753
Farming. See Agriculture
Ferguson, I.
  Letter from a soldier on the soldier-vote; C 278
Films. See Agee, J. (for reviews)
Finance, public
  Fiscal program for post-war employment. B. Ruml; S.......491; see also....... 452
  Murray-Truman-Revercomb bill proposes budget allocation to insure full employment; E............................ 761
  Tax program of the Committee for economic development; E................ 311
  Treasury seeks increase in social-security tax; EP............................ 631
  United nations financial and monetary conference at Bretton Woods. I. F. Stone; S....63; see also E....60; EP....86; EP 114; 147
  Votes, jobs, and taxes; the Republican and Democratic programs compared. M. S. Stewart; S............................ 457
Fine, Janet B.
  Lowell, J. R., on the Republican party; C. 139
Finland
  American isolationists encourage it to continue the war; E...................... 4
  Cabinet accepts President Ryti's "understanding" with the nazis; EP.......... 30
  Mannerheim becomes president; expected to seek renewal of peace negotiations with Russia; EP......................... 170
  Relations with, severed by the United States; EP.......................... 30
  Russo-Finnish peace terms, the; EP....... 366
  Withdraws from the war; EP............ 281
  See also Russo-German war
Fischer, Louis
  Dumbarton Oaks: the big-power peace; S....315; see also....312, 340; C.... 542
  Gandhi's new strategy; S........123; see also EP.............................. 170
  Washington jottings; S................. 453
Fish, Hamilton. See New York state
Florida
  Electorate approves the anti-closed-shop amendment. W. H. Joubert; C....754; see also EP.........546; EP......... 603
Foldes, Andor
  Questions Mr. Haggin's attitude on modern music; C....195; see also 53; 109; 137; C.............................. 251
Food. See United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
Foreign economic administration
  Clayton, W.. rumored as successor to Crowley. I. F. Stone; S.................. 678
  Far eastern section under L. Currie tackles post-war problem of Japan. Pacificus; S 436
  State department seeks to take over its activities with W. Clayton in charge; E 703
Fortune
  Presidential poll. B. Berelson; S.......... 515
Forty-eight hours. J. Agee; MP............ 81
France
  Agence francaise de presse, new official news agency. replaces Havas. R. Baxter; S... 287
  And the United States. See Franco-American relations
  Anglo-French relations. See Great Britain —Anglo French relations
  Appointment of R. Murphy as adviser to Eisenhower on French affairs protested. F. Kirchwey; S..................... 255
  Article on, by K. Cannell in the Reader's Digest, protested. K. Boyle and others; C 363
  Bidault, G., president of the Council of resistance, becomes foreign minister in the de Gaulle cabinet; EP................. 310
  Carrel. Alexis, death. M. Cane; P........ 512
  Churchill in Paris; EP.................. 602
PAGE
  De Gaulle government recognized by the allies; EP............................ 502
  De Gaulle versus the F. F. I. F. Kirchwey; S.........632; see also.......... 644
  De Gaulle's speech at Lille; E........424; see also EP.......................... 394
  Evacuee train from Paris. Low; Ct....... 258
  Experiences of some American civil affairs officers. Captain Cox and Lt. Box; S... 321
  Franco-Russian pact concluded; EP........ 729
  Franco urges allied representatives in France to dissolve Spanish units within the maquis; EP.....423; see also..... 632
  French committee of national liberation organizes relief of liberated areas; allied civil affairs units find little to do; EP ....86; see also EP........... 57
  How to recognize a democracy........... 239
  Invited to join the European advisory commission; EP.....602; see also.....638; 688
  Koenig, General P-J., named leader of the interior forces by General Eisenhower; EP........29; see also E.........227; 267
  Maquis' plan for reconstruction, the. M. Clark; S............................ 15
  New press reforms, the. R. Baxter; S.... 287
  News from the liberated areas; EP....... 253
  Past history shows it to be unconquerable. J. Chapiro; S......................... 68
  Should clean house. F. Kirchwey; S...... 255
  Vichy French rule Indo-China under loose Japanese control. S. C. Menefee; S... 99
  Vichyites believe the Anglo-Americans will welcome their aid. T. Adam; S........ 297
Franco, Francisco. See Spain
Franco-American relations
  American recognition of the independence of Syria and Lebanon; EP............. 366
  De Gaulle's visit to President Roosevelt results in de facto recognition of the French committee as the provisional government of France; EP........57; see also EP............................. 86
  Eisenhower, General D. D.. names General P-J. Koenig head of the French forces of the interior; EP.................... 29
  French quislings believe the Anglo-Americans will welcome their aid. T. Adam; S 297
  French underground disappointed by America's failure to recognize the Committee of liberation. M. Clark; S............. 15
  Reber, S., placed in charge of relations with France. F. Kirchwey; S.......... 312
  Roosevelt appoints J. Caffery as representative to the "de facto authority" of France; EP.....366; see also EP..... 394
  United States recognizes the de Gaulle government; EP...................... 502
Frank, Gerold
  Europe's refugee children; S............. 349
  Refugees from Europe report on the crumbling morale of the nazis; S............ 296
  Truth about the terrorists in Palestine, the; S............685; see also............ 674
Frank. Waldo
  Policy for Argentina, a; S...........471, 615
French committee of national liberation. See France
Frenchman's creek. J. Agee; MP........... 445
Fulbright, J. William. See Arkansas
Funk, Casimir, father of the vitamin. B. Harrow; S............................ 741

G

G.I. bill of rights. See Veterans
Gallup, George H.
  House campaign committee opens investigation of his election polls. B. Ginzburg; S..........737; see also 266, 294, 550, 557, 795, 796
Gandhi, Mohandas K. See India
Gannett. Frank E. See Committee for constitutional government
Gannett, Lewis S.
  Europe's wandering Jews—and others; S.. 292
  German soldier, the; S.................. 433
  Meeting of the Inter-governmental committee on refugees; S.................. 292
Gaulle, General Charles de. See France
George, Walter F. See United States—Post war
George II. King. See Greece
Gerber, John W.
  Catlos, General F., quisling among the Slovakian quislings; S..................... 559
Germany
  All-out military defense creates industrial paralysis. Argus; S................... 410
  Allies install a pro-nazi as mayor of Rötgen; EP............................ 450
  Allies urged to warn nazis on atrocities against German anti-nazis; EP......... 365
  Anti-nazi underground activity. Argus; S....801; see also EP.....310; C..... 727
  "Battle supplement" for front-line troops. Argus; S............................ 745
  Berlin people's court in action, the. Argus; S 519
  Christmas, 1944. Argus; S.............. 801
PAGE
  Coal shortage. Argus; S................. 561
  Defeatism in action. Argus; S......382; see also 325
  Defense rallies. Argus; S...........184; see also 130
  Dittmar, General K., sees defeat possible; urges continuation of fight to win a softer peace; EP..................... 281
  Festung Europa becomes Festung Deutschland. Argus; S...................... 46
  Foreign "volunteers" in the army. Argus; S 774
  Goebbels's Reich film bureau plans for post-war theaters. Argus; S.......... 17
  Gordeler, K., former mayor of Leipzig, hanged with six others for opposition to the government; EP.................. 365
  Himmler prohibits the alteration of party uniforms. Argus; S................ 212
  Himmler pushes the campaign for an increase in births. Argus; S........... 17
  Hitler and a staff of architects plan the Berlin of tomorrow. Argus; S........ 17
  Hitler mystery, the. Argus; S......745; see also EP......601; Ct............ 689
  Interviews with German prisoners of war. L. S. Gannett; S.................... 433
  "Map psychosis" in eastern Germany. Argus; S 184
  Nazi news and propaganda.............. 44
  Nazi propaganda techniques in Turkey. M. Carter; S.....177; see also EP..... 170
  Officers' plot, the. Argus; S........156; see also E...115; 128; EP...141; 152; 240; 295; 437; 745
  Post-war:
    British trade union congress endorses the use of forced German labor. K. Hutchison; S 513
    Kilgore committee urges the breaking up of German cartels and the punishment of leading industrialists; E.......... 632
    Morgenthau plan for deindustrialization, the; E 395
    Nation, The, offers a plan; E......395; see also C.......543; E........789; 793
    Nazis export funds to finance post-war party. Argus; S.................. 46
    Russia expects the allies to fulfil their pledge on the punishment of war criminals. A .L. Strong: S.........460; see also 433
    What shall we do with the Ruhr? A. Norden; S 380
    Will the nazis "go underground"? F. Kirchwey; S....173; see also EP.... 365
    World Jewish congress offers a program for restoring Jewish property seized by the nazis; EP.................. 730
  Propagandists report a regime of terror under American military occupation. Argus; S 616
  Refugees from Europe report on the crumbling morale of the nazis. G. Frank; S........................... 296
  Robot bombs, the; other secret weapons to come. Argus; S.....73; see also..... 561
  Russo-German war. See Russo-German war
  Swedish poll reveals that 80 percent of the Germans questioned see a military defeat inevitable; EP 281
  Thalmann, E.; and Breitscheidt, R., reported killed during British bombing; EP 365
  Three-front war drives morale to new low. Argus; S 101
  Total mobilization. Argus; S........212; see also EP....141; EP....449; 690; EP 729
  Transportation difficulties. Argus; S.... 645
  "Unconditional resistance." Argus; S..353; see also EP....449; EP....450; 473; 643; 744
  Value of the mark drops following the Normandy invasion. Argus; S........ 46
  Von Kluge replaces von Rundstedt as commander on the western European front; EP 58
  "What about stopping 'em up right now?" Low; Ct 405
  Why the wehrmacht fights on. K. O. Paetel; S 437
  See also War, European
Ghinelli, Mario. See Italy
Gieseking, Walter, used for cultural propaganda by the nazis in Turkey. M. Carter; S 177
Gigli, Beniamino. See Italy
Gil Robles, José Maria. See Spain
Ginzburg, Benjamin
  Dr. Gallup on the mat; S...........737; see also 266, 294, 550, 557, 795, 796
Gitt, Josiah, W., Pennsylvania candidate for congress. S. C. Menefee; S.......... 468
Goebbels, Joseph. See Germany
Goes, Coriolanos de. See Brazil
Gördeler, Karl. See Germany
Government finances. See Finance, public
Governmental agencies. See names of agencies
Graham, Betty
  China in crisis; S....373; see also E.... 368
Granbery, John C.
  Reflections on race; C.................. 250

PAGE
Great Britain
  Anglo-American relations:
   American business groups fear continued lend-lease aid will give Britain world trade advantages; EP.............. 254
   Lyttelton, O., declares that the United States was not provoked into war by Japan; EP 3
   New lend-lease agreement; EP......... 701
   Stettinius disassociates United States from the British veto of Sforza. F. Kirchwey; S...732: see also E...704; 799
  Anglo-French relations:
   And the Smuts proposal for a western bloc; EP.....602; see also.....683: 688
   Churchill promises early recognition of a provisional French government; EP.. 393
   Progress made in negotiations between A. Eden and P. Vienot of the French committee of national liberation; EP.. 29
  Anglo-Greek relations:
   British, bearing gifts, the. F. Kirchwey; S........732; see also........ 799
   Churchill and Eden in Athens to negotiate peace with the EAM; EP...... 786
   Dilemma of the Labor party. P. Strauss; S 763
   Greek people oppose British efforts to restore King George II; EP....422; see also E................505; 765; 772
   Rule Britannia. C. Poulos; S....772; see also EP 758, 765
  Anglo-Indian affairs:
   Gandhi's compromise proposals rejected by Secretary of State L. S. Amery; EP 170
   Gandhi's new strategy. L. Fischer; S.........123; see also EP......... 170
  Anglo-Italian relations:
   British veto Count C. Sforza as Italian minister of foreign affairs; E....704; see also EP...............674; 732; 799
  Anglo-Palestinian relations:
   Assassination of Lord Moyne. G. Frank; S....685; see also EP...602; EP... 674
  Anglo-Polish relations:
   Churchill's statement on the Polish boundary; EP...759; see also EP... 393
  Anglo-Soviet relations
   Churchill invites Stalin to meet to discuss political differences; EP........ 393
   Churchill sees early settlement of Russo-Polish question; EP................ 393
  Anglo-Spanish relations:
   Churchill's praise for Spain condemned. Corporal; C 111
   Templewood, Lord, resigns as ambassador; describes nazi activities in Madrid; E........786; see also........ 791
  Bracken, B., urges the Dutch not to relinquish any part of their empire; EP.. 311
  Churchill reports on casualties from robot bombs; EP 57
  Churchill reviews military developments and discusses political problems; EP.... 393
  Conference of the labor parties of the commonwealth. F. R. Scott; S........... 402
  Labor party will make a bid for independent power at the next general election. K. Hutchison; S...427, 583; see also E 560
  Post-war housing. K. Hutchison; S..641; see also 583
  Role of the British army in the battle of western Europe. C. G. Bolté; S...... 342
  Social security plan, the. K. Hutchison; S..........427; see also EP.......... 394
  Tory democracy and Romanism in a partnership? G. A. Borgese; S........... 429
  Town and country planning bills, the. K. Hutchison; S 583
  Trade union congress urges use of forced German labor after the war. K. Hutchison; S 513
  White paper on its contribution to the war; EP 702
   See also War, European
Greece
  Britain's General Scobie uses food as a weapon against the Greeks. C. Poulos; S........772; see also EP........758, 765
  British, bearing gifts, the. F. Kirchwey; S............732; see also............ 799
  British in open warfare against the E.A.M. and E.L.A.S. C. Poulos; S......772; see also EP.....................758; 765
  Churchill and Eden in Athens to negotiate peace with the EAM; EP............ 786
  Papandreou's role in the Anglo-Greek crisis. C. Poulos; S.............772; see also EP.....................758; 765
  People oppose British efforts to restore King George; EP................422; see also E..................505; 765; 772
  Sforza declares Italy ready to turn Dodecanese islands over to the Greeks; EP..........254; see also C.......... 391
  Strength of the E.A.M.; E.............. 505
Greenberg, Beatrice S.
  Comments on "Big power peace," by Louis Fischer; C.....542; see also..... 315
Greenberg, Clement
  Articles on art:
   Surrealist painting 192, 219

PAGE
  Reviews of art exhibitions:
   Art of this century.................. 598
   Baziotes, William 598
   Delacroix, Eugène 617
   Eakins, Thomas 24
   Guadaloupe Posada, José 389
   Hartley, Marsden 810
   Homer, Winslow 539
   Motherwell, Robert 598
   Rattner, Abraham 445
   Tunnard, John 626
Greene, Marc T.
  Praises J. Agee's film criticisms; C...... 251
Grew, Joseph Clark
  Nominated as an assistant secretary of state. I. F. Stone; S........735, 762; see also EP.......................... 758
Grzegorzewski, Edward
  Organizes the college of medicine in Lublin's new Curie university. A. L. Strong; S 740
Guadaloupe Posada, José. C. Greenberg; A 389

H

Hagen, Paul
  Answers statements about him made by J. Steel in radio broadcast; C....... 447; see also C.......................... 542
  Comments on "No unity with fascists" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C.............. 26
Haggin, B. H.
  Articles on music:
   Acoustics of the New York City Center. 541
   Albeneri trio 699
   Anderson, Marian, recital............. 699
   Bloomer girl 483
   Concertos 726
   Defauw and the Chicago symphony orchestra 25
   Fidelio 811
   Heifetz, Jascha 222, 305
   Hempel, Frieda 571
   Hindemith, Paul 109, 137
   Huberman's musicianship 222
   Jazz in relation to American symphonic music 571, 599
   Lax performances by the New York philharmonic 335
   Marriage of Figaro, the.............. 82
   Modern music ....53, 109, 137; see also C.........195; C......... 251
   Music for films 390
   Musicians and selective service........ 25
   New friends of music................. 699
   Ortenberg, B., joins the Budapest quartet 726
   Role of the critic, the................ 277
   Rubinstein's performance of Beethoven piano concerto No. 3 with Toscanini conducting 626
   Schneider, Alexander, and the Albeneri trio 699
   Seldes, G., views on jazz.........599; see also 571
   Song of Norway..................... 305
   Stock, Frederick 25
   Stravinsky, Igor 53, 109
   Toscanini, Arturo 541, 571, 626
  Articles on the dance:
   Balanchine's choreographies 418, 541
   Ballet international 626, 753
   Ballet russe de Monte Carlo.........418, 483
   Ballet theater 483, 541, 571, 753
   Bloomer girl 483
   Bourgeois gentilhomme 418
   Dancers and choreographers........... 362
   Dances concertantes 418
  Music, recorded 165, 249, 305, 335, 390, 446, 671, 726, 753, 782
   See also Book reviews
Hague, Frank. See New Jersey
Hail the conquering hero. J. Agee; MP.... 361
Halsey, Admiral William Frederick, Jr.
  See War, Pacific
Hamburger, Ludwig
  Comments on H. L. Matthews' report of contacts between allied and axis diplomats in Italy; C.................... 279
Hamilton, Walton
  Supreme court today, the; S.........179, 207
Hansel, Alvin H.
  Planning full employment; S............ 492
Hapsburg, Otto von. See Austria
Harrow, Benjamin
  Funk, Casimir, father of the vitamin; S 741
Hartley, Marsden, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A 810
Harvey. J. W. Krutch; D................ 624
Havas agency. See France
Hawes, Elizabeth
  How will the women vote? S......344; see also 234
Hayes, Carlton J. H. See United States—And Spain
Health, public. See Medicine
Hedgeman, Anna Arnold
  FEPC should be made permanent; C..... 83
Heifetz, Jascha. B. H. Haggin; M....222, 305
Heller, Edward. See Surplus property board
Hempel, Frieda. B. H. Haggin; M........ 571

PAGE
Hengyang. See Chinese-Japanese war
Herald Tribune, New York
  Condemns CIO-PAC as a pressure group with distinct economic interests; EP.... 282
Herrmann, Eva
  Little man, what now? Ct.............. 551
Hillman, Sidney. See Congress of industrial organizations—Political action committee
Himmler, Heinrich. See Germany
Hindemith, Paul. B. H. Haggin; M...109, 137
Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
Holland. See Netherlands
Holmes, General Julius C.
  Nominated as an assistant secretary of state. I. F. Stone; S........735, 762; see also EP.......................... 758
Home in Indiana. J. Agee; MP.......... 24
Home is the soldier. F. Ebright; P........ 397
Homer, Winslow, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A 539
Horne, G. R.
  War bond purchases and inflation; C..111; see also EP.......................... 31
Housing
  F.D.R.'s post-war program. I. F. Stone; S 578
  Government housing plan for veterans. C. Abrams; S....................... 498
  New homes for Britain. K. Hutchison; S............641; see also............ 583
Houston, Charles H.
  Negro soldier, the; S.................... 496
Huberman, Bronislaw. B. H. Haggin; M.. 222
Hudson, Manley O.
  America's responsibility for world peace; S 489
Humphries, Rolfe
  Angels, the; P......................... 687
Hungary
  Deports 400,000 Jews to Silesian extermination camps; EP.................... 58
  In a state of civil war; Szalasi becomes premier under German protection;; E... 505
  Nazis hold on desperately to keep path open for their retreating Balkan troops; EP 253
  Relations with Germany; E............. 604
  Rescue the remaining Jews! F. Kirchwey; S..229; see also EP..171: EP.. 503
  See also War, European
Hurley, Robert A. See Surplus property board
Husbands, Sam H.; his appointment to the Surplus property board is held up. I. F. Stone; S........635; see also........ 678
Hutcheson, William
  Rumored as Dewey choice for Secretary of labor; EP 59
Hutchison, Keith
  Britain's new social security plan; S..... 427
  British Trade union congress, the S...... 513
  End of Britain's party truce; S..427, 583; see also E.......................... 560
  Post-war housing for Britain; S.....641; see also 583

I

I remember Mama. J. W. Krutch; D...... 568
Impatient years, the. J. Agee; MP........ 334
In bed we cry. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 669
In the wind......14, 43, 71, 98, 127, 154, 182, 210, 237, 262, 291, 317, 346, 377, 403, 432, 512; C....754, 558, 586, 612 642, 686, 714, 742, 771, 798
India
  Bose, S. C., Japan's Indian quisling. S. C. Menefee; S 99
  Gandhi's compromise proposals rejected by Secretary of state L. S. Amery; EP... 170
  Gandhi's new strategy. L. Fischer; S..123; see also EP.......................... 170
Indiana
  Anti-New deal sentiment and the election. W. Shelton; S....................... 463
Indo-China
  Vichy French rule under loose Japanese control. S. C. Menefee; S............ 99
Industry. See Business
Inflation. See Business
Inter-governmental committee on refugees. See Refugees
Iran
  Russo-Iranian dispute over oil concessions; E 577
Ireland
  De Valera refuses to pledge denial of asylum to axis war criminals; EP........ 630
Italian war. See War, European—Italy
Italy
  Allied agencies appear incapable of bringing help to the starving people; EP.... 630
  Allies and the partisans, the. M. Bellini; S...324; see also 559; C...627; EP... 630
  Allies save the king, the. M. Bellini; S... 743
  Avanti, Socialist paper, demands that the Allied control commission leave the country; E........367; see also EP........ 394
  British veto Count C. Sforza as Italian minister of foreign affairs; E......704; see also EP..................674, 732, 799

PAGE

- Churchill-Roosevelt statement increases the authority of the Bonomi government; EP ... 394
- Ghinelli, M., arrested for 1931 attack on A. Toscanini; EP ... 760
- Has no objection to the annexation of the Dodecanese islands by Greece; EP..254; see also C ... 391
- Italians force cancellation of concert by B. Gigli because of his pro-fascist sympathies; EP ... 3
- Killing of P. Carretta; E...367; see also EP...394; C ... 419
- Limited help recommended by UNRRA council; EP.....367; see also EP ... 394
- Matthews, H. L., reports contacts between allied and axis diplomats; record of the German ambassador, Baron E. von Weizsaecker. L. Hamburger; C ... 279
- Monarchists hope for prolonged allied occupation as a protection against revolution. G. Salvemini; S...211, 238
- Mussolini's role in the murder of the Rosselli brothers. A. Rosselli; C ... 727
- Orlando, V., seen as allied choice for Bonomi's successor EP...630; see also EP ... 674
- Poletti, C., AMG commissioner for Rome area, promises purge of fascist collaborators from government posts; EP ... 3
- Program of the Bonomi government. P. Nenni; S......351; see also EP ... 338
- Rowell, the AMG, and the Roman antifascists. G. Salvemini; S ... 238
- Speech by C. Sforza on foreign policy; EP...254; see also C ... 391

J

- J.K.G.
  - How to predict the loser in the campaign; S ... 550
- Jamming the blues. J. Agee; MP ... 753
- Japan
  - And the Soviet Union:
    - Stalin lists Japan as an aggressor nation; EP ... 602
  - And the United States. See War, Pacific
  - Chinese-Japanese war. See Chinese-Japanese war.
  - Government institutes total mobilization and other war measures to meet a "grave crisis." C. G. Bolté; S ... 314
  - Has an underground. Pacificus; S ... 716
  - Its puppets in Asia. S. C. Menefee; S ... 99
  - Post-war:
    - Allied post-war policy. Pacificus; S ... 436
    - President Roosevelt hints at permanent American control of the mandated islands; EP ... 226
  - Tojo overthrown as premier; new government is headed by General K. Koiso; E. ... 116
- Japanese Americans
  - Army lifts ban against their return to the west coast. C. McWilliams; S ... 797
  - Supreme court decisions in the Korematsu and Endo cases; E ... 788
- Japanese-Chinese war. See Chinese-Japanese war
- Jarrell, Randall
  - Second air force; P ... 526
- Jews
  - And Nordic superiority. J. C. Granbery; C ... 250
  - And the presidential election. S. S. Wise; S ... 487
  - Anti-semitism as a fascist weapon....496; see also ... 487
  - Condition is desperate in liberated Rumania; EP ... 576
  - Meeting of the Inter-governmental committee on refugees. L. S. Gannett; S.. 292
  - Nazis massacre over 1,500,000 in two-year period in the "model extermination camps"; EP ... 58
  - Refugee children of Europe. G. Frank; S ... 349
  - Rescue them from Hungary. F. Kirchwey; S..229; see also EP..171; EP.. 503
  - Roosevelt calls for unrestricted immigration into Palestine; EP ... 503
  - World Jewish congress offers a program for restoring property seized by the nazis; EP ... 730
  - Zionist organization meets to discuss immediate and post-war problems; EP.......503
  - See also Palestine
- Johnson, Olin D. See South Carolina
- Johnson bill. See United States—Post-war
- Jones, Jesse H.
  - Chides Texas anti-fourth-term Democrats; his nephew, G. Butler, is a leading figure in the group; EP ... 58
  - Nominees he backs for Surplus property board rejected; EP....678; see also.... 635
- Josephs, Ray
  - Argentine show-down? S...148; see also EP ... 142
  - Chile's democracy in danger; S ... 609
- Joubert, W. H.
  - Florida's anti-closed-shop law; C.....754; see also EP.........546; EP ... 603
- Journalism. See Newspapers
- Jugoslavia. See Yugoslavia

K

PAGE

- Kansas
  - Lambertson, W. P., defeated in the primaries; EP ... 170
  - Will go Republican. M. P. Akers; S.... 464
- Kelly, Richard N.
  - Those Italian war prisoners; C ... 307
- Kemper, J. P.
  - Sees social equality as unattainable; urges some segregational basis; C ... 250
- Kennedy, J. P., opposes Wallace as vice-presidential candidate. I. F. Stone; S.. 7
- Kerney, James, Jr.
  - Hague's boss rule endangers Roosevelt's chance of victory in New Jersey; S.232; see also EP ... 603
- Kerr, Anne
  - Comments on editorial "Churchill's blunderbuss"; C ... 251
- Keyerleber, Karl
  - Lausche, F. J., and Ohio politics; S ... 95
- Kilgore committee
  - Issues report on cartels and national sercurity; E ... 632
- Kilgore-Murray-Truman bill. See United States—post-war
- Kindelan, Alfredo. See Spain
- King, Judson
  - Record of the REA, the; S ... 41
- Kingdon, Frank
  - Subversion of America; S ... 497
- Kirchwey, Freda
  - America and Franco; S ... 548
  - Announces a conference of The Nation Associates on "America's opportunity to create and maintain lasting peace"..337; see also EP....450, 485, 509, 554, 611, 615
  - Battle for Wallace at Chicago, the; S.118; see also ...89; 91
  - British bearing gifts, the; S ... 732
  - Campaign notes; S ... 369
  - Challenge of the election, the; S ... 485
  - De Gaulle and the resistance; S......632; see also ... 644
  - Dewey on labor; S ... 369
  - Future of the P.A.C.; a new popular front? S........677; see also ... 607
  - Hitler underground; S ... 173
  - How to keep the peace; S ... 312
  - Let France clean house; S ... 255
  - Norris, George W., death; S........283; see also ... 343
  - Old guard rules both major political parties; prospects for a third party; S...........145; see also C ... 279
  - Rescue Hungary's Jews! S ... 229
  - Willkie, Wendell, death; S ... 421
- Kirk, Grayson
  - Problem of post-war national security; S ... 490
- Kleberg, Richard M. See Texas
- Kluge, General Guenther von. See Germany
- Knight, Max E.
  - Comments on "Don't call us G.I. Joe" by J. Spingarn; C..543; see also 203; C.. 419
- Koenig, General Pierre-Joseph. See French committee of national liberation
- Koiso, General Kuniaka. See Japan
- Korea
  - Crown prince Yi Ewa held prisoner by the Japanese; may become puppet king. S. C. Menefee; S ... 99
- Kronenberger, Louis
  - Strachey, Lytton; S ... 158
- Krutch, Joseph Wood
  - Detective story, the; S ... 647
  - Returns to The Nation as regular drama critic; EP ... 451
  - Reviews of plays:
    - Bell for Adano, a ... 781
    - Bloomer girl. See Haggin, B. H. (for review)
    - Catherine was great ... 194
    - Dark hammock ... 810
    - Dear Ruth ... 810
    - Embezzled heaven ... 598
    - Harvey ... 624
    - I remember Mama ... 568
    - In bed we cry ... 669
    - Late George Apley, the ... 725
    - Meet a body ... 568
    - Perfect marriage, the ... 624
    - Sadie Thompson ... 698
    - Seven lively arts ... 781
    - Soldier's wife ... 482
    - Song of Norway. See Haggin, B. H., for review
    - Streets are guarded, the ... 725
    - Violet ... 624
    - Visitor, the ... 539
    - While the sun shines. See Marshall, M., for review
  - Vanishing playwright, the; S ... 670

L

- L. M.
  - Urges United States to educate Italian prisoners of war about democracy; C... 110
- Labor
  - C.I.O. looks ahead, the. P. Murray; S....554; see also ... 495

PAGE

  - Economic security and world peace; excerpts from addresses delivered at conference of The Nation Associates...489, 554
  - F.D.R.'s program for post-war employment. I. F. Stone; S ... 578
  - Hutcheson, W., rumored as Dewey choice for Secretary of labor; EP ... 59
  - Manpower. See War effort—Manpower
  - Murray-Truman-Revercomb bill for post-war full employment; E ... 761
  - Philadelphia transit strike, the; E....172; see also C....306 ... 466
  - Sailors of the U.S.S. Coos Bay collect funds to "buy off" striking workers at Wright aircraft factory; EP ... 2
  - State unemployment compensation laws should be revised. I. F. Stone; S..... 678
  - Thomas, R. J., calls for planning for full utilization of manpower after the war; E ... 5
  - Views of T. E. Dewey. F. Kirchwey; S.. 369
  - Votes, jobs, and taxes; the Republican and Democratic programs compared. M. S. Stewart; S ... 457
  - Wages:
    - Increase seems assured by cost-of-living report of the National war labor board; EP ... 339
    - Pepper resolution for a 65-cent minimum. I. F. Stone; S ... 635
- Labor unions
  - A. F. of L. refuses British trade union invitation to world labor conference; EP ... 630
  - British trade union congress favors a hard peace for Germany. K. Hutchison; S.. 513
  - National association of manufacturers sponsors state amendments to outlaw closed-shop contracts; EP....546; see also EP....603; C ... 754
  - Supreme court decision in cases of anti-Negro discrimination by the Brotherhood of locomotive firemen and engineers; E ... 788
  - Victory of J. C. Petrillo and the musicians' union over the recording companies; EP ... 630
  - Workers of the R. J. Reynolds plant win union security, but Negro leader, W. DeBerry, is jailed; EP ... 631
- La Follette, Robert M., Jr.
  - Attacks the Dumbarton Oaks plan; EP... 339
- La Guardia, Fiorello H.
  - Congress and the peace; S ... 486
- Lambertson, W. P. See Kansas
- Lamer, Martin L.
  - Comments on J. Agee's motion-picture reviews; C ... 167
- Lamm, Hans
  - Wallace's defeat; C ...167
- Lange, Oscar
  - What peace for Germany? S....793; see also E.....395; C.....543; E..... 789
- Late George Apley, the. J. W. Krutch; D.. 725
- Lathers, Swift
  - Michigan editor arrested for denouncing slaying of J. Davilla, Mexican agricultural worker. C. McWilliams; S ... 687
- Latin America
  - Civilian uprisings oust dictatorships in several countries; EP ... 87
  - Faces acute economic problems despite a war boom; EP ... 87
  - Unrest grows as democratic forces fight their dictators. J. W. White; S ... 9
  - Welles urges a meeting of the foreign ministers of the Americas to discuss hemisphere problems; EP ... 198
  - What the policy of the United States should be. W. Frank; S....471; 615
- Laurel, José. See Philippine islands
- Lausche, Frank J.
  - Big man in Ohio politics, the. K. Keyerleber; S ... 95
- Lazarsfeld, Paul F.
  - Campaign facts and controversies; S..... 435
  - Checking the accuracy of the various presidential polls; S ... 557
  - Negro vote, the; S ... 379
  - Post-mortem on the election; S ... 613
- Lebanon
  - United States recognizes independence of; appointment of G. Wadsworth as minister criticized; EP ... 366
- Le Corbeiller, Jean
  - Urges liberals to register; C ... 447
- Leistikow, Gunnar
  - Danish resistance to the nazis; S ... 72
  - Germans disband the Danish police; S.... 644
- Lend-lease act. See United States
- Lequerica, José Felix. See Spain
- Leon, Marion Arnold
  - Praises The Nation; C ... 110
- Lessner, Erwin
  - Describes German installations and military strength in Finland; E ... 4
- Levin, Meyer
  - On the Spanish frontier; S ... 587
- Lewis, Alfred Baker
  - Management's share of blame for the Philadelphia transport strike; C....306; see also E....172; ... 466
- Leyte. See War, Pacific

PAGE

- Lilienthal, David E.
  - Senator Norris and the TVA; S........ 343
- Literature
  - Books of 1944—a selected list........... 662
  - Detective story, the. J. W. Krutch; S... 647
  - Nodier after a century. P. Rosenfeld; S.. 18
  - Notes by the way. M. Marshall; S 522, 562, 590, 618, 652, 718, 746, 802
  - Strachey, Lytton. L. Kronenberger; S... 158
  - Vanishing playwright, the. J. W. Krutch; S 670
- Littell, Norman M.
  - Anti-semitism as a fascist weapon; S....496; see also 497
  - Versus Biddle. I. F. Stone; S.......... 707
- Lost in a harem. J. Agee; MP............ 725
- Loewenstein, Karl
  - Atlantic charter and the principle of self-determination, the; S................ 235
- Low, cartoons
  - Cooperation conundrum 703
  - Diplomatic courtesy in China 638
  - Evacuee train from Paris 258
  - Hitler mystery 689
  - Neutrality at Rome 430
  - Not here—there's the spot for the picnic. 727
  - On the western front 738
  - "Patience, pals. Let's get it focused".... 231
  - Sleepless nights 129
  - Study in self-restraint 511
  - War of movement in Italy 42
  - "What about stopping 'em up right now?" 405
- Luce, Clare Boothe. See Presidential campaign of 1944
- Lutz, Alma
  - Seeks letters from men and women in the service for inclusion in a book; C..... 280
- Lynn, Winfred
  - Supreme court rules that his case of refusal to serve in segregated army regiment is a moot cause. D. Macdonald; S 13
- Lyttelton, Oliver. See Great Britain—Anglo American relations

M

- Macdonald, Dwight
  - Case of W. Lynn; the Supreme court's moot suit; S 13
- MacLeish, Archibald
  - Nominated as an assistant secretary of state. I. F. Stone; S....735, 762; see also EP.........................758; 791
  - People are indivisible, the; S........... 509
- Mademoiselle Fifi. J. Agee; MP 698
- Maestro, M.
  - Comments on "Garibaldi's return" by M. Bellini; C....627; see also 559
- Magazines. See names of magazines
- Magnes, J. L.
  - Compromise for Palestine; C........... 783
- Malinowski, W. R.
  - Warsaw uprising, the; S....347; see also EP 338
- Malinin, N. See World war—Dumbarton Oaks conference
- Malone, R. T.
  - Comments on "Sex and the censor" by P. Wylie; C....195; see also 39; C...... 110
- Man, Alexander
  - Labor shortages and unemployment; C.... 139
- Man in Half moon street, the. J. Agee; MP 753
- Mannerheim, Baron Carl Gustav. See Finland
- Mannes, Marya
  - Interview with Lequerica, an; S......... 114
- Manpower. See War effort
- Marcantonio, Vito. See New York state
- Marine raiders. J. Agee; MP............ 53
- Marshall, Margaret
  - Notes by the way; S......522, 562, 590, 618, 652, 718, 746, 802
  - While the sun shines; D............... 389
- Masaryk, Jan
  - Europe's road to peace S....683; see also 688
- Matthews, Herbert L.
  - His reports on the deaths of Carretta and Caruso in Italy condemned. P. P. Morand; C....419; see also E....367; EP 394
  - Reports contacts between allied and axis diplomats in Italy. L. Hamburger; C.. 279
- Maverick, Maury. See Smaller war plants corporation
- McMahon, Francis E.
  - Comments on "No unity with fascists" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C............... 195
- McNaughton, General Andrew G. L. See Canada
- McWilliams, Carey
  - California is for Roosevelt; S.......... 461
  - Tear for José Davilla, a; S............ 687
  - Watch the west coast; S............... 263
- Medicine
  - Funk, Casimir, father of the vitamin. B. Harrow; S 741
  - High percentage of draft rejections reveals need for adequate medical and dental care in this country; E....88; see also C 167
  - Medical schools reopen in liberated Poland; equipment badly needed. A. L. Strong; S 740
- Meet a body. J. W. Krutch; D........... 568
- Meet me in St. Louis. J. Agee; MP 670
- Mehring, Walter
  - Behind the German generals' plot; S...128; see also E...115; EP...141; 152; 156; 240; 295; 437; 735
- Méndez, Leopoldo
  - And the Mexican workshop for popular graphic art. E. Wilder; A........... 299
- Menefee, Selden C.
  - Gitt, Josiah, W., Pennsylvania's grass-roots candidate for congress; S...... 468
  - Japan's quislings in Asia; S............ 99
- Merrill, H. M.
  - Wallace's defeat; C.................... 167
- Mexico
  - Taller de grafica popular, the. E Wilder; A 299
- Middle east. See names of countries
- Migueis, J. R.
  - Salazar of Portugal: forgotten fascist; S 715
- Mikolajczyk, Stanislaw. See Poland
- Military training. See Selective service
- Minnesota
  - Ball, J. H., upsets the Republican apple cart. W. Shelton; S....463; see also EP....423; EP 502
- Missouri
  - Clark, B. C., defeated in the primaries; EP 170
  - Election trends. M. P. Akers; S......... 464
- Mitchell, Kate L.
  - What to do about China; S....708; see also E 705
- Money. See Finance, public
- Monopolies
  - And the international business conference at Rye; E 632
  - Are they inevitable? S. Chase; S....... 768
  - Corcoran, T. G., used his influence to obtain mild consent decree for Sterling drugs. I. F. Stone; S................ 7
  - Department of justice files anti-trust suit against forty-seven western railroads; EP 255
- Moon, Henry Lee
  - How the Negroes voted; S....640; see also 486
- Moore, Marianne
  - Propriety; P 656
- Morand, Paul Phelps
  - Attacks H. L. Matthews' reporting on the deaths of Carretta and Caruso in Rome; C 419
- Morgenthau plan. See Germany—Post-war
- Mortola, Alexis
  - Wallace's defeat; C.................... 167
- Motherwell, Robert, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A 598
- Moving pictures. See Agee, J. (for reviews)
- Muenzinger, Karl F.
  - Why there is no active anti-Nazi underground in Germany; C....727; see also EP 310; 801
- Murphy, Robert. See United States—State department
- Murray, Philip
  - Labor's fight for democracy; S......495, 554
- Music (articles by B. H. Haggin)
  - Acoustics of the New York City Center.. 541
  - Anderson, Marian, recital 699
  - Bloomer girl 483
  - Concertos 726
  - Defauw and the Chicago symphony orchestra 25
  - Fidelio 811
  - For films 390
  - Heifetz, Jascha 222, 305
  - Hempel, Frieda 571
  - Hindemith, Paul 109, 137
  - Huberman's musicianship 222
  - Jazz in relation to American symphonic music 571, 599
  - Lax performances by the New York philharmonic 335
  - Marriage of Figaro, the 82
  - Modern music....53, 109, 137; see also C....195; C 251
  - Musicians and selective service 25
  - New friends of music 699
  - Ortenberg, E., joins the Budapest quartet. 726
  - Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.
  - Role of the critic, the 277
  - Rubinstein's performance of Beethoven piano concerto No. 3 with Toscanini conducting 626
  - Schneider, Alexander, in recital with the Albeneri trio 699
  - Seldes, G., views on jazz..599; see also.. 571
  - Song of Norway 305
  - Stock, Frederick 25
  - Stravinsky, Igor 53, 109
  - Toscanini, Arturo 541, 571, 626
- Myrdal, Gunnar
  - Sees United States as a backward area in the post-war economic world. I. F. Stone; S....117; see also 175

N

PAGE

- N. C. P. A. C. See National citizens political action committee
- Nation, The
  - Fifty years ago 64, 178, 294, 407, 552, 682, 797
  - On the side of totalitarianism. H. S. Davis; C 306
  - Opposed third term, supports a fourth. S. D. N.; C......................... 420
  - Plan for post-war Germany, a; E....395; see also C....543; E..............789; 793
  - Praise for its coverage of the presidential campaign. E. C. Crary; C.... 139
  - Praise for publishing material on Negro soldiers. M. A. Leon; C 110
  - Seventy-five years ago......38, 150, 226, 374, 508, 636, 767
  - Should not accept advertising from the American Mercury. J. L. Brod; C 447
  - Ten years ago 8, 122, 234, 350, 465, 610, 739
  - Twenty-five years ago 96, 206, 323, 428, 579, 710
  - Why it supports Roosevelt for reelection; E 503
- Nation associates, the
  - Conference on the opportunity for lasting peace, excerpts from addresses....485; see also 509, 554, 611, 615
  - To hold a conference on "America's opportunity to create and maintain lasting peace." F. Kirchwey....337; see also EP 450
  - With other organizations calls a mass meeting for Republican Spain....731; see also EP....758; EP 786
- National association of manufacturers
  - Its pre-election "educational" fund; EP.. 282
  - Sponsors amendments to state constitutions to outlaw closed-shop contracts; EP....546; see also EP....603; C.... 754
- National citizens political action committee
  - Votes to continue its existence. F. Kirchwey; S 677
  - See also Congress of industrial organizations—Political action committee
- National council of teachers of English
  - Magazine committee submits a critical report on the Reader's Digest; EP....... 675
- National defense. See War effort
- National income; the Brookings institution pamphlet. I. F. Stone; S.............. 452
- National planning association
  - Issues report on American world-trade opportunities; EP 702
- National service act. See Selective service
- National velvet. J. Agee; MP 781
- Nazism. See Germany
- Near east. See names of countries
- Negrín, Juan. See Spain
- Negroes
  - And the Philadelphia transit strike; E 172; see also C...................306; 466
  - And the presidential election. P. N. Lazarsfeld; S....379; see also EP....114; 466; 486; 640
  - FEPC receives appropriation, with restrictive provisions, despite opposition from the southern bloc; EP 2
  - FEPC should be made permanent. A. A. Hedgeman; C..83; see also E..172; E.. 285
  - Navy accepts Negro women in the Waves; EP 503
  - Negro soldier, the. C. H. Houston; S.... 496
  - Social equality seen as unattainable; some segregational basis urged. J. P. Kemper; C 250
  - Supreme court decision in cases of discrimination by the Brotherhood of locomotive firemen and engineers; E...... 788
  - Supreme court rules that the case of W. Lynn is a moot cause. D. Macdonald; S 13
  - Wright aircraft workers go on wildcat strike to protest transfer of Negro workers into white department EP 2
- Nelson, Donald M. See United States—and China; War effort—War production board
- Nenni, Pietro
  - Rebirth of Italy, the; S....351; see also EP 338
- Netherlands
  - Colijn, Hendrik, death; EP............ 631
  - Urged by B. Bracken not to relinquish any part of its empire; EP.......... 311
  - See also Dutch East Indies
- New deal. See Presidential campaign of 1944
- New friends of music. B. H. Haggin; M.... 699
- New Jersey
  - Edge versus Hague. J. Kerney, Jr.; S 232; see also EP 603
  - Hague's boss-rule endangers chance of a Roosevelt victory. J. Kerney, Jr.; S.. 232
  - Rejects proposed new state constitution; EP 603
- New York philharmonic orchestra. B. H. Haggin; M 335
- New York state
  - A. F. of L. refuses to endorse R. F. Wagner for reelection; EP....367; see also 507
  - Dewey refuses the use of the federal ballot to soldiers; EP....87; see also EP 114; EP 143

PAGE
  Fish, H., defeated for reelection by A. W. Bennet; E.P. 575
  Fish wins congressional renomination by narrow margin; EP 170
  Marcantonio, V., wins three-party designation in the primaries; EP 170
  Powell, A. C., wins three-party designation in the primaries; EP 170
  Wagner reelected to the Senate; EP..... 575
Newspapers
  How to read the war news. C. G. Bolté; S 174
  Political bias. Bureau of applied social research 348
    See also Censorship
Niebuhr, Reinhold
  Basis of world order, the; S 489
  Temple, Dr. William, and his Britain: S 584
Nodier, Charles. P. Rosenfeld; S......... 18
None but the lonely heart. J. Agee; MP 670, 698
Norden, Albert
  Eisenhower in the Ruhr; S 380
Norris, George W.
  And the TVA. D. E. Lilienthal; S..... 343
  Death. F. Kirchwey; S 283
North Dakota
  Nye appears to be the winner in the senatorial primary; EP....30; see also EP 545
  Nye defeated; E 604
Notes by the way. M. Marshall; S....522, 562, 590, 618, 652, 718, 746, 802
Novels. See Books
Nye, Gerald P.
  Faces the stiffest opposition in a three-cornered fight for reelection; EP....... 545
  Defeated; E 604
  Wins North Dakota senatorial primary; EP 30

O

Office of price administration. See Business—Prices
Office of war mobilization. See War mobilization, office of Ohio
  Lausche, F. J., candidate for governor. K. Keyerleber; S 95
Oil
  Anglo-American agreement, the; E....... 201
  Russo-Iranian dispute over oil concessions; E 577
Once upon a time. J. Agee; MP 107
Orlando, Vittorio. See Italy
Ortenberg, Edgar, joins the Budapest quartet. B. H. Haggin; M.......... 726
Otto of Hapsburg. See Austria
Oxnam, G. Bromley
  Basis of world security, the; S......... 490

P

P. A. C. See Congress of industrial organizations—Political action committee
Pacific islands
  Post-war:
    Roosevelt hints at permanent American occupation of Japanese-mandated islands; observers also foresee request for perpetual leases of allied bases in the southern Pacific; EP 225
Pacificus
  Chinese impasse, the; S....588; see also EP 575
  How to deal with Japan; S.......... 436
  Japan's underground; S.......... 716
Paetel, Karl O.
  Why the wehrmacht fights on; S........ 437
Painting. See Art
Palestine
  Assassination of Lord Moyne, the. G. Frank; S....685; see also EP....602; EP 674
  Compromise plan. J. L. Magnes; C..... 783
  Roosevelt supports unrestricted Jewish immigration; EP 503
  Truth about the terrorists, the. G. Frank; S....685; see also EP.......... 674
Pankhurst, E. Sylvia
  Ethiopia should regain Eritrea and other territories annexed by Italy; C........ 55
Panofsky, Erwin
  Criticizes The Nation's plan for post-war Germany; C....543; see also E....395; E 789; 793
Papandreou, George. See Greece
Parkhurst, Winthrop
  Comments on letter by R. W. Pence; C 307; see also C 250
Patton, James G. See United States—Post-war
Peluffo, Orlando L. See Argentina
Pence, R. W.
  Dilemma of a liberal in the coming election; C....250; see also C 307
Pennsylvania
  G.O.P. is worried, the. F. G. L.; S..... 289
  Gitt, Josiah W., grassroots candidate for congress. S. C. Menefee; S.......... 468
Penton, Brian
  Advance Australia—where? S.......... 11

PAGE
People's avengers, the. J. Agee; MP 53
Pepper, Claude. See Labor—Wages
Perfect marriage, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 624
Perón, Juan Domingo. See Argentina
Pesotta, Rose
  In memory of Sacco and Vanzetti; C.... 251
Petrillo, James C.
  His victory over the recording companies may lead to new Congressional attacks on labor; EP 630
Philippine islands
  Aquino, B., pro-Japanese collaborationist. S. C. Menefee; S 99
  Filipinos continue guerrilla warfare against the Japanese; Quezon, T., guerrilla leader. S. C. Menefee; S 99
  Laurel, J., heads Japan's puppet government. S. C. Menefee; S 99
  Roxas, M., named by Japanese to administer food distribution in famine areas. S. C. Menefee; S.......... 99
  Vargas, J., named "ambassador" to Japan. S. C. Menefee; S 99
    See also War, Pacific
Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.—Music, recorded
Pibul Songgram, Luang. See Thailand
Pierlot, Hubert. See Belgium
Pinner, Max
  Comments on "The health scandal"; C 167; see also E 88
Plays. See Haggin, B. H.; Krutch, J. W.; Marshall, M. (for reviews)
Podell, David L.
  Reconversion problems of small business, the; S 494
Poems
  Alexis Carrel. M. Cane 512
  Angels, the. R. Humphries 687
  Black international. Sagittarius 800
  Home is the soldier. F. Ebright 397
  Propriety. M. Moore 656
  Second air force. R. Jarrell 526
  To Henry David Thoreau. I. Edman ... 346
Poland
  Churchill favors the Curzon line as basis of Russo-Polish boundary settlement; EP 758; see also EP 393
  Conflicting Polish and Russian reports on the Warsaw uprising; EP....226; see also 261; EP......338; 347; EP...... 423
  General Bor leads partisans in drive on nazi positions in Warsaw; EP........ 169
  Government in exile proposes coalition government; would also remove anti-soviet General Sosnkowski as head of the army; EP....282; see also....183, 205
  Medical schools reopen in liberated Poland; equipment badly needed. A. L. Strong; S 740
  Mikolajczyk-Stalin conference, the; E 144; see also 183; 205; EP..169; EP.. 198
  Polish committee of national liberation. A. L. Strong; S....183, 205; see also E 144; EP....169; EP 198
  Project of a Czech-Polish confederation. J. Masaryk; S 683
Polanyi, Karl
  His views on monopolies. S. Chase; S.. 768
Polish Americans
  Voting intentions in the presidential election. Bureau of applied social research; S 323
Polish committee of national liberation. See Poland
Political action committee. See Congress of industrial organizations
Political war
  Allied propaganda to occupied Europe 44
  Argentina:
    Its nazi-phalangist dictatorship. F. Cernuschi; E 614
    Policy of the United States. W. Frank; S 471, 615
  Balkan states: possibilities for democratic post-war organization. B. Raditsa; S 267; see also EP......253; EP...... 254
  Brazil: Vargas on the defensive; E....269; see also EP 254
  Bulgaria on the spot. B. Raditsa; S..... 155
  China: mission of D. M. Nelson, the. Pacificus; S....588; see also EP....... 575
  Czechoslovakia: Catlos, General F., quisling among the quislings. J. W. Gerber; S 559
  Denmark resists the nazi occupation forces. G. Leistikow; S....72; see also 644
  France:
    How to recognize a democracy 239
    Maquis's plan for reconstruction of France, the. M. Clark; S.......... 15
  Germany:
    All-out military defense creates industrial paralysis. Argus; S.......... 410
    Anti-nazi underground activity. Argus; S....801; see also EP....310; C.... 727
    "Battle supplement" for front-line troops. Argus; S 745
    Berlin people's court in action. Argus; S 519
    Christmas, 1944. Argus; S.......... 801
    Coal shortage. Argus; S.......... 561
    Defeatism in action. Argus; S....382; see also 325

PAGE
    Defense rallies. Argus; S....184; see also 130
    Festung Europa becomes Festung Deutschland. Argus; S 46
    Foreign "volunteers" in the army. Argus; S 774
    Goebbels's Reich film bureau plans for post-war theaters. Argus; S 17
    Himmler prohibits the alteration of party uniforms. Argus; S.......... 212
    Himmler pushes the campaign for an increase in births. Argus; S 17
    Hitler and a staff of architects plan the Berlin of tomorrow. Argus; S.... 17
    Hitler mystery, the. Argus S....745; see also EP....601; Ct.......... 689
    "Map psychosis" in eastern Germany. Argus; S 184
    Nazis store funds in neutral countries to finance post-war Nazi party; Argus; S 46
    Officers' plot, the. Argus S....156; see also E....115; 128; EP....141; 152; 240; 295; 437; 745
    Propagandists report a regime of terror under American military occupation. Argus; S 616
    Refugees from Europe report on the crumbling morale of the nazis. G. Frank; S 296
    Robot bombs, the; other secret weapons. Argus; S....73; see also 561
    Three-front war drives morale to new low. Argus; S 101
    Total mobilization. Argus; S....212; see also EP....141; EP....449, 690; EP 729
    Transportation difficulties. Argus; S.. 645
    "Unconditional resistance." Argus; S 353; see also EP....449; EP....450; 473: 643; 744
    Value of the mark drops following the Normandy invasion. Argus; S....... 46
    What shall we do with the Ruhr? A. Norden; S 380
    Why the wehrmacht fights on. K. O. Paetel; S 437
  Great Britain:
    Watch the Labor Party! E....560; see also 427; 583
  Greece:
    Rule Britannia. C. Poulos; S....772; see also 763; 765; 799
  Italy:
    Allies and the partisans, the. M. Bellini; S....324, 559; see also C.... 627
    British veto of Sforza. G. Salvemini; S....799; see also E..........704; 732
    Friends, Romans, monarchists. G. Salvemini; S 211, 238
    Political rebirth. P. Nenni; S....351; see also EP 338
    We save the king. M. Bellini S....... 743
  Japan:
    Allied post-war policy. Pacificus; S.. 436
    Has an underground. Pacificus; S..... 716
    Its quislings in Asia. S. C. Menefee; S 99
  Portugal: Salazar—forgotten fascist. J. R. Migueis; S 715
  Post-war leadership in Europe. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S...688; see also EP...602; 683
  Russia rebuilds. P. Cot; S 408
  Spain:
    Iberia, 1944. J. Allen; S 517
    With the Spanish maquis on the frontier. M. Levin; S 587
Polls. See Bureau of applied social research; Presidential campaign of 1944
Portugal
  National council for anti-fascist unity formed to combat Salazar's fascist regime. J. R. Migueis; S 715
Post-war, United States. See United States
Post-war reconstruction. See World war
Poulos, Constantine
  Rule Britannia: betrayal in Greece; S 772; see also EP 758; 765
Powell, Adam Clayton. See New York state
Power
  Rural electrification administration, the. J. King; S 41
  Senate defeats the Bailey amendment to prevent the establishment of regional authorities on the TVA model. I. F. Stone; S 678
  Senate defeats the St. Lawrence seaway project; EP 758
Presidential campaign of 1944
  Activities of F. Gannett's Committee for constitutional government; E 424
  And that dog Fala; EP 341
  Anti-New deal press seeks to explain away the primary defeats of their favorite candidates; EP 170
  Anti-New deal swing in the middle west. I. F. Stone; S 400
  Ball, J. H., upsets the Minnesota Republican apple cart. W. Shelton; S....463; see also EP........423; EP........ 502
  CIO-PAC. See Congress of industrial organizations—Political action committee

PAGE
  California is for Roosevelt. C. McWilliams; S 461
  Campaign expenditures:
    Educational fund of the National association of manufacturers; EP........ 282
    Hillman's statement on CIO-PAC funds before the House investigating committee; EP.....282; see also E..... 424
    Real subversives, the; E. 424
  Catholic vote, the; EP 545
  Corporation earnings under the New deal; EP 546
  Democratic convention nominates F. D. Roosevelt for the presidency; EP....... 85
  Democratic platform, the; EP........... 114
  Dewey at Philadelphia calls for an early return to Hoover economic policies; EP 310
  Dewey "draft," the; EP..1; see also EP 31
  Dewey looks at Dumbarton Oaks. I. F. Stone; S......231; see also......261; 369
  Dewey on labor. F. Kirchwey; S......... 369
  Dewey pledges an "able" cabinet; W. Hutcheson rumored as choice for Secretary of labor; EP 59
  Dewey, Roosevelt, and the peace. M. S. Stewart; S 375
  Dewey's cross-country campaign trip. J. A. Wechsler; S 398
  Dilemma of a liberal. R. W. Pence; C 250; see also C 307
  Dulles gives the Dewey campaign a respectable foreign-policy front. F. Kirchwey; S 369
  Election and America's future; excerpts from addresses delivered at conference of The Nation Associates 485
  Election prospects along the eastern seaboard. I. F. Stone; S 455
  Electoral college conspiracy; EP....31; see also EP.........58; EP......... 339
  F.D.R.'s program for post-war employment. I. F. Stone; S 578
  First in war, first in peace; E.......... 547
  Hague's boss rule endangers Roosevelt's chance of victory in New Jersey. J. Kerney, Jr.; S....232; see also EP.... 603
  History and Mr. Dewey; E 340
  How will the women vote? E. Hawes; S 344; see also 234
  Indiana's anti-New deal sentiment. W. Shelton; S 463
  It's in the bag for F.D.R.; S 36
  Kansas will go Republican. M. P. Akers; S 464
  Missouri election trends. M. P. Akers; S 464
  Nation, The, supports Roosevelt for reelection; E 503
  National groups as a factor in the middle west. I. F. Stone; S 371
  Negro vote, the. W. White; S....466; see also EP............114; 379; 486; 640
  New congress, the; E.................. 604
  Old guard rules both major political parties; prospects for a third party. F. Kirchwey; S......145; see also C...... 279
  Pennsylvania's G.O.P. is worried. F. G. L; S 289
  Politicians speculate on how Willkie would have voted; EP 450
  Polls:
    Bias in the phrasing of questions...... 294
    Campaign facts and controversies. P. F. Lazarsfeld; S 435
    Checking the accuracy of the various polls. P. F. Lazarsfeld; S......... 557
    Fortune poll, the. B. Berelson; S..... 515
    House campaign committee opens investigation of the Gallup election polls. B. Ginzburg; S...737; see also 266; 294; 550; 557; 795; 796
    How to predict the loser. J. K. G.; S.. 550
    It looks like F.D.R. G. Watson; S.... 469
    Negro vote, the. P. F. Lazarsfeld; S 379
    Newspaper bias 348
    Polish American vote, the 323
    Post-mortem. P. F. Lazarsfeld; S 613
    Predicting doubtful states 266
    Reliability of public-opinion polls...181; see also EP 144
    September samplings show an increase in Roosevelt's probable majority. G. Watson; S 407
    Trends between the elections 209, 234
    Vice-presidency, the: Wallace is the popular choice. F. Kirchwey; S....89; see also 91
    What the columnists and commentators think. B. Berelson; S.............. 515
    Women in the election 234
  Record-smashing vote reveals political strength of the industrial workers; EP 575
  Red scare fails to win votes for the Republicans; EP 603
  Registration in the industrial areas ahead of 1940. I. F. Stone; S 455
  Republican convention, the. I. F. Stone; S....36; see also 32
  Republican governors' conference, the; EP 143; see also E 171
  Republican party platform, the; E....32; [illegible] also EP 1; 36

PAGE
  Roosevelt is reelected; E 573
  Roosevelt's speech before the Teamsters union; EP 365
  Roosevelt's speech on foreign policy; EP 501
  Soldier-vote, the; C..83; see also EP..87; 90; EP..114; EP..115; C..139; EP 143; C..195; E..199; C..223; EP 226; C...........306; EP........... 603
  Soldier's letter to Mrs. Luce, a. W. J. Caldwell; S......35; see also C...... 139
  Study in self-restraint. Low; Ct......... 511
  Trends in the middle west. I. F. Stone; S 371, 425
  Votes, jobs, and taxes; the Republican and Democratic programs compared. M. S. Stewart; S.......................... 457
  Wallace should be renominated for the vice-presidency. I. F. Stone; S....91; see also 7; EP 58; 89; 118
  Watch the west coast. C. McWilliams; S 263
  Will Willkie support Dewey? A. Beichman; S 70
  Wisconsin election trends. W. Shelton; S. 463
    See also names of states
Press. See Newspapers
Prices. See Business
Prisoners, war. See World war—Prisoners
Profits. See Business
Progressive party. See Wisconsin
Propaganda
  Allied, to occupied Europe 44
  Nazi techniques in Turkey. M. Carter; S..........177; see also EP.......... 170
Propriety. M. Moore; P 656
Public finances. See Finance, public
Public power. See Power

Q

Quezon, Tomas. See Philippine islands
Quintanilla, Luis
  Horse is dead, the. Long live the horse! Ct 759

R

REA. See Rural electrification administration
Rabe, Waclaw
  Named rector of new Curie university in Lublin. A. L. Strong; S 740
Radio
  Television comes of age. A. Barth; S.. 125
Raditsa, Bogdan
  Bulgaria on the spot; S 155
  Way out for the Balkans; S....267; see also EP...........253; EP........... 254
Raggio, Mrs. Grier H.
  Comments on the dismissal of H. P. Rainey from the University of Texas; C..........754; see also EP.......... 603
Railroads
  Accidents and safety devices; EP 367
  Anti-trust suit against forty-seven western roads hits at discriminatory rates charged southern and western states; EP....... 255
  West coast protests discriminatory railroad rates which hinder development of its industries. C. McWilliams; S........ 263
Rainbow, the. J. Agee; MP.............. 624
Rainey, Homer P., dismissed from the University of Texas; EP.............603; see also C.......................... 754
Ralston, J. L. See Canada
Rattner, Abraham, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A 445
Reader's Digest
  Article on France by K. Cannell protested. K. Boyle and others; C............... 363
  Criticized in report by the magazine committee of the National council of teachers of English; EP.................. 675
Reber, Samuel. See United States—State department
Reconversion. See United States—Post-war
Recorded music. See Haggin, B. H.—Music, recorded Refugees
  Europe's children. G. Frank; S......... 349
  First group arrives at "free port" in Oswego, N. Y.; EP.................... 171
  Meeting of the Inter-governmental committee on refugees. L. S. Gannett; S.. 292
  Resettling Europe's displaced persons. L. S. Gannett; S.................... 292
Republican party
  Ball, J. H., Minnesota Republican senator, attacks Dewey's foreign policy; EP 423; see also 463; EP............... 502
  Dewey "draft" at Chicago convention certain; EP.......1; see also EP........ 31
  Governors' conference to stress problem of federal versus states' rights; EP 143; see also E...................... 171
  Platform adopted by the national convention; E.......32; see also EP.......1; 36
  Soldier's letter to Mrs. Luce, a. W. J. Caldwell; S......35; see also C...... 139

PAGE
  Viewed by J. R. Lowell in 1871. J. B. Fine; C............................ 139
  See also Presidential campaign of 1944
Reynolds company, R. J.
  DeBerry, W., Negro union leader, jailed; EP 631
Richardson, B. T.
  International civil aviation conference, the; S...681; see also EP...502; E...504; E....577; EP....576; EP....602, 605; EP 674
Ringling brothers, Barnum and Bailey
  Many die as fire destroys circus tent in Hartford, Connecticut; EP............ 59
Robinson, P. D.
  Comments on "A soldier's letter to Mrs. Luce" by W. J. Caldwell; C......139; see also 35
Robot bombs. See Aviation
Rockefeller, Nelson Aldrich
  Nominated as an assistant secretary of state. I. F. Stone; S........735, 762; see also EP.....................758; 791
Roman catholic church
  And book censorship. P. Wylie; S....39; see also C..........110; C........... 195
  Neutrality at Rome. Low; Ct........... 430
  Pope and the peace, the. G. A. Borgese; S 429
  Scanlan, P. F., awarded [illegible] knighthood in the Order of St. Gregory the Great by Pope Pius; EP..................... 730
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano
  Administration:
    Discusses the future of the Pacific bases; EP 225
    Post-war program. I. F. Stone; S..... 578
    Urges continuation of lend-lease until Japan and Germany are defeated; EP 254
  Presidential campaign:
    Address before Foreign policy association; EP 501
    And that dog Fala; EP.............. 341
    Campaign speech before the Teamsters union; EP 365
    His foreign-policy record. M. S. Stewart; S ....375; see also E....... 547
    His program on jobs and taxes. M. S. Stewart; S 457
    Nominated for [illegible] fourth term by the Democratic convention; EP......... 85
    Republican nomination of Dewey and Bricker assures his reelection. I. F. Stone; S 36
    Will support Wallace for the vice-presidency. I. F. Stone; S......... 91; see also EP..................58, 89, 118
Rosenfeld, Paul
  Nodier after a century; S.............. 18
Rosinski, Herbert
  Himmler and the volkssturm; S......... 643
Rowell, Colonel Henry Thompson. See Italy
Roxas, Manuel. See Philippine Islands
Rubinstein, Arthur. B. H. Haggin; M.... 626
Ruhr, the. See Germany
Rumania
  Liberation of the country has not improved the condition of the Jews; EP......... 576
  Switches sides; Rumanian troops battle the nazis; EP....................... 253
Rumely, Edward A. See Committee for constitutional government
Ruml, Beardsley
  Fiscal program for high employment, a; S...........491; see also............ 452
Rundstedt, General Karl Rudolf Gerd von. See Germany
Rural electrification administration
  Its nine-year record. J. King; S........ 41
Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Russo-German war
  Nazis may evacuate the whole Baltic area; EP 85
  Red army advances on to the Hungarian plain; EP 422
  Red army atta ks on eight fronts; EP.... 113
  Red army captures Viipuri in Finland; E 4
  Red army enters Riga; next offensive may come against Germany's center troops; EP 449
  Red troops enter East Prussia; EP...... 501
  Russian break-through from Polotsk to Kovel. C. G. Bolté; S............... 62
  Russian troops are close to a junction with Tito's forces in Yugoslavia; EP....... 281
  Russians drive on Vitebsk. C. G. Bolté; S 6
  Russians free Belgrade; cross the Tiza in drive on Budapest; EP...........501; see also EP......................... 601
  Russians penetrate deeply into enemy lines in Lithuania; EP.................... 422
  Russians seize Vilna; Germans may stand on the Riga-Brest-Litovsk-Lvov line. C. G. Bolté; S......................... 62
  Soviet offensive in White Russia; the E 33
  With the Red army in Minsk. A. L. Strong; S 121
Ryti, Risto. See Finland

S

PAGE

S. D. R.
  Comments on A. Folde's criticism of B. H. Haggin's articles on modern music; C 251; see also 53, 109, 137; C.......... 251
Sadie Thompson. J. W. Krutch; D....... 698
Sagittarius
  Black international; P.................. 800
St. Lawrence seaway
  Power project defeated by the Senate; EP 758
Saipan. See War, Pacific
Salaries. See Labor—Wages
Salazar, Oliveira. See Portugal
Salvemini, Gaetano
  Friends, Romans, monarchists! S....211, 238
San Diego I love you. J. Agee; MP...... 569
Scanlan, Patrick F.
  Awarded a knighthood in the Order of St. Gregory the Great by Pope Pius; EP.. 730
Schneider, Alexander. B. H. Haggin; M.. 699
Scobie, General Ronald M. See Greece
Scott, F. R.
  Conference of the Labor parties of the British commonwealth; S............. 402
Scoville, John W.
  Comments on reference to him in "In the wind"; C........754; see also........ 512
Second air force. R. Jarrell; P........... 526
Sedition
  Death of Justice E. Eicher brings the mass trial to a standstill; EP............... 702
Seedman, George J.
  Small business after the war; S......... 487
Seldes, George, views on jazz. B. H. Haggin; M.........599; see also......... 571
Selective service
  And musicians. B. H. Haggin; S....... 25
  Boards reclassify 26-37 group not engaged in essential war work; EP............ 757
  Case of W. Lynn ruled a moot cause by the Supreme court. D. Macdonald; S.. 13
  High percentage of draft rejections reveals need for adequate medical and dental care in this country; E..88; see also C. 167
  See also United States—Army
Sering, Paul
  Himmler's outlaw army; S.............. 744
Sevareid, Eric
  Price we pay in the Italian campaign, the; S ....713; see also........... 706
Seven lively arts. J. W. Krutch; D....... 781
Seventh cross, the. J. Agee; MP.......... 334
Sforza, Count Carlo. See Italy
Shelton, Willard
  Election trends in Wisconsin and neighboring states; S...................... 465
Sheng Shih-tai, General. See China
Shepherd, James; his appointment to the Surplus property board is held up. I. F. Stone; S........635; see also........ 678
Sherman anti-trust act. See Monopolies
Shiskin, Boris
  Economic depression ahead? S......... 495
Sifton, Paul
  What the farmer hopes for; S........... 488
Since you went away. J. Agee; MP...... 137
Smaller war plants corporation
  Maverick, M., urges that war surpluses be sold in small lots so that smaller business men may bid on them; E......... 228
  Reconversion problems of small business. D. L. Podell; S.....494; see also..... 487
Smith, Alfred E., death; EP.............. 423
Smith, Ellison D. See South Carolina
Social security
  Government planning for post-war security. E. M. Burns; S.....499; see also..... 498
  High percentage of draft rejections reveals need for adequate medical and dental care in this country; E............88; see also C 167
  George-Taft bill on post-war unemployment compensation. I. F. Stone; S......... 175
  Kilgore-Murray-Truman bill on post-war unemployment compensation. I. F. Stone; S 175
  State unemployment compensation laws should be revised. I. F. Stone; S..... 678
  Vandenberg proposes to freeze the tax at its present rate for another year; EP.. 631
Soekarno, Ir. See Dutch East Indies
Soldier-vote bill. See United States—Army
Soldiers. See United States—Army
Soldier's wife. J. W. Krutch; D.......... 482
Song of Norway. B. H. Haggin; D....... 305
Sosnkowski, General Kazimierz. See Poland
South America. See Latin America
South Carolina
  Johnston, Governor O. D., wins congressional nomination; EP................ 143
  Smith, "Cotton Ed", defeated; EP....... 143
Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Spain
  Ambassador Hayes recalled to the United States; EP.....730; see also EP..... 758
  British ambassador, Lord Templewood, resigns; describes nazi activities in Madrid; E.........786; see also......... 791
  Churchill's words of praise condemned. Corporal; C 111
  Coffee, J. M., urges severance of American diplomatic relations and aid to the guerrillas; EP.....4; see also EP..... 311
  Delegates, headed by Kindelan, to attend International civil air conference in Chicago; EP 502
  Destroy Franco now. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S............556; see also........... 548
  Disunity in the Spanish republican emigration: the quarrel between Negrín and the Communists. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..........318; see also EP......... 339
  Franco asks a place at the peace table; EP 576
  Franco concludes a reciprocal aviation pact with the United States; EP.......... 730
  Franco urges allied representatives in France to dissolve Spanish units within the maquis; EP..423; see also EP..339; EP 502, 587, 632
  Franco's interview with the United press; EP 576
  Germans reported to be fighting against the Spanish maquis; EP.............. 502
  Gil Robles describes chaotic conditions... 97
  Horse is dead, the. Long live the horse! L. Quintanilla; Ct.................. 759
  Iberia, 1944. J. Allen; S.............. 517
  Interview with Lequerica, an. M. Mannes; S 514
  Mourns the loss of the Tirpitz; EP...... 674
  Spanish republic in exile fights on; its program for the post-war period. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S....318; see also EP 339
  Stricter American policy in prospect? EP 758
Spingarn, Jerome H.
  Don't call us G. I. Joe; S....203; see also C............419; C............ 543
Stambaugh, Lynn U.
  Loses to Nye in North Dakota primary; EP 30
Stalin, Joseph. See Union of soviet socialist republics
State department, United States. See United States
Steel, Johannes
  Distorts the facts about P. Hagen in radio broadcast. P. Hagen; C....447; see also C 542
Sterling drugs, incorporated
  Corcoran, T. G., used his influence to obtain a mild consent decree in anti-trust case. I. F. Stone S................. 7
Stettinius, Edward R., Jr. See United States—State department
Stewart, Maxwell S.
  China's zero hour; S....637; see also EP 546; EP..575; 588; EP..629; E..705; 708
  Dewey, Roosevelt, and the peace; S.... 375
  Votes, jobs, and taxes; the Republican and Democratic programs compared; S 457
Stilwell, General Joseph W.
  Recalled from China because of rumored differences with Chiang Kai-shek and Lord Louis Mountbatten; EP......546; see also EP.....575; 588; EP.....629; 637; E 705; 708
Stock, Frederick. B. H. Haggin; M...... 25
Stocks. See Business
Stone, I. F.
  Bretton Woods monetary conference; S 63; see also E..60; EP..86; EP..114; 147
  Brookings popgun; S.................. 452
  Dewey looks at Dumbarton Oaks; S..230; see also 261; E.................340; 369
  Election prospects along the eastern seaboard; S 455
  FDR. PAC, and the midwest; S..371, 400, 425
  F.D.R.'s post-war program; S........... 578
  Future of the P.A.C., the; S..607; see also 677
  It's in the bag for F.D.R; S........... 36
  Jones-Clayton-Baruch slate for the Surplus property board defeated; EP....678; see also 635
  Littell versus Biddle; S 707
  Nelson versus Wilson; S..259; see also EP 197
  On reconversion; S.................... 175
  Pepper resolution for a 65-cent wage minimum, the; S 635
  Planning and socialism; S 493
  Plot against Wallace, the; S....7; see also EP.....58; 89; 91; 118; C..... 419
  Reactionaries around Roosevelt, the; S.. 678
  Reelect R. F. Wagner; S 507
  Senate defeats the Bailey amendment against the establishment of regional authorities on the TVA model; S...... 678
  State department reorganization, the; new front, old firm; S....735, 762; see also EP 758; 791
  State unemployment compensation laws should be revised; EP............. 678
  United States as a backward area in the post-war economic world; S..117; see also 175
Strauss, Patricia
  British Labor party's dilemma; S....763; see also EP.................758; 765; 772
Stravinsky, Igor. B. H. Haggin; M....53, 109
Streets are guarded, the. J. W. Krutch; D.. 725
Strikes. See Labor

PAGE

Strong, Anna Louise
  Medicine without microscopes in Poland; S 740
  Moscow looks at Dumbarton Oaks; S 261; see also 231; 315
  Poles take over, the; S....183, 205; see also EP...........169; EP........... 198
  Russia's post-war policy; S............. 460
  Russians think of home, the S.......... 378
  Stalingrad tomorrow; S................ 151
  With the Red army in Minsk; S 121
Subasich, Ivan. See Yugoslavia
Summer storm. J. Agee; MP............. 107
Sun Fo. See China
Supreme court
  Decision in cases of anti-Negro discrimination by the Brotherhood of locomotive firemen and engineers; E.......... 788
  Decision in Korematsu and Endo cases on army ban against Japanese Americans; E 788
  Justice Black after seven years. I. M. Engel; S 404
  Nine independent men. W. Hamilton; S., 179
  Nine minds, one law. W. Hamilton; S.. 207
  Rules that the case of W. Lynn is a moot cause. D. Macdonald; S.............. 13
Surplus property board
  Jones-Clayton-Baruch slate of nominees defeated; EP......678; see also...... 635
  President will name R. A. Hurley and E. Heller as administrators; EP......678; see also 635
Surpluses, post-war. See United States—Post-war
Syria
  United States recognizes independence of; appointment of G. Wadsworth as minister criticized; EP.................. 366

T

Taft, Robert A.
  Charges that the War department is overzealous in getting soldiers to vote; EP 226; see also EP 603
  Declares that his amendment to the soldier-vote act curtailing soldiers' reading material should be liberalized; EP....115; see also 90; C......195; E......199; C.......223; C.......306; C........ 542
  Opposes the international stabilization fund agreed on at the Bretton Woods conference; EP 86
Tall in the saddle. J. Agee; MP......... 569
Taller de grafica popular. E. Wilder; A.... 299
Tariffs
  And American opportunities in world trade; EP 702
  Plank in the Republican platform; E....... 32
Taxation. See Finance, public
Tead, Ordway
  Class of 1944, the; S.................. 97
Television. See Radio
Temple, William, death. R. Niebuhr; S..... 584
Tennessee valley authority
  And Senator G. W. Norris. D. E. Lilienthal; S 343
  Bailey amendment, the. I. F. Stone; S... 678
Texas
  Jones, J. H., chides anti-fourth-term Democrats; his nephew, G. Butler, a leading figure in the group; EP 58
  Kleberg, R. M., foe of the federal anti-inflation program, defeated for Congress; EP 143
  Pro-Roosevelt Democrats regain control of party in primary; EP................ 339
  Rainey, H. P., dismissed from the state university; EP....603; see also C.... 754
Thailand
  Pibul Songgram, L., pro-axis premier. S. C. Menefee.. S 99
Thālmann, Ernst. See Germany
Theater. See Haggin, B. H.; Krutch, J. W.; Marshall, M. (for reviews)
They met in Moscow. J. Agee; MP....... 24
Thirty seconds over Tokyo. J. Agee; MP... 698
Thomas, R. J. See Labor
Thunder rock. J. Agee; MP 569
Tito. See Yugoslavia
To have and have not. J. Agee; MP....... 569
To Henry David Thoreau. I. Edman; P..... 346
Together again. J. Agee; MP 725
Tojo, Hideki. See Japan
Toscanini, Arturo. B. H. Haggin; M...... 541
571, 626
  Ghinelli, M., leader of band which assaulted the conductor in Bologna in 1931, arrested in Italy; EP................... 760
Trade. See Business
Trade agreements
  American-Bolivian agreement on tin prices; EP.........758; see also 791
  And the international stabilization fund; EP.........86; see also EP......... 114
  British post-war trade to be aided under terms of the new Anglo-American lend-lease agreement; EP..701; see also EP.. 254
  Republican platform plank, the; E........ 32
  Tariffs and American economic prospects; EP 702

PAGE

Transport workers union
  Philadelphia transit workers strike to prevent upgrading of Negroes; E....172; see also 466
Truman, Harry S.
  Southern Democrats seek to block nomination of Wallace and to name him as vice-president; EP 58
Trusts. See Monopolies
Tunnard, John, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A 626
Turkey
  Behind the diplomatic and economic break with Germany. M .Carter; S....177; [illegible] also EP 170
Two girls and a sailor. J. Agee; MP 24

U

UNRRA. See United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
U.S.S.R. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Unemployment. See Labor
Union of soviet socialist republics
  And Bulgaria:
    Bulgarian people look to Russia for salvation. B. Raditsa; S.......... 155
    New Bulgarian cabinet seeks close ties with Russia; E.......... 505
  And China:
    Removal of General Sheng Shih-tai as governor of Sinkiang may result in improved relations; EP.......... 311
    Russo-Chinese differences. L. Fischer; S 453
  And Czechoslovakia: Czech-Soviet pact, the. J. Masaryk; S.......... 683
  And Finland:
    President Mannerheim expected to seek renewal of peace negotiations with Russia; EP 170
    Russo-Finnish peace terms, the EP..... 366
  And France:
    Franco-Russian pact concluded; EP..... 729
  And Germany:
    British trade union congress endorses Russian demand for the use of forced German labor after the war. K. Hutchison; S 513
    Russia expects allies to fulfill pledge on the punishment of war criminals. A. L. Strong; S....460; see also.... 433
    Russia will support no scheme for the de-industrialization of Germany; E... 395
    Russo-German war. See Russo-German war
  And Great Britain. See Great Britain—Anglo-Soviet relations
  And Iran:
    Dispute over oil concessions; E........ 577
  And Japan:
    Stalin lists Japan as an aggressor nation; EP 602
  And Poland:
    Churchill favors the Curzon line as basis of boundary settlement; EP....758; see also EP.......... 393
    Mikolajczyk-Stalin conference. A. L. Strong; S.........183, 205; see also E......144; EP......169; EP...... 198
    Polish government in exile offers new proposals for unity in effort to reach settlement with the Russians; EP.... 282
    Russia disputes claims of the Polish exile government about the Warsaw uprising; EP..226; see also 261; EP 338, 347; EP 423
    Soviet government recognizes the Polish committee of national liberation, a rival government to the London government-in-exile; E.....144; see also EP........169, 183; EP........198, 205
  Eastern bloc and western bloc for Europe? J. Alvarez del Vayo; S....688; see also EP 602; 683
  Planning for reconstruction. A. L. Strong; S............378; see also.......... 408
  Post-war foreign policy. A. L. Strong; S 460
  Russo-German war. See Russo-German war
  Stalin's speech on the twenty-sixth anniversary of the October revolution EP.. 602
  Stalingrad tomorrow. A. L. Strong; S.. 151
  War casualties. L. Fischer S.......... 453
Unions, labor. See Labor unions
United nations. See World war
United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
  Montreal conference, the; conflict between the UNRRA and the military over the length of the military control period in Europe EP.......... 367
  Recommends limited help to Italy; EP 367; see also EP......394; EP....... 630
  Will aid in the resettling of Europe's displaced persons. L. S. Gannett; S...... 292
United States
  And Argentina:
    Argentine reaction to Roosevelt's denunciation of the present regime; EP 394
    What our policy should be. W. Frank; S 471, 615

PAGE

  And China:
    China needs military, political, financial aid from this country; EP.......... 142
    Recall of General J. W. Stilwell; EP 546; see also EP..........575, 588; EP 629, 637
    Mission of D. M. Nelson, the. Pacificus; S....588; see also EP....575, 637; E 705, 708
    Wallace's tour; EP 2
    What the United States can do to help China. K. L. Mitchell; S...708; see also E 705
  And Finland
    State department severs diplomatic relations; EP 30
  And Great Britain:
    American business groups fear continued lend-lease aid will give Britain world trade advantages; EP.......... 254
    Lyttelton, O., declares that the United States was not provoked into war by Japan; EP 3
    New lend-lease agreement; EP......... 701
  And Italy:
    Stettinius disassociates this country from the British veto of Sforza. F. Kirchwey; S........732; see also........ 799
  And Latin America:
    Welles, S., urges meeting of all foreign ministers to discuss hemisphere problems; EP 198
    What the policy of the United States should be. W. Frank; S........471, 615
  And Spain:
    Ambassador Hayes recalled; EP....730; see also EP 758
    American divisions may be ordered to the Franco-Spanish frontier as Spanish guerrillas raid from France; EP..423; see also 632
    Anti-fascists in this country should be allowed to return to Europe; EP..... 576
    Coffee, J. M., urges severance of diplomatic relations and aid to the guerrillas; EP......4; see also EP...... 311
    Destroy Franco now! J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.......556; see also........ 548
    Nation Associates, with other organizations, calls a mass meeting for Republican Spain....731; see also EP.... 758
    Stricter American policy in prospect? EP 758
    We conclude a reciprocal aviation pact with Franco; EP..730; see also EP.. 502
  Army:
    Bans circulation of several books in army camps. P. Wylie; S.......... 39
    Bans several magazines from post exchanges because of lack of soldier-demand; EP..115; see also 90; C..195; E ....199; C 223
    High percentage of draft rejections reveals need for adequate medical and dental care in this country; E....88; see also C 167
    Morale, letters, and reading material. J. H. Spingarn; S......203; see also C ....419; C 543
    Soldier vote, the; C......83; see also EP...87, 90; EP...114; EP...115; C....139; EP....143; C....195; E 199; C..223; EP..226; C..306; EP 603
    Taft amendment to soldier-vote act sharply curtails reading material of soldiers; EP....115; see also 90; C 195; E...199; C...223; EP...226; C ....306; C 542
  Congress. See Congress
  Lend-lease:
    Business groups fear continued lend-lease aid will give Britain unfair advantages in world trade; EP.......... 254
    New Anglo-American agreement; EP... 701
    Roosevelt urges its continuation until the defeat of Japan and Germany; EP.. 254
  Navy:
    Accepts Negro women in the Waves; EP 503
    Sailors of the U.S.S. Coos Bay collect funds to "buy off" striking workers at Wright aircraft factory; EP........ 2
  Post-war:
    Brookings institution issues a pamphlet on national income. I. F. Stone; S.. 452
    C.I.O. looks ahead, the. P. Murray; S 495, 554
    Colmer war surplus bill, the; E 228
    Economic prospects of the west coast. C. McWilliams; S.......... 263
    Economic security and world peace; excerpts from addresses delivered at conference of The Nation Associates; 489; see also 554
    F. D. R.'s program for peace-time jobs. I. F. Stone; S.......... 578
    George report on post-war economic problems. I. F. Stone; S.......... 175
    Johnson bill on the disposal of post-war surpluses. I. F. Stone; S.......... 175
    Kilgore-Murray-Truman bill on post-war employment compensation. I. F. Stone; S....175; see also E....200; EP......227; EP.....255; EP..... 283

PAGE

    Maverick, M., urges that war surpluses be sold in small lots so that small business men may bid on them; E... 228
    Murray-Truman report on reconversion. I. F. Stone; S...175; see also EP... 367
    Murray-Truman-Revercomb bill for full employment; E 761
    Nelson's order for limited civilian production is opposed by members of the WPB; EP.....59; see also E.....5; EP ....87; EP 197, 259
    Proposal of J. G. Patton for post-war production; E 200
    Seen as backward area in post-war economic world. I. F. Stone; S....117; see also 175; EP.......... 702
    Senate passes the George amendment to the social security act; E....200; see also EP....227; EP....255; EP.... 283
    Thomas, R. J., calls for planning to utilize our material and human resources; E 5
    To control the defense of the whole Pacific area; EP 225
    Wages and full employment. I. F. Stone; S 635
    What about the economic peace. S. Chase; S 711, 768
  State department:
    Appointment of R. Murphy as adviser to Eisenhower on French affairs protested. F. Kirchwey; S.......... 255
    Byrnes reported as probable successor to Hull; progressives urge the naming of Wallace; EP 674
    Dooman, E. H., favors appeasement of Japan. Pacificus; S 436
    Foreign policy and world organization; excerpts from addresses delivered at conference of The Nation Associates.. 489
    Hinders European anti-fascists in this country from returning to Europe; EP 576
    Hull warns Argentina against further dealings with the axis powers. R. Josephs; S....148; see also EP.... 142
    Murphy, R., named chief adviser to Eisenhower on German policy. F. Kirchwey; S 312
    Policy toward Argentina criticized by S. Welles; Stettinius, E. R., replies..EP 198
    Reber, S., named to administer relations with France. F. Kirchwey; S...... 312
    Reorganization—new front, old firm. I. F. Stone; S.....735, 762; see also E 703; EP 758, 791
    Secretary Hull resigns; EP 674
    Seeks to take over activities of the Foreign economic administration and place W. Clayton in charge; E...... 703
    Seeks to weaken the Department of commerce in view of reports that Wallace may be named secretary of commerce; E 703
    Stettinius announces an American "hands-off" policy in Italy and Greece. G. Salvemini; S.....799; see also 732
    Stettinius named secretary; E......... 703
United States supreme court. See Supreme court, United States

V

V-1. J. Agee; MP 725
Vagts, Alfred
  Putsch that failed, the; S..152; see also E.......115; 128; EP.......141; 156; 240; 295; 437; 745
Vandenberg, Arthur H.
  Demands Congressional vote on use of American arms by a world organization to enforce the peace; EP....339; see also 375
Van Loon, Helen
  Seeks letters written by H. W. van Loon; C 728
Vargas, Jorge. See Philippine islands
Vatican. See Roman catholic church
Very thought of you, the. J. Agee; MP... 725
Veterans, war
  And the G.I. bill's housing plan. C. Abrams; S 498
  Economic security for returning veterans. C. G. Bolté; S 493
Violet. J. W. Krutch; D 624
Virginia
  Democratic convention majority hostile to the New deal; may join Texas in the electoral college conspiracy; EP....31; see also EP 339
Visitor, the. J. W. Krutch; D 539

W

WLB. See War labor board
WPB. See War effort—War production board
Wadsworth, George. See Lebanon
Wages. See Labor

PAGE

- Wagner, Robert F.
  - New York state A. F. of L. refuses to endorse him for reelection; EP..367; see also 507
  - Reelected to the Senate; EP 575
- Wallace, Henry Agard
  - And the battle of Chicago. F. Kirchwey; S 118
  - Corcoran, T. G., campaigns for W. O. Douglas as vice-presidential candidate in his place. I. F. Stone; S.......... 7
  - His defeat. H. M. Merrill; C.......... 167
  - May be named secretary of commerce; State department seeks to weaken the power of the department; E....703; see also 791
  - Progressives urge that he be named to succeed Hull as Secretary of state; EP 674
  - Receives overwhelming popular support in poll conducted by Bureau of applied social research. F. Kirchwey; S....89; see also 91
  - Southern Democrats seek to block his nomination and to name Truman as vice-president; EP 58
  - Visit to China; EP.......... 2
- Wang Ching-wei. See China
- War effort
  - Battle of the sequins. K. Boyle; S...... 770
  - Bonds. See War loan
  - Conscription. See Selective service
  - Cutbacks result in idle men and machines despite some lags in arms production; EP 59
  - Manpower:
    - Army and navy oppose limited resumption of civilian production while workers are needed for war production; EP ....59; see also EP........ 87
    - Employment in war industries drops; shortages persist in certain areas; E 5; see also C.......... 139
    - Selective service boards reclassify 26-37 group not engaged in essential war work; EP 757
    - Shortage of workers cuts war production below army needs; E.......... 731
  - Office of price administration. See Business—Prices
  - Office of war mobilization. See War mobilization, office of
  - Prices. See Business
  - Production of military supplies fails to meet army needs; E 731
  - Strikes. See Labor
  - Taxation. See Finance, public; War loan
  - War labor board. See War labor board
  - War production board
    - Nelson, D. M., announces limited resumption of civilian production; E... 5
    - Nelson versus Wilson on reconversion; EP.........197; see also.......... 259
    - Nelson's order for limited civilian production is opposed by members of the board; EP....59; see also EP....87; EP 179, 259
- War, European
  - Allied military government:
    - Installs a pro-nazi as mayor of Rötgen; EP 450
    - Poletti, C., promises purge of fascist collaborators from Italian government posts; EP 3
    - Rowell, the AMG, and the Italian anti-fascists; G. Salvemini; S.......... 238
  - Allies break out from Normandy beachhead following capture of Caen. C. G. Bolté; S....62; see also EP....29; EP.....85; EP.....113; 146; EP..... 169
  - Allied troops in southern France reach Aix; E 227
  - Allies increase pressure in the area between Metz and Nancy; soon face the problem of crossing the Rhine; EP....422; see also EP 601
  - Allies move through Belgium, Holland, and Luxembourg for the final drive on Germany proper; EP 281
  - American troops enter Aachen; EP.. 449; see also EP 422
  - Battle of France, the. C. G. Bolté; S....202; see also E....227, EP.... 281
  - Battle of the Cologne plain. C. G. Bolté; S 680
  - British troops invade Greece; EP....422; see also EP..........449; E.......... 505
  - Canadians continue to clear the Scheldt estuary approaches to Antwerp; EP 501
  - Chances of victory this year, the. C. G. Bolté; S................258, 370, 399, 634
  - Churchill does not see war's end before next summer. C. G. Bolté; S.......... 577
  - Criticisms of the Normandy offensive. C. G. Bolté; S 146
  - Dittmar, General K., sees German defeat possible; urges nazi army to continue fighting to obtain softer peace terms; EP 281
  - Festung Europa becomes Festung Deutschland. Argus; S 46
  - Four allied armies on the western borders of the reich; EP 309
  - German counter-offensive into Belgium and Luxembourg; E..760; see also EP..757; EP 785; 790; 800
  - German soldier, the. L. S. Gannett; S.. 433
  - Germans appear recovered from earlier disorganization; war now moving more slowly; EP 546
  - Germany plans for guerrilla warfare. Argus; S......353; see also EP......449; EP 450, 473, 643, 744
  - Invasion casualties; EP.......... 30
  - Italy:
    - Campaign seen as a major allied miscalculation. E. Sevareid; S........713; see also EP..........546, 706
    - Front once more stalemated; EP...... 449
    - War of movement. Low; Ct.......... 42
  - Meeting of Churchill, Tito, and Subasich presages military developments in the Balkan state; EP.......... 225
  - Nazi troops resist bitterly and show high morale; EP 449
  - Nazis' situation on Normandy peninsula seen as critical. C. G. Bolté; S....... 6
  - Netherlands campaign, the; Arnhem paratroop action. C. G. Bolté; S......370, 399
  - Offensive and defensive strategy. C. G. Bolté; S 706
  - Robot-bomb attacks on England; EP...57; see also 73
  - Role of the British and Canadian armies. C. G. Bolté; S.......... 342
  - Tito's troops push toward Belgrade; EP.. 449
  - Uses of air power, the. J. R. Cuneo; S...........93; see also.......... 454
  - Von Kluge replaces von Rundstedt as German commander on the Normandy front; EP..........58; see also.......... 156
  - Why the wehrmacht fights on. K. O. Paetel; S.......... 437
  - Winter campaigns, the. C. G. Bolté; S 577
  - See also Russo-German war
- War, Italian. See War, European—Italy
- War labor board
  - And the Pepper resolution for a 65-cent wage minimum. I. F. Stone; S....... 635
  - Cost of living report; EP.......... 339
- War loan
  - Results of the fifth war-bond drive; EP 31; see also C.......... 111
- War mobilization, office of
  - Byrnes, J. F., opposes a veto of the new price-control bill; EP.......... 3
- War, Pacific
  - Contribution of the air arm. C. G. Bolté; S 454
  - Halsey's third fleet crushes Japanese air power in the Philippines and disperses their vessels; EP.......... 393
  - Halsey's third fleet strikes three times in Japan's "basic sea area"; EP......... 449
  - Japan's "basic sea area." C. G. Bolté; S 286, 314
  - Japanese land reinforcements to continue battle on Leyte; EP..601; see also EP 673; E 760
  - Landings in the Philippines, the. C. G. Bolté; S.......506; see also.......553, 580
  - MacArthur and Nimitz strike against Morotai and the Palau group; EP..... 338
  - Not here—there's the spot for the picnic. Low; Ct 727
  - Quebec conference maps the defeat of the Japanese; EP 338
  - Reverses in Pacific theater seen behind the overthrow of Premier Tojo in Japan; E 116
  - Saipan and Hengyang. C. G. Bolté; S... 34
  - Second battle of the Philippines cuts Japan's fleet strength by 50 per cent. C. G. Bolté; S......553; see also...... 580
  - Superfortresses bomb Japan from Saipan base; EP..673; see also EP..2, 6; E.. 760
- War production board. See War effort
- Washington letters; articles by I. F. Stone; 7, 36, 63, 91, 117, 147, 175, 230, 259, 371, 400, 425, 456, 507, 578, 607, 635, 678, 707, 735, 791
- Watson, Goodwin
  - It looks like F. D. R.; S.......... 469
  - September polls show an increase in Roosevelt's probable majority; S....... 407
- Wechsler, James A.
  - Dewey's cross-country campaign trip; S.. 398
- Weizsaecker, Baron Ernst von. See Italy
- Welles, Sumner
  - Criticizes American policy toward Argentina; EP 198
- While the sun shines. M. Marshall; D.... 389
- White, John W.
  - Storm signals over South America; S.... 9
- White, Walter
  - Negro vote in the presidential campaign: S 466
- Wilder, Elizabeth
  - Mexico's workshop of graphic art for the people; A 299
- Williams, J. Sid
  - Corrects Private M. S. on the poll-tax requirement in Georgia; C..........363; see also C.......... 278

PAGE

- Willkie, Wendell L.
  - Death. F. Kirchwey; S............421; see also EP.......... 450
  - Speculation on his choice of a president; EP 450
  - Will he support Dewey? A. Beichman; S 70
- Wilson. J. Agee; MP..221; see also EP.. 171
- Wilson, Charles E. See War effort—War production board
- Wireless. See Radio
- Wisconsin
  - Who will get the Progressive party vote? W. Shelton; S 463
- Wise, Stephen S.
  - Election, the; what the Jew hopes for; S 487
- World Jewish congress
  - Offers a program for restoring Jewish property seized by the nazis; EP....... 730
- World war
  - Dumbarton Oaks conference:
    - And the Chinese peace plan. L. Fischer; S........315, 340; see also........ 312
    - Attacked by R. M. La Follette, Jr.; EP 339
    - Attacked by A. Vandenberg; EP...339; see also 375
    - Big-power peace. L. Fischer; S...315; see also 312
    - Dewey looks at the conference. I. F. Stone; S.....230; see also.....261, 315
    - Results; E....451; see also E....257, 312
  - Post-war reconstruction:
    - Anglo-American oil agreement, the; E.. 201
    - Atlantic charter and the principle of self-determination. K. Loewenstein; S 235
    - Australia and Pacific policies. B. Penton; S 11
    - Bretton Woods monetary conference. I. F. Stone; S..63; see also E..60; EP ....86; EP 114, 147
    - Eastern bloc and western bloc for Europe? J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..688; see also EP..........602, 683
    - Economic security and world peace; excerpts from addresses delivered at conference of The Nation Associates 489; see also..........509, 554, 611, 615
    - Ethiopia's territorial claims. E. S. Pankhurst; C 55
    - Germany. See Germany—Post-war
    - Goodby to the revolution! J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 65
    - Japan. See Japan—Post-war
    - Leadership in Europe. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S........688; see also........ 683
    - Malinin, N., Russian writer, offers a post-war security plan. I. F. Stone; S.........231; see also.........261, 315
    - "Patience, pals. Let's get it focused." Low; Ct 231
    - Pope and the peace, the. G. A. Borgese; S 429
    - Problem of Europe's displaced persons. L. S. Gannett; S 292
    - Toward a socialist Europe. C. Davila; S 611
    - Why Europe must go left. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.......... 65
  - Prisoners:
    - American treatment of Italian war prisoners. R. N. Kelly; C........307; see also C.......... 110
    - Germany plans to use Russian prisoners as army reserves. Argus; S........ 774
    - Interviews with German prisoners of war. L. S. Gannett; S.......... 433
    - Stimson rejects proposal to educate German prisoners about democracy; EP 702; see also C.......... 110
  - Quebec conference:
    - Maps the defeat of Japan; EP......... 339
- Wright aeronautical company
  - Lockland workers strike against employment of Negro workers in skilled department; EP 2
- Wright, Herbert
  - Comments on "A Catholic looks at the Dies committee" by I. F. Stone; C.... 27
- Wylie, Philip
  - Sex and the censor; S................39 see also C..........110; C.......... 195

Y

- Yi Ewa. See Korea
- Youth runs wild. J. Agee; MP.......... 389
- Yugoslavia
  - Italian-Yugoslav border problems; EP.254; see also C.......... 391
  - Meeting of Churchill, Tito, and Subasich presages new military developments in the Balkans; EP.......... 225
  - Terms of the Tito-Subasich agreement; EP 282
  - Tito seeks a federal union with Bulgaria; E 505
  - Tito's army includes an Italian partisan division. M. Bellini; S.......... 324
  - See also War, European

BURLINGAME

Index

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A PAGE

Account rendered. V. Brittain; B.......... 751
Adams, J. Donald
  Shape of books to come, the; B......... 660
Adams, James Truslow
  Frontiers of American culture: A study of adult education in a democracy; B..... 160
Adams, Mildred; R..............162, 440, 804
Against oblivion: The life of Joseph Severn. S. Birkenhead; B.................... 134
Aguirre, José Antonio de
  Escape via Berlin; B.................... 722
Air gunner. B. Hutton and A. Rooney; B.. 534
Akritan songs. A. Sikelianos. Greek text and English translation by P. Nord; AN 389
Allen, Jay; R 102
America and the Americas. H. Herring; B. 658
American character, the. D. W. Brogan; B.. 566
American in Sicily, an. E. Davis; AN.... 389
Anatole France: A life without illusions. J. Axelrad; B 532
Anna and the king of Siam. M. Landon; AN 277
Argentine diary. R. Josephs; B........... 188
Argentine riddle. F. J. Weil; B........... 750
Army of shadows. J. Kessel; B 102
Arrival and departure. A. Koestler; B..... 241
Art in the armed forces; Pictures by men in action; B 567
Arvin, Newton; R 566
Auden, W. H.
  For the time being; B.................. 537
Auden, W. H.; R 355
Axelrad, Jacob
  Anatole France: A life without illusions; B 532

B

Bailer, Lloyd H.; R 217
Baker, George
  Sad Sack, the; B 618
Bancroft, George, biography. R. B. Nye; B 300
Barricades, the. P. Toynbee; AN......... 443
Barzun, Jacques; R 521
Bates, Ralph; R....188, 620, 658, 722, 750, 778
Beast in view. M. Rukeyser; B............ 660
Beck, Warren
  Final score; B......................... 304
Beerbohm, Max
  Lytton Strachey; B.................... 158
Behold trouble. G. Hicks; B............. 696
Belden, Jack
  Still time to die; B.................. 358
Bellamy, Edward, biography. A. E. Morgan; B 803
Belshaw, H.; R 806
Benét, William Rose
  Day of deliverance: A book of poems in war time; AN....305; see also C.... 627
Bentley, Eric Russell
  Century of hero-worship, a; B........... 412
Bentley, Eric Russell; R..22, 534, 595, 660, 723
Berge, Wendell
  Cartels; B............................ 595
Bergson, Abram
  Structure of Soviet wages, the, a study in socialist economics; B 77
Bernanos, Georges
  Plea for liberty; B.................... 162
Between heaven and earth. F. Werfel; B.. 723
Bienstock, Gregory, S. M. Schwarz, and A. Yugow
  Management in Russian industry and agriculture. Edited by A. Feiler and J. Marschak; B 77
Birkenhead, Sheila
  Against oblivion: The life of Joseph Severn; B 134
Bishop, Air Marshal William A.
  Winged peace; B 605
Bisson, T. A.; R 75, 159, 440, 622, 660, 696, 724
Black mail. H. Hoke; B................. 275
Bloom, Solomon F.; R.................... 76
Boardman, Philip
  Patrick Geddes: Maker of the future; B 566
Bogan, Louise; R.................214, 526, 775
Bolté, Charles G.; R.................... 605
Boston adventure. J. Stafford; B.......... 383
Boyle, Kay; R 748
Brailsford, H. N.
  Our settlement with Germany; B........ 563
Brant, Irving; R 48
Brave men. E. Pyle; B 658
Bread upon the waters. R. Pesotta; B..... 806
British commonwealth, the: Its place in the service of the world. Sir E. Grigg. Introduction by Lord Halifax; B........ 20
Brittain, Vera
  Account rendered; B.................... 751

PAGE

Brodie, Bernard
  Guide to naval strategy, a; B........... 303
Brogan, D. W.
  American character, the; B.............. 566
Brooks, Van Wyck
  World of Washington Irving, the; B.... 411
Brown, Harry
  Walk in the sun, a; B.................. 74
Brown, Ralph Adams; R.........695, 723, 750
Bruner, Jerome S.
  Mandate from the people; B 247
Bureaucracy. J. M. Juran; B............ 778
Burton, Robert, the psychiatry of. B. Evans; B 532

C

Calhoun, John C., biography. C. Wiltse; B.. 750
Campbell, Joseph, and H. M. Robinson
  Skeleton key to Finnegans wake, a; B... 214
Carrie Chapman Catt; A biography. M. G. Peck; B 330
Cartels. W. Berge; B.................... 595
Catt, Carrie Chapman, biography. M. G. Peck; B 330
Century of hero-worship, a. E. R. Bentley; B 412
Chang, Dr. H. H.
  Chiang Kai-shek: Asia's man of destiny; B....246; see also C 755
Characteristics of the American Negro. Edited by O. Klineberg; B............ 356
Chiang Kai-shek: Asia's man of destiny. Dr. H. H. Chang; B....246; see also C.... 755
Children of light and the children of darkness, the: A vindication of democracy and a critique of its traditional defence. R. Niebuhr; B...720; see correction... 748
China enters the machine age. Kuo-heng Shih; B 660
China looks forward. Sun Fo; B.......... 440
China takes her place. C. Crow; B........ 724
Cluny Brown. M. Sharp; AN............ 443
Coleman, McAlister; R......412, 530, 595, 803
Coming struggle for peace, the. A. Visson; B 78
Compass of the world: A symposium on political geography. Edited by H. W. Weigert and V. Stefansson; B 778
Condition of man, the. L. Mumford; B.... 132
Contemporary Spanish American fiction. J. R. Spell; B........................ 804
Control of Germany and Japan, the. H. G. Moulton and L. Marlio; B............ 563
Corbett, P. E.; R 186
Corwin, Norman
  More by Corwin; B..................... 48
Cotton mill worker, the. H. J. Lahne; B.... 623
Coward, Noel
  Middle east diary; B.................. 590
Crab apple jelly. F. O'Connor; B......... 696
Criticism in American periodicals of the works of Henry James from 1866 to 1916. R. N. Foley; B 718
Croce, Benedetto
  Germany and Europe: A spiritual dissension. Translated and with an introduction by V. Sheean; B................. 215
Cross and the arrow, the. A. Maltz; B..... 596
Cross-section. Edited by E. Seaver; B..... 190
Crow, Carl
  China takes her place; B.............. 724

D

Dabney, Thomas Ewing
  One hundred great years. The story of the Times-Picayune from its founding to 1940; AN 81
Dali, Salvador
  Hidden faces; B 104
Da Vinci, Leonardo, biography. R. L. Douglas; B 696
Davenport, Russell W.
  My country; B......................... 79
Davis, Earl
  American in Sicily, an; AN 389
Davis, Robert Gorham; R 411
Days of deliverance: A book of poems in war time. W. R. Benét; AN....305; see also C 627
Dear baby. W. Saroyan; B.............. 696
Democracy begins at home. J. Perry; B... 530
Deutsch, Babette
  Take them, stranger; B................ 779
Deutsch, Babette; R 415
Dewey: An American of this century. S. Walker; B 412
Diagnosis of our time. K. Mannheim; B... 596
Dos Passos, John
  State of the nation; B................ 131
Douglas, R. Langton
  Leonardo da Vinci: His life and his pictures; B 696
Dowson, Ernest, biography. M. Longaker; B 534
Drawings of Paul Klee. Edited by W. Grohmann; B 724
Duffield, Marcus; R..........104, 358, 534, 658
Duffus, R. L.
  Innocents at Cedro, the: A memoir of Thorstein Veblen and some others, with the advice and consent of William M. Duffus; B 76
Dunsany, Lord
  Guerrilla; B 596
Dupee, F. W.; R 327, 537, 660, 779

E PAGE

Earth and high heaven. G. Graham; AN.. 443
East by southwest. C. LaFarge; B........ 218
Edward Bellamy. A. E. Morgan; B....... 803
Either/or: A fragment of life. S. Kiekegaard. Volume I: Translated by D. F. and L. M. Swenson; Volume II: Translated by W. Lowrie; B.............. 50
Ernest Dowson. M. Longaker; B.......... 534
Escape via Berlin. J. A. de Aguirre; B.... 722
Eulau, Heinz H. F.; R.................... 77
Evans, Bergen
  Psychiatry of Robert Burton, the; B..... 532
Everybody's political what's what. G. B. Shaw; B 521

F

Fast, Howard
  Freedom road; B 218
Fernand-Laurent, J. C.
  Gallic charter: Foundations of tomorrow's France; B 243
Feuchtwanger, Lion
  Simone; B 444
Fighting Joe Hooker. W. H. Hebert; B.... 723
Final score. W. Beck; B................ 304
"First with the most" Forrest. R. S. Henry; B 695
Fitzpatrick, Edward A.
  McCarthy of Wisconsin; AN 81
Foley, Richard Nicholas
  Criticism in American periodicals of the works of Henry James from 1866 to 1916; B............................. 718
For love alone. C. Stead; B............. 535
For self-examination and Judge for yourselves! and Three discourses, 1851. S. Kiekegaard. Translated by W. Lowrie; B 50
For the time being. W. H. Auden; B....... 537
Foreign policy begins at home. J. P. Warburg; B 694
Forrest, Nathan Bedford, biography. R. S. Henry; B 695
Fox, William T. R.
  Super-powers, the: The United States, Britain, and the Soviet Union—their responsibility for peace; B 384
Fraenkel, Osmond K.
  Our civil liberties; B 387
France, Anatole, biography. J. Axelrad; B.. 532
Frank, Waldo
  Jew in our day, the. With an introduction by R. Niebuhr; B.................... 355
Franklin, Benjamin, biography. C. Van Doren and eleven others; B................. 20
Frazier, E. Franklin; R...............356, 776
Freedom road. H. Fast; B............... 218
Freeman, Douglas Southall
  Lee's lieutenants: A study in command. Vol. III. From Gettysburg to Appomattox; B 778
French colonies, the: Past and future. J. Stern; AN 81
French impressionists and their contemporaries. Preface by E. A. Jewell. Photo research and biographies by A. Crane. Supervised by A. Gloeckner; B 480
Freund, Philip
  Young Greek and the Creole, the; AN... 444
Frontiers of American culture: A study of adult education in a democracy. J. T. Adams; B.......................... 160
Furlough. F. Hoellering; B.............. 304

G

Gallic charter: Foundations of tomorrow's France. J. C. Fernand-Laurent; B...... 243
Geddes, Patrick, biography. P. Boardman; B 566
Gentleman from Massachusetts, the: Henry Cabot Lodge. K. Schriftgiesser; B 439
George Bancroft: Brahmin rebel. R. B. Nye; B 300
Gerard Manley Hopkins: A life. E. Ruggles; B 415
Germany: A self-portrait. A collection of German writings from 1914 to 1943. Edited by H. R. Crippen; B 22
Germany and Europe: A spiritual dissension. B. Croce. Translated and with an introduction by V. Sheean; B 215
Gide, André
  Imaginary interviews. Translated from the French by M. Cowley; B 526
Gilbert, William H., Jr.
  Peoples of India; B.................. 159
Giraud and the African scene. G. W. Price; B 74
Gogol, Nikolai, biography. V. Nabokov; B 658
Golden mirror, the. M. Zaturenska; B...... 660
Goldman, Eric F.; R 160
Goodrich, L. Carrington
  Short history of the Chinese people, a; B 51
Goodrich, Lloyd
  Winslow Homer; B 539
Gordon, Manya
  How to tell progress from reaction. Roads to industrial democracy; B 478

Index

PAGE
Goshal, Kumar
  People of India, the; B.................. 159
Goudge, Elizabeth
  Green dolphin street; AN................ 443
Graham, Gwethalyn
  Earth and high heaven; AN............... 443
Grattan, C. Hartley; R 20
Gravediggers of France, the. Pertinax; B... 299
Graves, Robert
  Wife to Mr. Milton; B.................... 751
Great short novels of Henry James, the. Edited with an introduction and comments by P. Rahv; B.................. 652
Green continent, the: A comprehensive view of Latin America by its leading writers. An anthology selected and edited by G. Arciniegas. Translated by H. de Onis and others; B 440
Green dolphin street. E. Goudge; AN..... 443
Greenberg, Clement; R...480, 539, 567, 696, 724
Grigg, Sir Edward
  British commonwealth, the: Its place in the service of the world. Introduction by Lord Halifax; B.................. 20
Groves, Harold M.
  Production, jobs, and taxes; B........... 107
Gunnison, Royal Arch
  So sorry, no peace; B.................... 622
Guérard, Albert; R....20, 78, 243, 328, 532, 566, 694, 720, see correction.... 748
Guerrilla. Lord Dunsany; B 596
Guide to naval strategy, a. B. Brodie; B... 303
Gunther, Frances
  Revolution in India; B.................. 159

H

Haggin, B. H.
  Music for the man who enjoys "Hamlet"; B 620
Haggin, B. H.; R.......................... 137
Halsey, Margaret
  Some of my best friends are soldiers; AN. 443
Hays, H. R.
  Lie down in darkness; AN............... 443
Hayek, Friedrich
  Road to serfdom, the; B 478
Headquarters Budapest. R. Parker; B...... 272
Heal, Edith
  This very sun; B........................ 808
Hebert, Walter H.
  Fighting Joe Hooker; B.................. 723
Hedden, Worth Tuttle
  Wives of high pasture; B................ 218
Henry, Robert Selph
  "First with the most" Forrest; B....... 695
Henry James: Stories of writers and artists. Edited with an introduction by F. O. Matthiessen; B 652
Henry James: the major phase. F. O. Matthiessen; B.......................... 775
Herman Melville: The tragedy of mind. W. E. Sedgwick; B....................... 694
Hermens, Ferdinand, A.
  Tyrants' war and the people's peace, the; B 750
Herring, Hubert
  America and the Americas; B........... 658
Hicks, Granville
  Behold trouble; B 696
Hidden faces. S. Dali; B................. 104
History of Rome Hanks, the. J. S. Pennell; B 161
Hoellering, Franz
  Furlough; B 304
Hoellering, Franz; R..................131, 215
Hogg, George
  I see a new China; B.................. 414
Hoke, Henry
  Black mail; B........................... 275
Hollywood hallucination, the. P. Tyler; B 50; see also C 195
Homer, Winslow, biography. L. Goodrich; B 539
Hook, Sidney; R............412, 530, 596, 621
Hooker, General Joseph, biography. W. H. Hebert; B 723
Hope, Bob
  I never left home. Illustrated by C. Rose; B 104
Hopkins, Gerard Manley, biography. E. Ruggles; B 415
Horace Walpole's correspondence with Mary and Agnes Berry. Edited by W. S. Lewis and W. R. Dayle, with the assistance of C. H. Bennett and E. M. Martz. Two volumes; B 530
How to tell progress from reaction: Roads to industrial democracy. M. Gordon; B 478
Humphries, Rolfe
  Replies to W. R. Benét's criticism of review of "Day of deliverance: A book of poems in wartime"; C....627; see also AN 305
  Summer landscape, the; B............... 779
Humphries, Rolfe; R 134, 535, 691
Hutchinson, Betsy; R....................48, 330
Hutchinson, Keith; R...................... 74
Hutton, Bud, and A. Rooney
  Air gunner; B 534
Huxley, Aldous
  Time must have a stop; B.............. 270
Huxley, Julian
  On living in a revolution; AN.......... 305

I PAGE

I never left home. B. Hope. Illustrated by C. Rose; B.......................... 104
I see a new China. G. Hogg; B.......... 414
Iliad of Homer, the. A line for line translation in dactylic hexameters. W. B. Smith and W. Miller; B.............. 535
Imaginary interviews. A. Gide. Translated from the French by M. Cowley; B...... 526
Innocents at Cedro, the: A memoir of Thorstein Veblen and some others, with the advice and consent of William M. Duffus. R. L. Duffus; B.................... 76

J

James, Henry, writings; B..652; see also B 775
Jew in our day, the. W. Frank. With an introduction by R. Niebuhr; B........... 355
John C. Calhoun, nationalist, 1782-1828. Vol. I. C. Wiltse; B..................... 750
Johnson, Pamela Hansford
  Winter quarters; B 135
Johnson, Samuel, biography. J. W. Krutch; B 654
Joseph the provider. T. Mann; B......... 47
Josephs, Ray
  Argentine diary; B 188
Juran, J. M.
  Bureaucracy; B 778
Justema, William
  Private papers: Poems of an army year; AN 389

K

Kardiner, Abram; R....................... 132
Karski, Jan
  Story of a secret state; B............. 746
Kaye-Smith, Sheila, and G. B. Stern
  Speaking of Jane Austen; B............. 187
Kelsen, Hans
  Peace through law; B................... 623
Kessel, Joseph
  Army of shadows; B..................... 102
Kesten, Hermann; R....................... 474
Kiekegaard, Soren
  Either/or: A fragment of life. Volume I: Translated by D. F. and L. M. Swenson; Volume II: Translated by W. Lowrie; B 50
  For self-examination and Judge for yourselves! and Three discourses, 1851. Translated by W. Lowrie; B.......... 50
  Training in Christianity. Translated by W. Lowrie; B 50
Klee, Paul, drawings. Edited by W. Grohmann; B 724
Koestler, Arthur
  Arrival and departure; B 241
Koht, Halvdan, and S. Skard
  Voice of Norway, the; AN............... 81
Kronenberger, Louis; R...........158, 187, 654
Krutch, Joseph Wood
  Samuel Johnson; B...................... 654
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R..............216, 530
Kuo-heng Shih
  China enters the machine age; B........ 660

L

Labor baron: A portrait of John L. Lewis. J. A. Wechsler; B 271
Labor lawyer. L. Waldman; B............ 386
L'affaire Pétain, faits et documents. A. Schwob; B 748
La Farge, Christopher
  East by southwest; B.................. 218
Lahne, Herbert J.
  Cotton mill worker, the; B............. 623
Lambert, Constant
  Music ho!; B........................... 137
Lamott, Willis
  Nippon: The crime and punishment of Japan; B 75
Landon, Margaret
  Anna and the king of Siam; AN 277
Lane, Margaret
  Where Helen lies; B 696
Last voyage of the Quien Sabe, the. L. Skattebol; B 534
Lattimore, Owen and Eleanor
  Making of modern China, the: A short history; B 164
Leaning tower and other stories, the. K. A. Porter; B 359
Lee's lieutenants: A study in command. Vol. III. From Gettysburg to Appomattox. D. S. Freeman; B..................... 778
Lees, Hannah
  Till the boys come home; B............ 332
Leonardo da Vinci: His life and his pictures. R. L. Douglas; B 696
Leonov, Leonid
  Road to the ocean; B 751
Letters home. Arranged and edited by M. Curtiss; B 104
Lewis, John L., biography. J. A. Wechsler; B 271
Lie down in darkness. H. R. Hays; AN... 443
Lippmann, Walter
  U. S. war aims; B 186

PAGE
Little coquette. R. de F. McCormick; B.... 273
Lodge, Henry Cabot, biography. K. Schriftgiesser; B 439
Loeb, James, Jr.; R 247
Longaker, Mark
  Ernest Dowson; B 534
Lytton Strachey. M. Beerbohm; B 158

M

Maisel, Edward M.; R 590
Making of modern China, the: A short history. O. and E. Lattimore; B 164
Maltz, Albert
  Cross and the arrow, the; B............ 596
Management in Russian industry and agriculture. G. Bienstock, S. M. Schwarz, and A. Yugow. Edited by A. Feiler and J. Marschak; B 77
Mandate from the people. J. S. Bruner; B.. 247
Mann, Thomas
  Joseph the provider; B 47
Mannheim, Karl
  Diagnosis of our time; B 596
Marlio, Louis, and H. G. Moulton
  Control of Germany and Japan, the; B.. 563
Marshall, Margaret; R........74, 131, 562, 590, 618, 652, 718, 746
Masterpieces of painting from the National gallery of art. Edited by H. Cairns and J. Walker; B 724
Matthiessen, F. O.
  Henry James: the major phase; B....775; see also B 652
Maurois, André
  Miracle of America, the; B............. 328
McCarthy of Wisconsin. E. A. Fitzpatrick; AN 81
McCormick, Renée de Fontarce
  Little coquette; B 273
McWilliams, Carey
  Prejudice; B 535
Meet Dr. Franklin. C. Van Doren and eleven others; B 20
Mehring, Walter
  No road back. Translated by S. A. de Witt. Illustrations by G. Grosz; B... 474
Melville, Herman, biography. W. E. Sedgwick; B 694
Men and saints: Prose and poetry. C. Péguy. Rendered into English by A. and J. Green; B 595
Middle east diary. N. Coward; B......... 590
Miller, Douglas
  Via diplomatic pouch. Foreword by W. L. Shirer; B 131
Miller, Henry
  Sunday after the war; B 562
Miller, Walter, and W. B. Smith
  Iliad of Homer, the. A line for line translation in dactylic hexameters; B... 535
Milton, George Fort
  Use of presidential power, the, 1789-1943; B 48
Miracle of America, the. A. Maurois; B... 328
Mises, Ludwig von
  Omnipotent government; B.............. 530
Moore, Marianne
  Control of Germany and Japan, the; B.. 563
Mowrer, Lilian; R 299
  Nevertheless; B......................... 779
More by Corwin. Sixteen radio dramas by Norman Corwin; B..................... 48
Morgan, Arthur E.
  Edward Bellamy; B 803
Moulton, Harold G., and L. Marlio
Mumford, Lewis
  Condition of man, the; B 132
Music for the man who enjoys "Hamlet." B. H. Haggin; B 620
Music ho! C. Lambert; B 137
My country. R. W. Davenport; B 779

N

Nabokov, Vladimir
  Nikolai Gogol; B 658
Naturalism and the human spirit. Edited by Y. H. Krikorian; B 804
Nevertheless. M. Moore; B 779
New directions 1944-8; B................. 476
New Europe, the. B. Newman; B 442
New poems 1944. Edited by O. Williams; B 779
Newman, Bernard
  New Europe, the; B 442
Nichols, Beverley
  Verdict on India; B 696
Niebuhr, H. Richard; R.................. 50
Niebuhr, Reinhold
  Children of light and the children of darkness, the: A vindication of democracy and a critique of its traditional defence; B 720; see correction 748
Niebuhr, Reinhold; R........105, 478, 563, 623
Nikolai Gogol. V. Nabakov; B........... 658
Nippon: The crime and punishment of Japan. W. Lamott; B 75
No road back. W. Mehring. Translated by S. A. de Witt. Illustrations by G. Grosz; B 474
Norman, Charles
  Soldier's diary, a; AN 389

PAGE

Northrup, Herbert
  Organized labor and the Negro; B 217
Nye, Russel B.
  George Bancroft: Brahmin rebel; B 300

O

O'Connor, Frank
  Crab apple jelly; B 696
Of men and battles. Pictures by D. Fredenthal and text by R. Wilcox; B 567
Omnipotent government. L. von Mises; B .. 530
On living in a revolution. J. Huxley; AN .. 305
One hundred great years. The story of the Times-Picayune from its founding to 1940. T. E. Dabney; AN 81
Organized labor and the Negro. H. R. Northrup; B 217
Our civil liberties. O. K. Fraenkel; B 387
Our settlement with Germany. H. N. Brailsford; B 563

P

Parker, Robert
  Headquarters Budapest; B 272
Patrick Geddes: Maker of the future. P. Boardman; B 566
Peace through law. H. Kelsen; B 623
Peck, Mary Gray
  Carrie Chapman Catt: A biography; B ... 330
Péguy, Charles
  Men and saints: Prose and poetry. Rendered into English by A. and J. Green; B 595
Pennell, Joseph Stanley
  History of Rome Hanks, the; B 161
People of India, the. K. Goshal; B 159
Peoples of India. W. H. Gilbert, Jr.; B .. 159
People on our side. E. Snow; B 358
Perry, Jennings
  Democracy begins at home; B 530
Pertinax
  Gravediggers of France, the; B 299
Pesotta, Rose
  Bread upon the waters; B 806
Peyre, Henri
  Writers and their critics; B 691
Phillips, William; R 47, 241
Plea for liberty. G. Bernanos; B 162
Porter, Katherine Anne
  Leaning tower and other stories, the; B .. 359
Possony, Stefan T.; R 303, 778
Prejudice. C. McWilliams; B 535
Presidential agent. U. Sinclair; B 74
Price, G. Ward
  Giraud and the African scene; B 74
Primer of the coming world. L. Schwarzschild; B 105
Private papers: Poems of an army year. W. Justema; AN 389
Problem of Germany, the. Interim report by a Chatham House study group; B 563
Production, jobs, and taxes. H. M. Groves; B 107
Psychiatry of Robert Burton, the. B. Evans; B 532
Pyle, Ernie
  Brave men; B 658

R

Rahv, Philip; R 658, 694
Revolution in India. F. Gunther; B 159
Rice, Philip Blair; R 804
Riesel, Victor; R 275, 332
Road to serfdom, the. F. Hayek; B 478
Road to the ocean. L. Leonov; B 751
Robinson, Henry Morton, and J. Campbell
  Skeleton key to Finnegans wake, a; B 214
Rooney, Andy, and B. Hutton
  Air gunner; B 534
Ruggles, Eleanor
  Gerard Manley Hopkins: A life; B 415
Rukeyser, Muriel
  Beast in view; B 660

S

Sad Sack, the. G. Baker; B 618
Samuel Johnson. J. W. Krutch; B 654
Saroyan, William
  Dear baby; B 696
Schriftgiesser, Karl
  Gentleman from Massachusetts, the: Henry Cabot Lodge; B 439
Schuman, Frederick L.; R 384
Schwartz, Delmore; R 190, 476
Schwarz, Solomon M., G. Bienstock, and A. Yugow
  Management in Russian industry and agriculture. Edited by A. Feiler and J. Marschak; B 77
Schwarzschild, Leopold
  Primer of the coming world; B 105
Schwob, André
  L'affaire Pétain, faits et documents; B ... 748
Seagle, William; R 387
Selected poems of R. P. Warren; B 660

PAGE

Sedgwick, William Ellery
  Herman Melville: The tragedy of the mind; B 694
Selection from the poems of Alfred, Lord Tennyson, A. Selected with an introduction by W. H. Auden; B 776
Severn, Joseph, biography. S. Birkenhead; B 134
Shakespeare and the actors: The stage business in his plays (1600-1905). A. C. Sprague; B 216
Shape of books to come, the. J. D. Adams; B 660
Shapiro, Karl
  V-letter and other poems; B 327
Sharp, Margery
  Cluny Brown; AN 443
Shaw, George Bernard
  Everybody's political what's what; B 521
Shepard, Odell; R 300, 439
Short history of the Chinese people, a. L. C. Goodrich; B 51
Sikelianos, Anghelos
  Akritan songs. Greek text and English translation by P. Nord; AN 389
Simone. L. Feuchtwanger; B 444
Sinclair, Upton
  Presidential agent; B 74
Skard, Sigmund, and H. Koht
  Voice of Norway, the; AN 81
Skattebol, Lars
  Last voyage of the Quien Sabe, the; B .. 534
Skeleton key to Finnegans wake, a. J. Campbell and H. M. Robinson; B 214
Skidmore, Hobert Douglas
  Valley of the sky; B 218
Smedley, Agnes; R .. 51, 246; see also C .. 755
Smith, William Benjamin, and W. Miller
  Iliad of Homer, the. A line for line translation in dactylic hexameters; B 535
Snow, Edgar
  People on our side; B 358
So sorry, no peace. R. A. Gunnison; B 622
Soldier's diary, a. C. Norman; AN 389
Some of my best friends are soldiers. M. Halsey; AN 443
Speaking of Jane Austen. S. Kaye-Smith and G. B. Stern; B 187
Spell, Jefferson Rea
  Contemporary Spanish American fiction; B 804
Sprague, Arthur Colby
  Shakespeare and the actors: The stage business in his plays (1600-1905); B .. 215
Stafford, Jean
  Boston adventure; B 383
State of the nation. J. Dos Passos; B 131
Stead. Christina
  For love alone; B 535
Stern, G. B., and S. Kaye-Smith
  Speaking of Jane Austen; B 187
Stern, James; R 104, 135, 273, 444
Stern, Jacques
  French colonies, the: Past and future; AN 81
Stewart, Maxwell S.; R 164, 414, 535
Still time to die. J. Belden; B 358
Stolberg, Benjamin
  Tailor's progress; B 103
Story of a secret state. J. Karski; B 746
Strachey, Lytton. M. Beerbohm; B 158
Structure of Soviet wages, the, a study in socialist economics. A. Bergson; B ... 77
Summer landscape, the. R. Humphries; B .. 779
Sun Fo
  China looks forward; B 440
Sunday after the war. H. Miller; B 562
Super-powers, the: The United States, Britain, and the Soviet Union—their responsibility for peace. W. T. R. Fox; B 384
Syrkin, Marie
  Your school, your children; B 621

T

Taft, Philip; R 103, 271, 386, 623, 806
Tailor's progress. B. Stolberg; B 103
Take them, stranger. B. Deutsch; B 779
Tennyson, Alfred, Lord; selected poems. Selected with an introduction by W. H. Auden; B 776
Testament to democracy. Right Hon. Lord Wedgwood; B 302
This very sun. E. Heal; B 808
Till the boys come home. H. Lees; B 332
Time for decision, the. S. Welles; B 186
Time must have a stop. A. Huxley; B 270
Times-Picayune; history of, from its founding to 1940. T. E. Dabney; AN 81
Torrey, Volta
  You and your Congress; B 332
Toynbee, Philip
  Barricades, the; AN 443
Training in Christianity. S. Kiekegaard. Translated by W. Lowrie; B 50
Trilling, Diana
  Replies to B. Viertel's letter on her review of "Transit" by A. Seghers; C 26
Trilling, Diana; R ... 161, 218, 270, 304, 332 359, 383, 443, 535, 596, 696, 751, 808
Trilling, Lionel; R 532, 776

PAGE

Tyler, Parker
  Hollywood hallucination, the; B .... 50; see also C 195
Tyrants' war and the people's peace, the. F. A. Hermens; B 750

U

Understanding New Zealand. F. L. W. Wood; B 806
U. S. war aims. W. Lippmann; B 186
Use of presidential power, the, 1789-1943. G. F. Milton; B 48

V

V-letter and other poems. K. Shapiro; B ... 327
Valley and its people, the. Text by R. L. Duffus. Illustrations by the Graphics department of the TVA; B 658
Valley of the sky. H. D. Skidmore; B 218
Vambery, Rustem; R 272, 302, 442, 750
Van Doren, Carl, and eleven others
  Meet Dr. Franklin; B 20
Verdict on India. B. Nichols; B 696
Veteran comes back, the. W. Waller; B ... 590
Via diplomatic pouch. D. Miller. With a foreword by W. L. Shirer; B 131
Viertel, Berthold
  Comments on D. Trilling's review of "Transit" by A. Seghers; C 26
Visson, André
  Coming struggle for peace, the; B 78
Voice of Norway, the. H. Koht and S. Skard; AN 81

W

Waldman, Louis
  Labor lawyer; B 386
Walk in the sun, a. H. Brown; B 74
Walker, G. R.; R 107
Walker, Stanley
  Dewey: An American of this century; B 412
Waller, Willard
  Veteran comes back, the; B 590
Walpole, Horace, correspondence with Mary and Agnes Berry. Two volumes; B 530
Warburg, James P.
  Foreign policy begins at home; B 694
Warren, Robert Penn
  Selected poems; B 660
Way our people lived, the: An intimate American history. W. E. Woodward; B 218
Weber, Brom; R 778
Wechsler, James A.
  Labor baron: A portrait of John L. Lewis; B 271
Wecter, Dixon
  When Johnny comes marching home; B .. 590
Wedgwood, Right Hon. Lord
  Testament to democracy; B 302
Weil, Felix J.
  Argentine riddle; B 750
Welles, Sumner
  Time for decision, the; B 186
Werfel, Franz
  Between heaven and earth; B 723
What the Negro wants. Edited by R. W. Logan; B 776
When Johnny comes marching home. D. Wecter; B 590
Where Helen lies. M. Lane; B 696
Whitman, Wilson; R 658
Wife to Mr. Milton. R. Graves; B 751
Willison. George; R 218
Wiltse, Charles
  John C. Calhoun, nationalist, 1782-1828. Vol. I; B 750
Winged peace. W. A. Bishop; B 605
Winter quarters. P. H. Johnson; B 135
Wives of high pasture. W. T. Hedden; B .. 218
Wolfson, Victor; R .... 50; see also C 195
Wood, Frederick L. W.
  Understanding New Zealand; B 806
Woodward, W. E.
  Way our people lived, the: An intimate American history; B 218
World of Washington Irving, the. Van W. Brooks; B 411
Writers and their critics. H. Peyre; B 691

Y

You and your Congress. V. Torrey; B 332
Young Greek and the creole, the. P. Freund; AN 444
Your school, your children. M. Syrkin; B .. 621
Yugow, Aaron, G. Bienstock and S. M. Schwarz
  Management in Russian industry and agriculture. Edited by A. Feiler and J. Marschak; B 77

Z

Zaturenska, Marya
  Golden mirror, the; B 660

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 1, 1944 NUMBER 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 1

EDITORIALS

Finland's False Friends 4
Prospects of Reconversion 5

ARTICLES

The Great Offensive by Charles G. Bolté 6
The Plot Against Wallace by I. F. Stone 7
Storm Signals over South America by John W. White 9
Advance Australia—Where? by Brian Penton 11
The Supreme Court's New Moot Suit by Dwight Macdonald 13
In the Wind 14

POLITICAL WAR

The Maquis's Plan for France by Michael Clark 15
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 17

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Nodier After a Century by Paul Rosenfeld 18
Dr. Franklin by Albert Guérard 20
The Dominions and the Empire by C. Hartley Grattan 20
The Other Germany by Eric Russell Bentley 22
Films by James Agee 24
Art by Clement Greenberg 24
Music by B. H. Haggin 25
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 26
CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 70 by Jack Barrett 28

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Editor Political War Section J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON ▪ MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON
Director of Nation Associates LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

UNLESS THE POLITICAL WISEACRES ARE HOPElessly at sea, Governor Thomas E. Dewey will have flown to Chicago before most Nation readers receive this issue and told the Republican convention that he is the boy "who cain't say no." For nobody doubts that he will consent to be "drafted" despite his 1943 statement: "I do not believe that an honest-to-goodness draft ever nominated the Presidential candidate of one of the major political parties." This will remain true even though his friends succeed in making his selection look a little more like a draft by inducing the other contenders to withdraw and getting him chosen unanimously on the first ballot. The strange thing is that with all his overwhelming support Mr. Dewey seems to have aroused little real enthusiasm. But as Turner Catledge of the New York Times has pointed out, the sole motivation of the Republicans at Chicago is "the desire to win, the hope to win, the determination to win—above all, to win." And Dewey on his vote-getting record in New York State looks more like a winner than anyone else available. Other qualifications would be superfluous.

*

AGREEMENT ON A PROGRAM IS PROVING harder than agreement on a candidate. The natural inclination of the G. O. P. bosses is to follow the rule for platform makers enunciated by Mark Sullivan—"The function of an opposition is to be an opposition." Believers in this strategy would gloss over the many differences on issues inside the party and concentrate on "turning the rascals out." Mr. Dewey himself evidently favors this approach; his one direct contribution to the deliberations of the resolutions committee has been a strong blast at bureaucracy. So far as domestic issues are concerned, suitable compromises can probably be arranged. But the international plank is causing trouble. Even though Mr. Willkie has been sidetracked, Governor Edge of New Jersey and others are protesting against the effort to build it out of "rubber words." Mr. Edge has been particularly incensed by the use of the phrase "peace force" as a means of avoiding any commitment to armed collective action against aggressors and has threatened to take the question to the floor of the convention—a move which the party managers wish to head off at all costs.

BURLIN
PUBLIC L

TO THE CREW OF THE U. S. S. COOS BAY. We sympathize with your indignation about the strike at the Lockland plant of the Wright Aeronautical Company, which held up for several days the production of vitally needed airplane engines. But it is clear that those whose duty it is to keep you informed about events at home have badly misled you in this instance. You inclosed with your letter to the Associated Press a fund you had subscribed out of your small pay for the purpose of "buying off" the "money-hungry strikers." We understand your contempt, but it is misdirected. The walkout at Lockland had nothing to do with money; it was a strike in protest against the transfer of seven skilled Negro workers to a department previously manned only by white personnel. It was an unofficial stoppage in defiance of the Automobile Workers' Union, which is not only opposed to strikes in war time but is strongly committed to the principle of racial equality in industry. Unfortunately there are minorities among the workers who, finding inspiration and encouragement in very high places, fight for discrimination even though it means interfering with the flow of material to the battle fronts. There are members of Congress and governors of great states who are constantly ranting about "white supremacy" and attacking bitterly every effort to allow Negroes equality of opportunity or their other rights as citizens. These are the men morally responsible for the Lockland trouble and many other strikes over the same issue. They provide the lead which ignorant workers follow when they attempt to exclude Negroes from their shops.

*

IN SPITE OF HYSTERICAL OPPOSITION FROM the "White Supremacy" bloc in Congress, the Fair Employment Practices Committee has been granted $500,000 to carry on its fight for racial equality in employment. Meager though the amount may be for the vast responsibility that has been imposed upon the agency, the provision of even this sum must be considered a major political victory for the advocates of racial justice. In the Senate particularly, the racial bigots left no stone unturned to discredit the FEPC and withhold its appropriation. The agency was charged with creating racial trouble, with seeking to communize America, and, in the words of Senator Bilbo, with furthering the Negro's "dream of social equality and intermarriage." Under pressure from the Southern bloc the Senate adopted an amendment which will prevent the government from seizing and operating plants to enforce the rulings of the FEPC against discrimination. The agency will still have the power to enforce its orders through cancelation of government contracts. A second Senate amendment providing that no decision by the FEPC could modify any act of Congress is regarded as an attempt to undermine its cancelation powers. The practical effect of these amendments is not clear as we go to press; but since the agency has achieved remarkable results in the past without adequate authority for cracking down on offenders, now, armed with a clear-cut Congressional mandate, it should make an even better record.

*

THE AMERICAN NAVAL VICTORY AND THE advance on Saipan hold promise of even more spectacular news before the summer is over, as Mr. Bolté suggests on another page. But against our Pacific successes, and the less impressive advances being made in Burma, must be placed Japan's counter-achievements in China. The capture of Changsha in itself was hardly of major importance. The Japanese have held the city briefly on at least two previous occasions and could presumably have retained control before now if they had so desired. But its present capture is part of a large strategic plan which involves the opening of direct rail communications from the Japanese mainland, via the Straits of Shimonoseki, to Canton and, ultimately, to Singapore and Burma. As long as the Japanese hold this line, our own efforts to supply China from a port on the South China coast are completely blocked. The only way for supplies to reach the Chinese armies and our own superbomber bases will continue to be the hazardous air route from India. As General Chennault has indicated, this may seriously delay our victory in the Pacific. Fortunately, the Chinese, by unexpectedly stubborn resistance, seem to have upset the Japanese time-table. The whole of the Canton-Hankow railway has not by any means been conquered, while Chinese counter-attacks in the north have prevented the enemy from consolidating his control of the Hankow-Peiping line. A settlement of the long-standing differences between the Communist and Kuomintang armies—which is still in process of negotiation—would release hundreds of thousands of additional Chinese soldiers in this crucial northern sector and would seem the one immediate hope of balking Japanese plans.

*

VICE-PRESIDENT WALLACE'S MISSION TO China has started most auspiciously. The Vice-President was greeted at the airport by an extraordinary delegation which included President and Madame Chiang Kai-shek, Foreign Minister T. V. Soong, War Minister Ho Ying-chin, and the heads of all but one of the diplomatic missions at Chungking. At a state banquet given the following evening Mr. Wallace made a notable speech, echoing China's legitimate aspirations and making it clear that while America had abandoned the kind of imperialism that insisted on special privileges and concessions it would not again dodge its responsibilities for preserving peace in the Pacific. But Mr. Wallace's success in winning the Chinese has not been confined to formal speech-making. They have found him extremely well-informed and interested in the potential development of Chinese agriculture and industry after the war. Mr. Wallace found time in his first few days to take a long tour through Szechuan's rich farming country, where he examined the latest experiments in applying Western technique to China's age-old land. The Vice-President also made a hit with the American G. I.'s by stripping to the waist and playing three fast games of volley ball. We should probably have heard a howl of protest from the Republicans that the Vice-President was more interested in playing politics than volley ball if they had not already seen to it that few, if any, of the G. I.'s in China will have a vote this fall.

*

ON THE ITALIAN ANTI-FASCIST FRONT THE people themselves have scored some victories. The most important of the gains was the recognition of the new Bonomi government by the Allies. There was some delay over the issues of including Badoglio in the new Cabinet and compelling an oath of allegiance to the king. Badoglio, according to last reports, was not included, and whereas the Badoglio administration pledged allegiance to "the king and his royal successors," the new government swore to act "in the supreme interest of the nation." The monarchy still survives in vestigial form in the person of Prince Humbert, but a liberal republicanism is evidently calling into being new institutions of democracy. The improved situation is showing itself in other ways. Five years ago the tenor Gigli, on his return to Italy from an American tour, informed his countrymen that the United States was on the brink of civil war, that it was being ruined by the Jew who controlled the trade unions, that its arts were in decay, and that there was a "general nervousness and disorientation and an air of extortion and corruption." Gigli was booked last week to sing before American soldiers, but so violent was popular protest because of his previous pleasant associations with Fascists and Nazis that the American officer in charge had to cancel the engagement. Colonel Charles Poletti, former Lieutenant Governor of New York, is now A.M.G. commissioner for the Rome area. It is heartening to learn that his purge of Fascist collaborators from government agencies is going to be thorough and "pitiless." He told Homer Bigart of the New York Herald Tribune that he would lean heavily on the underground movement of resistance, previously heavily snubbed by A.M.G. "I sympathize with the views of these fellows," he said. "What the hell—they've been carrying on the fight for months. They are going to be asked to help." Here, at long last, is the American accent we have been waiting to hear breaking crudely into the suave evasiveness of diplomatic politesse.

THE INEPTITUDE OF OLIVER LYTTLETON, British Minister of Production, and the disproportionate ballyhoo which his remarks raised in this country, both show that the OWI and the British Ministry of Information have not yet completed their educational jobs. One essential for mutual understanding between two countries is a sympathetic grasp of each other's mythology. Our myth is that we entered the war as the surprised victim of unprovoked aggression. The British, on the contrary, take pride in the fact that they took the initiative against Hitler; they declared war on him because of his aggressions against others. And it was because of this pride that Mr. Lyttleton intended to pay a compliment when he said: "It is a travesty on history ever to say that America was forced into the war." What he meant was that America, like Britain, had taken its stand for international morality as a matter of free will, not because of force majeure. Obviously the British story includes an element of compensation for the sorry record of Chamberlainism. Only when Nazi aggression had grown beyond the point where it clearly menaced British interests did the British government reluctantly and hesitatingly take a stand. Our policy toward the aggressors was to back strong moral protests with gradually stronger measures "short of war." Undoubtedly our embargoes against Japan and our tentative support of China were provocative from the Japanese point of view, but it was the kind of provocation of which we need not be ashamed except to the extent that it was inadequate and belated. Neither America nor Britain has to apologize for resisting aggression: both need to become more conscious of their tardiness in resistance—a tardiness for which they are now atoning heavily.

*

THE PRICE CONTROL EXTENSION BILL WHICH was finally adopted by the Senate-House conference committee and subsequently passed by both houses is distinctly less objectionable than either the House or Senate version of the bill; but it remains highly unsatisfactory. After a four-day struggle the notorious Bankhead amendment—designed to roll up huge profits for the textile industry—was discarded in favor of a compromise that will boost clothing prices by somewhat less than the $350,000,000 indicated in the original amendment. The conferees struck out a provision which would have removed all restrictions on wage increases for workers earning less than $37.50 a week and the amendment permitting appeals to the District Courts, but they retained, with some slight modifications, most of the amendments designed to weaken the OPA's enforcement powers. These include a provision making it possible for a price violator who is being sued for treble damages to escape punishment by showing that the violation was not wilful and that reasonable precautions had been taken to prevent it. Another crippling provision requires the OPA to bring action against price violators in the district where the defendant lives or has his office. The new bill also prohibits the OPA from denying a black-market operator the right to sell rationed goods, and requires increases in rent ceilings in cases of "substantial hardship." War Mobilization Chief James F. Byrnes, who was largely responsible for the compromise on the Bankhead amendment, is reported to be strongly opposed to a veto on political grounds, and it is probable that the President is reluctant to compel Congress to cut short its recess. But rather than permit special interests to cripple the entire stabilization program, the President should veto the bill and force Congress to pass some sort of simple continuing legislation.

*

WE LIKE AN INDEPENDENT CONGRESSMAN. John M. Coffee (Dem.) of Washington has a healthy habit of speaking out of turn and not waiting for the nod from his party leaders. It has made him one of the most consistent and effective of the House liberals. Last week he introduced a resolution calling upon the President to break off diplomatic relations with Franco Spain in the interests of a speedier victory and a lasting peace. This in itself constituted a sharp jab at an Administration which had certainly showed no marked hostility to Franco's fascists. But Coffee went on to insist that this should be but a preliminary to the appointment of a military commission charged with getting arms, ammunition, and medical supplies to "the heroic Republican guerrilla armies of Spain when their revolt, timed to weaken the Nazi armies in their moment of greatest crisis, creates in Spain one of the active and decisive battlefields of this global war." It is good to hear a representative of the American people remind his colleagues and his government that the important issue of this war is the utter destruction of fascism.

Finland's False Friends

THE Finnish tragedy is drawing toward its inevitable climax. The Red Army, in the first of its summer offensives, has smashed through the Mannerheim lines in short order and captured the key port of Viipuri. This not only opens the road to the Finnish capital, 135 miles distant, which is being evacuated by civilians, but cuts the main line of communications for the Finnish forces in eastern Karelia. It is in this region that the Russians have now begun new drives, north and south of Lake Onega, and are rapidly retaking Russian territory which the Finns conquered with German aid in 1941 and hoped to retain as part of a "Greater Finland."

Those hopes faded long ago, and now the trap into which the Finns walked so heedlessly when they joined up with the Axis in 1940 is about to close on them. Their one chance to escape total occupation is to make peace, and it is not surprising that rumors of negotiations for an armistice should be spreading in Sweden. But no real peace can be made between Russia and the present Finnish government, which, clinging obstinately to its Nazi allies, threw away its opportunity three months ago. By all reports the Finnish people themselves are desperately tired of the war, but it is not yet clear whether they are prepared to insist on its being brought to a close. In order to survive, in order to get a new chance to build a really democratic state, they must find leaders who are prepared to end forever a foreign policy based on traditional hostility to Russia. If Finland showed its good-will by throwing out the men who have brought it to its desperate situation, we do not believe that the Soviets would insist on a Carthaginian peace.

When peace is Finland's only hope, it is criminal to encourage it to hold out. Yet this is exactly what some of the pre-Pearl Harbor isolationists and other enemies of the Administration in Washington have been doing. The expulsion of the Finnish Minister, Procope, who for far too long had been permitted to carry on anti-Allied activities in this country, has been the signal for vicious attacks on Russia and Mr. Roosevelt. Representative Knutson of Minnesota, for instance, has accused the President of having given "the Russians a free hand to invade Finland and wage a war which is as savage and barbaric as it is unjustifiable."

Propaganda of this sort ignores completely Finnish complicity in German plans of conquest and adopts uncritically the line that Finland was a victim of Russian aggression in June, 1941. We suppose it is hopeless to offer to men like Knutson any facts which conflict with their theories, but unbiased sympathizers with the Finns will find revealing information in an article in the June issue of Harper's. Its author, Major Erwin Lessner, is an Austrian refugee who fought as a volunteer with the Finns during the "Winter War." He describes a meeting in the village of Lapua, where he was stationed, only eleven days after the end of hostilities, at which Parson Kares, leader of the Finnish fascists, persuaded Marshal Mannerheim, never an admirer of Germany, to give his blessing to an alliance with the Nazis for the purpose of waging a new war against Russia. That was in March, 1940; in May the first German soldiers landed in Finland, and work was begun on a great German air base at Petsamo, on the shores of the Arctic, an air base from which many deadly attacks have been launched against American and British ships on their way to Murmansk. When the moment came, a little more than a year later, for Hitler to attack Russia, there were at least seven German divisions in Finland ready to take their part in the invasion. Under these circumstances it is hardly possible to describe Finland as the victim of unprovoked aggression, even if Russians fired the first shot.

There are still some seven German divisions in Finland, and we wonder what our Knutsons would suggest that the Russians do about this force. In order to save Finland from invasion, is it to be allowed to stay there unscathed, menacing Russian communications with Murmansk? Or would they suggest that Russia sign an armistice with Finland on terms which will allow these German troops to withdraw in good order and so become available for reinforcement of Rommel's hard-pressed legions in Normandy? How many American lives are they prepared to sacrifice in order to uphold the hands of Finland's fascists? Unless they have an answer to such questions, they will serve both Finland and America better than they are now doing by advising Helsinki to make a peace that will enable the Red Army to insure the utter destruction of the German divisions cornered in the north.

Prospects of Reconversion

RECONVERSION is not so close as it would appear to be in the headlines, and its timing will be determined not in Washington but in Europe. WPB Chairman Donald M. Nelson has been under pressure from industry for months to permit some resumption of civilian production, and he has now announced that he will permit three steps in that direction. Manufacturers will be allowed enough materials for working models of products to be turned out after the war. They will be allowed to purchase necessary machinery, tools, and dies for civilian production out of available surpluses and, where it will not interfere with war production, to place orders with the machine-tool industry. Both these steps seem to us proper and necessary. A third is still clouded in considerable doubt. Restrictions are to be lifted on aluminum and magnesium in order to permit civilian output where man-power is available. But on the question of the availability of man-power there seems to be a difference of opinion between the military and the War Production Board.

The man-power problem is extremely complicated. On the one hand, employment in munitions production has dropped 800,000 since the peak of last fall and may drop another million by the end of this year. On the other hand, as Chairman Nelson told the Truman committee, there is still a serious shortage of labor in some areas, and some 200,000 workers must be shifted to tight labor areas within the next few months if we are to meet current production goals. Unlike materials, labor cannot be crated and shipped where it is wanted. All sorts of factors—wages, housing, the unwillingness of people to leave their homes—play a part. Nelson's position seems to be that since labor is not fluid and many workers cannot be moved at all, a certain amount of civilian production could be allowed in areas of labor surplus. The military authorities fear that if such resumption is permitted, it will ease pressure on workers to move into sections where there are labor shortages. The position seems to be that a certain amount of unemployment is necessary on the edges of the war effort to keep labor moving toward places where it is needed.

Any considerable reconversion is out of the question, as Nelson has made clear, until we are closer to Hitler's defeat. The army woke up in Italy to the need for more artillery and in France to the need for more tanks—though it would have expanded both programs long ago if it had been more willing to learn from Russian experience. Now some reconverted facilities, notably in the railroad-equipment industry, will have to be turned back to the production of tanks. This is no easy task, and illustrates the danger of permitting reconversion before we are certain that there may not be a change in the fortunes of war. Both capital and labor are apt to press too soon for reconversion, and we may find them both allied against the military. It would be safer to overrate rather than to underrate the extent of German resistance and the task of defeating Japan when the European war is over.

Some small part of the pressure has been eased by the action of the military in consenting to let the new Production Executive Committee of the WPB decide what plants and what localities are to be affected by the cutbacks in military orders. It would do a great deal for labor morale and smooth the economic readjustments involved if labor were represented directly on this committee, as asked by R. J. Thomas of the United Automobile Workers' Union. The system of labor advisory committees is unsatisfactory at best and actually exists largely on paper. At the present time there are 769 industry advisory committees—and 13 labor advisory committees. The figures are the best commentary on the realities of labor-management cooperation at the WPB.

The job of reconversion is enormous and delicate and will need much good-will and cooperation to be successful. At present, discussion of the subject is far too much concerned with when industry can get the go signal and how soon controls will be removed. That way lies a return to pre-war production levels, and that, as Thomas said in Washington last week, means fifteen to nineteen million unemployed. Labor representation, direct representation at the top levels, would give labor a chance to keep attention focused on the need for full employment. "The type of planning that I think is necessary," Thomas said, "is not planning for reconversion but planning for full utilization of our material and human resources." Theoretically everyone shares that perspective; actually little is being done about it.

BURLINGA

The Great Offensive

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

WE'VE heard a lot of talk about global warfare, but now for the first time we are seeing it waged. The past three weeks have seen the beginnings of the true global offensive; the long and anxious period in which the United Nations built up their strength and deployed their forces is now finished. With the opening of the global offensive, the end of the war is for the first time within sight.

The great offensive has been well planned and well coordinated. It is a concurrent offensive, waged on opposite sides of the world, aimed at destroying our enemies' strength and pushing them back into their homelands. There is no out for Germany or Japan: having lost the initiative, having failed to crush us before we became more powerful than they, they have lost everything—including an early advantage, that of possessing interior lines of communication. We now have superior strength massed against both of them: what good are interior lines if they dare not move troops from one front to another for fear of an offensive against the weakened front? When you have won an empire by conquest and must hold it all by force, and when you are then confronted by superior force at many or all of your boundaries, you are inescapably in a dilemma, and interior lines are no longer of major importance.

Consider Germany's situation. The Allies have done a tremendous job of landing men and material on the Norman beaches; now they have taken Cherbourg, a deep-water port through which they can funnel even greater quantities of men and material, harbor demolitions notwithstanding. The local German reserves have been roughly handled, and were not able to force a penetration to the sea in the early stages of the operation when the Allies were comparatively weak ashore. As this is written, the enemy's strategic counter-attack has still not developed, which means either: (1) that the Germans couldn't move their mobile reserve over lines of communication badly battered by the Allied air force and the sabotage of the French Army of the Interior; or (2) that SHAEF's astute method of issuing consecutive weekly warnings to European fishermen to stay home has made the Germans fear other landings at spots which they dare not leave uncovered.

Meanwhile a strong and masterfully commanded Allied force has been driving the Germans up Italy—obviously toward no good end, unless the mauled Tenth and Fourteenth armies can somehow contrive a stand on the Pisa-Rimini line. With the Allies poised on Corsica and Sardinia, no troops can leave southern France to aid their unfortunate comrades on the peninsula; nor, with Tito active in Yugoslavia, can help come from the Balkans.

Likewise the long eastern front. Finland appears on the verge of quitting the war, thus in effect exposing the extreme left flank of the German line. The successful drive in Finland is directly linked with the opening of the main summer offensive on the White Russian front around Vitebsk. Removal of Finland from the Russians' right flank opens the way for a drive through the Baltic states; but no such drive is profitable so long as the Germans hold Vitebsk, the strongest bastion on the entire eastern front and a thorn in the left flank of any such drive. In last winter's offensive against Vitebsk, the local Soviet command was known as "troops of the Second Baltic Front," which suggested a clue to the intention of that offensive, as Vitebsk is a long way from the Baltic.

The Germans held Vitebsk then, and according to their communiqués threw the Russians back from their temporarily commanding positions around the city. Presumably great strength has been massed for the present offensive, but Vitebsk still looks like a tough nut. It has been extensively fortified, with concrete strong points, wire fields, mine fields, and artillery batteries sited in great depth. However, if there is a single lesson to be learned from this war, it is that no static defense can long hold out against determined and resourceful attack. Vitebsk may have fallen by the time this is read; if it has, the way will be open for a drive through the Baltic states, or straight across the northern approaches to Poland, above the barrier of the Pripet Marshes.

This is the short route to Germany from the east. As such, it will be strongly defended. But what if it is, or what if Vitebsk holds awhile? Another Soviet offensive is poised below the Pripet Marshes, even closer to Germany; yet another is aimed through Rumania. The Germans cannot shift their forces in anticipation of one or another of these offensives; they must try to hold all their ground with inferior strength, bolstered by increasingly large non-German levies and by that chimerical concrete-and-steel about which they themselves waxed so hoity-toity when they had crashed through the Maginot Line. Time and space are the elements of strategy: on the east as on the west and south, the Allies dictate the timing, and each new phase of the offensive robs the Germans of space. Each phase of the offensive links with the others, and there is symbolism as well as very real military gain in the triangular shuttle bombing of Germany which is now to be started.

In the Far East the lines are not yet so tightly constricted, but the 1,100-mile leap from Eniwetok to Saipan, the cleaning up of Biak, the pounding of the Central Pacific bases, the counter-blows in the Burma-India theater, and the first fine performance of the Superfortresses show the development of the anti-Japanese pattern. The thrust to Saipan, by-passing Truk with derision, seemed daring; but we have Admiral Nimitz's word for it that we "put enough muscle into our Fifth Fleet to handle the situation." The "situation" might have been the entire Japanese fleet; but since Kwajalein, I believe, each of our Central Pacific advances has been covered by a task force powerful enough to engage the Imperial Fleet on favorable terms.

Saipan seemed the final step that would force the Japanese into a fleet engagement: however, the loss of 402 planes on a single day, and the loss and damage to their surface units two days later when our carrier-based aircraft intercepted their task force, turned them away before the Fifth Fleet could close the action. Our admirals regretted this, but eventually how much more regrettable for the Japanese. Our hold on Saipan puts us within striking distance of the Philippines, Formosa —an island to watch carefully—and Japan itself. If the Imperial Command would not risk the fleet to meet this threat, it is difficult to say when it will take risk.

The gap in the Far Eastern war, of course, is the ground situation in China; but this seems the enemy's offensive of desperation, designed to secure the Peiping-Hankow-Canton rail link for overland passage of troops from Manchuria to the South China coast before the sea lanes are closed. An offensive of desperation may win temporary advantage, but it doesn't win wars, or even delay defeats very long.

The Plot Against Wallace

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, June 22

TOM CORCORAN is running quite a campaign behind the scenes here to get the Democratic Vice-Presidential nomination for Supreme Court Justice Douglas, and the tactics being used have disturbed some of Douglas's own colleagues on the bench. Corcoran is hated by the old-line Democratic politicians for past reasons that reflect credit on him, and mistrusted by most of the New Dealers for current reasons that don't. He still has a coterie of office-holders who depend on him for advice and owe their original appointments to his influence as a Presidential adviser before 1940. He uses this coterie for all it is worth on both public and private business, and he has been pretty successful in harnessing it to the Douglas chariot.

So active has the campaign for Douglas become on the Hill that it was discussed at a recent session of the Senate Judiciary Committee as "Tom's Plot." One of those who have been doing some under-cover lobbying for Justice Douglas in Congressional circles and elsewhere is Secretary of the Navy Forrestal, who owes a good deal to Tom's counsel. If the reports I get are correct, Forrestal has overstepped the bounds of propriety in his slurs on Wallace. If Forrestal is wise he will attend to the navy, where he has made a good reputation, and leave politics, where he may lose it, alone.

Corcoran seems to have entree to the White House again, where he takes credit for the Pepper and Hill victories. In White House circles his line is that while labor is on record for Wallace, it doesn't really care and would be as well satisfied with Douglas. With laborites his line is that, of course, Wallace is the best choice for Vice-President, but the reactionaries may block him, and Douglas would make a good second string for labor's bow. With politicians on the Hill, who are hostile to Wallace anyway, the Douglasites play on the argument that Wallace would lose the ticket votes. With the right, the line, of course, is to stress the danger of Wallace's succession to the Presidency. Perhaps Arthur Krock's Sunday dispatch in the New York Times of June 18 indicates that the right may be convinced that Douglas is less dangerous than Wallace. Krock refers to the Supreme Court Justice with curious equanimity as "a judge more radical than otherwise, but deeply native in his personality, intellectual process, and geographical background." I find it hard to see where Wallace of corn-belt Iowa is less "deeply native" than Douglas of the Yale Law School. From so calloused a son of the Wall Street soil as Krock, the phrase may be obscure, but I am inclined to think it significant.

Whether as an ally of Corcoran's or independently, Joe Kennedy is also playing a part in the anti-Wallace campaign and has spread word that the White House is not really for his nomination, which I know is untrue. The President is for Wallace, and his position is to his credit, for there is no one better equipped to carry on the best traditions of the New Deal at home and abroad. The White House second choice, if any, seems to be Ambassador Winant, an engaging figure but much Wallace's inferior in ability and insight. An attempt has been made unsuccessfully to play on the religious angle. Both Kennedy and some of Tom's supporters have claimed that Wallace would alienate the Catholic vote. But this argument has made no headway at the White House and has been resented by important Catholics here, who like Wallace as much as they dislike loose talk of "the Catholic vote."

The Douglasites have played no part, of course, in the attempt of Southern reactionaries to free the Electoral College from popular control but are not without hope that the threat may be enough to dislodge Wallace for their own candidate. Tom's own second choice, Sam Rayburn, is loyal to the President and stands with the Roosevelt Democrats in Texas. Yet either Douglas or Rayburn might be the beneficiary of the Southern revolt, and Corcoran is shrewd enough to understand this. He has much influence with Senator Pepper and seems to have tried to dissuade him from making a speech attacking the Electoral College conspiracy.

The Wallace crowd blames Corcoran's hostility on the Vice-President's opposition to cartels. Corcoran is the dominant figure in the powerful Sterling Drug, Inc., as Sterling Products is now known, and Sterling was closely allied before the war—and before Tom came into it—with I. G. Farben's American subsidiary, General Aniline and Film. The monopolistic policies followed by Sterling in the handling of atabrine, the best of our quinine substitutes, lead straight to the revival of cartel agreements after the war. But this view of Tom's opposition to Wallace is much oversimplified. Douglas has been his pet candidate for President or Vice-President ever since the 1940 campaign. Tom loves politics and he loves power. The manipulation of men and events satisfies his deepest instincts. He is charming, shrewd, energetic, and ruthless. He feels that he has made several Supreme Court justices, at least two Cabinet members, a brace of Representatives and Senators, and many lesser officials, and he would like to make a President.

What has alienated those who once admired him and worked with him is the way in which he has used these men and his influence with them to further his present private interests as a Washington corporation lawyer and lobbyist. He has said that he has put his old conscience "on the shelf" temporarily while he makes some money, but one wonders whether a man can change consciences as easily as he changes shirts. The private interests he serves today run counter to the public causes that once had the benefit of his great abilities. He used his influence at the Department of Justice to get much too mild a consent decree in the Sterling case. He used his influence with Senator Pepper to stop the Senate Patents Committee before it could investigate that case. He is one of the principal advisers of that extraordinarily stupid man Leo T. Crowley, whose policies as Alien Property Custodian and Foreign Economic Administrator have been of great help to Sterling at home and abroad. I'd hate to see Tom add a Vice-President and some day a President to his private collection.

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

TO LOOK FORWARD to a Republican victory in 1936 the Republicans must produce a candidate who can really be considered a rival to Franklin Roosevelt's remarkable personality, with a constructive plan for the social and economic reorganization of the United States which will give a guaranty that it will work better than the Roosevelt program. There is not a single Republican candidate in sight who could be taken seriously.—OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, June 6, 1934.

IN EVERY PART OF THE COUNTRY, in every branch of industry, workers by hundreds, by thousands, and by tens of thousands have been laying down their tools in strikes that have been overwhelmingly supported by the rank and file. . . . Recognition of the union with its implication of the closed shop is the central issue in the rising wave of unrest which may culminate in a strike of steel workers in June.—June 6, 1934.

NO MORE STRIKING EXAMPLE of the Roosevelt-Hull new Latin American policy can be found than our imminent withdrawal from Haiti. Though less important in the eyes of the world than President Roosevelt's continentalizing of the Monroe Doctrine and the abolition of the Platt Amendment, the proposed manner of our leaving Haiti is a more conclusive proof of the high purpose and good faith of the New Deal in inter-American affairs.—ERNEST GRUENING, June 20, 1934.

THE INTERNATIONAL ARMAMENT RING will rejoice in the collapse of the League's effort to initiate an embargo on the shipment of munitions to the Chaco. Although twenty-three nations, including Great Britain and the United States, indicated their willingness to cooperate in the project, ten others made their acceptance conditional on the formal adherence of Germany and Japan, who as non-members of the League have thus far declined to join in the proposed move.—June 20, 1934.

HITLER AND MUSSOLINI, meeting in Venice to the accompaniment of dazzling festivities and political rites, have agreed on a "virile peace" for Europe. . . . Obviously, when the tumult and the shouting dies, it will appear that nothing has happened which is likely to relax the desperate tensions in Europe.—June 27, 1934.

FIRST PLACE AMONG the medical marvels of 1934 was easily won by the long-awaited official A. M. A. report on the socialization of medicine . . . issued to the public by Dr. Morris Fishbein in the form of "Ten Commandments." . . . These pronouncements are in effect a command to the American public to pull in its neck and leave medicine to its sole owners and monopolists, the medical profession. —June 27, 1934.

Storm Signals over South America

BY JOHN W. WHITE

Santiago, Chile, June 18

ECUADOR'S revolution on May 28 and the refusal of Colombia's Senate two weeks earlier to let President López yield to anti-democratic opposition and resign are storm signals of new unrest in South America. Throughout the continent the persecuted democratic forces are determined to try at last to free their countries from their long subjection to fascist-minded dictators. The dictators, quite naturally, are making frenzied efforts to crush this democratic unrest before it gets out of control. Fascism holds no terror for them; it is the nightmare of democracy that drives them to imitate Gestapo methods.

In Argentina, Paraguay, and Peru leaders of organized labor, "the leftist hordes," and other adherents of democracy are being arrested, tortured, and either deported or sent to concentration camps. In Bolivia the junta set up by the revolution which overthrew President Peñaranda under the guidance of Buenos Aires has resorted to similar measures in preparation for the forthcoming "elections," which it is hoped will obtain for the government the recognition of the United States Department of State. These preparations are so thorough that the rigidly censored news agencies were permitted as long ago as March 15 to transmit the prediction that the "elections" would be won by the Movimiento Nacionalista Revolucionario, which has been supporting the de facto regime. In Brazil the signs of popular unrest induced President Vargas to assure the Brazilian people on April 15 that democracy would be restored to them as soon as the war was over.

Of the ten South American countries, only Chile and Uruguay have been able to preserve their democracy free from internal threat. Yet one prediction can be made about South America in all safety: there will be no political stability, no organized production, no ordered economy, no efficient participation in post-war cooperation until freely elected, popularly supported democratic governments are set up in all the republics.

The war has been history's greatest boon to the South American dictators. When the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor thrust the United States into the war, almost completely unprepared, Washington found most South American rulers friendly disposed toward Hitler and Mussolini. Hundreds of millions of dollars had to be poured into their countries to keep the dictatorships "in line"—that is, to purchase an allegiance that in more than one case has been only half-hearted at best. But we were in the biggest war in our history, and it was necessary to adopt a policy that would assure to the United Nations, instead of to Germany and Japan, the strategic raw materials so essential to winning the war.

While superficially adhering to the Atlantic Charter and pretending to cooperate with the United Nations in crushing fascism in Europe, the South American dictators have maintained fascist-style totalitarian regimes at home. Argentina's recently established military government is the most notorious example. Several years before the war started, however, Getulio Vargas had set up in Brazil an Italian-style corporative state which he calls the New State (Estado Novo) instead of the New Order. In Peru, Prado's government is a continuation of the totalitarian state which Marshal Benavides established with the assistance of Japanese military advisers and an Italian police mission. The political secret police organized by this mission has proved fully as efficient as any in Germany, Russia, or Italy. The country's only democratic party, the APRA, is outlawed, and four hundred of its most prominent members are in exile.

It is a significant commentary on the so-called democracy of the South American republics that the democratic forces in the various countries are obliged to communicate with one another by means of "undergrounds" similar to those in the occupied countries of Europe. These undergrounds use the two democratic capitals of Santiago and Montevideo as relay points for collating and redistributing their information. It was through the underground that Velasco Ibarra was able to keep in touch with the democratic parties of Ecuador during his long exile in Chile. A similar organization keeps the exiled members of Peru's APRA in touch with their comrades at home. The underground communication system between Buenos Aires and Montevideo handles almost as much "business" as the regular postal service.

The Nazi type of concentration camp has become an established institution, complete of course with torture chambers and whipping-posts. One of the first acts of the Villarroel government in Bolivia was to establish a concentration camp on Coati Island, in Lake Titicaca, two miles above sea level, and to fill it with democratic leaders and other "Communists." Argentina's concentration camp is in the Territory of Neuquen, in bleak, windy Patagonia. It is packed with democrats, Socialists, Communists, workers, and the other left elements which Argentina's generals hate and fear. Peru has its concentration camp on Fronton Island, near Callao. The affidavits detailing the tortures to which prisoners are subjected would be unbelievable had not the routine in Nazi camps been described so often.

The political situation in Ecuador before the recent revolution was typical of that existing in most of the continent. For the last three months President Arroyo del Rio had concentrated all the activity of his government on one purpose—to prevent the entry into the country of Velasco Ibarra. Ibarra was the extremely popular Presidential candidate of the united democratic parties, which comprised the democratic wing of the conservatives, the Socialists, the unimportant Communists, organized labor, and other liberal forces. His partisans have always insisted that he has the support of 75 per cent of Ecuador's voters. Even allowing for enthusiastic exaggeration, there never has been any doubt of his ability to carry by a wide margin any honest, uncontrolled election. The crowd that welcomed him upon his arrival at Guayaquil was described by the news agencies as the greatest popular demonstration in the recent history of Ecuador. The one thing, of course, that President Arroyo del Rio did not want was an honest election. He had picked an "official" candidate as his successor and was supporting him with all the power of the government in order to keep his own fingers in the graft.

Velasco Ibarra left his long exile in Chile early in March on the Argentine steamer Rio de la Plata, bound for Colombia. President Arroyo del Rio at first refused to let the steamer call at any port in Ecuador but finally permitted it to anchor at the entrance to the Gulf of Guayaquil. A small army of political secret police was sent to the place to prevent anyone from approaching Velasco Ibarra. Passengers boarding the ship were not permitted to be accompanied by friends or members of their families. These elaborate precautions made it impossible for the Rio de la Plata to load a large consignment of balsa wood that was to have been shipped to airplane factories in the United States, but saving Ecuador from Velasco Ibarra was a much more important matter in the mind of Arroyo del Rio than Ecuador's participation in the war effort.

Since becoming President, Velasco Ibarra has promised the people of Ecuador a democracy similar to Chile's. In nearby Colombia the recent refusal of the Senate to accept the resignation of President Alfonso López and his subsequent resumption of the administration insure the continuance of progressive democracy in that country also. Thus the two South American countries closest to the Panama Canal will now have democratic administrations, eager to cooperate with the United States instead of having to be bribed to do so.

Argentina presents the most dangerous threat to the future of democracy in South America. But Argentine meat, hides, wheat, and linseed are so vitally essential to the war effort that the military clique at Buenos Aires knows the United Nations do not dare impose the economic sanctions that would force the downfall of the government. Aggression is part of the totalitarian ideology, as we have learned at great cost, and the Buenos Aires government has lost no time in getting its aggression machinery into operation. The overthrow of Peñaranda in Bolivia was the first step and the only one that so far has met with success. Soon after the Bolivian revolt the Chilean government thwarted an Argentine plot to overturn the strongly democratic government of President Rios. The threat in little Uruguay became so serious that a United States squadron was sent to Montevideo and Admiral Ingram announced to the world that Washington was prepared to defend its friends anywhere against totalitarian aggression. An Argentine-inspired plot against Peru organized in La Paz after the fall of Peñaranda was discovered before it acted.

Not only the democracy but also the peace of the South American continent is endangered by the ambitions of the military clique that rules at Buenos Aires. War and the threat of war have always been a popular strategy for unpopular rulers. The Chilean government recently announced that it had arrested and deported two Argentine officers who were trying to organize a smuggling ring to keep the Argentine army supplied with copper, iron, and other war materials. A chair of national defense has been organized at La Plata University as part of the government's program to educate Argentine youth for war. Inaugurating the course on June 10, Secretary of War Perón explained the government's political goals thus: "Diplomatic action is necessary, but when it fails, we must resort to force in all those situations which justify force."

It is a question where the present Argentine government will strike when it decides to summon the people to unite behind their unpopular generals for the defense of the country. Argentina calls 30,000 young men to the colors every year for compulsory military training. The last two classes have been taught to hate both Brazil and the United States. When taken to the rifle ranges, they are told by the sergeants to imagine they are aiming at a damned Yank or a Brazilian macaco, a slang word for monkey which the Argentines apply to Brazilians with all the venom of a curse.

The Argentine government is using its belated break with the Axis as an excuse for suppressing all the constitutional rights of the people. Radio stations are under strict government control and are forced to interrupt their programs at all hours to broadcast government propaganda. They are forbidden to retransmit British and United States short-wave programs beamed at South America "until they have been edited in accordance with Argentine laws." This editing usually consists of eliminating anything offensive to the Axis powers. Movie theaters must show at least one government propaganda film at each show. Newspapers are told what they may and may not print. Telephone lines are tapped. A large corps of secret political police, organized under the personal direction of members of Hitler's Gestapo, reports on conversations overheard in bars and tea-rooms. The great daily La Prensa was closed for five days for criticizing a stringent economy policy in the hospitals. The two Nazi-subsidized newspapers are kept in newsprint from supplies allotted to the government for its Boletin Oficial. American news reels of the war are closely censored, but two downtown theaters showing German propaganda films remain unmolested.

While we are fighting for democracy, that way of life is taking a brutal beating in South America.

Advance Australia—Where?

BY BRIAN PENTON

AUSTRALIANS sing a national anthem bravely entitled "Advance Australia Fair." Their prospects in a tormented world suggest that "Advance Australia—Where?" might be a more appropriate slogan.

Seven million whites inherit a continent, about the size of the United States, at the strategic crossroads between East and West. To survive, Australia must become the catalyst of Asiatic, American, and British Imperial interests, many of them sharply conflicting. A thousand million Asiatics live at its back door in ghastly poverty. Two of the most numerous peoples—the Chinese and the inhabitants of India—are about to emerge as at least potentially great powers. This writes a question mark over the pattern of the whole world, but it makes especially doubtful the future of the Pacific and of underpopulated and isolated Australia.

Australia has grown up in isolation. Distance, plus a strong British navy, guaranteed that isolation. Behind these barriers Australia was able to legislate a high standard of living for its people. As far as statistics can give the picture, the following figures on real income—compiled by Colin Clark, Queensland government statistician, formerly lecturer in statistics at Cambridge—reveal how Australian standards compared with others in 1938 (the units are an abstraction based on the purchasing power of an American dollar in the decade 1925-34):

U. S. A.	1,381
Canada	1,337
New Zealand	1,202
Great Britain	1,069
Switzerland	1,018
Australia	980
Netherlands	855
Eire	707
France	684
Denmark	680
Germany	646
Belgium	600
Czechoslovakia	455
Japan	353
Italy	343
U. S. S. R.	320
South Africa	276
Lithuania	207

The outstanding fact demonstrated here is that in 150 years of history Australia had been able to provide its people with a standard of living exceeded by only five nations. This standard is immeasurably above that of the 50 per cent of the world's population which lives just to the north. The great question now is whether the conditions which enabled it to do this will continue after the war. That question makes the hair rise on the heads of thoughtful Australians.

The war has partly answered it. Singapore, stronghold of the mighty British navy, fell a few weeks after the first Japanese landed in Malaya. Why? Because the British selfishly abandoned it, along with other possessions on the periphery of their Empire, to be recovered, as one statesman said, "in the subsequent negotiations"? Some Australians thought so, and they were bitter. But the fact was much more distressing. To be abandoned through indifference is one thing; to be abandoned because one's guardians are utterly incapable of carrying out their defensive commitments is quite another.

The Empire was not an effective military unit in modern war. That was the plain truth. Any war was a world war now, and in a world war Britain was so closely beset from the Continent, its exposed supply lines were so vulnerable, that it just could not afford to scatter its forces across a global Commonwealth.

So what of the future? What of the "White Australia" policy—a policy of race differentiation dictated by fear of cheap colored labor, which every educated Asiatic must resent? What of the tariff, which more than any other factor made possible the high industrialization on which Australia's standard of living rested? When the Japanese were fanning out across the Pacific, the Australian Prime Minister said: "The Australian government regards the Pacific struggle as primarily one in which the United States and Australia must have the fullest say in the direction of the democracies' fighting plan. Without any inhibition of any kind I make it quite clear that Australia looks to America, free of any pangs as to our traditional links of kinship with the United Kingdom."

That simple statement caused an illogical flutter and much unwarranted indignation among the editorial writers of Britain. Perhaps it was the word "pangs" which got them. But Mr. Curtin was throwing down no gauntlet. He did not mean that Australia was "cutting the painter" and henceforth would consider itself the protégé of the United States. He meant that in accord with geographic realities Australia looked to America for material and strategic aid on their common sea, without any fear that this would injure its traditional ties, etc., etc. But it was true, though he did not say it, that the traditional links between Australia and the Empire had undergone a subtle change. This change would be simply defined, when the air was less heavily charged, as Australia's discovery that it belonged not in the European orbit of Great Britain but in the Asiatic orbit of the Pacific.

This discovery was a blow, but it was softened by a second discovery made at the same time—that practically close at hand, where the determining realities of his life lay, the Australian had a close blood and lingual relation in the American. The discovery may seem a bit belated, since Australians had been absorbing American culture for years through books, movies, and a two-way traffic in tourists. But here was something deeper than mere imitation. A theoretical commonalty of aims and ideas and—what detached analysis would no doubt later prove even more important—a vital interdependence were demonstrated in dramatic action. If Australia had merely been "rescued" by Americans, the lesson would have had no point. It would have left the long, dark future in pawn to quixotry. But the Americans had come not merely to rescue Australia; they had come also to save themselves. Whether or not Australia was going to be the base for a counter-offensive, whether it was the best springboard for an attack on Japan, was a debatable point: expert military opinion seemed early in the piece to decide it was not. But that tactical decision could not alter the grand strategic truth that America's future in the Pacific—even after it dictated terms to Tokyo—would depend on maintaining in Australia the rule of a friendly, white people. It seemed improbable that Britain would ever wish, or be able, to recover its ante bellum Pacific status. America must. Geography tied it to that area. The vast unexploited markets of Asia, the vast military threat of Asia, the political development of Asia were its intimate concern.

On the strategic map Australia loomed very large—not merely for today, not most significantly for today, but for long and uncertain tomorrows. Australians drew comfort from this to replace the lost sense of security they once derived from reflecting that Britain must protect them because it must protect its possessions in China, Malaya, and India. Now they knew, or believed they knew, that America must continue to cooperate in the defense of Australia because to remain a Pacific power it must maintain a Pacific axis in order to restrain Asiatic infiltration across the encircling net of Pacific islands.

Only one doubt—no bigger than a man's fist—remained. Would this axis be a defensive or an offensive axis? The Australian would not feel easy if it were to be used as a gun at Asia's head, to create the conditions required to exploit the Asiatic mainland in the good old colonial way. Despite fair, vague words to the contrary, that did not seem at all unlikely. There was an Atlantic but so far no Pacific Charter. Reticence on this point was understandable to anyone who had the remotest idea what, in simplest economic terms, the under-privilege of Asia's thousand million souls meant. Any day in the streets of Peiping, Hangkow, or Canton you could see a man squatting beside a piece of sacking on which he displayed for sale a battered can and a rusty nail or two. He was the ironmonger of the multitudinous poor in a country so short of cheap manufactures, so devitalized in purchasing power, that nothing was without economic value. Well might Occidental hypocrisy balk at translating the four freedoms into Chinese. Yet it was doubtful whether they could have meaning in any language unless that were done. Freedom from want and freedom from fear in the Pacific mean the industrialization of Asia.

"But of course," you say. "And America has the capital for the job."

Quite. But for what end? To raise the standards of the backward peoples or to increase American dividends? The two are not, up to a point, incompatible perhaps, and exploitation is not always so ugly as it sounds. Even an imperialistic capitalism which set out to find a use for its surplus money by financing the industrialization of Asia could not help enriching the country with roads, railways, power stations, and factories. It might try to maintain possession of these assets by promoting venal government and political disruption and by holding over China's head the threat of military action from encircling bases, but in the long run the Chinese people would inevitably seize what their own labor and resources had created.

There was the rub. The Chinese people, all the people of Asia, no longer backward, no longer unequipped for large-scale modern war, would eventually rise against those who tried to control and exploit them in the imperial way. When this rising occurred, Australia would provide the main field of battle. One could not contemplate the outcome of such a clash between East and West, between the insurgent East and the declining West, with any optimism.

So the great question remains? Advance Australia—Where? The United States has the clue to the mystery. It is concealed in its yet unformulated Asiatic and Pacific policies. Will it see its long-term profit in the raising of Asiatic standards; or will it go into Asia to grab short-term profits and let the devil take the hindmost. Look at the map and you will see that geography has located Australia in that unenviably exposed position.

The Supreme Court's New Moot Suit

BY DWIGHT MACDONALD

A FEW weeks ago the United States Supreme Court provided the colored people of America with a new-model moot suit, complete with legalistic reat pleats, stuff cuffs, and all the rest. The court dreamed up this bit of judicial tailoring, which has caused seasoned civil-liberties lawyers to gasp slightly, in order to dodge the Lynn case, the only court challenge of military jimcrow that has yet been made. By declaring the Lynn case "moot," on grounds we shall presently examine, the court hopes to avoid having to decide it one way or the other.

I described the early stages of the Lynn case in an article in The Nation of February 20, 1943. It all began two years ago when Lynn, a young Negro landscape gardner, was notified by Local Board 261 of Jamaica, Long Island, that he had been classified 1-A. He replied by letter: "Please be informed that I am ready to serve in any unit of the armed forces of my country which is not segregated by race. Unless I am assured that I can serve in a mixed regiment and that I will not be compelled to serve in a unit undemocratically selected as a Negro group, I will refuse to report for induction."

Local Board 261 took no official notice of this letter and ordered Lynn to report for induction in the fall of 1942. When he refused, he was arrested and indicted for draft evasion. His brother, Conrad Lynn, a lawyer, applied for his release on a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that his selection in an all-Negro quota violated Section 4(a) of the 1940 Draft Act; which states: "In the selection and training of men under this act, and in the interpretation and execution of the provisions of this act, there shall be no discrimination against any person on account of race or color." The Lynn brothers found that no judge would even hear their case so long as Winfred resisted induction. He must come into court "with clean hands." Therefore he accepted induction and entered the army in December, 1942. The Federal District Court in New York then heard the case and ruled against Lynn. Not long afterward, Conrad Lynn himself was drafted, and the case was turned over to Arthur Garfield Hays and his associate, Gerald Weatherly, acting for the American Civil Liberties Union.

On December 8, 1943, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in New York heard the case, and on February 2, 1944, it also ruled against Lynn. It was a split decision, however, Judges Swan and Augustus N. Hand in the majority, and Judge Clark in the minority. To the government's claim that Congress did not intend to abolish racial segregation in selection when it passed Section 4(a), Judge Clark replied: "I find it is difficult to think of more apt language to express the Congressional intent; the suggestion that Congress should have said something more, or amended the statute, means in effect that it should be watchful to see how a statute is violated and then expressly negative such violation or be assumed to sanction it." Mr. Hays at once appealed the decision to the Supreme Court.

Lawyers generally feel they have a good chance of getting the Supreme Court to review a case if they can get a split decision in the Circuit Court. But the Lynn case is not just another lawsuit. It is full of political dynamite. It was not too surprising, therefore, when the Supreme Court on May 29 last announced it would not review the Lynn case. (This technique of evasion was also used in the Minneapolis Trotskyists' case. By simply refusing to review, the court is able to allow reactionary decisions to stand without compromising its reputation for liberalism.) What was surprising was the reason the court gave for refusing to hear the case: "The petition for writ of certiorari in this case is denied on the ground that the cause is moot, it appearing that petitioner no longer is in respondent's custody, U. S. ex rel. Innes v. Crystal, 319 U. S. 755, and cases cited."

A case becomes "moot" when it has changed in such a way that it can no longer be decided one way or the other. When Lynn originally brought his suit, he was in the "custody" of Colonel Downer, commandant at Camp Upton, New York. Hence Coloned Downer is named as the "respondent" who is asked to produce the "body" of Winfred Lynn. Since then, Lynn has completed his training and is now serving overseas in the Pacific area. Hence he is no longer in the custody of the "respondent" and the case is moot. Even had he remained at Upton, the case would still be moot, by this reasoning, for Colonel Downer himself has now been retired from the army because of age.

The court's line of reasoning is even more fantastic than it appears at first glance. To note a few salient points:

1. When Lynn originally brought his suit, the courts told him he must enter the army in order to get a hearing. He did so and as a result soon passed out of the custody of the original "respondent." Because he obeyed the orders of one branch of the government, he is now told by another branch that he has lost the right to have his case decided.

2. At the time Lynn was ordered overseas, Mr. Weatherly protested to the Adjutant General and received the following reply, dated February 9, 1944: "Should the unit to which he is assigned be ordered to proceed outside the continental United States and he is qualified for the duties to which assigned, he will not be removed from his unit. . . . (Signed) J. A. Ulio, Major General."

3. If the court had had any interest in seeing the case decided, it could have simply ordered Lynn's present commanding officer substituted for Colonel Downer as respondent. Rule 21 of the federal Rules of Procedure provides: "Parties may be dropped or added by order of the court on motion of any party or of its own initiative at any stage of the action. . . ." And Rule 81(a)(2) makes this specifically applicable to habeas corpus proceedings.

4. Habeas corpus is the only part of civil law that still applies to persons serving in the armed forces. If the military authorities can escape its control simply by passing the "body" from one colonel to another, it is in effect nullified in the military sphere.

5. Most of the cases cited by the court to justify its ruling are cases in which a civilian prisoner has been pardoned or freed on parole subsequent to his bringing the habeas corpus action. Such cases are obviously not comparable to the Lynn case. The only case cited which seems at all similar is Innes v. Crystal. Yet even here the soldier involved at least had passed from the custody of the army to that of the Leavenworth penitentiary. Lynn is today in the custody of the army, as he was originally.

6. That the Lynn case might be sidetracked as "moot" seems to have been a last-minute inspiration of Solicitor General Charles Fahy, who is famous among lawyers for such brilliant tours de force of legal technique. The government lawyers did not raise the issue of mootness in the lower courts, although by the time the case got to the Circuit Court of Appeals Lynn had been out of the custody of the original respondent for almost a year. The showdown will come this fall when Arthur Garfield Hays's appeal to the court to reconsider its refusal to review the case will be finally determined.

The Workers' Defense League, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and the March on Washington Movement plan to file supporting briefs amicus curiae, and the Lynn Committee to Abolish Segregation in the Armed Forces is planning a publicity campaign. Unless public opinion causes the court to reverse itself, the chances of getting a legal test—let along winning it—of the anti-discrimination section of the 1940 Draft Act will henceforth be slight, and jimcrow in uniform will be more strongly intrenched than ever.

In the Wind

WESTBROOK PEGLER, IN HIS COLUMN of June 20, revealed the long-distance telephone records of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, which have been subpoenaed by the Dies committee and which, Mr. Pegler implies, indicate the close relationship existing between the committee and the White House and various official agencies in Washington. What Mr. Pegler did not reveal is that the Dies committee secured the documents from American Tel. & Tel., unbeknownst to the Political Action Committee, that Mr. Dies has never introduced them into the public record, and that they are now in the hands of the World-Telegram's distinguished columnist. The subpoena power of the House of Representatives, it seems, has become the property of Westbrook Pegler.

IN WASHINGTON, THE NEGRO DIGEST reports, the white-looking official Latin American guests are quartered by the State Department's Division of Cultural Relations in Blair House, the official government guest house. The darker Latin gentlemen are referred to Howard University.

RUMOR FROM ACROSS THE OCEAN: Mr. Churchill has informed his intimates that the British Cabinet has finally taken a decision, to be announced after the war, with respect to the future of Palestine, and it will be favorable to Zionist hopes.

TEAMWORK: JUNE 18, EARL BROWDER, in the Daily Worker: ". . . our problem . . . is to develop peace-time markets, under our capitalist system, equal to the war market in volume and effectiveness. . . . If this foreign market is properly organized, the goods we sell to them will make them wealthy and prosperous, so that they will soon be able to pay, with handsome profits for American capitalists. JUNE 19, ERIC JOHNSTON, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, to a press conference in Moscow: The Soviet Union wants to buy "many billions of dollars' worth of American goods on purchase terms mutually advantageous to the two countries involved."

THE OFFICIAL ORGAN of the railroad brotherhoods, Labor, says that "Montgomery Ward's sales tobogganed $19,000,000 in the first months of 1944, while in the same period the business of Sears, Roebuck and Company, which has not fought labor, zoomed by $32,000,000.

FESTUNG EUROPA: According to information recently received in Washington, the Czechs in Prague are being punished by the Nazis for merely talking loudly on the streets "or smiling." . . . A Belgian resistance group has succeeded in hoodwinking the German censor by posting leaflets in envelopes filched from the German Labor Office.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The Maquis's Plan for France

BY MICHAEL CLARK

Algiers, June 3

I HAVE before me a batch of underground newspapers from France, the most recent being three issues of Le Franc-Tireur. This paper, 150,000 copies of which are printed monthly "in spite of the Gestapo and the Militia," is already quite candid about what it "expects from Algiers." "Too many of our companions have fallen," it says in one place. "We do not want medals for their widows but lead for their assassins.* ... Is it foreign pressure that has retarded and is still holding up the action of justice?"

The resistance movement evidently keeps a close watch on the political scene here, and it is quite frequently critical. Le Franc-Tireur, for instance, writes: "That is why, like the other twenty or so clandestine newspapers which are saving the honor of the French press, we are not too surprised at the timorous and kindly measures taken by the Commissariat à l'Information in Algiers against the North African papers, which continue to appear after having served the enemy. . . . No one would like to believe that our friends in Algiers are contemplating a procedure for France which only the confusion of the first few months could explain in North Africa." This criticism suggests a possible conflict in liberated France between the active leaders of the underground and those sincere liberals, like M. Henri Bonnet, Commissioner of Information, who have been spared the struggle against internal treason and Nazi occupation. The former will demand that L'Oeuvre, Le Matin, Le Petit Parisien, Le Nouvelliste, Le Petit Dauphinois, and all the other papers which have followed the orders of Berlin or Vichy be ruthlessly eliminated on the day of liberation. The liberals here, on the other hand, shrink from measures likely to menace in any way the fundamental freedom of the press.

The underground press makes it clear that the resistance movement is not too busy sabotaging communications and printing newspapers in cellars to think of larger matters. "The temporary government," says Le Franc-Tireur, "to fulfil the unanimous wish of the people, must take revolutionary measures as soon as the country is liberated. These measures will not frighten our real friends. Others had best remind themselves that the attempt to maintain a status quo profitable to any special interests would provoke reactions which we would support with all our strength." In its February issue La Revue Libre competently and dispassionately tackled the thorny problem of the nationalization of vital industries, drawing valuable conclusions from such past experiences as the nationalization of the French railways in 1938.

A PROGRAM OF ACTION

But the most interesting document of all, I think, is the "Program of Action" of the National Resistance Council in France, which is quoted at some length in the April issue of Le Franc-Tireur. Its purpose is summed up in a short preamble, which says: "This combat mission [that of the resistance movement] must not come to an end with the liberation. . . . Therefore the representatives of the resistance organizations, of the trade unions, and of the political parties, making up the National Resistance Council, deliberating in plenary session on March 15, 1944, have decided to unite on the following program. It includes a plan of immediate action against the oppressor and measures designed to establish, when the country is liberated, a more just social order." The "plan of immediate action" contains the following specific provisions:

> 1. In order to assure better coordination, particularly between the military effort and that of the nation at large, the National Resistance Council will undertake to organize local resistance committees in cities, towns, villages, and factories to supplement the already existing departmental committees.
>
> 2. Auxiliary militias led by engineers, teachers, civil servants, and reserve army officers will be created to protect the French people from terrorism and to assure good discipline.

But the bulk of the document is devoted to measures proposed to achieve "the greater task of reconstruction." Among these are the following:

> 1. General de Gaulle's Provisional Government is temporarily to assume the administration of territorial France in order to defend the nation's political and economic independence.
>
> 2. Traitors are to be punished, and the governmental machinery is to be purged; the property of traitors and black-market operators is to be confiscated.
>
> 3. A wider democracy, based on universal suffrage, will guarantee (a) freedom of thought, conscience, and expression; (b) the freedom of an honorable and independent press; (c) freedom of association, assembly, and demonstration; (d) the inviolability of the home and of correspondence; (e) the respect of the person; (f) the absolute equality of all citizens before the law.

---

*This refers, no doubt, to men like Peyrouton, Tixier-Vignancourt, Bergeret, and others now in North Africa.

4. Reforms are to be carried out along these lines:

(a) Economic: True economic and social democracy implies popular control of the national economy and the subordination of private to public interests. Therefore monopolies, the exploitation of natural resources, insurance companies, and large banks must be returned to the nation. Elsewhere worker participation in management will be assured.

(b) Social: Improved labor laws will guarantee the right to work and the right to rest. The workers' buying power will be protected by wage control and a stabilized currency. Unionization will be on a larger scale. The conditions of agricultural workers will be improved. Social security and educational opportunities will be expanded. Wider political, social, and economic rights will be extended to native populations.

This program is offered as a rallying-point for all Frenchmen who are behind General de Gaulle and the Committee of Liberation. At the same time the Committee is asked to take note of the program's aims, and it cannot be denied, I think, that it is doing so. Despite local obstructionists and the poorer elements in its own composition, the Committee, and of course the Consultative Assembly as well, is clearly taking its obligations toward France very seriously.

LIAISON BETWEEN ALGIERS AND FRANCE

Obviously, the Committee's most important task has been to maintain a close liaison with France in order to reflect as closely as possible the will of the people. This has not been easy. Communications with an occupied country are hazardous at best, but Algiers has encountered an additional difficulty. London is an essential link in the liaison between Algiers and metropolitan France, and the suspension of private diplomatic correspondence with London has virtually cut Algiers off from the underground. It is felt here that this drastic measure can only reduce France's effective participation in the war.

In addition to maintaining liaison, the Committee has tried to obtain material support for the underground. Although French troops have contributed notably to the victories of the Fifth Army in Italy, many people believe that the country's greatest contribution will still be made on what is known as the front de l'intérieur. They point with pride to the substantial accomplishments of the Forces Françaises de l'Intérieur (F. F. I.).

Many Frenchmen here insist that the damage which the underground is capable of doing is greater than that resulting from aerial bombardments and is infinitely less wasteful materially and in human life. They say that at Creusot, for example, more stoppage has been caused by sabotage than by bombing, although the bombings have cost several hundred lives. But if the operations of the underground are to be effective on a large scale, arms, explosives, and money must be got to the men of the maquis in still greater quantities. For this, France must rely on British and American assistance.

The government in Algiers, in response to the urgency of the problem, has created a Comité d'Action to supplement and coordinate the existing agencies dealing with the resistance movement. And on May 30 the Committee announced that it had fixed by law the status of the F. F. I. This law has not yet been made public, but if the combatant status of the men of the maquis is established, it will be a great asset to the resistance.

THE TRANSITION PERIOD

The Committee of Liberation, like the National Resistance Council, is concerned with the problems of reconstruction. Jules Moch has already analyzed the most important of these in the pages of The Nation. Although only a National Constituent Assembly, elected by universal suffrage (including women for the first time), will be competent to determine the future organization of France, the Committee of Liberation must undertake the immediate task of setting up a civil and military administration behind the Allied armies. Already the Committee, with the approval of the Consultative Assembly, has promulgated laws which provide the necessary administrative machinery. The law of April 21 will regulate the transfer of the Provisional Government and the Consultative Assembly to France, the convocation of temporary municipal and general councils purged of collaborationists, and the election of the Constituent Assembly. The role of the resistance movement during the transition period is defined by Article 19, which decrees that as each department is liberated, a departmental committee of liberation composed of representatives from each resistance organization, trade federation, and political party affiliated with the National Resistance Council will be formed to assist the prefect. In his address to the House of Commons on May 24 Mr. Churchill gave assurance that the administration of liberated France would be handled, under General Eisenhower's control, by the Committee of Liberation according to the terms of this decree.

GOEBBELS PLUS "READER'S DIGEST"

The failure of Britain and the United States to recognize the Committee of Liberation as the Provisional Government of the French Republic has caused great disappointment here. In France it has provided useful ammunition for German and Vichy propaganda. The men and women who are fighting the enemy both within France and outside are grimly determined not to admit any authority other than French authority. This spirit, which sometimes comes dangerously close to xenophobia, particularly when inflamed by unnecessarily wasteful bombing, can only harm Franco-American relations. And to make matters worse, our policy toward France, based on honorable, perhaps, though not very clairvoyant scruples, has used unworthy methods of justification.

No words are too strong to apply to the inspired campaign of defamation carried on against General de Gaulle in America. Our relations with France are poisoned—and to what end?—by articles like Kingsbury Smith's Spotlight on the State Department in the May issue of Reader's Digest, which charges De Gaulle with using "Gestapo" methods and with resorting to "suicides" and "brutal treatment" which "would shock the American people." The Reader's Digest is distributed to troops in this theater in the form of a free supplement to Stars and Stripes and other newspapers for the Allied forces. The impression created here by that sort of thing is painful in the extreme. Again, on May 3, 1944, the Algiers edition of Stars and Stripes reported that the State Department had refused to recognize the Committee of Liberation because of General de Gaulle's "dictatorial" tendencies. M. Hauriou, a delegate from the resistance movement in France, called the attention of the Consultative Assembly to this article, declaring: "We protest against this opinion. We wish to recall that the organizations of the resistance movement recognized General de Gaulle as leader only when he affirmed his determination to reestablish the Republic." As for the almost pathological pleasure which some American writers—Westbrook Pegler is one of them—seem to derive from burying France for good, nothing need be said, except, in the words of Talleyrand, "Tout ce qui est excessif ne compte pas."

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ON THE very eve of the invasion and even after it had started, the Nazi leaders were still keeping up their own and the people's spirits with their grandiose plans for the future. Each one of the gentlemen, it is well known, has his special hobby, and he has continued to ride it right through these critical days.

Herr Goebbels's love is the movies, and as head of the Reich Film Bureau he acts as their guardian. So in recent weeks he has been securing the future of the movies. Picture theaters are crowded today and box-office receipts incomparably higher than in peace time. In consequence the fees paid by the theaters to the producers on a percentage basis are running into enormous sums. Here, Herr Goebbels saw an opportunity to lay his hands on a few million marks. He issued a decree taking away this increased income from the producers. Hereafter they are to be paid only the amount they received in 1939. Everything above that is to go into a fund administered by the Reich Film Bureau. This fund will be used for great and far-reaching purposes—"to finance the reconstruction or restoration of theaters in Germany after the war, and particularly the erection of theaters in the newly acquired territories of the Reich."

Herr Himmler has a different hobby: instead of concerning himself with future theaters in the conquered provinces, he wishes to be sure that there will be future soldiers. Four weeks ago this column referred to the campaign for an increase in births suddenly launched by his organ, the Schwarze Korps, and quoted this arresting sentence: "Even if the present war is lost, tomorrow's war can be won by the children of today's soldiers." Since then the campaign has been pushed with vigor. In the issue of June 6—the day of the invasion—women were taken to task for considering themselves too old to have more children.

> No woman is too old to bear children. What a fundamental mistake! What a deviation from natural thinking! How could a woman ever be too old to be a mother as long as nature finds her young enough? Experience teaches us that older women who in their youth have given birth to one or more children find delivery very easy. It may happen occasionally, though certainly not as a rule, that older women have difficulty when giving birth for the first time; if so they are no different from younger women. But even this difficulty does not exist to the extent that widespread superstition would indicate. A woman who fails to fulfil her destiny will be treated far more harshly by nature than those who live in accordance with natural laws.

It is a merit of the "National Socialist reshaping of thinking," Himmler's paper declared, that these questions can now be discussed openly. Before Hitler they were taboo—but not in the usual sense. "What was taboo was their political implications. Today we can publicly discuss these questions as a political problem of the first magnitude, closely linked with the great problems of war and peace."

With Goebbels and Himmler making such farsighted plans for the post-war period, Hitler himself could not be found lacking. Knowing his passion for building, we are not surprised to learn from a story in the St. Gall Tagblatt of May 30 that a staff of 150 architects under his personal direction is occupied with plans for the "Berlin of the future."

> As might be expected, Berlin is to be built completely anew. It cannot be "mended." Patchwork would only make it grotesque and ugly; enough has been destroyed or damaged to justify the idea of creating something entirely new. . . . The problems involved are of course gigantic. How can the rubbish be removed, and where to? Where will the freight cars and the barges and the machines be found? Where will people live during the reconstruction of the city? Or will the new Berlin be erected on some other site? These questions cannot be answered for the moment. Only one thing is certain: the new Berlin will be a city of ten million people, the largest and most beautiful city of the Continent.

The Swiss reporter then added drily, "Of course these plans can be carried out only if the Germans win the war."

BOOKS and the ARTS

Nodier After a Century

BY PAUL ROSENFELD

LONDON newspapers sometime in 1819 reported that Napoleon at Longwood recently had spent a night reading and annotating a French novel. This was "Jean Sbogar," the depiction in a romantic plot of the character of a sublime Illyrian bandit. It had been issued at Paris the year before. An English version appeared the following year; and two years after, an American one—"improved" by the interpolation of original pieces by the translator, Peter Irving, Washington Irving's brother. The author was Charles Nodier, subsequently famous as the link between French classicism and romanticism, who in the present year, the centenary of his death, must be the subject of commemorations wherever literature remains in honor and the love of French literature persists.

The truthfulness of the report about Napoleon and the novel was afterward impugned. The story was called a clever inspiration of the publisher's. Yet if indeed it was a lie, it was an artistic one. "Jean Sbogar" introduced readers of fiction to a new cause of action which might readily have interested the imperial Realpolitiker, the former ally of Babœuf. This new cause of action naturally was not a sublime motive for banditry, a passion for justice, say, leading to banditry. Noble banditti long since had become familiar figures in novels, dramas, narrative verse. Their line led back to Lope de Vega: Schiller merely had sensationally continued it in "The Brigands," Byron more recently in "The Corsair," Scott very lately in "Rob Roy." All these figures rose from the timeless conflict between law and liberty; the more recent from the interior conflicts of individualism, from the division and resentments in middle-class youth in a feudal society, tragic in the sensitive individual requiring freedom for work toward his goals. The crimes of which Schiller's Karl Moor boasts are significantly the slaughter of an absolute Count, that of a minister who had wormed himself into favor and risen "through the ruin of his neighbor and the tears of orphans," and of a financial counselor who "sold honors and posts to the fortunate and turned sorrowing patriots from his door"; the firing of a Dominican church "in a city of bigots"; and the assassination of a priest "who from the chancel mourned the Inquisition's decay." A picture of banditry—what it comes to is revolt—inspired by individualism, even the noblest kind, could therefore doubtfully have been of interest to Napoleon; nor was the cause of action introduced into fiction by "Jean Sbogar" individualistic.

It was social. In Venetian society of the opening nineteenth century, the fiction begins, there figured a handsome man of mystery. Actually he was the Illyrian brigand, Jean Sbogar, but the fact was unsuspected, and a young patrician, Antonia, fell in love with him. One day he dropped his notebook, which, most prophetically, was "bound in Russian leather." Peering into it, Antonia read this aphorism among others similarly colored: "The robbery of the rich by the poor . . . in the last analysis is nothing save a reparation, a just and reciprocal displacement of a piece of bread or money, returning from the hand of a robber into that of the robbed." Was Nodier's outlaw echoing Babœuf? We do not know. This however is plain: under romantic decorations Nodier here introduced to readers of fiction the idea of the social revolutionary in the epoch propelled by Napoleon; the source of his passion. Since the novelist endowed his brigand with chivalry, magnanimity, a sharp ethical sense, the introduction was ceremonious and serious. "Jean Sbogar" thus was the first socialist novel, by which name we signify a fiction honoring the social motive of revolt. In its wake streamed all the novels expressing popular sympathy, making for social justice—from those of the 1840's by Sue, Sand, Gogol, Dickens, through those by Balzac, Zola, Tolstoi, to grandiose records of the social struggle like "Pellé the Conqueror."

A real outlaw, who had revolted against Napoleon, had been captured and brought to trial in Laybach in Illyria in 1813 while Nodier was serving there as imperial librarian, and Nodier visited the man in prison. From his impressions and other elements—among them certainly was a memory of "The Brigands," which Nodier had devoured with other romantic German literature during youth in Strasbourg—he had "formed a new individual and bidden him 'Be!'" The feat was characteristic of Nodier.

He was indeed a creator in the Greek sense; consistently the inventor of the new in point of material or method; continually "forming new individualities from out a mass of scattered elements." In 1803, almost at the beginning of his career, he had produced a new method of fiction, the journalary form of the novel. He used it to present the type of the psychological solitary: so also have Hugo, Turgenev, Chekhov, Rilke, Bernanos, and almost all of the novelists who have followed him in using it. After "Jean Sbogar," in 1839, he revealed yet another important new material for fiction in his exquisite "Novena of Candlemas." This is the stuff of the pastoral novel—which is not to be confused with idyls like "The Vicar of Wakefield" or naturalistic and objective studies of peasants and provincial people. The content of the pastoral novel is the lyrical expression of the very peasant or provincial spirit. The country fictions of George Sand probably constitute the classic French representatives of the type; the characteristic fictions of the Swiss C. F. Ramuz and Jean Giono, and stories of Sherwood Anderson's like "I'm a Fool," its chief contemporary ones. Yet another of Nodier's volumes, the humorous and fantastic "Castles of the King of Bohemia," anticipated a modern mold of poetry's. The book features expressive contrasts and dispositions of typography creating a sort of supplemental poetry; on one of its pages an arrangement of words in lines evoking an image identical with the one formed by the words' meanings. Rabelais and George Herbert had made experiments of the sort: Nodier's, however, far surpass theirs in wit. The anticipated modern poetic mold of course is the typographic poem of Mallarmé, Guillaume Apollinaire, and E. E. Cummings—that encroachment of poetry on the domain of the sensuous arts.

There are still other instances of his invention of means and materials. Innovation in art, indeed, appeared to Nodier "the seal of genius": in particular, those "irresistible innovations which obediently conform to the progress of social intelligence" and "proceed like naive emanations from the practical inventions of civilization." "Such is the genius of societies," argued he, "that no fundamental change can occur in their antique organizations unless an analogous movement operate in their means of speech." And it is precisely this brilliant inventiveness of his and his steady defense of innovation that are responsible for the elevation of the tone in which we commemorate the one-hundredth anniversary of his death over the one in which his contemporaries commemorated the actual event. Not that Nodier's personality and work were not much remarked on, much admired and praised, when he died. Long before, his apartment in the Arsenal in Paris had become "the little Tuileries," where not the fashionable but the literary world foregathered. There the young romantic school had grown conscious of itself under his paternal eye. But his innovations amused his contemporaries a little more than they impressed them. Sainte-Beuve, in the course of his famous, affectionate portrait of Nodier, a trifle patronizingly called him a littérateur. A littérateur of course is "an author without a specialty—whose talent, works, literary life resemble an army containing all banners, everything, indeed, save general headquarters."

Now, we do not deny that Nodier was a "polygrapher." Besides novels, he composed, in almost passionate excitement, poetry, criticism, and history; and was a philologist to boot, a bibliographer, and a student of botany and of butterflies, "whose brilliant hues he would seem to have transferred to his style." Neither do we in the least deny that Nodier excelled in nothing. His style, which was modest, sensitive, and charming, did want power.

It merely is that, looking back over the past century, we can perceive the startling results of the new methods and materials which amused his contemporaries; and moreover possess general reasons for seeing in all such inventions "the seal of genius"—reasons still other than those with which Nodier himself supplied us. One is the feeling that ultimately it is in forming new phenomena that art meets the many spiritual demands of society. For each vibration of the spirit has an appropriate form, and there always are new vibrations. Another is the feeling that we encounter the human spirit more purely, profoundly, thrillingly in what is fire-new and unprecedented than in what is influenced, imitative, and traditional. "Ontogeny recapitulates phylogeny!" We even suspect that without innovation there might not exist the possibility of tradition. To put ourselves in the way of understanding past men, it seems we must ourselves perform deeds in some way paralleling theirs: one can, it seems, understand only what in some fashion one is capable of accomplishing. And the past certainly generated the new. Hence, facing the fertile Nodier, we feel nothing save admiration, and revere his memory.

LEWIS MUMFORD

"For many years Lewis Mumford has been concerned with Man. His CULTURE OF CITIES and TECHNICS AND CIVILIZATION were fruits of this concern.... Now comes the book into which Mumford has put everything he has thought and learned about Man yesterday, today and—because there is a good deal of the prophet in Mumford—tomorrow.... If there has been written for the comprehension of the general reader a more significant statement of our condition—what it has been, what it is and what it may be—I don't know where you'll find it." —Joseph Henry Jackson, San Francisco Chronicle

"THE CONDITION OF MAN is big but not ponderous, informed and documented but not pedantic, scholarly but written in such simple and lucid style that any reader will follow it with a continued absorption of interest."

—Cleveland Plain Dealer

"No review can pass over to the reader a just idea of the breadth and depth of THE CONDITION OF MAN. Ranging confidently through history, from St. Augustine, Loyola, Voltaire, and Rousseau, on to Karl Marx, Nietzsche and Freud, Mumford assesses the thinking of the successive generations of modern men. He continues to prove himself a thinker unafraid of serious affirmations and bold syntheses in a day when specialists are content to dissect their fragmentations of knowledge and experience."

—Dallas News

16 pages of illustrations, $5.00

THE CONDITION OF MAN

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York 17, N.Y.

Dr. Franklin

MEET DR. FRANKLIN. By Carl Van Doren and Eleven Others. The Franklin Institute, Philadelphia.

"MEET DR. FRANKLIN" is not an introduction: the authors take it wisely for granted that we have met him before. "How are you today, Dr. Franklin?" would have been a more accurate title, for this is a series of reports on the present state of Franklin scholarship. The tone is informal: lectures before an intelligent general public. The substance is learned. Dr. Carl R. Woodward, for instance, establishes very conclusively that Franklin's famous experimental farm never existed; the letter describing it, and printed in Franklin's works, was written by somebody else. The no less famous experiment with plaster-of-Paris may be a legend diffused by the great French chemist Chaptal. Franklin would have been an epoch-making printer, says Lawrence C. Wroth, if he had come round to it, but he retired from the business before reaching that stage. He would have been a great friend of the Indians if he had had a chance. At any rate, he proposed hunting them with dogs, and was a colonel in command of an expedition against them. He may have got his idea of federation, the seed of our mighty republic, from the Iroquois (Julian P. Boyd). But, says Dr. Robert A. Millikan, he did fly the immortal kite, and thus "wrested from the heavens their thunder and their scepter from the tyrants." I am glad scholarship spared that kite: I am getting too old to unlearn.

Because the book presupposes that we know Dr. Franklin, it does not suffer from the usual curse of collective works—fragmentariness. The pieces are disjointed; but they all fit into the picture which we all have in our minds. Some of the essays raise very general and very interesting questions. Carl Van Doren, the foremost authority on Franklin lore—Bernard Fay is morally dead—insists on the fundamental Americanism of Franklin: a truism so true that it can never become trite, in the way of old paradoxes and half-truths. But Conyers Read shows that Franklin was perfectly happy and thoroughly at home in England. Unfortunately, no essay is devoted to his sojourn in Paris, which Gilbert Chinard could have done so well: there again Franklin was a universal favorite and enjoyed life immensely. The meeting between Franklin and Voltaire is one of the richest scenes in cultural history: so full of grandeur and pathos, fraught with the destinies of our world, yet with delightful depths of irony. Conclusion, dedicated to Representative Martin Dies: the most American of us all is the most cosmopolitan.

Bernard Knollenberg establishes that Franklin was a "philosophical revolutionist"—cautious, shrewd, temperate, but not a conservative. He constantly challenged the status quo: "Is this logical? Does it hold water?" In other words, Daughters of the Revolution, there was such a thing as the American Revolution, and it was a radical one. We, and the European revolutionists, are the heirs to its spirit; even to the point of repeating after Franklin: "Private property, therefore, is a creature of society, and is subject to the call of that society whenever its necessities shall require, even to its last farthing."

The key to the paradox that Franklin was at the same time Americanism incarnate and also an excellent Englishman, and most of all a perfect Parisian, is that he was "first of all a typical eighteenth-century figure, and moved easily and naturally in an eighteenth-century world." There was an eighteenth-century world; the period is far more real than the country. In those days there was a great republic of free souls; its name was the Enlightenment; England, America, and France were among its chief provinces. That is why Crèvecœur, Lafayette, and Du Pont de Nemours were so much at ease with us, while Jefferson and Franklin throve in France as if it had been their native soil. We have sadly declined from "the eighteenth, greatest of centuries"; but there have been renaissances in the past, after long ages of bewilderment. Benjamin Franklin, as mirrored in this pleasant and useful little book, beckons us back to a more humane civilization.

ALBERT GUERARD

Just Published —

LIFE BEGINS WITH MARRIAGE

By Theodore G. Mitchell

Author of "Formula for 100 Years' Peace"

The Supreme goal of every person is marriage. The SUPREME goal of every marriage is HAPPINESS. But happiness is the ART of making the SUPREME feelings of one another the commonwealth of the Family. You will discover this ART in this book.

At your bookseller or direct, $2.75

DEARBORN PUBLISHING COMPANY
711 South Dearborn Street Chicago 5, Illinois

The Dominions and the Empire

THE BRITISH COMMONWEALTH: ITS PLACE IN THE SERVICE OF THE WORLD. By Sir Edward Grigg. Introduction by Lord Halifax. Liveright Publishing Corporation. $2.75.

THIS is one of those books which discuss matters of the first importance but nevertheless can hardly be taken as more than the expression of a minority point of view little likely ever to be more than that. Any other appraisal of it would unduly exaggerate its importance, for far from being a scholarly treatise it is rather a political argument on a high plane, though it may occasionally be represented otherwise for political reasons, or because of ignorance of the trends of opinion in British circles. Sir Edward Grigg, by his own statement, speaks for a section of the Conservative Party of the United Kingdom which is today tremendously concerned that the Commonwealth and Empire shall be much more tightly organized and integrated than has ever been the case in our time. Yet he is up against the indisputable fact that dominion nationalism is very strong and has been considerably intensified by the events of the present war. He is therefore at pains to protest that his schemes for imperial integration are in no particular intended to subvert the independence of the dominions. Nevertheless, it is plain as a pikestaff that Sir Edward's schemes, if accepted, would severely limit the power of the dominions over their economic and trade policies and, by organizing the Empire-Commonwealth regionally, implicate them deeply in colonial affairs hitherto solely the concern of the United Kingdom, with the immediate effect of making them responsible before the world for policies which, under present conditions, they would indorse—after their formulation in London—rather than initiate or administer.

Consciously or unconsciously Sir Edward and his like-minded associates are seeking a way of bolstering up the power of the United Kingdom vis-à-vis the world by bringing the power of the dominions more directly to the service of the United Kingdom than hitherto.

Though a careless reader might never perceive it in Sir Edward's book, so parenthetically does he introduce the matter, the real reason for making this effort is the deep conviction, supported by much concrete evidence, that this war has drastically weakened the power of the United Kingdom and that new sources of power must therefore be directly tapped if it is to maintain its world position. Sir Edward obscures the point with much political fustian and irritating moralizing about British virtues, but others as different as Lord Halifax and Professor E. H. Carr have stated it directly. Lord Halifax said his piece at Toronto last January. Professor Carr, in his "Conditions of Peace," declared: "At the close of the war, however favorable the issue, Great Britain will have little temptation to repeat the error of supposing that victory has enhanced her military or economic power. Behind the short-lived exultation of victory her self-confidence will have received a salutary shock."

The need for dealing with the difficulties thus posed is, from the British point of view, both immensely real and immensely important, and some solution is sure eventually to be worked out. The British community has lost neither its grip on political and economic realities nor its capacity to deal with them. But that is very different from saying that Sir Edward's solutions are apt to win general acceptance. In due course we shall know the answers. The whole question was just recently debated in London by the British Prime Ministers. It is significant of the drift of opinion that whereas at Toronto Lord Halifax definitely declared himself in favor of Sir Edward's general outlook, in the Introduction to Sir Edward's own book he backtracks a bit and somewhat wistfully remarks, "It may be that the basis of our relationship with each other calls for no more than the machinery of consultation." I think that is very near the mark and that Sir Edward's attempt to raise an elaborate structure on the foundation of this perception takes him farther and farther away from reality.

The temptation to debate many of the particular statements in Sir Edward's book is extremely strong, especially his implied views of American affairs, in particular his notion, shared with Professor Carr, that we Americans, like dutiful colonials, still await a British lead in world affairs. But a final observation: books like this one, founded on a point of view definitely oriented around the needs of the United Kingdom, should be balanced by constant reference to views originating in and founded on the needs of the overseas dominions. Only thus can the Commonwealth be seen whole.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

Support the Lynn Case! Fight Jim Crow in Uniform!

The Lynn Committee to Abolish Segregation in the Armed Forces

Needs Your Help Today to:—

—make a national issue of the Supreme Court's attempt to dodge the Lynn case by a legalistic trick. The Lynn case is the only court test yet made of the anti-discrimination clause in the 1940 Draft Act. It is a concrete first step toward democratizing the Army's racial policies. The Supreme Court will rule on it finally next fall. We need funds for a nation-wide educational campaign this summer.

—get tens of thousands of signatures to a statement opposing racial segregation in the armed forces. This is in the form of "4 Questions to Candidates" asking them to take a clear and specific stand on the issue. It will be presented in August to all presidential and Congressional candidates, and their answers will be publicized. We need funds to give these "4 Questions" wide circulation.

—publish a mimeographed news-letter presenting in digest form the facts about race relations in the armed forces from week to week. This will be circulated among editors, radio commentators, columnists, educators, journalists and other key persons. The job is not being done now. We need funds to collect and issue this material.

—fight such cases of individual injustice as that of the 19 colored Seabees who were discharged last fall without a hearing after they had complained to their commanding officer about intolerable jimcrow treatment. These men, many of them volunteers, were discharged as "unfit" and "undesirable." We need funds to make their story known, to explore possible legal angles.

- The Lynn Committee is the only organization set up specifically to fight for racial democracy in our armed forces.
- Among the sponsors of the Lynn Committee are Luigi Antonini, Roger Baldwin, Algernon Black, George S. Counts, John F. Finerty, Alain Locke, Carey McWilliams, A. Philip Randolph, Willard S. Townsend, and Oswald Garrison Villard.

The Lynn Committee to Abolish Segregation in the Armed Forces,
360 West 125th St., New York 27, N. Y.

I WANT TO HELP. ENCLOSED IS $.............. FOR THE FIGHT AGAINST JIM CROW IN UNIFORM. (Make checks payable to Nancy G. Macdonald, Treasurer)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

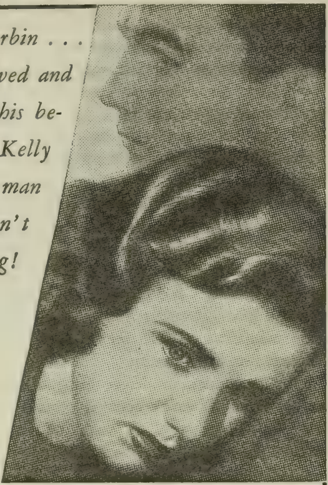
CITY.................................... UNIT........... STATE.....................

MOTION PICTURES

Deanna Durbin . . . she never lived and loved like this before! Gene Kelly . . . as the man she couldn't stop loving!

●

in W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM'S



Christmas Holiday

with RICHARD WHORF ▪ DEAN HARENS ● GLADYS GEORGE ● GALE SONDERGAARD ▪ DAVID BRUCE

Produced by FELIX JACKSON

Directed by ROBERT SIODMAK. Associate Producer, Frank Shaw. As written for the [illegible] by HERMAN J. MANKIEWICZ. A UNIVERSAL PICTURE.

Back the Invasion! BUY WAR BONDS!

LOEW'S COOL CRITERION

BROADWAY & 45th STREET.

MANHATTAN
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST. — 86th ST.
58th ST. — 125th ST.
HAMILTON
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd STREET
BRONX
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCHELLE
WHITE PLAINS
YONKERS
BROOKLYN
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON PROSPECT REPUBLIC
TILYOU
QUEENS
KEITH FLUSHING
MIDWAY
KEITH RICH. HILL
STRAND

RKO

MON., TUES., WED.
JULY 3, 4, 5,
LIMITED ENGAGEMENT
3 DAYS ONLY!

Exactly as presented on Broadway for 19 weeks!

Winner of 5 Academy Awards

FRANZ WERFEL'S
"THE SONG OF BERNADETTE"

A 20th Century Fox Triumph

Will Not Be Shown Elsewhere at Lower Prices
AFTERNOONS, ADULTS, 76c.—CHILDREN 40c., Incl. tax
EVENINGS, ADULTS, $1.10—CHILDREN 55c., Incl. tax

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

The Other Germany

GERMANY: A SELF-PORTRAIT. A COLLECTION OF GERMAN WRITINGS FROM 1914 TO 1943. Edited, with an Introduction and Chronicle, by Harlan R. Crippen. Oxford University Press. $3.75.

THIS anthology consists of more than 450 pages of reading, chiefly literary, in the history of Germany since 1871. It includes in this field several documents which it is good to have reprinted—letters of Rosa Luxemburg, the Spartacus Manifesto, Thomas Mann's letter to the Dean of Bonn. Nor does the book, like Klaus Mann's "Heart of Europe," lack theme. The selected pieces are connected by editorial narrative and arranged as a continuous chronicle. The theme is that of the Other Germany which has fought against every reactionary tendency and regime from Bismarck to Hitler. At a time when not only old buffers like Vansittart but men like Stout and Clifton Fadiman are declaiming both against the Nazi regime and the German people, a book like this is a contribution to enlightenment. All who read such books as "Germany, the Aggressor Through the Ages,"

STAGE PLAYS

"HIT MUSICAL" Walter Winchell

"Follow the Girls"

Production Staged by HARRY DELMAR

44th St. THEA.
West of Broadway
AIR COND.
Evs. 8:30. Mats. Wed. & Sat. 2:30
Presented by
DAVE WOLPER
(In association with AL BORDE)

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (in association with Jack H. Skirball)

JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL

The FRANZ WERFEL–S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN

LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS

J. EDWARD BROMBERG

MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED
Evgs. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs., Sat. & JULY 4th

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS ▪ Staged by HASSARD SHORT

SONGS BY COLE PORTER

WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.
AIR CONDITIONED

"A definite hit . . . gay, glib, daffy — enormously funny."
—Morehouse, Sun.

RUTH GORDON
IN THE NEW COMEDY HIT
OVER TWENTY-ONE

MUSIC BOX, 45th St. W. of B'way. CI 6-4636—Evs. 8:40. Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:40
SCIENTIFICALLY AIR-CONDITONED

✚ RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

"Germany: the Black Record," and "Germany Will Try It Again" should also read Mr. Crippen's anthology, for it portrays Dr. Jekyll just as convincingly as they portray Mr. Hyde.

But it is not a very good book. Like many recent anthologists in this and kindred fields, Mr. Crippen has given us neither one thing nor the other. His book is not a collection of the best German writing, or even the best political writing, of the period; his choice of material would often be hard to defend on either historical or literary grounds; he omits many important authors, an omission which is not atoned for by editorial apology. He includes pieces—by Brecht and Becher, for example—which are far from being their author's best or most symptomatic work. The book consists chiefly of anti-Nazi writing; yet for some reason the program of the Nazi Party suddenly confronts us. The book consists chiefly of creative writing; yet suddenly we stumble upon the Weimar constitution. Above all, the book claims to be a self-portrait of Germany; but the only representative of Mr. Hyde is the prosaic Fritz Thyssen, whose "I Paid Hitler" may not be as authentic as Mr. Crippen assumes. Anyway, it is preposterous to quote such a work at length and not to quote at all the works of Hitler, Rosenberg, or H. S. Chamberlain.

Mr. Crippen assumes that Germany is Jekyll and Hyde, but does not find it necessary to strike up more than a nodding acquaintance with the latter. That is a mistake. But a deeper mistake is to accept the Jekyll and Hyde idea as more than a dramatic oversimplification. Like his antagonists, the Germanophobes, Mr. Crippen is utterly committed to this error. Are Jekyll and Hyde two sections of the German people? Are they two sections of each German? Some critics have followed one line, some the other; many have jumbled the two together. Would it not be wiser to abandon the somewhat boyish partisanship of such categories and consider Germany as a many-sided political and social problem which we must try to solve not because we are immune from hypothetically German traits but because we are citizens of the world? Of course every problem is to some extent a peculiar problem, but if we wish to find the peculiarity of German psychology through German literature, would it not be better to examine a really tough case of mixed mentality such as Oswald Spengler, Stefan George, or Thomas Mann?

The Germans are not a pack of blond beasts. Nor are they a band of victimized democrats. Nor are they divided into compact groups of each. Such neat categories can only lead to unrealistic policies. It is unrealistic to think that we might exterminate or sterilize the Germans. It wouldn't happen. It is unrealistic to think that we could reeducate the Germans, since imposed democracy is not democracy. On the other hand, it is equally unrealistic to hope that the Other Germany will snap into place, like a Reinhardt stage setting, once the present stage is cleared. A realistic policy will not be Germanophobe, nor will it be Germanophile except in so far as it is humane. And if we need a special understanding of German psychology we might read Franz Neumann on the structure of National Socialism or Konrad Heiden on Hitler. But we shall not need "Germany: a Self-Portrait."

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY

How German democracy lost its battle for survival

Prelude to Silence

by Arnold Brecht

A brilliant analysis of the bitter political fight against rising totalitarianism which marked the ill-starred Weimar Republic under which Germany, step by step, lost her personal freedom. The author, an important official of the Republic throughout its history, shows how Hitler, gradually usurping the power which led to ultimate dictatorship, managed with two notorious exceptions to stay within the bounds of constitutional authority. $2.00

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. 11

"The most illuminating document on the Soviet Union I have read since Alexander Barmin's autobiography."—Edmund Wilson, New Yorker.

My Lives in Russia

MARKOOSHA FISCHER

"A book written by an honest person, one who neither fears telling the truth nor who has any political or other aim for concealing that truth . . . all should read this book. It is convincing in its sincerity and warmth and simplicity."—PEARL BUCK, Asia Magazine.

"A simple, straightforward story of how Russians live and raise families; how they are housed; what they eat and wear; how they think and feel and amuse themselves; how their children are educated."—WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN, N. Y. Times Book Review.

3rd Printing $2.75

HARPER & BROTHERS

FILMS

ONLY one of the following movies seems to me worth more than a note, though three or four of them can be seen without more than a pint or so of anaesthetic.

The only one I really enjoyed was "They Met in Moscow," which, without seeming to take any trouble to do so, makes monkeys out of us in the field of musical comedy. It tells of the meeting, separation, longing, and reunion of a southern shepherd and a northern girl who herds swine. The songs they sing are excessive, vivid, pretty, uncommercial, and solidly rooted in alphabetic emotions. They are handled and photographed as if real faces and real fresh-air landscapes could not but be more pleasing than death masks peopling a vacuum-sealed magniloquence of scarlet linoleum and dry-ice mist. I wish I thought such a film could be made in this country; but our idea of "freshness" is pretty aptly embalmed, I'm afraid, in an inadvertent horror show about youth hostels called "Song of the Open Road," which made something so loathsome of youth that even "Home in Indiana" seemed comparatively harmless.

"Home in Indiana" is about adolescent love and harness racing. There are some half-appreciative Technicolor landscapes; there is about as little pleasure in horses as I have ever seen achieved in a horse movie. One of the female adolescents looks attractive in dungarees; another wears a couple of rather extreme bathing suits. None of them act their age or any other.

"Bathing Beauty" swarms with bathing suits and their contents; most often and most carnally in focus is Esther Williams, lolloping in a friendly way before under-water cameras. Above water level Harry James and Xavier Cugat play, and Red Skelton, for my leathery taste, is occasionally rather funny. I could not resist the wish that Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer had topped its aquatic climax—a huge pool full of girls, fountains, and spouts of flame—by suddenly draining the tank and ending the show with the entire company writhing like goldfish on a rug. But M.-G.-M. resisted it.

Why "Two Girls and a Sailor" is the hit it seems to be must be explained by those who mistake the all-American bitchiness of the heroines for all-American cuteness, Van Johnson for homely charm, and what seemed hours of suffocating boredom for air-conditioned summer entertainment. But Gracie Allen does a funny number in it, and I would recommend it to anyone who cares remotely as much for Jimmy Durante as I do. He ought to have a great deal more to do. But even as a stage corpse he would make me grateful.

"Christmas Holiday" is fair enough while Deanna Durbin sings a quiet arrangement of "Always"; aside from that it is pseudo-tragic mush, about a New Orleans cabaret singer, her weak husband (Gene Kelly, wasting his time), and an insipid officer on furlough.

In "They Met in Moscow" the Russians show us how to make a musical comedy; in "Days of Glory"—the Russian "White Cliffs of Dover"—we show them how not to make a Russian war movie. I have an unhappy feeling that Casey Robinson, who wrote and produced it, wanted to do something artistically first-rate about the guerrillas; but the film interests only as a possibly accurate image of the Russia which may exist in the minds of the more fatuous contributors to Russian War Relief. Aside from Robinson's sincere intentions, I can speak courteously only of Tamara Toumanova's anachronistic beauty, which, I imagine, might have wrung dithyrambs out of Lord Byron.

JAMES AGEE

ART

NATURALISM does not altogether explain the art of Thomas Eakins. The hard-headed, mathematically founded account he gave of what met his eyes when he looked at the model or scene was the framework on which he projected an ideal chiaroscuro, unobtrusive only because worked out according to nature but not found there entirely. Eakins's imagination realized itself in the disposition of values—darks and lights—which transfigured the literal facts without violating them. Often he insisted on contrasts not too far from the poetic effects of such of his American contemporaries as Ryder, Newman, and Fuller. Chiaroscuro was a characteristic expression of the American sense of the poetical in the nineteenth century. It appears in literature in Hawthorne, Poe, and Melville, even in James. (As instance: blackness and night are the dominants of the first few chapters of "Moby Dick": the hero, stumbling through pitch darkness, finds a Negro prayer-meeting going on behind the first door from which he sees a ray of light. All of which is to prepare us at long remove for the violent contrast of the whiteness of the whale.) This American version of chiaroscuro opposes the unexplored to the explored, the mysterious to the known; man is isolated in a universe he can only make meaningful through symbolic or esoteric experience.

A good deal in Eakins argued against such a romanticism. Particularities, observed facts of light and texture, elicited some of his strongest painting. He had to acknowledge and state the given material before he could project his imagination. And not only did he show a new sensitivity to local color; he even intensified the literalness of his art—in an actual if not, fortunately, in a painterly sense—by beginning to model volumes in degrees of tone and color rather than in greater or lesser saturations of black or brown shading. Yet his impressionistic tendencies were usually overtaken by a sentiment of the dramatic and the psychological which always involved chiaroscuro—even when, toward the end, he began to see colors in the background shadows and their opacities began to dissolve and gleam.

Eakins had almost no manner, which explains why his paintings so often lack immediate presence and require a longer gaze to make themselves felt. But he did have a style, and that style evolved. His earliest work is the product of French influence in the sixties. Curiously enough, he reacted to Courbet and Delacroix in somewhat the same way Cézanne did: by simplifying and summarizing forms, caking his paint, and opposing his values sharply. This freedom seems to have been soon abandoned for another. There come pictures in which local colors are permitted to assert themselves with an intensity new for that period—here Eakins and Homer approach closest to each other. The effect of the large uniform areas of high color in a painting of the artist and his father hunting reed-birds (1874) is modern; the "Biglen Brothers Turning the Stake" (1873), a rowing scene, is almost revolutionary in its vivid spots of blue and the throbbing, suppressed luminosity of its sunlight. But Eakins appears then and there to have lost the gift for the transparent shadow and the broken, traveling high light that made his interior pieces and female portraits of the early seventies so powerful. He showed other sides of his talent, a greater enterprise in the investigation of appearances, and he was always able to make a successful picture out of any subject that showed light falling on or through soft fabric, but nothing he gained quite redeemed this loss. No longer under the inspiration of the French, his development became one of private involution rather than of public expansion; he reentered academic painting, to destroy it by its own logic but not to add a new impulse to painting in general.

The ridges of paint which duplicate the flesh tones and follow the contours of a female nude done as a study in the early eighties are from the brush of a master. But many of the portraits of that time, especially those of men, show a mere pedestrian honesty, succumbing too frequently to the social or professional types of the sitters. Nevertheless, it can be held fortunate, I think, that the failure of Eakins's genre painting to win acceptance—or perhaps his own self-recognition—made him limit himself more and more to the portrait. For his later genre pictures, including those really original examinations of subject and atmosphere which are his prize-fight scenes, lack a final emphasis, some called-for tension between dark and light; while he continued in spite of everything to produce fine portraits to the end of his career, arriving at a way of defining variously lit planes in flat high tones with sharper divisions—as in the portraits of Mrs. Kershaw, Mrs. Eakins, and Ruth Harding. Here lighted surfaces displace rather than emerge from surrounding shadows. A synthesis of Manet's impressionism with Rembrandtian psychologism was pointed to, which no one after Eakins could sustain under the conditions of the twentieth century. Eakins's art, as Lloyd Goodrich says, founded no school. His realism caught up with that of the French and produced some discoveries tending beyond realism itself, but he did not change the basis of his painting on their account or incorporate them in a new style. He remained a realist, a profound one, and he also remained of the nineteenth century.

The present loan exhibition of his paintings and sculpture (at Knoedler's through July 31) is in celebration of the hundredth anniversary of Eakins's birth, and was preceded by a large centennial show during April and May in Philadelphia, the birthplace and home of the painter. Both exhibitions are on the way to establishing a canon of his masterpieces; but some of the best examples of his art are not included—the portrait in the present Museum of Modern Art show, and one of a woman in a blue dress which was displayed two years ago in the show of modern portraits at the same place—while four or five of the pictures now on view ought not to be put in any exhibition that intends to present Eakins at his strongest. CLEMENT GREENBERG

MUSIC

SOME time ago I discussed the changes which the late Frederick Stock felt free to make in the music he transcribed or merely performed with the Chicago Symphony. I spoke of the published edition of Griffes's "Kubla Khan," and of the transcription of Schubert's C major String Quintet that a Chicago reader had described to me, as well as of what I had heard myself—the performance of Schumann's Third Symphony, and the newly issued recorded performance of the transcription of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E flat. Later I received from William R. Wambaugh, music editor of the University of Chicago's student newspaper the Chicago Maroon, a clipping of his review of the recorded performance of Chausson's Symphony, in which he pointed out a change in the last movement that I had not noticed because I did not have the score of the work: "In the twenty-two bars commencing at the grave at '0' our Symphony's organist has a lovely solo passage which the composer had scored for 4 horns, 4 trumpets, 3 trombones, tuba, and kettledrums. No doubt Stock knew better." And in his letter he added: "Unfortunately, in Chicago, we have long been exposed to such assaults on our intelligence."

As a matter of fact the Chicago musical public was exposed to Stock's mediocre and tasteless musicianship for thirty-seven years. And the reader who wrote me about the transcription of Schubert's Quintet gave me an account of what has happened since Stock's death. For a year his associate, Hans Lange, carried on while the Orchestra Association had a number of conductors come for visits and consideration as Stock's successor. "This Orchestra Association, like similar bodies elsewhere, is made up of the usual 'civic leaders'—business and society men without musical and aesthetic knowledge, interested chiefly in a smooth-working organization that will provide a season less notable for musical distinction than for social and chamber-of-commerce uses. There is no evidence that any musical or critical authorities were consulted. We had no visits from Toscanini, Walter, Beecham, or Koussevitzky; it was said that they were all 'too old' for the post—though, since it is likely that they will still be conducting for another five or ten years, it seems strange that a town and orchestra of this rank would not choose one of the undisputed leaders of the profession. Rodzinski and Stokowski were neither invited nor mentioned; it was rumored that these men, like Toscanini and Beecham, were 'too temperamental' for the trustees and musicians. As a consequence the candidates were a line of second-string conductors—Steinberg, Barlow, Defauw, Barbirolli, and Kurtz; and Defauw was elected almost immediately after leading a couple of concerts in which he offered a mussily sparkless version of Debussy's Nocturnes, a feverish account of Franck's 'Éloides,' and one of the bumpiest performances of Beethoven's Seventh on record—and even before four of the remaining candidates were given a hearing."

In estimating Defauw's work this first season my correspondent wrote that one had to make allowance for the unusual difficulties which he faced—"the local Stock hero-worship, the war conditions that are depleting the ranks of the players"—in addition to the "inevitable problems of mastering a complex instrument." But what also had to be recognized was "the superficiality of his discipline and the erratic individualism of his musicianship." In his performances "there seems to be no given standard of timing, tone, feeling, or interpretation. Most conductors, even minor ones, have recognizable principles that account for both their failings and their successes. But here we get eloquence and feebleness, hectic stridency

"HEAVEN AND HELL"
The most definite teaching on the certainty of immortality and on the life hereafter is to be found in the Writings of famed scientist, philosopher, theologian and statesman. His book on HEAVEN AND HELL, FROM THINGS SEEN AND HEARD, may be obtained by new readers at the introductory price of five cents.
EMANUEL SWEDENBORG
SWEDENBORG FOUNDATION, INC.
Room 1636, 51 East 42nd St., New York 17

Rec. by Prof. [illegible] of Cornell, [illegible] in U.S. Army, Amer.-Russ. Inst., [illegible] "best at any price for students, invaluable grammatical aid."
NEW RUSSIAN-ENGLISH & [illegible]
DICTIONARY ed. by M. A. O'Brien, Ph.D.
NEW ORTHOGRAPHY. 70,000 terms. $1.98
720 p. Accentuation. Colloquialisms.
DOVER PUB. 31 E. 27 St., N.Y. 16, N.Y. DEPT n

BURLINGAME

and pallid languor, declamatory passion and mincing French delicacy in no discernible relation to the piece being performed. Sometimes we get them all huddled together by fits and starts. What happens to music and playing of that kind is soon evident: it lapses into muddle and inconsequence."

Discussing the effect of the war on the orchestra's personnel my correspondent wrote that in addition to the large number of players who had been drafted another large group had been told they would be inducted unless they took war jobs in factories in addition to their work in the orchestra. "I have been told on sound authority that in one gun-making plant as many as fifteen or eighteen orchestra players are on duty from midnight to eight in the morning, after which they must attend rehearsals, practice, get what sleep they can, attend to their practical affairs, play at concerts, and get back to the factory by midnight. . . . I wonder if the situation I have described here prevails generally in America—if trained musicians whose service to public morale no one would care to deny are being forced to work days and nights to justify their continuance in civilian life." Recognizing that under a system of compulsory war-service "discrimination among publicly necessary trades, crafts, and services is an almost baffling problem in values and claims," my correspondent asked: "But is any serious selection and discrimination being practised at all? Are competent boards, composed of other than military or political officials, in operation to exercise such judgment?"

Evidently not; since the most brilliant male dancer of today, Igor Youskevitch, is being trained for active service in the Navy. B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

JOHN W. WHITE has represented American newspapers in Santiago, Chile, for many years.

BRIAN PENTON is the editor of the Sydney, Australia, Daily Telegraph and author of the novels "Landtakers" and "Inheritors."

DWIGHT MACDONALD is editor of Politics, a weekly journal.

MICHAEL CLARK is the accredited correspondent of The Nation in North Africa and the Middle East.

PAUL ROSENFELD is the author of "By Way of Art."

Letters to the Editors

Inexpedient Expedient

[We print below a comment on Alvarez del Vayo's article, No Unity with Fascists, which appeared in The Nation of June 3. Comments by other political observers appeared last week.]

Dear Sirs: In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred a policy of expediency turns out not to be expedient. If there can be an argument in the present period for exploiting conflicts within the fascist camp, there can be none for unity with fascists in any section of the anti-Nazi front. Mr. del Vayo has stated that convincingly for the Nazi vassal countries. What about the center of Nazism? What about Germany itself?

Oddly enough, for some people there seems to be a problem. Among certain circles in the United Nations preparations are being made for a policy of expediency toward Germany. Reliable sources report that plans for the administration of occupied Germany envisage extensive reliance on civil servants who have served faithfully under the Nazis. Moreover, speculation about the best candidate for a German Badoglio has led one crowd to favor Rundstedt, or even Rommel, another to choose the Junker general, von Seydlitz. To be quite fair to the officers around Seydlitz in the Moscow "Association of German Commissioned Officers," they have made statements showing a certain recognition of the destructive role of fascism. On the other hand, however, they have repeatedly stated that they hope to see the German army so used as to be an instrument for peace. This is certainly the one function the German army cannot be trusted with.

There are two explanations for such speculations. One is a deep suspicion that there are no genuine democratic forces in Germany. This results partly from insufficient knowledge of modern German history—which is not only the history of aggressive imperialism but also of the continual struggle waged against it by democratic forces—and partly from insufficient understanding of modern fascism's capacity to drive democratic opposition temporarily underground. The other is fear of exactly those elements whose existence the defenders of expediency deny—the potential revolutionary forces in the fascist countries. It is difficult for people in the Western democracies, with their relatively stable societies, to understand the urgent need for revolutionary social change in the countries where democratic development has been retarded. Until these fundamental social changes take place, the fascist countries cannot become partners in a democratic world and a lasting peace. To countenance any kind of German Badoglioism after Hitler will simply contribute to the reproduction of the evil which, more than anything else, has been the motive force behind aggressions in our time. Therefore the only expediency for progressive forces lies in fostering the completion of the democratic revolution after the defeat of Hitler. PAUL HAGEN

New York, June 7

Unheroic Hero

Dear Sirs: Diana Trilling, in her review of Anna Seghers's latest novel "Transit" in your issue of May 20, stated that the author dealt unsympathetically with refugees. I found no trace of such an attitude in the novel. Quite the contrary. In this book as in all her writing Seghers's creative urge springs from her deep solidarity with human beings, a solidarity that is to her the fundamental fact of social life as well as of her own political beliefs. Her attitude toward the refugees is certainly not "something between ironic superiority and a sneer." I would call it rather controlled pathos or grim pity. Mrs. Trilling is right in saying that the love story of the narrator is "a cruel joke of a plot," but isn't the fate of most of these refugees a cruel joke? Many such fates are woven into the complicated web of the narrator's reflections. What makes these scenes and characters unforgettable is the author's unrelenting compassion, even if the tragedy of people "caught in a terrible maze of transit visas, exit visas, and steamship accommodations" appears to her as narrator a bitter farce compared to the martyrdom of mangled nations and the heroism of active fighters. The narrator's report is indeed "a frightening statement," not of a special political morality, as Mrs. Trilling indicates, but of this transit world of ours.

The narrator depicts a type of refugee who has thus far not been described and is rarely mentioned in literature or films —the refugee who in spite of having gone through the hell of concentration camps, of flight and disaster, is not able to depart from the soil of Europe, to cut the invisible umbilical cord that binds him to the old continent. So he can't make use of the accommodations which he has tried by every means to get and which are ultimately offered to him. That makes him hardly believable to people over here, who are daily pressed to do all they can to rescue the victims of Nazi tyranny, to make affidavits for them, and to grant them free ports. Since he doesn't want to remain in Europe for any political purpose—he has arrived at a state of political apathy—he cannot count on much understanding and sympathy. His seems to be a case of an emigration neurosis. His lack of decisiveness, his passivity, his fatalism are not attractive; they are even abhorrent. He would rather lie to himself about his chances to survive in a Hitler-ridden France than take a resolute step—which makes him look like a hopeless defeatist. Poor wretch of a man! He may perish, or he may be able to stall, as a farm hand or as a loafer, until the invasion by the Allied armies makes him active again and gives him, in the liberation of Europe, a real purpose.

I hope I have been able to convey in these few lines what seems to me the significance of this unheroic hero, this queer lover, and the value of this tormenting and tormented book by Anna Seghers. BERTHOLD VIERTEL

New York, June 11

Too Generous

Dear Sirs: Mr. Viertel reads Miss Seghers's novel generously but I think inaccurately. He implies that "Transit" is the account of a man at the mercy of fate, whereas actually it is the account of a man ruthlessly manipulating the fate of a woman. He says that the narrator of the novel is indecisive, passive, and fatalistic; actually, Miss Seghers's narrator is full of scheming energy in pursuit of his love. Mr. Viertel regards Miss Seghers's principal character as the object of his author's compassion, but actually this unheroic hero is his author's mouthpiece; no voice is raised above his voice, and it is only through his cruel eyes that we see the transit world.

I could wish that "Transit" had been written from the point of view Mr. Viertel finds in it.

DIANA TRILLING

New York, June 20

Brother Raymond's Conclusions

Dear Sirs: As the head of the Department of Politics of the Catholic University of America and the major professor responsible for the direction of Brother August Raymond Ogden's Ph.D. dissertation on "The Dies Commitee," may I thank you for the space which you have accorded to it in the two articles by I. F. Stone in the issues of May 27 and June 3. In justice to Brother Raymond, however, a sentence or two more of his conclusions should have been added to that quoted in the issue of May 27. As Mr. Stone indicates in his quotation, there still remain "many aspects of subversive activity that only a Congressional committee could thoroughly and completely expose." But Mr. Stone fails to report that Brother Raymond recommends that "a joint standing committee [of the House and Senate] be created to maintain a continual investigation of subversive affairs," furnished with "enough money to allow it to employ a staff of competent and disinterested investigators." Furthermore, "a method of collaboration with the FBI should be provided" to avoid overlapping and duplication. Also "certain rules would have to be adopted," not necessarily the "complicated rules of evidence as used in the courts," but "a system of procedure based on respect for the individual rights of all citizens and consonant with the American tradition of fair play." In the case of federal employees suspected of subversive activities, "the role of the proposed committee should be limited to the assembling of data," leaving to the Civil Service Commission appropriate action thereon, with the right of appeal to the duly constituted courts on the part of either the Congressional committee or the person investigated. Brother Raymond specifies some of these rules and concludes that "a joint standing committee set up under the conditions enumerated would be able to avoid many of the pitfalls met by the Dies committee and at the same time protect the nation from subversive activities by means more in keeping with the American tradition of respect for the rights of all. It would be American, not in its end alone, but in all the means employed to attain that end. . . . Especially after the war it would be a potent force for maintaining that American democracy for which so many true Americans will have sacrificed their all." HERBERT WRIGHT

Washington, D. C., June 15

CHILDREN'S CAMP

SMILING HILLS CAMP
EAST STROUDSBURG PENNSYLVANIA
A progressive camp for boys and girls, from [illegible] to 12 years of age. All activities. Non-sectarian. Non-regimented. Individual care. (Limited to 50 campers)
Write:
James & Nellie Dick, Modern School,
115 Cary St., Lakewood, N. J. Phone 1007

FARMS, ACREAGE

CHARMING small colonial; 20 beautiful acres; ideal location; good barns; $3,000. 300 others. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

VERMONT FARM, 110 acres, good 7-room house with bath, furnished, barns, etc., ideal for summer home, $2500. I. J. Levy, West Topsham, Vt.

FOR RENT

114 St., 508 W.—Arizona, $5 and up. Opposite Columbia, luxurious studios, housekeeping; 24-hour elevator, switch-board service.

Single or double room, nicely furnished, with private bath, in modern elevator apartment, for July and August. TR 7-8224, before 10 a.m., after 6.

WANTED TO PURCHASE

PHONOGRAPH LANGUAGE SETS, Language, Room 1203, 18 East 41st St., N. Y. C. 17.

POSITION WANTED

FOOD SUPERVISOR, buying food, charge of menus, also charge of dining room or kitchen if necessary. Nursery school preferred. Experienced. References. Box 1474, c/o The Nation.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8
☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:
☐ 10 Weeks $1
Cash with order

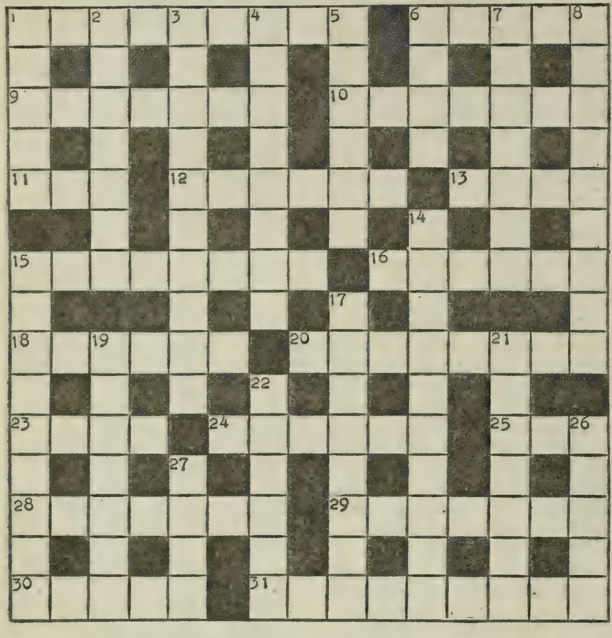
Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

Name..........
Address..........
7-1-44

BURLINGAM
PUBL

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 70

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Unprincipled hypocrite in Martin Chuzzlewit
8 An oar reveals his name
9 A petty quibble. Quell it!
10 Where it sounds like glasses, but is really jug (two words, 2 and 5)
11 Raised Cain
12 Women didn't dress in this when they asked for a vote
13 As a doornail
15 You have to close your eyes in order to see it
16 Engagement that isn't broken off at the option of either party
18 City of the King of Laputa, whose scientists tried to extract sunbeams from cucumbers and to convert ice into gunpowder (Gulliver's Travels)
20 "And -------- near a thousand homes I stood, And near a thousand tables pined and wanted food" (Wordsworth)
23 A fruit that sounds like more than one
24 Title, and heroine, of a Fielding novel
25 Out of town
28 "O, slap it!" (anag.)
29 There's room for a girl in this bread basket!
30 Flowers for sprinkling among others
31 Members of the press gang

DOWN

1 Ill-feeling you get on the top of a mountain?
2 Simple Susie used to think they were authors, since their tails came out of their heads
3 Anxiety for 101 in icy isolation
4 It was Constantinople when we went to school, but that was before 1929
5 Crusoe's faithful man
6 The Marble one in London is made of marble
7 There's a broken tear in the clothing
8 A bare headland?
14 A workman seems to interpolate a note with musical aptitude in Wagner (two words, 4 and 6)
15 Alter step (anag.)
17 Recline, do I? with ginger beer—that's sweet!
19 Horse, sheep and Manx cat in one creature
21 Nine wet (anag.)
22 What the horse we back usually turns out to be 26 Diet of Luther
27 Solon likened them to cobwebs—they held the powerless, but not the powerful

---

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 69

ACROSS:—1 COLD IN THE HEAD; 10 LAIRS; 11 NELL GWYNN; 12 OVEREATEN; 13 ESHER; 14 APPEAL BOARDS; 19 AFTERTHOUGHT; 22 AARON; 24 MODERNIST; 25 CRICKETER; 26 IBSEN; 27 GHASTLY DREAMS.

DOWN:—2 OLIVER; 3 DISTEMPER; 4 NINETIETH; 5 HELEN; 6 HAGUE; 7 ANYWHERE; [illegible] ELBOW; 9 UNDRESS; 15 LAUNDERED; 16 OTHERWISE; 17 VACANCY; 18 STARFISH; 20 LISSOM; 21 STONE; 23 NOKES; [illegible] METAL.

RESORTS

RELAX, REJOICE WITH SUMMER AT
Lakecrest
on Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.
90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N. Y. C. R. R. to Amenia, N. Y. Open all year.
WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATION
EVA BERG, Director Standfordville 4108

Timberland
AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100
ALL SPORTS ▪ PRIVATE LAKE
MUSIC • LECTURES • CONCERTS
N. Y. OFFICE: 33 W. 42 St. LOngacre 5-3674
The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

The Oaks Formerly RED OAKS
Elberon, N. J.
Enjoy all outdoor sports, excellent tennis, ocean bathing, delicious cuisine, in this American plan country estate. On Highway 4N, only 50 miles from N. Y. C. (Jersey Central or Pennsylvania R. R. direct to Elberon.) Phone Long Branch 2438
Management of Joseph Horowitz

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village [illegible]

WESTERN VIEW FARM
25th Season
TED OHMER
New Milford Connecticut
Telephone: NEW MILFORD 440

Intimate Different Delightful OAKWOOD NEW WINDSOR, NEW YORK
Tel.: Newburgh 4477. Only 58 miles from N.Y.C.
Enjoy the charm of this Colonial Estate. Spacious grounds. Private Lake. Boating. Swimming. All sports. Unexcelled food.
Limited accommodations.

SHADYBROOK
MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 963
50 miles from N. Y. C. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Tennis, handball, etc.; golf, swimming, riding. Free MOVIES.
JULY and AUGUST — $40 Weekly: $7 per day
Write for Booklet N. POPPER & SIMON

GRANITE LAKE CABINS—With private baths; Simmons beds. Water sports, excellent home cooking. Adults only, $60 a week double. Box 77, Munsonville, New Hampshire.

ROMAINE VILLA, Monsey, N. Y. Meals for better health. Ideal for rest and convalescing. Limited accommodations. Spring Valley 525.

Shorten the Road to Victory
BUY BONDS!

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 8, 1944 NUMBER 2

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 29

EDITORIALS
- The Republican Platform 32
- The Soviet Drive 33

ARTICLES
- The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 34
- A Soldier's Letter to Mrs. Luce by William J. Caldwell 35
- It's in the Bag for F. D. R. by I. F. Stone 36
- 75 Years Ago in The Nation 38
- Sex and the Censor by Philip Wylie 39
- The Record of the REA by Judson King 41
- In the Wind 43

POLITICAL WAR
- Allied Propaganda to Occupied Europe 44
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 46

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
- The One and the Many by William Phillips 47
- Presidents Should Be Strong by Irving Brant 48
- Winged Words by Betsy Hutchison 48
- Kierkegaard by H. Richard Niebuhr 50
- Mr. Tyler's Hallucination by Victor Wolfson 50
- China's Great Past by Agnes Smedley 51
- Films by James Agee 53
- Music by B. H. Haggin 53

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 55

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 71 by Jack Barrett 56

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE BATTLE OF CAEN, MEASURED BY THE terrific scale of the Battle of Minsk, may seem a minor engagement, but its outcome is of crucial importance. The Germans have made this sizable Norman city the kingpin of their defense system. If it is lost and Montgomery's forces are able to reach the wide plain to the southeast where armor can operate freely, Rommel will have to pull back many miles. This would enable the Allies to establish their beachhead beyond dispute and give them the elbow room necessary for a deep drive into France. The British offensive, which opened while Cherbourg was still being mopped up, sought to outflank the city from the west. After a bridgehead across the River Odon had been consolidated, the enemy struck back with one counter-attack after another. But these blows, while very intense, were undertaken with small forces, and each was confined to a narrow front. Commentators have been puzzled by the piecemeal nature of the German tactics. One reason appears to be shortage of infantry, without which positions taken by armored troops cannot be held. Another factor is the ubiquitous Allied tactical air force, whose rain of punches makes any massing of troops unhealthy and keeps Rommel from building up dependable lines of supply.

*

GENERAL EISENHOWER IS WINNING NEW diplomatic as well as new military laurels. His appointment of General Pierre-Joseph Koenig, hero of Bir-Hacheim, as commander of the French Forces of the Interior is a really constructive step toward improvement of relations with the French Provisional Government. In the first place, it constitutes full recognition of the invaluable services of the French underground fighters since the beginning of the invasion. Secondly, the choice of one of General de Gaulle's closest associates to head this indomitable army is a tacit acceptance of the claim of the French Provisional Government to represent the forces of resistance inside France. General Eisenhower has also strengthened working relations with the French by an agreement which will enable 230 French administrative liaison officers now in England to proceed to France as members of General Koenig's staff. As a result there are good hopes of a modus vivendi being achieved which will satisfy the French desire to control civil affairs in the liberated territory. Meanwhile it is understood that progress is being made in the negotiations in London between Pierre Vienot, ambassador of the Provisional Government, and Foreign Secretary Eden. The British are clearly aware both of the strength of the Algiers regime inside France and of the absence of any competing group with a popular following. It is to be hoped that the pressure of facts is also being felt in Washington, where General de Gaulle is expected very shortly.

BURLINGAME

* * *

ALLIED CASUALTIES ON THE BEACHES OF Normandy not only failed to fulfil the scare rumors that were prevalent before the invasion but were extremely moderate for a military operation of such extensive proportions. The total of American, Canadian, and British casualties for the first two weeks of the invasion has been given as 40,549. Although this figure does not include losses resulting from the final attack on Cherbourg, it does include the high beachhead losses suffered by the First Division and the losses incurred by the paratroopers. It is probable that this total is somewhat higher than the actual casualties, since a fairly large number of the 12,000 listed as missing may have merely become separated from their own units and attached temporarily to others. In any event the total appears extremely small when compared with the Soviet Union's admitted losses of 5,300,000 in three years of war or with recorded losses in the major operations of World War I. In the First Battle of the Somme in 1916, for example, the British are believed to have suffered 750,000 casualties, as against German losses of approximately 500,000—for a net gain of 200 square miles of French soil. In the Battle of Verdun German losses amounted to more than 300,000, while the French lost at least 200,000. In the Battle of Arras casualties on both sides approached 700,000. In the severe fighting that lies ahead we may suffer far heavier losses than any that we have yet had to endure. But the precautions that were taken to protect the lives of our soldiers in breaching the Atlantic Wall justify high faith in our military leadership.

* * *

DENMARK, INVADED WITHOUT WARNING IN April, 1940, fell with scarcely a shot fired. A small, peaceful country with no more than a token army and without natural defenses, it had no way of combating the swarms of German bombers that flew over Copenhagen or the hordes of Nazi soldiers that emerged from the holds of "innocent" merchant vessels. But the Danes, with the exception of a handful of Quislings, never surrendered in their hearts. From the first they spurned German offers of Nordic brotherhood. Then they turned to sabotage showing remarkable ingenuity. Last week they took to the offensive openly, calling a general strike in Copenhagen as a protest against new curfew orders and the employment of Danish Nazis as police. For nearly two hours the city was paralyzed while armed patriots barricaded the streets and fought the isolated German garrison. Shortage of food and water finally made it necessary to call off the strike, but although temporarily defeated, the Danes have struck a blow in the Battle of Liberation. As outside pressure on the walls of Hitler's fortress grows, its defenses are being undermined from within by men who refuse to be slaves.

* * *

MR. HULL'S ACTION IN ENDING RELATIONS with Finland spells the failure of prolonged attempts by the United States to act as a bridge between the U. S. S. R. and Finland. Well-intentioned as this effort was, it is doubtful whether it has served the best interests of the Finnish people. The hope has always been that we could persuade the Finnish government to dissociate itself from Germany and make a separate peace. But the fact is that ever since the Finnish leaders entered into a pact with Hitler in the spring of 1940 they have been irrevocably bound to Germany despite all their protests that their war was a quite different war from the one the rest of the world was waging. Maintenance of relations with America has only encouraged them to believe that, even if Germany proved a broken reed, Finland could rely on our support to save it from the consequences of defeat. It is apparent that the Finnish people have long been weary of the war and, after the defeats suffered in the past few weeks, are more than ready to come to terms with Russia. But instead of sending emissaries to Moscow, President Ryti received von Ribbentrop in Helsinki and reached a "perfect understanding" with him which quickly brought German troops to the Finnish capital. The agreement was not submitted to Parliament, and even the Cabinet, it is believed, was not consulted. However, its members, after considering resignation, have decided to remain in office, and by so doing they accept the Quisling brand. Clearly, a necessary preliminary for peace and the restoration of democracy in Finland is the liquidation of the leaders who have reduced the country to its present plight. In Moscow the hope was expressed that America's severance of relations might lead to overthrow of the government, but with the Germans in full possession immediate prospects for revolt seem poor.

* * *

IT NOW LOOKS AS IF SENATOR NYE WERE the winner in the North Dakota sweepstakes. The race has been nip and tuck all the way, Stambaugh holding a slight lead at first, Nye coming up strong and winning by a nose in a photo finish. Usher Burdick ran a good race a few lengths behind, and A. C. Townley trailed far in the rear. They haven't seen a race like it in North Dakota's history. Of course, the result will not be dead certain until the State Canvassing Board meets on August 1, and it is just possible that absentee ballots and soldiers' votes will eliminate Nye's lead of several hundreds. Burdick's failure to capture the race is a disappointment to those who have watched with growing confidence the effectiveness of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee. But North Dakota is a farm state, and its farmers are largely unfamiliar with and still distrustful of organized labor. Nye and Stambaugh, poles apart in their international outlook, vied with each other in attacking Burdick because organized labor, and particularly the Political Action Committee, was backing him. Stambaugh painted a dread picture of a resurrected I. W. W. spreading terror and revolution, while Nye flourished wildly a copy of the Daily Worker that contained a tribute (unsolicited) to Burdick. The most progressive farmers in the western section of the state, active in the Non-Partisan League and strongly behind Burdick, met an undeserved rebuff from the weather. A deluge of rain on Election Day literally washed out their vote and with it, perhaps, Burdick's margin of victory. The likely candidates of November are therefore Senator Nye, Republican, and Governor Moses, Democrat. It is still possible that when the Congress to make the peace assembles, America's isolationist number one will not be there.

*

THE VIRGINIA DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION, which meets at Roanoke on July 8, will have a majority unfriendly to the New Deal and the fourth term. Most of the delegates have been handpicked by the "courthouse crowd" which operates Senator Harry Byrd's well-heeled and strongly intrenched machine. Probably they will send to Chicago a delegation which is either uninstructed or pledged to support Byrd himself. It is unlikely, however, that they will join up with the Texas conspiracy. In the first place, Virginia's voting laws recognize that the "independent" Presidential elector is a constitutional fiction. The official ballot places the names of the Presidential candidates at the top with spaces for the voter's cross opposite: underneath are listed the Vice-Presidential nominees and the electors. Thus there is no doubt about the choice of the voters, and any elector who dared to flout it would have a hard time explaining. Apart from this technical obstacle, a strong opposition group was organized some time ago to support Roosevelt and nip in the bud any election-stealing plot. Known as the Committee of One Hundred, it is headed by Christopher Garnett, president of the Virginia Bar Association, and Rixey Smith, who has long been secretary to Senator Carter Glass. At least so far as its opposition to the Texas plot is concerned, it has the support of the state's leading editor, Virginius Dabney, who has denounced scheming to circumvent a popular vote for Mr. Roosevelt as a means of destroying constitutional government. It is therefore probable that the reactionaries of the Old Dominion, if they want to carry through with their bitter opposition to the President, will be forced either to support an independent Democrat—perhaps Byrd—or to bolt to the Republicans. They may split the Virginia vote; they are not likely to be allowed to steal it.

*

THE COYNESS OF CANDIDATES IS AN OLD American tradition. Nobody is fooled by it but everyone expects it. Take Tom Dewey. He wasn't a candidate for the Republican nomination, but his mother was in Chicago in case he should be "drafted." He hadn't put himself forward, but a twenty-three-passenger plane was kept ready in Albany so that he could get to Chicago quickly in case the Republicans thought he was the only man who could beat Roosevelt. In his acceptance speech he said, "I have not sought this responsibility. . . ." At that point Mr. Dewey's coyness began to look to us like plain lying, his humility like cheap impertinence. But it's possible, of course, that we did him an injustice. It's barely possible that he meant what he said, despite the fact that even Republicans seem to feel that he wanted the nomination and worked like hell to get it. Perhaps Mr. Dewey is already looking forward to the first Wednesday after the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November when he can relax and say, "I didn't want to be President anyway. I told you so." We are sure that he can count on millions of voters to cooperate in saving him from the awful sacrifice of having to be Chief Executive of the biggest country in the world. We at least shall be glad to do our bit.

*

SALES OF WAR BONDS TO INDIVIDUALS IN the Fifth War Loan drive have lagged dangerously despite the enthusiasm generated by the offensives in Europe and the Pacific. While there is not much doubt that the national quota of $16,000,000,000 will be surpassed through institutional subscriptions before the drive ends on July 8, it is possible that the $6,000,000,000 quota for individuals may not be reached. This is serious, because bank purchases are inflationary in effect, while purchases by individuals, through absorption of excess spending power, have an anti-inflationary influence. The lag in sales to individuals cannot be attributed to lack of money or lack of savings. Figures recently released by the Treasury show that the American people are saving at the rate of $38,000,000,000 a year, but that only about $13,000,000,000 of this amount is being invested in war bonds or other government securities. The unprecedented rise in the amount of currency in circulation in recent years indicates that a considerable amount of money is being hoarded in cash. Savings banks and commercial banks report huge increases in deposits. This money should be dug out and invested in war bonds, not because our boys need bullets—they will get them regardless—but to save the home front from the terrors of an uncontrolled inflation which would make the money hidden in trunks or deposited in banks all but worthless.

The Republican Platform

AFTER reading and rereading the platform adopted by the Republican National Convention we have been totally unable to find in it any coherent pattern of political principle. While one paragraph draws on Republican tradition, the next borrows freely from the New Deal; a bow made to free enterprise is followed by a salute to state intervention; states' rights are strongly upheld, and a promise is made to Negroes of legislation which must encroach on states' rights. According to their platform Republicans favor freer trade and the maintenance of tariffs; they are against subsidies for farm commodities but for support of prices and commodity loans, which, as the New York Times has pointed out, are subsidies in another form; they pledge themselves to maintain the value of the dollar and condemn the "freezing of wage rates"—an essential measure in preventing inflation. Here, indeed, is something for everyone, a lavish scattering of bait for voters, a bundle of contradictions held together only by a fervent desire for victory.

Republican commentators admit the catch-all nature of the platform but assert that platforms are not really important; what matters is the candidate's interpretation and expansion of the general line of policy approved by the convention. Of course, "as a matter of private honor and public faith" Mr. Dewey is pledged "to be true to the principles and program," but this undertaking should not prove unduly hampering in the circumstances. A much more exacting task will be to produce interpretations which satisfy the many conflicting interests within the G. O. P.

Consider, for instance, the tariff plank adopted at Chicago. It promises "to establish and maintain a fair protective tariff on competitive products," thus propitiating the farmers, livestock producers, and manufacturers of consumer goods dependent on the home market. But since the great mass-production and capital-goods interests, an important source of party funds, are anxious to find markets abroad, there is also an undertaking to "join . . . in every cooperative effort to remove unnecessary and destructive barriers to foreign trade." Then, evidently fearing they have gone too far, the writers of the plank hastily add that tariffs "should be modified only by reciprocal bilateral trade agreements approved by Congress."

At his first press conference after nomination Governor Dewey was asked whether he approved Mr. Hull's reciprocal-trade-agreement program. "That," he replied, "has always been a Republican policy which Secretary Hull has carried out ably and which I hope the Republicans will continue to carry out." Mr. Dewey either does not know or chooses to forget that in 1934, 1937, and 1940 Republicans in Congress almost solidly voted against the Hull program. Last year, it is true, a majority supported a renewal of the State Department's authority to negotiate reciprocal-trade treaties, but now their action has been repudiated, in effect, by the Republican platform. For an essential element in Mr. Hull's success in reducing tariffs has been the fact that his agreements do not have to be submitted to Congress, and are not therefore at the mercy of the log-rollers. Obviously, before we know where Mr. Dewey and his party stand on foreign-trade questions a great deal more elucidation and interpretation are necessary.

This is not a minor issue, and, apart from its intrinsic importance, it has a large bearing on a very major issue —foreign policy. As Ralph Robey, the conservative business editor of Newsweek, has pointed out, "a nation can follow a policy of economic isolationism and at the same time refuse to carry on political cooperation with foreign countries . . . but no nation can successfully be internationalist on the political level and isolationist on the economic level." It follows that either the Republicans are trying to square the international circle or that they are not sincere in advocating "responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression."

It is to be hoped that in the course of the campaign Governor Dewey will find some means of unhooking his party from the horns of this dilemma. But in order to achieve this feat he will first have to abandon the tariff plank and then make over the international policy outlined in the platform by sharply defining its many ambiguous phrases. Up to now Republican interpreters of the foreign-policy plank, including Mr. Dewey, have been chiefly concerned to tell us what it doesn't mean. It does not provide for our incorporation in a world state, we are told; it does not commit us to an international police force; it does not deprive us of our sovereign power to make war. Very well, but does it mean that a Republican Administration would place its full weight behind an international organization to provide collective security, even though that involved some sacrifice of national sovereignty? That is the question which all who dread a third world war want to have answered.

Clearly, if Mr. Dewey provides a reassuring answer he will be in for trouble in his own party—the same kind of trouble that Wendell Willkie encountered. So long as the foreign-policy plank looks "satisfactory" to the Chicago Tribune, it is going to appear a very dubious proposition to hosts of voters. There is no dodging this issue; yet every suggestion of campaign tactics so far indicates that the G. O. P. is going to try to dodge it. It would like to leave international questions outside the arena and concentrate on domestic affairs. That stout Republican columnist David Lawrence has remarked: "The Republican concept of the 1944 campaign has been to lay low and gather in the protest votes." The key word in their propaganda, it would seem, is to be "bureaucracy," and by its constant repetition they hope to rally all the discontents on the civilian front. Does the sugar ration irk your sweet-tooth? That's New Deal bureaucracy. Can't you get enough gas for your vacation? The bureaucrats keep it from you. Is your train crowded and late? Are you frozen in your job? Can't you get that rise in pay you think you deserve? Then vote for Dewey and crack down on the bureaucrats. It is hardly necessary to point out the dangers of such an irresponsible exploitation of civilian discontent. It encourages that slackening of effort on the home front against which the Chiefs of Staff have just found it necessary to issue a grave warning. This may seem a harsh judgment, but as Walter Lippmann has pointed out, "there is not one line, not one word, in the whole platform which recognizes honestly the need of civilian control and sacrifice in war time."

The Soviet Drive

THE world has become so accustomed to successful Soviet offensives on the eastern front that it was somewhat slow to grasp the magnitude of the great drive in White Russia. But it is now clear that this is no ordinary offensive. In size, power, coordination, and speed it transcends any effort yet made by one of the United Nations, even the invasion itself. In attacking the so-called Fatherland Line in White Russia, the Red Army struck at the most powerful defensive position the Germans had yet succeeded in establishing along a major sector of the eastern front. Its northern anchor, Vitebsk, had held out under almost continuous attack for the better part of a year. On a line stretching nearly 200 miles to the south the Germans had strongly fortified three other important railway junctions on the strategic Leningrad-Odessa railway—Orsha, Mogilev, and Zhlobin. These four great strongholds, together with Bobruisk to the rear, fell on four successive days. Within a week the Red Army had forged ahead almost a hundred miles, crossed the Berezina, and was approaching the old Polish border along the main Moscow-Minsk-Warsaw highway.

It is evident that this time the German "disengaging movements" have not proceeded "according to plan." Five Nazi divisions were surrounded and destroyed at Vitebsk; five more were cut off and destroyed at Bobruisk; at least one division was caught at Mogilev. Among the more than 25,000 Nazi prisoners captured in the five days between June 23 and June 27 were four German generals, the largest bag since Stalingrad. One of the generals was the commander of an army corps; two others were divisional commanders. Their loss can hardly be reconciled with any interpretation of a "planned withdrawal." The German defenses appear to have been cut to pieces so quickly that it was impossible for any large number of the defenders to withdraw to previously established lines in the rear.

A further indication of the growing power of the Red Army may be seen in the fact that it has maintained its triple offensive against Finland while conducting these massive operations in White Russia. The Finnish offensive has also yielded impressive results. After a fortnight of fighting, some 240 miles of the important Murmansk-Leningrad railway has been cleared of the enemy, and Petrozavodsk, the capital of Soviet Karelia, has been liberated. This triumph, coupled with the even greater achievement of freeing the last segment of the Leningrad-Odessa line, gives the Soviets a first-class railway roughly paralleling the front all the way from Murmansk to Odessa—an advantage they have not possessed since the early days of the war.

It may be some time before it will be possible to assess the full significance of the Soviets' White Russian offensive. Is this the main drive planned at Teheran, or is it merely a preliminary to greater blows to be struck in the south? That, of course, is the question to which the Nazi High Command must find the answer if it is to have any hope of stopping the Red Army. There is reason to believe that the Nazis have anticipated that the main drive would be in the Western Ukraine. If so, it presumably will not start until the White Russian offensive clears the area north of the Pripet Marshes. But the magnitude and power of the present offensive suggest that the more advantageous central route chosen by Napoleon for the invasion of Russia may be used by the Red Army for the advance to Warsaw and Berlin. In any case it is difficult to see how the Germans can hope to stop the Soviet offensive without drawing deeply on their strategic reserves. And if they draw on their strategic reserves to stop the present drive, they will have little left for use in the west or in stopping other possible Soviet offensives. The dilemma in which the German High Command finds itself is indeed an unenviable one. If it guesses wrong, the German military machine faces immediate, complete disaster. But can any action by the German General Staff stave off defeat for long? The fury of the White Russian offensive suggests that all the possible courses of action available to the Nazi High Command would turn out to be equally disastrous.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

Saipan and Hengyang

SAIPAN and Hengyang are the two critical spots in the Far Eastern war at the moment: Saipan where the Allies most seriously threaten Japan, Hengyang where the Japanese most seriously threaten us. As this is written, we are winning Saipan and they are winning Hengyang. The two battles are closely related, although they are more than 2,000 miles apart.

I tried to suggest the connection between these two battles last week when I said that our hold on Saipan puts us within striking distance of the Philippines, Formosa, and Japan (Saipan is roughly 1,500 miles from each), and that the Japanese drive along the Hankow-Canton railway was designed to secure overland passage of troops from Manchuria to the South China coast before the sea lanes are closed. I called this Japan's offensive of desperation, and concluded: "An offensive of desperation may win temporary advantage, but it doesn't win wars, or even delay defeats very long."

I don't propose to eat crow on that statement, but one of my Chinese friends thinks I may have to before long; so let's examine the situation more closely.

Japan won China's northern provinces in 1937, pushed inland to Hankow and landed at the south- and east-coast ports in 1938, and then became occupied elsewhere by greater schemes. These schemes boomeranged, in that United States aircraft, based in China, and United States submarines, based in the Pacific, began to prey on the coastal shipping which supplied the coastal garrisons and carried the material of war from the Indies to the home islands. In actions here and elsewhere Japan has lost more than 3,000,000 tons of merchant shipping since Pearl Harbor.

This attrition of Japan's war commerce was serious. Even more serious was Admiral Nimitz's threat: that our Pacific strategy was aimed at securing a foothold on the China coast from which our troops could engage the main Japanese armies.

The Japanese, according to the best-informed Chinese circles, hold scarcely more than the city limits of Foochow, Amoy, Swatow, and Canton, the ports behind Formosa where we would presumably land. There are considerable Chinese forces in the coastal provinces—not fighting major battles but actively harassing the enemy and potentially an aid for any landing force. Moreover, advanced bases for the Fourteenth U. S. Army Air Force's strikes at shipping are maintained here.

With this as background in China, and with the fantastically rapid advance of our amphibious troops through the Central Pacific as incentive, the Japanese counterplan was inevitable but ambitious: drive south from Hankow and north from Canton along the great railway (which has no rails—the Chinese have carried them away and destroyed the roadbed), establish the essential overland line of communication, split Free China in two, mop up the Chinese troops and the air bases in the coastal region, and prepare to meet the landings.

After a poor start in April, the drive gained momentum in June. Hengyang has fallen; from Canton, 250 miles to the south, word comes that Japanese sea-borne reinforcements and supplies are pouring in at an unprecedented rate. The southern arm of the pincers seems ready to move. We hear that the fall of Hengyang is the worst blow for China since Hankow fell in 1938, and General Chennault says a Japanese success may prolong the war two years.

Well, perhaps; but Chennault is in the middle of the terrible hardships of the Chinese, he is concerned about his air force, and presumably he has not seen one of our several Pacific fleets. Moreover, a Japanese success is not so easy. It is not a nice stretch of land, that 250 miles between Hengyang and Canton. From Hankow to Hengyang was river valley; at Hengyang the Japanese enter the mountains. In those mountains are the troops of Kwangtung Province. To the west, on the Japanese flank, are the troops of Kwangsi, tough and very good troops with high morale, commanded by two Kwangsi generals who are among Chiang's best.

And Mr. Wallace has been in Chungking on a political and military mission. If war is the extension of politics, politics continues to be the accessory of war. China is one theater in which military developments cannot be discussed out of their political context. If the Communists and the Kuomintang have been persuaded to turn away from each other toward the Japanese, a million men will have been freed to press against the Japanese flank in the north—the area which is shaping up as the final battleground in the Far Eastern war.

So the Japanese are faced with mountains and fine troops in the south, and a potential political-military blow in the north—not to mention the increasing possibility of eventual Russian action on the other flank of the same vital Manchurian position. And even without these threats, can their best efforts ashore counterbalance their failure at sea? Japanese naval strategy is traditionally based on the theory of the transport fleet, to carry the army, and the protective squadron, to convoy the troopships. Fleet action is always avoided: the fleet's function is to protect troopship waters. But Saipan is in troopship waters; in failing to prevent our lodgment there, the fleet utterly failed to justify its reason for existence.

Moreover, even the highly correct—from a Japanese view—tip-and-run aerial-naval raid proved very costly in the Battle of the Eastern Philippines: without being able to join surface action, we sank one, probably sank another, and disabled two of the four large new aircraft carriers the enemy sent to meet us. The fabulous Task Force 58, officially described as "the most powerful and destructive unit in the history of sea warfare," which can launch more than 1,000 aircraft, also destroyed 747 Japanese planes. This impressive damage was all gain: the Japanese failed to halt the Saipan operation and failed to reduce our relative combat strength. Thus the policy of avoiding risk in a fleet engagement has allowed us to build strength so overpowering that we have neutralized the Marianas, and, as Secretary Forrestal says, has opened the way to blows against the Japanese mainland, the Philippines, and the East Indies.

Things are moving fast in the Pacific, thanks to the fleet-train, which enables us to carry our bases forward with us in a great variety of supply and repair vessels; and it seems most unlikely that the Japanese can finish their big and desperate job in China before Task Force 58, aided by the Superfortresses, will provide a more crashing distraction than Saipan on the enemy's weak side—the sea, where lie the home islands of Japan.

A Soldier's Letter to Mrs. Luce

BY WILLIAM J. CALDWELL

THE night of June 27 Clare Luce made a lovely speech. It worried me to beat hell because of one ruthless political practice it revealed.

Mrs. Luce talked about some friends of mine.

She talked about a lanky kid from Kentucky who used to be my tail-gunner—until a Jap 20 mm. caught him in the stomach.

She talked about a Greek from Brooklyn—a cook who brewed coffee for us combat crews before an 0300 Take Off, until Washing-Machine Charlie dropped one square on the mess hall.

She talked about a fighter pilot whose name I never knew. This pilot gave our bomber fighter protection one day—until he had to bail out and was machine-gunned to his death in his parachute.

Mrs. Luce talked about these men—and hundreds of thousands of their comrades, the American War Dead.

William J. Caldwell was an Army Air Force sergeant at Pearl Harbor when the Japs attacked. As a radio operator and gunner he saw action at the Battle of Midway and on sixty-eight bombing missions in the Southwest Pacific. He spent nine months on Guadalcanal. He was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross, Air Medal, Purple Heart, and Presidential Citation. This letter, from a twenty-five-year-old veteran of this war, is intended neither as a personal attack nor as a partisan plea. It is irrelevant, he says, that he is a Republican.

I was glad to hear her talk about them. Too few people outside their "next of kin" even think about these dead ones. Too few people take time to plan to preserve the America they died to save.

But Mrs. Luce went one step farther; one step too far, for my money. And in that step there lies a threat that many other speakers may follow her dangerous precedent, for her speech was a powerful, vote-catching speech. And by the gods of many politicians, that's what counts.

The "step too far" was this. Politically, Mrs. Luce seemed to resurrect the men killed in action. And into their silent, cold mouths she stuffed words. For what purpose? For the purpose of supporting her own political party.

Mrs. Luce found a new kind of Charlie McCarthy. She went one better than a wooden dummy—she made her mouthpiece a dead soldier.

And a powerful mouthpiece a dead soldier makes—witness the potency of the speech he spoke for Mrs. Luce. A speech powerful enough to stir cheers and tears, a speech maybe even powerful enough to help swing an election—a brave requiem for soldier dust.

But, Mrs. Luce, is this right? Is this ventriloquism honorable and decent?

Or is it obscene prostitution of your dead?

Presumably your reply is, "Yes, it is honorable. My intentions were high. The end—the instalment of my party (the good of America)—justifies the means."

But upon your slim shoulders weighs a responsibility heavy with the grim burden of "the young bones that bleach on the tropical roads of Bataan," that fill the earth beneath white crosses scattered the globe around.

BURLINGAME

You went on to say, Mrs. Luce, that "this convention is gathered together . . . to clarify what his [G. I. Joe's] wants are likely to be in the next four years and to plan to meet those needs . . . before this convention is done, it will clearly interpret his [the fighting man's] long-term wants in keynote and platform, and to the honoring of them our candidate will pledge himself."

Indeed a noble and praiseworthy sentiment. But, Mrs. Clairvoyant Luce, who besides your good self is at Chicago to reveal the fighters' "long-term" wants? Are you sure that sometimes his long-term wants may not be mixed up with your long-term wants?

A skeptical thought I admit. But what happened last time? Will no one allow the men themselves to decide what they want? Will no one give them time to fight and win and come home? And then grant them the American right of speaking for themselves. Please allow at least the living to talk for themselves, Mrs. Luce—if not the dead.

Do not cease, please do not anyone cease, from planning for the future of the veterans. But before these plans become actions, let the veterans look them over. Men who fight for their way of life and their country often think about them too.

Mrs. Luce is convinced that George Washington and today's G. I. Joe would prefer a gallery seat at the Republican convention to a gallery seat at the Democratic convention. Surely if heaven grants men peace and wisdom, our soldier dead would spend their days elsewhere than in the Chicago Stadium or the lobby of the Stevens Hotel.

While the blood is still wet on the beaches of France, upon the steeps of Saipan, politicians in foxholes from Pennsylvania to the Stevens Hotel are already making election propaganda out of their dead. Must the bones of our soldiers and sailors so soon be used as muck-shovels to sling mud from political party to political party?

Our dead belong first to themselves—and then to us, to America, not to this party or that. Let the country pledge faith, then, to the dead, and to the living who fight to protect it.

For the sake of those men who lie beneath the white crosses of our military graves, let there be an end now to this carving of campaign buttons from the young bones that bleach on the sands and rot in the mud.

It's in the Bag for F.D.R.

BY I. F. STONE

Chicago, June 29

CHICAGO is magnificent, a brutal force, an imperial city. Walt Whitman would have loved the splendor of its lake front, the skyline that challenges New York's, the luxury of Michigan Avenue and the flop houses of West Madison, the traveling salesmen and the tarts in the midtown hotels, the tireless human tides of the Loop. Little of that exuberant vitality was evident in the Republican National Convention, where droves of newspapermen foraged for scraps of news and delegates moved with bovine apathy into the Dewey camp. The Brickerites, with their boys' choir, lady cellist, and hymns, had something of the fervor of a Methodist revival, though with the sedateness proper in people from the right side of the tracks. The Stassenites were an isolated little band of Puritan internationalists, righteous, horrified, and impotent amid so much compromise with Colonel McCormick and sin. Willkie was only a voice offstage. The Dewey machine was modern, efficient, and triumphant, as slick as an advertising campaign by Batten, Barton, Durstine, and Osborn, proof to Chicago that politics is as susceptible to mass production as meat packing.

The convention itself required a strong stomach and a robust taste for humanity, not in the raw, where idealists may savor it, but in the pretentious and ribald package, human hamburger served up as Salisbury steak with a sprig of parsley. For this was country-club America gathering, respectable and prosperous America, the party of the small-town banker and lawyer as well as the party of Wall and State streets. Bald heads and well-lined paunches filled the rich lobbies of the Stevens. The pretty girl elevator operators got the libidinous eye of the men, the disapproving state of big-bosomed battle-axes accustomed to preside over the better women's clubs. The convention was no place for anemic prigs or pallid political moralists; it is a little late in the day to demonstrate that the Republican Party does not sincerely intend to build socialism in one country. The best guidebook to the spectacle was not Aristotle or Bryce but Balzac and Sinclair Lewis; here was the petty bourgeoisie in all its greed, cunning, caution, and stupidity; here also was Main Street, standardized but energetic, the horizons narrow but the faces friendly. The delegate's conception of politics may be cretinish, but he's a nice guy to drink beer with at a bar.

The most devoted were the Brickerites, good papas and mamas from small Ohio towns, likable people who trim their lawns and teach their little boys to wash behind the ears. Dewey's girls—he flooded the town with them Sunday—were cover girls, of a well-pasteurized loveliness, from the better agencies, and at least one of them confessed that she was a Democrat. But Bricker's were soulful young things who really thought the big, handsome, gray-haired ham a hero. I was at a Bricker rally Saturday night and heard the Governor's people cheer as he said, "I have been all around this country during the last few months. I know the longings of its people. I know their heart-beats. I know what they want. They want a real American for President." Bricker wears his hair like William Butler Yeats, but he's pure Throttlebottom.

No such evangelism was visible in the Dewey camp. Typical scene was that in the Missouri caucus over the week-end, as reported to me second hand. "Now look, boys," was the appeal, "we got to be practical. Remember last time when Pennsylvania missed the boat. One of the best newspapermen in America tells me Dewey already has 840 delegates. He'll be nominated before they ever get to the M's on the roll call. Now let's send our pledges up to Jaeckle and Sprague." So the pledges rolled in, and it was clear that the last possibility of hopeless battle was over Wednesday morning when Joe Martin hammered away with his huge burlesque-show gavel and shouted, "I introduce the Governor of Ohio." Americans like a good loser, and Bricker had the delegates as well as the galleries with him when he withdrew in favor of Dewey. Dewey's nomination produced a five-minute ovation; the delegates cheered Bricker for seventeen. The resentment of the convention broke through when Senator Ball, his face refreshingly different from the pompous statesmen and Honest Johns crowding the platform, withdrew Stassen's candidacy. "Ours," he said angrily, "has been a clean fight."

The formal addresses, interminable in the Turkish-bath atmosphere of the triple-tiered Chicago stadium, were an anthology of clichés; the nominating speeches an orgy of mixed metaphor. Joe Martin said the convention was meeting "in a solemn moment of our history" while we were "locked in a deadly struggle" with "a cruel foe" and "pouring out our treasure," the last being particularly irksome to economy-minded Republicans. Local talent won by a nose in the mixed-metaphor sweepstakes, a Chicago judge calling Dewey a Galahad in shining armor out to get the Holy Grail to perform the Augean task of smashing gang rule forever.

The only good speech of the convention was one made by Colonel Romulo, MacArthur's aide on Bataan, a Filipino with his people's gift for rhetoric, ". . . tell them how we starved . . . tell them how we made bombs out of pop bottles. . . ." Everyone mentioned the war, but no one else made it seem real. Hoover, when he spoke, seemed tired and old. When he finished, the sweat poured from his face under the huge klieg lights and his hand shook so he could not put his glasses in his pocket. Elderly men in sweaty shirts with big cigars waved and cheered the last Republican President with affection felt for a vanished moment in their own youth.

The other speeches, in their standard hollowness and uproarious illiteracy, were not offensive; they invoked the standard semantic symbols of the party. The one speech in bad taste—a feeling I found shared by people whose political views are quite unlike my own—was Clare Luce's bedtime story in the Orphan Annie manner of how G. I. Jim was haunting the convention, "Yes, maybe he was brought here by General George Washington. All Americans know that the General's spirit has watched over every gathering where Presidents have been picked for 147 years. . . ." This was applying whimsy with a shovel. Her attack on the President, leading any stranger to assume that the Republican Party had been the lonely voice during the '30's against the Axis and isolationism, was cheap and contemptible.

The stage managers of the convention, who seemed to have a gift for anti-climax, made Dewey's triumphal entrance a trifle difficult Wednesday night by having the crowd sing "Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord," which was laying it on a bit thick. The nominee himself, sired by Horatio Alger out of Sullivan and Cromwell, looked young and vigorous, and he flushed red with pleasure on the platform. (My story wouldn't be complete without Mother Dewey's statement to the press, "I never thought of Tom's growing up to be President. I just wanted him to be a good boy and he was—most always.") Dewey was not turgid. He was brief, compact, and competent, but he didn't say anything, and I had the feeling that the crowd would have preferred the old-fashioned hooey. The reception given him was short and sedate and quite unlike that customary at conventions. The lack of enthusiasm was not a good Republican sign for November.

Nowhere was the rubber-stamp character of the convention more apparent than in the extraordinary session Tuesday afternoon to adopt the platform. Starved for a story, some of us had hoped that the Willkie statement and the Edge protest would stir a fight on the floor against the foreign-policy plank. But not more than 10 per cent of the delegates put in an appearance at the platform session. The plank against more than two terms for President stirred the most applause. The response was mild even to the promise of "rigid economy," an old G. O. P. standby. There was a sprinkling of handclaps for a permanent FEPC and against lynching. But for the most part the delegates listened unresponsively as Taft read the entire platform. He moved its adoption. The motion was seconded. There was a scattering of "ayes" and no "noes." The Republicans had a platform.

I don't know what the foreign-policy plank means, but I think its best exposition may be found in the radio address Bricker made last Saturday night. "And finally," Bricker said, "the people of this nation want a foreign policy which will afford them reasonable assurance that their sons and daughters shall not again be asked to lay down their lives on the field of battle. They want America to be helpful in the world. They want America to have a place in a cooperative organization of sovereign nations, but"—and at this point Bricker faced the other way—"but they want no dictatorial world state, no military alliances, no international police force, and no international diplomacy that would lower our standard of living or deprive us of freedom of action." This is the 1920 catch-all formula over again, and those who want a fairly enduring peace can hardly be taken in by it. The Democratic plank will probably be little better than that. But the difference between Roosevelt and the Republican nominees is the difference between a man who wants some international order but is trimming his sails to placate the isolationists, and men who are opposed to an international order but are throwing out a few coy come-ons to those who want peace and security.

"I smell New Dealers," pudgy, raucous, but shrewd Gerald L. K. Smith cried in a speech to his followers last Sunday after they forced their way into the Stevens ballroom. The smell is strong in the domestic planks of the Republican platform. Like every Republican platform since 1936, it accepts the basic principles and legislation of the New Deal and in effect criticizes only their administration. Dewey and the men around him, though they stand naturally with the haves against the have-nots of our society, have no government philosophy of their own. They know it would be politically unsafe to call for repeal of New Deal legislation and are left only with the issue of efficient government. This is not a very exciting issue even when dressed up in unpopular words like "bureaucracy." In normal times natural dissatisfaction with the "ins" would make this a good-enough lever for Tweedledum to oust Tweedledee with. But this is not that kind of a year.

I think the general feeling here among the newspapermen and, in private, the politicians is that the Republican Party will not make its come-back until 1948, and Mark Sullivan has hinted as much. The time spent by the Republicans in answering the old saw about changing horses in midstream indicates that it has them worried. If the war is going well, Roosevelt's chances will be helped. If it should take a turn for the worse, the atmosphere will not be conducive to an all-out partisan campaign against him. On domestic issues the Republicans are New Dealers in spite of themselves, and have no clear line on which to fight. The biggest issue of the campaign will be that of American cooperation with a new world order, and that is an issue on which enough Republicans feel deeply to win several million crucial votes for Roosevelt. The Democrats will make a mistake if they place too much stress on Dewey's youth; they have too many old fogies hanging around Washington. But the question of Dewey's experience and maturity in dealing with leaders of other countries and in coping with the problems of the peace is a real one and will also keep many votes in the Roosevelt column.

The Chicago convention was the convention of a do-nothing party run by say-nothing politicians hankering for the past but afraid to speak up for it—even Bricker attacked "reactionaries who would return to 'the good old days.'" With Willkie as its candidate, this party might have won enough progressives away from Roosevelt to win. With Dewey and Bricker, the party will only alienate enough conservative internationalist Republicans to lose. Mr. Roosevelt will win in November, and some chance of a decent world order will win with him.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

ON THE WHOLE, WE THINK the political prospect at the South very encouraging. The acceptance of Negro suffrage as the basis of the new political regime by the white Virginians and Georgians, who are in a majority, has set an example which Mississippi will probably follow; and we shall, within a year or two, see the colored men admitted to the political arena all over the South, and fairly engaged in the game of politics with their white neighbors. —July 15, 1869.

THE INCREASED FREQUENCY OF DUELS lately observed goes far to show that the natural character of the Italians is, like everything else in the Peninsula, undergoing certain changes, and it would be false philosophy to deny that, in history, change means progress, and that dueling is a vast improvement on the time-honored use of the dagger and the poisoned ring.—July 15, 1869.

THERE IS A VERY PLEASANT RUMOR afloat about "representation" to be addressed to the Spanish government by our own on behalf of the Cubans, looking to an amicable settlement of the present troubles and the concession to the Cubans, if not of national independence, of autonomy. . . . Nobody is so well fitted to play the part of mediator as the United States, and the exceeding courage, loyalty, and integrity with which she has enforced the neutrality laws will give additional weight to all she may say.—July 22, 1869.

FRANCE IS RESOLVED to participate in the work of the government; resolved, above all, not to let her money be scattered about, as it has been, wilfully, sinfully, and secretly. The Emperor, like all men who have wielded sovereign power in modern times, is ready to submit to the decrees of popular opinion in the last resort; but, like all his brother sovereigns, he suffers himself to be deceived as to the genuineness and intensity of the popular will.—July 29, 1869.

Sex and the Censor

BY PHILIP WYLIE

CENSORSHIP is epidemic at the moment. The long and absurd trial of Esquire magazine by the postal authorities was an early sign of this particular pox of priggishness. It has spread and taken several forms.

In the fall of 1943 the Concord Book Store in New York issued a mail-order catalogue of standard books. The New York Post Office sent word to the shop that the 35,000 catalogues were unmailable because they advertised titles that fell under the classification of obscene literature. The questioned titles were stated to be Voltaire's "Candide," Balzac's "Droll Stories," and Hall's "Well of Loneliness." The Postmaster asserted that the titles were on a forbidden list in the General Post Office in Washington. He refused to produce the full list. The Concord Book Shop, feeling that it could not fight the case, overprinted the offending titles and sent out the catalogues, purged of their obscenity!

The time-dishonored Boston farce was played again over "Strange Fruit," a fine novel which contains a dirty word. Bernard DeVoto bought a copy nearby the city that is full of beans and short of liberal stamina. He was brought to trial, and the sale of the book was enjoined. Word came from the Post Office that the trial was being watched as an example—and the publishers of "Strange Fruit" had a brush with these people, who apparently were considering a graft of Boston bigotry upon the whole nation.

On the complaint of John S. Sumner, secretary of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, Magistrate Charles G. Keutgen of New York City has held the Dial Press for the Court of Special Sessions in the matter of "The First Lady Chatterley," by D. H. Lawrence. Magistrate Keutgen calls the book "clearly obscene" and defines an obscene book as one "which contravenes the moral law and tends to subvert respect for decency and morality."

Now there is no such thing as sex "moral law" in any legal sense. Free men differ greatly in their opinion of sex morals. Decency also is a matter of diverse definitions. If I understand Magistrate Keutgen correctly, any book could be called "obscene" and be suppressed which merely undertook to debate the moral pretensions of, say, middle-class American society. In the Chatterley book Lawrence tends to take the view that it is dangerous to the physical and mental health of his heroine to remain continent. This view Magistrate Keutgen evidently regards as obscene in itself—from which, I assume, he would also suppress all psychological, medical, and scientific works that present any evidence to support that opinion. It is a most extraordinary attitude, for this century.

I myself have recently witnessed a still more startling application of the prude's scissors and the prig's blue pencil—work done upon a splendid manuscript by the censors in the public-relations office of one of the services. The manuscript told a story of fighting men in naturalistic terms but with a reverential spirit. When the censors were done with it, there was no spirit left, and the fighting men talked in language suitable for the foyer of a Y. W. C. A. Fortunately, a higher and more discerning officer undid the desecration and restored the manuscript to its original condition. But it is no secret that, in this war, it is "policy" to hide so far as possible from the folks the fact that soldiers and sailors possess libido.

Incidentally, an interesting example of an official guardian's attempt to protect the morals of the troops was the banning of the book of soldier songs "Give Out," published by the Arrowhead Press. This book enjoyed great popularity in the camps, some 25,000 copies having been sold through post exchanges before the New York Postmaster sniffed it out. Then the mails were denied it. The publishers, acting with the American Civil Liberties Union, sued, and the case went to trial in federal court in the District of Columbia. The judge ruled that the New York Postmaster was quite within his rights in banning the book and that the evidence showed that his decision was not an arbitrary one.

The most recent case of an attempt to block books containing dangerous ideas or forbidden words has no relation to sex manners. It does, however, have the sound and smell of authoritarianism. A few weeks ago the Council for Books in Wartime, which has been publishing a special Armed Services Edition of books of a wide variety for American soldiers overseas, was notified by the Adjutant General of the army that several titles could not be included. Among them were "Yankee from Olympus," a biography of the late Justice Holmes, by Catherine Drinker Bowen, "One Man's Meat," a book of essays by E. B. White, and "The Republic," by Charles A. Beard. The Adjutant General decided that they came under Title V of the Soldiers' Vote Act, which prohibits distribution to the armed services of "books containing political argument or political propaganda of any kind calculated to affect the result of a federal election." Back to "Terry and the Pirates," boys; you can die for your country, but we can't risk exposing you to the idea books of this democracy of ours.

To these cases could be added the endless list of books Catholics are prohibited from reading and the books ministers indict, the books libraries refuse to house and the books the bookshops refuse to stock. Banning a book is the same as burning it, in the eyes of God—and we all know what became of the people who burned their books.

If this pernicious and regressive situation were to spread and increase, we ought in due time to regard it either as a most sinister social manifestation or as evidence that there is something rotten—and thoroughly organized—in the state of Denmark. Even so, I myself would confidently expect the American majority, as soon as it had the time and the opportunity to perceive the spectacle, to smite it and the sanctimonious prurience it connotes. For the censoring of "obscenity" is the work of the impure, to whom all things are impure; illegal dirtiness cannot be detected save by a mind in which subjective dirtiness has already been installed, organized, regimented, codified—and doted on, too, as the science of psychology has shown.

But I suspect that the present outbreak of senseless censorship is a hysterical expression, in part retrospective in nature, and in part anticipatory. The part that is memory refers back to the last war, at the end of which occurred a revolution in manners that resulted in a new candor, an educational step forward, and a fresh accessibility of good literature, both current and classical. Undoubtedly many persons in our society who regarded that step not as an achievement but as a mortal sin now automatically fear that it may be repeated at the conclusion of this war. Nothing could be more natural than that such persons would endeavor to block any putative river of change by raising dams in it ahead of the peace. And those who cannot even raise dams can throw stones.

I further suspect that enough unwished truth about the state of the world at this instant, of the people in it, of their sex morals and their sex manners has leaked out to the ears of prudes to put them on their guard—enough to throw them, indeed, into utter tizzie. Not only have about a quarter of the women in the world been steadily exposed to rape for the last half-decade, but vast sections of the so-called civilized globe have been given to a multitude of experiments in patriotic illegitimacy, forced breeding, and what not. Once peace is regained and communications restored, these conditions will have their effect on the behavior of us all—or, at least, on our thoughts.

Again, any person who has held much intimate converse with factory workers on the war production fronts will know that the invasion of the machine-shops by women has not made polite eunuchs of all male workers. Little has been published about this matter yet, and it is still largely confined to action, but I think it is not going too far to say that the very plain changes in the sex mores of the American people have reached all levels of our society and that such shifts in behavior cannot be arrested or even affected by the withholding of particular printed matter.

Moreover, some ten or eleven millions of young men, which is nearly all our young men, will come home one day with a marked enlargement of biological vocabulary and knowledge, as well as a statistical increment of experience.

These are facts. To all persons who regard a relaxation of sex taboo as essentially intolerable, such conditions must be most terrifying. Because these people react through fear, they do not examine any data, and they do not counter-propose any kind of teaching or education or even exhortation. They simply yell for the cops to put a stop to what evidence they do see—Esquire, "Strange Fruit," et al.

Since the Catholic church has been the most dogmatic group in these affairs, and the most high-handed in insisting upon a national application of its dogma, censorship has most often arisen in predominantly Catholic communities and has been invoked most often by Catholics. The Protestant church has followed as a sometimes more liberal second. But inasmuch as the majority of the American people do not belong to any church, the rules governing American sex morality are not by real right the business of any church whatever. Churches are free, under our system, to ask but not to demand or impose—which they have constantly done. Freedom of religion is not a blanket license of peculiar dogma, although it is quite possible for hysterical zealots to overcome and betray the common sense of the whole people in such a disheveling time as war. Passage of the prohibition amendment furnished an example of that kind of catastrophe.

However, I do not believe the censors will manage to prohibit sex. I do think it is unfortunate that current censorship should be so often indicated by the swinging censer of religion. The Catholic neutrals and the Protestant pacifists bear a grave if negative load of responsibility for this war; by insisting now upon the performance of their obnoxious Nice-Nellie-isms they only make themselves the more conspicuously tragic. They should, rather, face the realities with which we, all of us, are trying to deal nowadays. They should abandon the old disastrous policy of ignorance compelled. Where they are afraid they should honestly seek the reasons of their fear. Where they are uninformed they should be taught. Where they are full of arrogance and moral tyranny, they should be stopped, both in the name of democracy and in the name of truth.

The Record of the REA

BY JUDSON KING

AT THE ninth annual birthday dinner of the Rural Electrification Administration at St. Louis on May 11, Administrator Harry Slattery announced that more than 1,000,000 farmers and business and industrial consumers in rural areas who were unable to get electric service before the advent of the REA are now being supplied; also that plans are being perfected for a tremendous post-war expansion.

It is high time. Perhaps in another nine years, if the REA is permitted to function as originally intended, the United States will catch up with other advanced nations in this respect. That objective, however, will not be reached unless this splendid agency is kept free from politics and graft and is protected by federal and state law from strangulation by the private power companies.

A generation ago the idea of "area service"—that is, of making electricity as available in rural regions as in cities and towns—was scoffed at as a dream of impractical idealists. Today the REA, by making the dream come true, has captured the imagination of the American people and become universally popular. What is not understood in urban circles, however, and what needs sharp emphasis, is the fact that cheap electric motor power in barn and field, as well as lights, running water, and refrigerators in the farm home, is necessary for the rehabilitation of agriculture in this country. By "cheap" is meant an average cost of around 1 cent per kilowatt hour instead of the 3 to 10 cents now charged. Such a price would bring current within the reach of the pocket-books of the middle- and lower-income farmers, including share-croppers, who constitute over 80 per cent of our rural population. And it is not a pipe dream. Already some of the older cooperatives in the TVA region, as well as around Tacoma and in the Bonneville area in Washington and Oregon, are selling current at 1.5 cents or less. How can they do it? Their lines are being amortized, and they benefit from the very cheap wholesale rates of public-power dams.

Five years after the close of World War I only 177,000 American farms—2.6 per cent—were electrified. Thousands of progressive farmers were growing restless, and private industry moved to meet the demand. In 1923 the National Electric Light Association, representing 90 per cent of the nation's electric utilities, formed a "Committee on the Relation of Electricity to Agriculture," and started an impressive campaign to "electrify rural America." It invited and obtained the active cooperation of the national farm organizations, the agricultural colleges, the appliance manufacturers, the American Society of Agricultural Engineers, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, and the United States Department of Agriculture, of Commerce, and of the Interior.

During the next eleven years some $2,400,000 was spent on research, experimentation, and an intensive advertising campaign to "sell" electricity to our farmers. By 1935 the industry's own statistics showed that 743,954 farms were being served. That meant only 11 per cent; some 6,000,000 farms were as yet without current—this at a time when from 50 to 80 per cent of the farms in the advanced countries of Europe, in New Zealand, and even in Japan were electrified. In the winter of 1934 the national farm organizations, discouraged and disgusted, withdrew from the Committee on the Relation of Electricity to Agriculture. The grand effort of free enterprise to solve this great socio-economic problem had failed.

It had failed because of the rates charged, which were so high that only the rich farmers could afford to pay them. At the start of the campaign the utilities asserted that rates were not an essential factor, and the cooperating agencies were silent on this point. Rate schedules were kept high in order to yield customary profits on alleged "fair values." When the campaign died down, the utilities, under stinging criticism from farm leaders, replied bluntly that the companies were "not eleemosynary institutions . . .; therefore, conspicuous advances in farm electrification must wait"—until farmers could afford it.

In the winter of 1934 the National Grange and the American Farm Bureau Federation applied to the national government for help. The Natural Resources Board and the Civil Works Administration investigated and strongly recommended federal aid. Progressives without regard to party affiliations supported the movement. Senator Shipstead, for example, promoted an electric cooperative in his own county in Minnesota in 1934, and declared that without federal-government leadership the task of farm electrification could not be accomplished within any reasonable time. In April the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act earmarked $100,000,000 for rural electrification, and on May 11, 1935, President Roosevelt by executive order created the REA. In 1936 its life was extended for ten years by the Norris-Rayburn Act.

The principal function of the REA was to make twenty-five-year loans to rural cooperative groups or public-power districts at low interest rates to enable them to serve themselves electrically. The present Congress has extended the term of the loans to thirty-five years. To date $382,600,000 has been lent out, at an average interest rate of 2.5 per cent. "Area service" is a different thing from the company practice of running a few lines into thickly settled neighborhoods, and to protect the government loans the REA set up legal, finance, engineering, research, utilization, and other divisions at headquarters. The job of the technical staffs of the REA was to make cheap current possible, and they did it.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRAR

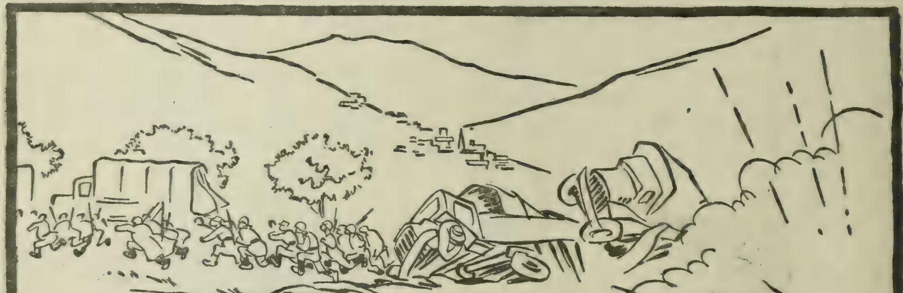
A "co-op" comes into being about as follows. Farmers and others in an unserved area organize a non-profit cooperative under state law, with the aid usually of an REA field man. They hire an engineer, draw up plans, and apply for a loan. If investigation shows the project will pay and the engineering plans are sound, a loan is made by the REA. The co-op proceeds with construction, and presently the area has light and power, distributed by itself. Power is purchased wholesale from private utilities. If the price is too high, the co-op builds its own generating plant. Some co-ops cover a relatively small area with a few hundred members; others serve four or five counties with from 5,000 to 8,000 members.

Rural America eagerly embraced the opportunity offered by the REA. Though construction was abruptly halted by the war, there are now 812 cooperatives in 45 states serving 1,115,056 rural consumers. The essential test for the conservative mind is, are these co-ops paying? The answer is that on April 1 the total amount due on all REA loans, principal and interest, was $50,252,000 and that the government had been repaid $16,131,794 in excess of that amount in advance payments. Only 9 of the 812 co-ops, whose average age is four and a half years, were in real financial trouble. Social benefits are well and good, but it is this evidence of financial success that has brought the REA almost universal approval.

The continued hostility of the private utilities, which is intensifying as peace approaches, has puzzled many people. Why, they ask, should the utilities fight against the accomplishment of a needed task which they declined to undertake; especially when the REA Act of 1936 prohibits loans to farm co-ops in territory already served by private companies? The reasons are simple. The power trust knows that co-op rates are lower than company city rates and that this is bound to have a



To Marshal Kesselring
"Sir, Marshal von Rundstedt wants two of your crack divisions for Normandy"
"Tell him we're all coming"
LOW

"WAR OF MOVEMENT" IN ITALY

powerful effect upon public opinion. Like all big business men, utility leaders fear the spread of the cooperative idea. When the REA challenged the supremacy of the private utilities, their executives suddenly began doing what they had declared was impossible. Since 1935 they have electrified as many farms as the cooperatives.

The total effect, then, of the establishment of the REA is that today some 42 per cent of American farms are electrified as against 11 per cent in 1935. However, the job is not yet one-half done, and the rest cannot wait indefinitely. Medium and small farmers are threatened by large-scale mechanized farming today just as small business is threatened by big business, and competitive enterprise by monopoly. To meet this threat they must have adequate modern machinery and electric power.

If we take a broad view of it, the farm problem is the same that faces our people in every field of endeavor. The crux of it is whether dollars shall be placed above human welfare. All intelligent men and women are aware of the approaching crisis. Hence the encouraging multiplicity of post-war planning. The REA has something constructive to offer. When nineteenth-century banker-utility practices failed them, American farmers, with the aid of their government, started doing the rural-electrification job themselves. Encouraged by success, they propose to finish the task.

In response to the inquiry of a Senate committee on post-war planning, REA officials, after a careful survey, have stated that to meet rural demands a loan program of $500,000,000 will be required in the first three years of peace. The long-range job is much larger. There are more than 6,500,000 rural dwellings, farm and non-farm, without electric service in the United States. There are more than 5,000,000 farms and small business and industrial units which can be served without subsidies. Nearly 2,000,000 miles of line will be required, costing over $1,500,000,000. Wiring and plumbing will cost $1,300,000,000. Last but not least, the task will require more than 700,000,000 man-hours of labor for line construction and farmstead wiring and plumbing—a direct contribution to the menacing unemployment problem. In addition, this extension of plant will create a demand for more than $2,500,000,000 worth of farm and home appliances and equipment.

That is a healthy program, and, mind you, it is "feasible"—financially sound, self-sustaining, and self-liquidating. It is not a drain on the taxpayers, nor does it mean more bureaucracy, centralization, or dictation from Washington or St. Louis. The REA administrator said recently at a state Rural Electrification Association meeting: "The doorway of post-war opportunity through rural electrification stands open. But it is a doorway which each unelectrified community must enter for itself by accepting the initiative and responsibility for its own planning."

Unfortunately, the REA has troubles that arise from within as well as from without. Created as an independent agency, it was put in 1939 under the Department of Agriculture, with unsatisfactory results. Some months ago a Senate committee began an investigation to discover just how the agency has fared under Agriculture, and whether it should not be restored to its original independent status. The committee also wants to know what is behind the attempt to force the resignation of Administrator Slattery; are some persons trying to put the REA and the cooperatives into politics? The inquiry is not yet completed, but on June 23 the committee issued an interim report recommending that the REA be made an independent agency again.

[This is the first of two articles on the REA.]

In the Wind

AFTER MEDITATING UPON the nomination of Governor Dewey by the Republicans, the Louisville Courier-Journal reports, a Tennessee farmer made this observation: "It's never a good idea to change horses in the middle of the stream. But if I ever come to that pass where I've got to consider doing it, I will sure draw the line at changing to a Shetland pony."

ADDRESSING THE ANNUAL DINNER of the University of Chicago alumni, Donald R. Richberg, former NRA administrator, warned that a battle of the home front will come as soon as the war of liberation is over. This is all because the reaction to Nazi claims of superiority has produced "an equally insane line of thinking" in this country to the effect that persons "in obviously inferior positions must be given superior rights so that they can maintain their claimed equality with their actual superiors."

DEPARTMENT OF CENSORSHIP: According to Editor and Publisher, a human-interest story about a tank driver in Castelforte, written for the Chicago Tribune, was held up by the censor. When it finally went through, the fact was deleted that the G. I.'s wife back home was an expectant mother. Tracked down by an irate correspondent, the censor explained that he cut it out because the Germans would be able to deduce that the soldier had been home within nine months, and would know that "newly arrived troops were facing them in Rome." The over-zealous censor was shipped back from Italy to Algiers.

FESTUNG EUROPA: In the City Hall square of Copenhagen the Danish tourist association has a little wooden hut in which it sells lottery tickets. A citizen went over to one of the many German tanks kept in the square, knocked on the "window," and asked the astounded soldier, "Do you sell lottery tickets here?"

[The prize for the best item received in June goes to Pfc. H. H. for the example of big-business logic which he extracted from a speech by Eugene Holman, vice-president of the Standard Oil Company. It appeared in the issue of June 17.]

Allied Propaganda to Occupied Europe

[As Allied armies advance against the aggressor in Europe from east and west, the trend of thought in the occupied countries becomes of increasing interest. Exact knowledge of the sentiments and aspirations of the Europe which is resisting Hitler is a prerequisite of effective political warfare. If anyone has believed that this section has exaggerated the strength of the underground, he has only to read the recent statements of General Eisenhower to be set right. Since the reactions of people in the occupied countries to Allied propaganda and political warfare are so important, we are happy to reprint here the report of a "correspondent lately in Norway," published in the London Economist on May 20.]

IN THE free world Allied propaganda to occupied countries is discussed only sporadically. In occupied territory it has, at any rate until recently, been a subject of daily discussion. To the free world the subject is theoretical; critics and defenders alike lack first-hand knowledge of the conditions under which it is received and of its effect on its public. People under occupation know this, but for their part are in ignorance of the general background of events from which propaganda agencies select and adapt their material; nor do they know the policy guiding propaganda. In either case discussion of the subject is handicapped. Given good-will, some of the difficulties might be overcome, but it is necessary for people in the free world to try to acquaint themselves with the fundamental experiences and views of people living under occupation and to bring an open mind to the problem.

It is impossible in a short article to give people in the free world an adequate impression of the circumstances and attitude of the recipients of propaganda. It would involve trying to correct and supplement the picture the free world has constructed for itself of people under occupation, which on so many points differs from reality. Active patriots who come out from the stimulating, rich, and alert political and intellectual life in an occupied country feel astonishment, then consternation, and ultimately despair when they fully realize what assumptions neutrals and Allies have made about them.

Nazi occupation and democratic resistance form an experience with a deep and far-reaching effect on the community and on individuals. The citizen has had to face fundamental ethical and political problems, and individually to make up his mind about them; he has in consequence acquired a deeper insight and a clearer realization about what those values are for which we fight. Political consciousness is found in wider circles than ever before. And it is not merely a primitive, emotional, nationalistic attitude; there have developed a calm, reasoned, democratic conviction, an open mind, and a readiness to discuss fundamental and controversial matters without prejudice. It is true that the loss of normal, ordered society may give rise to moral problems, but it is overwhelmingly clear that the self-discipline, cooperation, and mutual helpfulness which have risen out of the background of official lawlessness give great promise for further constructive developments; official lawlessness has created a heightened regard for constitutional law. A characteristic feature is also a strong and growing internationalism. The problems of state sovereignty and of the sovereignty of the people are regarded with deep interest, and a constructive attitude is prevalent.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

The first of the four freedoms, that of speech and opinion, is at the center of interest. Circumstances have given an added perspective to the discussion, and the concept has received a twentieth-century interpretation. The primitive right to speak one's mind is not felt to be the central issue—experience has proved that it is difficult to prevent people from expressing an opinion—but the essence of the problem is felt to be the right of access to information. Even under oppression man finds ways of saying what he thinks and of influencing the views of others, even if it cannot be done publicly. But the use of power to withhold, or pervert, essential information is looked upon as the sin against the Holy Ghost.

Much disappointment might have been avoided if the policy behind the Allied propaganda services had been made available in a clear form. Recently Time described the function of the Office of War Information as being to supply "the truth, but not the whole truth." This tallies perfectly with the conclusions reached after four years' observation of Allied propaganda. Its underlying assumption is, presumably, that the whole truth would have a weakening effect. It is, of course, realized that some information has to be withheld for military and security reasons. But the restrictions operate more widely than that, with the result that people have to brave the Gestapo and listen in all day and night in the hope of collecting valuable items from all the different broadcast services. The answer to the assumption about the dangerous effect of truth on morale was given by an old politician, who said in a discussion of whether it would be wise to circulate secretly a straightforward statement about a patriotic reverse, "Truth has never weakened the front." His view was not followed, for fear of such a weakening, and the result was uncontrolled rumors which had a depressing effect.

NAZI AND ALLIED NEWS

In practice, war-time information, both of the Nazis and in democracies, has two aspects—the provision of news, and political influence combined with the stiffening of morale. News is given the greatest space, and it also serves the other objective. The Allied news services aim at providing a corrective for the Nazi news services by publishing true items. This corrective function had a complete success over two years ago in the field covered, which is mainly that of military news. Until nearly the end of 1941 the German news services provided communiqués and other information with fictitious items. But the German propaganda authorities came to understand that too wide a discrepancy between their news and Allied news was a bad thing for them, and were sufficiently realistic to act accordingly. The unrestrained flights of imagination were given up, and since 1941-42 German communiqués have been materially correct. It must be considered a real victory that Allied information has forced the enemy to a complete reversal of his policy with regard to facts. But it is precisely after this achievement that the importance of the Allied news service has been constantly on the decline. Until 1941-42 it was in combat with the Nazi service in the field of war news. Now the enemy keeps quiet, although he still continues to be a menace, and the Allied news service is in a situation similar to that of "a fleet in being," which by merely existing contains enemy forces. It is strange that the BBC should rest content with being a "propaganda machinery in being," and that no forward move has been made. Or has it not noticed the victory?

The principles of selecting news material have caused comment. The ideal has been to provide encouraging military news in every program, whether the whole of the news is good or not. The complete picture presented over a longer period may in consequence be distorted. Statistics about losses in Allied air raids made up of BBC figures can give curious results. It may happen that three raids are reported in the same transmission, and that the number of planes lost is mentioned for two where the figures are low, but passed over in silence for the third, where the figure may be high. The policy with regard to military news has a hand-to-mouth character. This has shaken confidence, not in the truth of the details given, but in the whole picture they present. The effect is illustrated in a remark by a shrewd peasant woman. When asked whether she had had the day's news she said that she had not, but that that did not make much difference, "for the London news is always good." The cumulative effect of these daily doses of "good" news, which do not add up to great achievements, is that people begin to wonder whether there are forces making the Western Allies hold back.

THE EFFECTS OF ISOLATION

Other types of news have been entirely put in the shade by the military news. On the political side the Germans almost have the field to themselves. Democratic institutions and functions hardly play any part in the propaganda of the democratic states. It is clearly impossible for those who have not experienced a long term of total isolation to realize what isolation means, or what the cumulative effect of omissions in Allied information can be. By these omissions four years of Allied information leave listeners under occupation with the feeling that in the fight for democracy, democracy itself has gone under. In the political field the right of access to factual information is denied us by our own allies and compatriots, who keep us under a total blockade of ideas. The picture of the free world inferred from this is that politically and intellectually it has grown stale. This again undermines confidence in the prospect of constructive cooperation afterward. We are becoming afraid of our allies.

The attitude of propagandists to their allies or compatriots under occupation causes concern. We are almost invariably talked down to. A recent report from a regular listener begins: "The circumstance which has caused the gravest difficulties in radio work is the feeling that they did not take their task seriously enough." Keen observers record that there is a remarkable difference in tone and frankness between the formulation of news in the BBC home service and in the European service. The motive for this must be that the European public is rated lower than the public at home. In occupied territory one has a feeling of being treated like a child—patronized, encouraged, and praised, but kept outside when serious matters are discussed. From one point of view the effect may be disastrous. In the propaganda directed to themselves occupied people are flattered more than they like, and nothing is revealed to them of the views held about them in the free world, as shown in a number of articles in periodicals and dailies. When the frontiers are opened, and the occupied peoples realize how their free allies regard them, their reaction may be violent.

It is true that Allied propaganda works under great difficulties. Propaganda to neutrals, to free allies, and to allies under occupation presents three entirely different problems. Contact with the public under occupation is meager. The Allied propaganda agencies do not have the advantage of daily free criticism and interchange of views, and thus come to work in a somewhat rarefied atmosphere. And in the loud exchange of opinion in the free world it is difficult for the still, small voice from inside occupied territory to make itself heard, even when suggestions and requests have been got through the barrier. The result is that whereas as late as 1943 people were still eager to make and pass out suggestions and proposals for the radio, in 1944 there is a marked falling off. It seems as if information workers inside the barrier, who are as active as ever, have resigned themselves to obtaining their material in other ways. The BBC seems to have been written off as a constructive collaborator in the political war. Its importance for military news is recognized. But it is difficult to understand why Allied propaganda has no higher ambition than to remain "a propaganda arm in being."

BURLINGAME

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IMMEDIATELY after the opening of the "third front" a significant phenomenon was observed in Switzerland. The published account of it ran as follows:

> Reports from Zurich indicate that the Swiss banks are greatly disturbed over the enormous increase in the deposits of German-owned money in Switzerland. It is no longer a question of money brought to Switzerland by individual members of the Nazi Party for their own future use—a proceeding which has been going on for a long time. The sums flowing in of late are so large that they are believed to be funds which German Nazis expect to use to finance an illegal Nazi Party after the defeat.

This news, to be more specific, was printed in the Stockholm Aftontidningen on June 19. The paper added:

> It is an open secret in Germany that certain party members—in particular, members of the Gestapo and the Hitler Youth—are being trained in special schools for possible later underground activities. It can be assumed that the formidable sums now accumulating in or passing through Swiss banks are intended for the financing of such activities.

Attention is thus directed to another problem which will come up between the Allies and the neutral states after the war. Previously people have only asked what would happen to party members who succeeded in escaping to a neutral country; now we are reminded that the same question will be presented by the transference of party funds. The larger the amounts the plainer it will be that the "extradition," or at least the "internment" of these funds is scarcely less important than the extradition or internment of the Nazis themselves. Action against either will be difficult under existing international law—and little preparation for it seems to have been made.

Another financial consequence of the invasion was reported by a Swiss paper, the Arbeiter-Zeitung of Basel, on June 8: namely, that a few hours after the first landings the value of the German mark at the Swiss border dropped one-half.

> German railway men at the frontier stations complained to their Swiss colleagues about the drop. On Monday, June 5, they could buy a package of Swiss tobacco at the frontier buffet for four marks. On Tuesday, June 6—after the landings—they had to pay eight marks. "This is how the mark has slumped in one day," one of them said. "It started the same way last time."

It should be noted that it is a question here only of the unofficial rate of exchange of the "concrete" mark. The official rate of the "abstract" mark on the exchanges is regulated by the Reichsbank and has not changed for many years.

In November, 1942, after the Allied landings in North Africa, this column made a discovery which was soon talked about everywhere. It discovered Goebbels's invention of the slogan Festung Europa. The Allies, said the Propaganda Minister, could perhaps drive the Germans out of Africa, which was only the "glacis" of the fortress, but they would not succeed in breaching the Festung Europa itself.

The phrase entered into the world's vocabulary and retained a certain validity even after the landing in Italy. German propaganda treated Italy also as a mere glacis, and Fortress Europe, strengthened by the Atlantic Wall, remained a symbol of the Reich's invincibility.

Since this column was the first to note the birth of the slogan, it is only fitting that it should be today the first to record its death. Festung Europa, which for a year and a half has been the chief item in the German war catechism, has now, after a transition period of stammering vacillation, definitely disappeared. But of course the genius of Dr. Goebbels has not abandoned it without providing a successor. In its place he has produced—what a surprise!—Festung Deutschland. First mention of the Fortress of Germany was found in the Völkische Beobachter of June 18. The statement was made there that it was of course not hard for the enemy, under the protection of the guns of two fleets, to land on the "periphery" of the Continent, but that this did not really matter. Everything depended on whether the Allies could breach the Fortress of Germany—"and too much was accomplished by Germany in the earlier years of the war for it to be undone by Eisenhower; he will have no success in his announced intention of breaching Festung Deutschland by a coordinated attack from the west and the east."

In a word, the old theme has been transposed from the higher key of Europe to the lower key of Germany. One may hope that after Festung Deutschland a Festung Preussen will spring in due time from the fertile brain of Dr. Goebbels, and after that a Festung Berlin, and then a Festung Wilhelmstrasse.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The One and the Many

JOSEPH THE PROVIDER. By Thomas Mann. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

NOW that Thomas Mann has brought his Joseph cycle to an end, there can remain no doubt, it seems to me, that it is one of the great imaginative efforts of our time. I know there is a growing tendency in this country to disparage the work of Mann, partly as a reaction against his heavy Olympianism, and partly, I suspect, because of the national prejudice in favor of the homespun and the hard-headed. It must be admitted that there is some ground for such reaction, especially in Mann's political pronouncements, which are full of an overheated spirituality that is not only thoroughly platitudinous but also quite indistinguishable from the Sunday rhetoric of philistinism. Even in his fiction there are occasional lapses into a sheer posture of profundity; this concluding volume of the tetralogy is marred by many dreary passages of spiritual rumination. Mann, in an apparent effort to wind up the series, has overrun his subject. Still, despite these failings, he clearly towers over his contemporaries, and it would be nothing but a piece of provincial spite to deny Mann's central place in modern writing.

Mann is the only literary survivor of what might be called the period of the world theme, when art and literature tried to grasp the whole of experience, when the self-consciousness of the artist was expanded into a larger human consciousness, through some symbolic, or mythical, or technical means, or all three. I have in mind, of course, the period dominated by Joyce, Proust, Yeats, Picasso. And Mann, whose earlier writing definitely carried the pathos of this tradition, has now turned, in his latest work, to an even more generalized and timeless scheme, transforming the Biblical story of Joseph into an elaborate parable of the spiritual wanderer, exile, leader: of the artist and society, the chosen and those who are left behind, the one and the many.

The conception has a forbidding grandiloquence. Yet in the main the narrative is at once lively and tense, as Mann weaves the facts of the legend and their meaning back and forth in a highly sententious style that seems to take in the particular quite as easily as the general. Mann is, above all, a master—surely the greatest living one—of the grand manner. And if he has been able at the same time to preserve the charm and the forthrightness of the original tale, it is largely because of his flair for the ironic and his unusual skill at merging the possible with the actual in the life of his characters.

So far as the basic story is concerned, "Joseph the Provider" covers the second phase of Joseph's career in Egypt, from his imprisonment by Potiphar through his triumphal rise to fame and fortune and his reunion with his family and his people. Following pretty closely the familiar outlines of the Biblical text, the novel opens with Joseph on his way to an Egyptian labor camp, where the favored son of God soon establishes his superior tact and ability and becomes the assistant and companion of the warden, a stolid but not insensitive hireling who later exchanges roles with Joseph as he accompanies him in his climb to power. The turning point comes, of course, when Joseph prophetically interprets the dreams of Pharaoh's two functionaries who have been jailed and are placed in Joseph's care, and he is eventually summoned to analyze Pharaoh's famous dream about the seven rich and seven lean years. Shrewdly exploiting his gifts and his bargaining power, Joseph not only becomes, as we know, a kind of overseer of agriculture for all Egypt, but he also captivates the starry-eyed and infantile potentate. The dramatic climax, which by the way Mann seasons with a good deal of comic interplay, is reached in the revelation to Jacob and his eleven scheming though somewhat dim-visioned sons that Joseph is alive and is none other than the great provider of Egypt; and in Jacob's apocalyptic and semi-delirious blessing, on his deathbed, of each son, delivered with all the thunderous authority of the old patriarch.

On a relatively simple symbolic level, and one that is mostly within the spirit of the story as told in Genesis, Joseph typifies the destiny-laden man, the man of the ancient world who felt himself guided by the hand of God in the sense that he was able to make his way by means of his cunning, his wisdom, and his practical knowledge of good and evil. But on this primary and primitive myth, so to speak, Mann has superimposed a modern myth, that of the artist who is at once chosen and rejected by society, who stands apart from yet is implicated in its movement; and he has filled the original myth with a wide symbolism of association, analogy, and contrast. Thus Joseph is given the pathos of the modern intellectual in his role of the alien and the sage, thriving on his wit, his feeling for reality, and his imaginative powers. He is, to complete the picture, the spoiled darling of his father and his time, the engaging narcissist, the demonic youth who ripens without getting old. At the same time—and this is really a beautiful piece of historical transposition—Joseph occupies a position of superiority and alienation not as an artist but solely by virtue of the fact that he is the leader and provider of his people, the practical man with a prophetic sense. The artist in the ancient world "belonged," as Mann puts it, "to the tribe of whistlers and fiddlers."

I have scarcely been able to suggest the many intriguing turns and sideshows of the novel. And while I think it is something of a letdown as compared with the two preceding volumes, still the entire cycle is a masterly re-creation of the human and the historical, a "play and a pattern," as Joseph himself describes his life story.

There is, one should add, just one disturbing aspect of the tetralogy: namely, that its religious overtones and its somewhat static idea of humanity may well fortify the present trend toward God-seeking and historical smugness in general. The fact is, however, that Mann's religiosity, which is largely aesthetic, represents only one side of his work, hardly warranting an appropriation of it as a whole by our latter-day apostles. The ambiguities and interplay of meanings of the Joseph books reach far beyond any immediate social implications. WILLIAM PHILLIPS

Presidents Should Be Strong

THE USE OF PRESIDENTIAL POWER, 1789-1943. By George Fort Milton. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

"THE worst periods of our history have been when Presidents were weak and Congresses strong."

This conclusion, stated in the final chapter of Mr. Milton's case history of American Presidents, deserves to be underlined. It becomes evident in his book long before he puts it into words. It is not something he sets out to prove, in this simply written, scholarly examination of American executives, but is an inescapable deduction from a study of times, men, and events. The moral is not that Congresses should be weak, but that strong Presidents should be followed by strong Presidents.

The classic instance of evil combination, of course, is that worst of all periods, covering Civil War reconstruction, when a powerful Congress overran a succession of weak Presidents and immeasurably deepened the tragedy of that conflict. Again, the American people are paying today in death, danger, privation, and titanic money costs for the work of a strong Congress which vented its hatred on a strong President made weak by overwork and illness—Woodrow Wilson. Looking at Presidents alone, regardless of Congress, the weakness of Buchanan was the greatest tragedy in American history.

Mr. Milton measures the Presidents by their use of power in six capacities—as Chief of State, Chief of Foreign Relations, Commander-in-Chief of Army and Navy, Chief of Government, Chief of Party, and Leader of Public Opinion—and traces the growth of these functions. He puts the label of greatness on eight men who have held office: Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Cleveland, Theodore Roosevelt, Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt. (In my opinion, the more common appraisal of Cleveland as strong but not great still holds good.) All these men, regardless of the theories they held, expanded the total power of the federal government as well as of its executive branch; few more notably than Jefferson, the states' righter. The author rates Washington as the outstanding chief of state and administrator; Jefferson, Jackson, and Wilson as the most effective party leaders; Lincoln and Franklin Roosevelt as the Nos. 1 and 2 leaders of foreign policy and public opinion, but deficient as party leaders despite their political shrewdness.

Lincoln is presented as the greatest expander and user of war powers innate in the Presidency, Franklin Roosevelt as the greatest of all war Presidents by reason of his genius in the political aspects of military strategy—the over-all decisions—and his skill in leading public opinion. Yet "Franklin Roosevelt, as has been seen, makes sparing use of his almost illimitable powers of Commander-in-Chief, certainly less than Wilson, and amazingly less than Lincoln." The detailed comparative studies of Lincoln and Roosevelt reduce the cry of "Dictator Roosevelt" to childish absurdity.

This book is geared to today and tomorrow. A full third of it is a study of the Presidency during the two world wars. Structurally, it uses the Presidents before Wilson as a background for the extensive comparison of Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt, especially in their relations with Congress, the public, and the world at large. Both are treated objectively, sometimes almost harshly. Their unlikeness reduces but does not remove the danger of both being followed by a weak President, for the forces opposing them are the same. I wish that Mr. Milton had developed the implications of his statement that "never for long can the country do without a strong Chief Executive." Applying the logic of his analysis of the past to the problems of the immediate future, he might have said that "never for two months" can the country do without one. IRVING BRANT

Winged Words

MORE BY CORWIN. Sixteen Radio Dramas by Norman Corwin. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

RADIO plays are written to be heard, not to be read; yet if stage plays can retain their essential qualities in book form, radio can do as well and possibly better. For radio has been moving away from the dramatic and nearer to the narrative and even the critical idiom. Or, more strictly speaking, it has divided into two schools: the highly compressed drama of suspense, of which Arch Oboler is the chief exponent and George Asness a rising star; and the literature of ideas, whether expressed in dramatic, narrative, essay, or poetic form. In this second field Norman Corwin is the acknowledged leader, though Orson Welles did pioneer work there. It was Welles who originated the revolutionary idea that a narrator should be used for narration. From that point on the author had a voice of his own, and radio became a worthy vehicle for the expression of ideas.

Corwin entered radio as a producer, and thus gained a first-hand knowledge of his medium comparable to Noel Coward's knowledge of the theater. At that time radio was still imitating the stage play, awkwardly trying to find substitutes for the visual impression which it could not supply. Corwin realized that it had no need for makeshift, that the very absence of the spectacle released it from the realism which bound both stage and screen, and that the producer's art could give support to imaginative material too elusive for the visual media to handle. As there was little or no such material available, Corwin set to work to create it, exploring the potentialities of his medium in a variety of new forms.

In one sense he is still experimenting. His new collection, like his first—"Thirteen by Corwin," published in 1942—includes satire, burlesque, poetic drama, radio essays, and fantasy. To these are added the documentaries which have been Corwin's most celebrated contribution since 1941 and one work which is nearer to lyric poetry than to any other form. There is less drama than in the earlier volume and more direct statement of idea; there is less humor and more irony, but there is also a dash of unblushing slapstick. The plays are very uneven in quality; conspicuous among the successes is the radio essay, which Corwin has now developed in a finished and highly individual style. It differs from the documentary in that it shares an enthusiasm rather than voices a conviction, using factual material as a springboard for excursions into half-serious speculation. "The Anatomy of Sound," for instance, is a lively treatise on the impressions which enter the mind by way of the ear; it is amusing reading even without the sound effects which must enhance it considerably in the broadcast. "Good Heavens" deals with the planets and constellations in a similar vein; it is of an entirely different species from the educational broadcast, though it is doubtless the product of careful research as well as of brilliant writing. It is rich in the kind of spoofing in which Corwin is so peculiarly adroit, taking the listener in a split second from the cosmic to the familiar and back again.

In the radio essay the narrator naturally carries the burden of the argument, but this method is not essential for the development of an idea in radio any more than in other kinds of writing. In the historical documentary on the Bill of Rights, now a classic in its field, Corwin weaves narration and dialogue into a pattern of bold, poster-like design. The war plays are debates, dramas, and symposiums. The satire on advertising reads like a short story, though it leans very lightly on narration. Several of the plays are cast in the most conservative form, using dialogue only. They include such widely different genres as the riotous burlesque "Double Concerto" and the serious poetic drama "Samson."

So much attention has been given to Corwin's form that the content of his writing has sometimes been overlooked, though not by potential sponsors, who feel safer with lesser men. His plays are shot through with social criticism; his production notes turn from a lament on the literalness of sound men to a caustic comparison of the musical judgment of musicians and sponsors' wives. His war plays, which make up nearly half the number, exhibit a brand of anti-fascism which is decidedly "premature," chronologically and otherwise, for his emphasis is on the issues of the war rather than the events, and his protest antedated Pearl Harbor by several years. His government-sponsored series "This Is War" was heard by literally millions of listeners in that critical period (early 1942), and actually shared the credit for the suppression of Father Coughlin's Social Justice.

But the war plays are even more variable in quality than the others. In some Corwin loses his spontaneity in an exaggerated effort to persuade; in others he appears to be fumbling for adequate expression of a theme which overwhelms his creative powers for the moment. In that case the same theme will probably emerge triumphant in a later play—for example, "Untitled," broadcast in April, 1944, too late for inclusion here. In one work, however, Corwin achieves real passion. This is "The Long Name None Could Spell," which begins as a grim epitaph on the betrayal of Czechoslovakia and continues as a hymn of homage to the people of the resistance movement. It is more timely now than when it was written a year ago; no utterance made on D-Day itself spoke more eloquently for those who were awaiting liberation. In production this piece achieves an emotional power seldom if ever equaled on the air. Much of that power will emerge in the reading if you keep "the ear as will the new world be?

How much better

PRIMER OF
The Coming
World

by LEOPOLD SCHWARZSCHILD
Author of World in Trance

A BOOK to make every reader with a postwar theory sit up and think twice. Arguing that all the hellish periods of history have resulted from the failure of unrealistic hopes, Schwarzschild calls on all peacemakers and peace wishers to recognize what he believes to be the limitations of human nature and the lessons of history and lay their plans accordingly.

"Brilliantly reasoned and written. . . . It is cogent, lucid and provocative. It deserves wide reading both for what it says and for what it portends."
—FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN,
New York Times Book Review

"Spirited, succinct, sardonic, trenchant and to the point."—WALLACE R. DEUEL,
New York Herald Tribune Book Review

At all bookshops · $2.50

ALFRED · A · KNOPF · New York 22

BUY MORE THAN EVER BEFORE—
FIFTH WAR LOAN DRIVE

attentive as the eye," as Carl Van Doren has suggested. But it is regrettable that the work appears here in a shorter version than that used on Corwin's magnificent broadcast this season.

Corwin enjoys a unique position in radio. As director of his own programs—usually running for thirteen or twenty-six weekly sessions—he has been able to write as he pleases and to produce what he chooses. In radio this is a rare luxury. Sometimes he presents the work of other writers on these half-hours, thus providing one of the few opportunities for the single-shot script of quality to get a hearing. In his present series he is still finding new fields to conquer. This is a strictly limited engagement; in all probability a sponsor is negotiating for the spot if it is not already signed up. The word to the wise is simply: CBS, Tuesdays, 10 p.m. EWT. BETSY HUTCHISON

Kierkegaard

EITHER/OR: A FRAGMENT OF LIFE. By Soren Kierkegaard. Volume I: Translated by David F. Swenson and Lillian Marvin Swenson; Volume II: Translated by Walter Lowrie. Princeton University Press. $7.50.

TRAINING IN CHRISTIANITY. By Soren Kierkegaard. Translated with an Introduction and Notes by Walter Lowrie. Princeton University Press. $3.

FOR SELF-EXAMINATION and JUDGE FOR YOURSELVES! and THREE DISCOURSES, 1851. By Soren Kierkegaard. Translated by Walter Lowrie. Princeton University Press. $2.50.

WITH the publication of these four volumes Kierkegaard's major works—save for "The Works of Love," which is in process of translation—have all been made available for American readers. "Either/Or," Kierkegaard's first work, now appears in English for the first time; "Training in Christianity" and the shorter works, "For Self-Examination," etc., were issued in England some years ago and are now offered here in an offset reprint. The achievement of the translators—mainly Dr. Lowrie, the late Professor Swenson, and Mrs. Swenson—and of the publishers—chiefly the Oxford and Princeton University presses—is a remarkable one. In the space of a few years they have done for Kierkegaard what others have failed to accomplish in the course of generations for Kant, Hegel, Marx, and others.

It is unlikely that the effect of these volumes will be as spectacular as their publication has been, though doubtless a little Kierkegaard cult will spring up and perish after awhile. Kierkegaard, like Socrates, whom he venerates, imitates, and resembles most when he does not imitate him, will influence all sorts and conditions of men. Modern cynics will derive joy and aid, though no inspiration, from the first part of "Either/Or" with its aphorisms, its Diary of a Seducer, and other essays; amateurs of literary method will admire, when they are patient enough to grasp, the cunning artifices of the writer; the exponents of an ethical life-view will be confirmed and instructed by the splendid second volume; religious men will feel the powerful impact of "Training in Christianity" and of such essays as the one on Becoming Sober; traditionalist ecclesiastics will make use of incidental statements to fortify what Kierkegaard calls "Sunday twaddle about Christianity's glorious and priceless truths." But despite rather than because of all this, the man who appears in these writings, the man in the thinker rather than the thinker in the man, will make his way, as Socrates did, into the conscience and the consciousness of his readers.

It is wrong in a sense to speak of the man who "appears" in these writings, for he is often hidden. "Either/Or" purports to be a collection of papers and letters written by two men and edited by a third, with none of whom Kierkegaard identified himself. Yet it is evident that the hedonist of Part One and the moralist of Part Two set forth what has been a "lonely debate" in the author himself. In "Training in Christianity" and "For Self-Examination," which belong to the final, explicitly Christian part of Kierkegaard's work, as "Either/Or" belongs to the beginning of his career, the author speaks directly and in that sense does not seek to hide himself; yet here he is so objective in seeking to bring his reader into direct relation with Christ, the contemporary, the sign of offense, the pattern, that he seems hidden in another way: he has achieved his great desire of becoming transparent—a medium which does not call attention to itself. But hidden or not, the man is there in all he does and says as a man of passionate honesty who will not let himself or others be fobbed off with half-truths or who for the sake of consistency will ignore stubborn facts of existence. These stubborn facts of Kierkegaard are not those to which an objective view calls attention but those which man meets in his own subjective life; they are the facts of the self, with its desire and its inability to escape from the self, the fact of the quiet desperation which underlies both the frivolity and the melancholy of life, the fact of hypocrisy or of the contradiction between the verbal and the "existential" affirmations of men. In the explicitly Christian writings Kierkegaard, the great subjectivist, is again concerned with the complete objectivity to every individual of Jesus Christ, the sign of offense, the absolute contemporary, the pattern and way, and what he seeks to achieve here first of all is the admission on the part of Christianity that it is not Christian.

In his Journal Kierkegaard wrote of "Either/Or": "They cannot get rid of me just because everything began so happily, so happily with 'Either/Or.' They might like to let go of me; they might kill me; that does not help them, they have got me in their blood." That is the way he works—he does not convince but makes men convince themselves; he gets under the skin. H. RICHARD NIEBUHR

Mr. Tyler's Hallucination

THE HOLLYWOOD HALLUCINATION. By Parker Tyler. Creative Age Press. $2.50.

HENRY MILLER says of this nightmarish little volume that "it was always my intention to write a book about Hollywood. Since reading this book by Parker Tyler I know I shall never do it; the job has been done in a way beyond anything I could ever hope to accomplish." These remarks could, of course, be taken as praise from a diffident gentleman, which Mr. Miller is not. Undoubtedly, the job has been done in an extraordinary fashion.

I quote at random from the "Hallucination."

"The scandalous sway of Miss West's hips—it reminds me of nothing so much as the motion of a cradle; it is hypnotic, soothing, a finished and flawless equilibrium." Of Charlie Chaplin's mustache Mr. Tyler says: "That fat eel . . . frantically imprisoned in the fishbowl of his face." Then there is this: "After fire, after burning faggots, had served all the practical needs of his life, man cooked his mind over the symbolic fire of the night and achieved the concept."

This last statement is taken from a fearsome chapter called The Daylight Dream. It was while reading this section that I found myself screaming, "I want out!" I had come across the following: "The ritual of the daydream at night, of which artificial illumination is the symbol, cannot be abandoned merely because of the 'daylight-saving' philosophy of bourgeois capitalism. What is religion? Is it not . . ."

Finally, I give one instance of Mr. Tyler's humor. In discussing the film "King's Row" he writes: ". . . all is not hotsy-totsy on the right side of the old town—you can bet the Judith Anderson in your home on that."

This is a Serious book. Among the chapter headings are: The Play Is Not the Thing, The Technicolor of Love, and To Be or Not to Be; or the Cartoon Triumphant.

VICTOR WOLFSON

China's Great Past

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE CHINESE PEOPLE. By L. Carrington Goodrich. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

AUTHENTIC Chinese history from the Neolithic Age to the present is here compressed into a short volume by a scholar who knows his subject, and who also knows how to write. There are many helpful sketch maps, a supplementary reading list, a chronological table, and a chart comparing China's different historical periods with those of the West. The fifteen pages of photographs of China's art works and scientific inventions are beautifully done.

The West has unfortunately known China during a period of decline—and has contributed basically to that decline. For thousands of years, however, China was a progressive, adventurous, inventive country with contacts of every conceivable nature with the known world. Not only did many of the great civilizing inventions come from China, but China enriched its own culture by importing animals, plants, and scientific and philosophic discoveries from other countries. Its emphasis upon the cultivation of the human mind and spirit is indicated by its invention of printing with movable type and of rag paper (150 A.D.), as a substitute for wood and silk. From its earliest days China used silk, the compass, the sun dial, water clocks, water mills. Our "China-ware" indicates its origin.

The cultivation of tea, with its therapeutic values—as a cure for burns and intestinal diseases—was known to the early Chinese, and the porcelain industry developed at about the same time and in the same regions. In the first century after Christ the scientist Wang Ch'ung, who among other things combated superstition, wrote these pregnant lines:

> On an average there is one moon eclipse to about 180 days, and a solar eclipse in about every 41 or 42 months. Eclipses are regular occurrences and are not caused by political action. All anomalies and catastrophes are of the same class and are never dependent upon political events.

Galileo, it may be remembered, published his discoveries of sunspots in 1613, whereas Chinese astronomers observed and recorded them in 28 B.C. In 132 A.D. a Chinese scientist invented an instrument which registered earthquakes so slight that they could not be felt in his observatory.

These pages unroll a majestic panorama of the great dynasties under which Chinese civilization reached a level unknown in any other part of the world save for a brief period in ancient Greece. There was the classical age of the Chou dynasty (1027-256 B.C.); the exciting age of the militant, creative Ch'ins (221-207 B.C.), when the founder tried to destroy feudalism and develop a centralized state—the word "China" comes from that dynasty; the imperial, learned age of the Hans (202 B.C.-220 A.D.), with a continuous expansion of territory and a culture so impressive that present-day Chinese call themselves the "sons of Han"; the renaissance under the T'angs (618-906 A.D.), known as the golden age of literature and the arts, when "whoever was a man was a poet"; the Sung period of ripe maturity when lyric poetry gave way to learned prose, to great compendiums of history and works on natural science and political economy. There followed a period of decay, enabling the Mongols to found the Yuan dynasty—and the Mongols were absorbed and eventually overthrown by the Mings, who became the exquisites of the Eastern world—until they repeated the

On Living
IN A Revolution
By JULIAN HUXLEY

"Excellent! Here is not only the difference between the modern theory of evolution and the Mid-Victorian; it is the difference between the German world view and that of the democracies. We are living in a tremendous revolution . . . few writers can clarify the nature of this revolution with more insight than Julian Huxley."—STERLING NORTH, N. Y. Post.

"A prickly, provocative, controversial book." ORVILLE PRESCOTT, N. Y. Times.

$2.50 • HARPER

BURLINGAM

STAGE PLAYS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (in association with Jack H. Skirball)

JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL

The FRANZ WERFEL - S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN

LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS

J. EDWARD BROMBERG

MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED
Evgs. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs., Sat. & JULY 4th

MICHAEL TODD presents BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS ▪ Staged by HASSARD SHORT

SONGS BY COLE PORTER

WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.
AIR CONDITIONED

NATION Advertising Rates

Advertising space in The Nation, reaching a net paid sale which in 1943 averaged 35,500 weekly, is available at rates ranging from 62 cents per line for classified copy to $250 per page for general advertising.

If you seek a responsive, discriminating audience of well-to-do folk in communities of all size from coast to coast, here is your A-1 medium. For information, telephone BArclay 7-1066 or write

Advertising Department

THE Nation

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least two weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.
☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:
☐ 10 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME..
ADDRESS..
.... 7-8-14

mistakes of their forbears and were conquered by the Manchus. They grew soft and decadent, became tools in the hands of the Western capitalist powers, and were overthrown by the Republic in 1911.

One of my favorite Chinese statesmen, Wang An-shih, occupies a few paragraphs in this book. He is shown instituting great social, political, and military reforms, among others the organization of public schools in each prefecture and subprefecture in the empire—until the reactionaries drove him out and allowed the country to be conquered.

The section covering the Chinese Republic is brief but on the whole good. The Chinese Academia Sinica to promote research in modern science is described and analyzed, but all too briefly. "China has had difficulties with many foreign powers since 1912," writes the author, magnificently understating the fact. The Chinese people, he says, are essentially liberty-loving, industrious, and passive; I disagree with the last word. "Sharp cleavages between political groups may necessitate an oligarchy," he writes—just as if an oligarchy had not ruled since 1927. The government has remained in power, he states, with the apparent "support of the majority of the people"—though the people have nothing to say about it. Not even Dr. Hu Shih, whom he rightly quotes as an authority on Chinese history and thought, can vote in China. Only if the Chinese people had the right to hear all political ideas and choose between them in secret ballot should we know whom they would support. In our admiration of China we must not forget that Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek has been elected President by about a hundred men.

AGNES SMEDLEY

CONTRIBUTORS

PHILIP WYLIE, American novelist and short-story writer, is editor of Farrar and Rinehart, Inc., Publishers.

JUDSON KING, director of the National Popular Government League in Washington, is a veteran crusader for public power.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS is an editor of the Partisan Review.

IRVING BRANT, formerly on the editorial staffs of the St. Louis Star-Times and the Chicago Sun, is now at work on the second volume of a life of James Madison.

H. RICHARD NIEBUHR teaches Christian Ethics at the Divinity School of Yale University.

BLOOD DONORS NEEDED!

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

FILMS

TO "The People's Avengers" eighteen Soviet camera men contribute their records of guerrilla life and warfare, and Norman Corwin contributes his commentary and his voice. Mr. Corwin, in spite of being a radio man, lets gratifyingly long stretches of film run by without saying a word; when he does speak, the words are generally continent. The voice itself has, it seems to me, a slightly officious resonance, and I don't think he should be forgiven the remark "One down" when a German sentry falls dead, or the remark "Reluctant superman" as partisans drag a frantically abject German soldier from his hiding place in a haystack. (Just before this shot ends or is cut, by the way, there is a sudden clenching of people round the prostrate soldier, ambiguous but horribly suggestive, which makes the crack still more off color, and tempts me to wonder how global the anthology of post-war atrocity films might be, if every nation has the historical conscience to preserve its stock.)

The harvest of the cameras is fascinating even when it is tacky—some intensely rhetorical filter shots; or suspect—some silhouettes, before a dawn attack, which could easily have been discarded from "The North Star" but which may easily, and disconcertingly, be straight records. Some of the shots imply first-rate poetic foresight and imagination—most impressively, those of a German train, visible above rich deep-country foliage only in its soft walking tower of smoke as it moves slowly toward ambushed dynamite. Even shots which are heavily posed or reenacted—a newly decorated hero with the prettiest available girl—break the boundaries of faking; they betray, between subject and photographer, an unaffected quality of comradeship which is also seen sometimes in English films, almost never in ours. To me some of the most interesting moments showed the guerrillas at rest rather than at work—deep in the woods with their women, their stew kettles and pecking hens, and their death-experienced little boys—the faces all deep-rural, bottomlessly and naturally resolute, and incomparably secure. They reminded me, sharply, of people in parts of the back country, and of tag-ends of frontier, here. I felt reasonably sure that under similar circumstances such American civilians would react as well, and wondered how many of that kind are left.

44th Street Book Fair Gallery

July 5 to August 5
EXHIBITION OF
NEW WORK
10 New York Artists
Oils . Water Colors . Drawings $5-$125
Open until 9 p.m. daily except Sunday
133 W. 44th St., near Broadway

"Marine Raiders" is a formula war movie (Pat O'Brien versus Robert Ryan and Ruth Hussey, all versus the Japanese) which mildly transcends its formula through bits of truer-than-average dialogue, studio combat, acting, and direction, and an occasional flexibility of insight or camera work which seems to distinguish RKO pictures as political decency distinguishes those made by Warner Brothers. (There are some moments in San Diego—notably in a crowded, forlorn record-your-voice joint —which I thought very good even though they misfired.) Robert Ryan, if he is allowed to forget about Gary Cooper, may become one of the few good leading men. "Secret Command" is about shipyards, saboteurs, and saboteur hounds. It contains two pieces of melodrama which set records for wilful denial of suspense (more frequent cutting-in of a loosening bolt in one, a dial-and-needle in the other, would have fixed everything); aside from that, and another of Pat O'Brien's experienced soft-shoe performances, the film is in no way memorable.

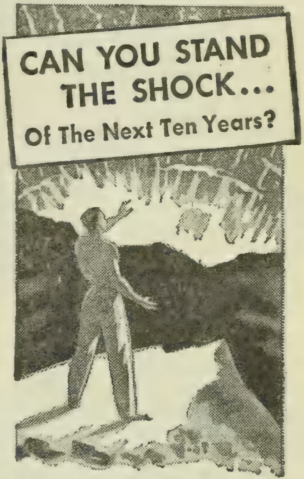
Two weeks ago in this column I wrote telescopic lens for telephoto. Three weeks ago vivacious roles were recommended for Susan Hayward. The word should have been vicious.

JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

IN A recent article on modernism Virgil Thomson observed that "the leading masters of it, Arnold Schönberg and Igor Stravinsky, are now elderly gentlemen. Their precepts and practices are expounded at all the music schools and colleges; their followers constitute practically the whole pedagogical wing of contemporary composition. All this represents a consolidation of past gains for the modernist movement." And "since modern music itself has come to be a conservative and well entrenched institution, the opposition to it no longer represents an intellectual position of any strength at all"; which is like saying that since Alcoa has come to be a conservative and well entrenched institution the opposition to it no longer represents an intellectual position of any strength at all—the "intellectual" being an example of Thomson's use of language for much the same purpose, and with much the same result, as Father Divine's.

"The estimate of how much modernism, and in what degree of dilution, a given audience will take at a given time," he continued, "is purely a consideration of practicability. Few real disputes about aesthetics have been active since the modernists came into command of all the positions of intellectual eminence by winning, a full generation ago, all the chief arguments about aesthetics. That is why open compromises on practical policy are possible today without any loss of dignity to any-



CAN YOU STAND THE SHOCK...
Of The Next Ten Years?

Know What To Do... and When To Do It!

WHETHER you are a butcher, baker, or candlestick maker, your life isn't going to be the same. The most astounding transformations—unexpected changes—are going to alter your ways of living in the next few years. Millions have been wanting a change—but few will be ready for it. Avoid the inevitable confusion, disillusionment that will come.

Let the Rosicrucians show you how to develop your intuitive powers, your unsuspected talents into new, useful abilities. Prepare to meet the demands that will be made upon you. It will be too late to say, "I always thought—I believed—We always did it this way."

Accept This Free Book

The Rosicrucians are an age-old fraternity devoted to helping man understand himself, and pointing out how he may adjust his capabilities to the world in which he lives. They offer you a free copy of the fascinating book "The Mastery of Life." It will tell you in simple language how you can prepare yourself and your family for the shock ahead—and for self-sufficiency. Address: Scribe I. O. P.

The Rosicrucians
SAN JOSE (AMORC) CALIF., U. S. A.
NOT a Religious Organization

RESORTS

THE VACATION OF YOUR LIFE

"Go Rustic at Wopowog and love it." Here you will find a spirit of good fellowship and friendliness seldom found elsewhere. ALL SPORTS. Large private lake. Orchestra. Gala B'way Entertainment. 110 miles from New York.

Informal atmosphere.

N. Y. Office:
303 5 Av. Tel. MU. 4-3800

THE ADULT CAMP

WOPOWOG

Lake Salmon, EAST HAMPTON, CONN.

The Oaks

Formerly
RED OAKS, Elberon, N. J.

Enjoy all outdoor sports, excellent tennis, ocean bathing, delicious cuisine, in this American plan country estate. On Highway 4N, only 50 miles from N. Y. C. (Jersey Central or Pennsylvania R. R. direct to Elberon.)

Phone Long Branch 2433
Management of Joseph Horowitz

WALTELL HOUSE
On FRANKEL FARM
MT. BETHEL • PENNSYLVANIA

[The Only Modern Farm Hotel Combined with a Children's Day Camp]

Meats, Poultry, Eggs & Produce Right from our own farm. All Rooms with Private Bath. 75 miles from New York. All Sports. ELLA FRANKEL, Phone Bangor 6-2273 or N. Y. LEx. 2-5864.

ARCADIA Fishkill, N. Y. Tel. Beacon 727

FOR A VACATION OF FUN, HEALTH AND EFFICIENCY—1100 acres of woods and trails. All sports. Square dances. Informal social surroundings, delicious food.

R. R. Station, Beacon, N. Y.
60 miles from city.

CHILDREN'S CAMP

SMILING HILLS CAMP
EAST STROUDSBURG PENNSYLVANIA

A progressive camp for boys and girls, from [illegible] to 12 years of age. All activities. Non-sectarian. Non-regimented. Individual care. (Limited to 50 campers)

Write:
James & Nellie Dick, Modern School,
115 Cary St., Lakewood, N. J. Phone 1007

LANGUAGES

PHONOGRAPH COURSES. BOOKLET N. Language Service, 18 East 41st St., New York City 17.

WANTED

Writer wants summer perhaps also fall retreat, within two hours N. Y. Must have privacy and quiet whenever feels like working, needs company other times. Lake very close by essential; horseback riding, ping-pong, boating desirable. Give details. Box 1475, c/o The Nation.

body. Etc., etc." What victories and so on those portentous-sounding words and phrases refer to I don't know; but the general music-loving public doesn't even care: it dislikes the music, and therefore objects to hearing it; being as strongly entrenched in the concert hall as the modernists are in the music schools and colleges it can make its objection effective; and no amount of verbal abacadabra about its having lost the aesthetic battle and about compromises without loss of dignity will fool it into doing anything else.

Not that the general public hasn't read about modern music. Others have had my experience: when, as a member of the general public, I began to listen to the music twenty-five years ago with ears and mind that were open and receptive, I also began to read explanations and discussions of it, in the hope that they would enable me to perceive the new artistic beauty or potency in what impressed me as hideous or feeble; but nothing I learned from reading about it changed the impression I got from listening to it. And in time what I heard made me increasingly impatient with what I read. The music was bad; but the talk about it was worse; and not just the talk of Paul Rosenfeld and the writers in Modern Music, but especially the talk of the composers themselves about their works that was printed in the program notes. Others, I say, have had my experience, and have reached my conclusions. The Boston correspondent who last summer wrote me that devastating analysis of Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" Suite had, he said, no respect for Stravinsky as an artist; and what produced that attitude was not only Stravinsky's succession of styles but his succession of pronouncements about them.

Recently this correspondent sent me the Boston Symphony program notes for the concert that Stravinsky conducted of his own works. The impressions he got from the most recent works were of continuing decay, ingratiating sterility, and harmlessness. "He no longer has the power, it would seem, to write music that is sustainedly vicious. The program book is another story; it I do find vicious, as so much pro-Stravinsky propaganda is—particularly the essay on the Symphony in C major (1940)." This was reprinted from the Musical Quarterly; and in it a Mr. Sol Babitz gave the results of his study of the score and his conferences with Stravinsky. My correspondent was infuriated by "this sort of thing, which one is always finding in Stravinsky criticism:

> The death rattle of the sonata form having been audible for some years, and official obituaries printed, it is rather awkward at this time to have to acknowledge the existence of a master of that form.

You know what I mean: The sonata form is dying, but lo! here is Stravinsky to make it live. The ballet is on its last legs, but Stravinsky arises and it is recreated anew. The art of making pasticcios is dead, but Stravinsky raises it to its former glory. You get more of this arrogance in the following section on the orchestration:

> Yet the page as a whole reveals a visual difference portentous of the new sounds contained. The manuscript is quite white, perhaps whiter than any of Stravinsky's scores; an unforgivable sin in the eyes of the pedants who have been held spellbound by the increasing blackness of symphonic scores during the last one hundred years. There is none of the conventional doubling, no outward attempts at tonal balance. Etc.

Completely ignoring the last hundred years of French orchestration, which has done just what Stravinsky has been turning to. Forgetting the best of Honegger's scores; forgetting Ravel. And to speak of no outward attempts at tonal balance is to speak nonsense: as great an orchestrator as Stravinsky would never make such a mistake."

It isn't only the arrogance, it is also the verbal churning up of nothing into something that I find infuriating—the hullaballoo about the number of black spots on the page, to transform a work whose musical contents the ear discovers to be ingratiating sterility into one which brings the dead sonata form to life again. And that is not found only in the writing about Stravinsky.

B. H. HAGGIN

FARMS, ACREAGE

CHARMING small colonial; 20 beautiful acres; ideal location; good barns; $3,000. 300 others. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

NEW PARTY PLATFORM

NEW PARTY WHIG FEDERALIST. Write for free copy of platform. No obligation. Phillip G. Miller, Suite 2218, 225 West 34th St., N. Y. C. 1, N. Y.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new is required for change of address.

Letters to the Editors

Ethiopia's Future

Dear Sirs: Ethiopia's friends are anxious about its future. Both for prosperity and for safety it requires access to the sea by recovery of its former territories, which Italy annexed at the end of the nineteenth century and twice used as bases for prosecuting wars of conquest as well as for minor invasions and intrigues with the purpose of disturbing and weakening the country in order to conquer it eventually.

After the Italian declaration of war on Britain and France in 1940, the time came for British help in liberating Ethiopia. The stiffest fight was in the north—in the mountains of the Gojjam and at Keren in Eritrea.

At Keren great use was made of propaganda, by radio and by leaflets showered from R. A. F. planes. Captain Steer, in his book "Sealed and Delivered," has given a lively record of it. A proclamation of Emperor Haile Selassie's, prepared in consultation with the British authorities, was reproduced in Tigrinya, an offshoot from the Gheze, or Ethiopic, spoken in the northern part of Ethiopia. This proclamation declared that the future of Eritrea lay with the rest of Ethiopia. Leaflets reproducing the Ethiopian flag conveyed the message, "Fight for your own king and your own flag." After a description of the many injustices they had suffered under the Italians, the Eritreans were assured, "The day when you will be delivered of all this has come." All these appeals urged Eritrean soldiers to desert the Italian ranks and either return home or come over to the British lines to fight the Italians. As Captain Steer has recorded, the Eritreans responded to these appeals in thousands, and thus materially contributed to the Italian defeat.

Both Ethiopians and Eritreans anticipated that the defeat of Italy would be followed by the immediate restoration of Eritrea to Ethiopia and the expulsion of the Italians, but after the victory they were informed that consideration of their claim must be deferred till the general peace settlement. Meanwhile Italian laws and color discriminations have been maintained in Eritrea, as well as Italian officials, with only a few British in the highest posts. The British and Italians consort amicably, while the Eritreans are still a subject race, debarred from the hotels and restaurants used by the Europeans.

Consternation has recently been caused in both Eritrea and Ethiopia by an article which received considerable prominence in the Sudan Star. It not only argued against the restoration of Eritrea to Ethiopia, but advocated restoring a new frontier made by Italy during its occupation of Ethiopia—a frontier which extended Eritrea and thereby robbed Ethiopia of the Tigré province, including Adowa and Axume, with St. Mary of Sion, the Obelisk of the Queen of Sheba—the very heart of Ethiopian history and belief.

The fact that such plans have been repeatedly discussed in some British political circles and in the press occasions anxiety also to British friends, particularly in view of the growing favor shown in Allied official circles to Italy, and the fact that no formal renunciation of Italy's aggressive claims on Ethiopia has been made by its present spokesmen.

Eritrean desire for reunion with Ethiopia has lately been manifested by striking incidents. At the festival of the Epiphany, on January 20, the children of Asmara, the capital of Eritrea, carried Ethiopian flags and sang Ethiopian patriotic songs.

On January 31, the date on which the Anglo-Ethiopian agreement of 1942 terminated, many Eritrean dwellings displayed Ethiopian colors. It was found that Ethiopian flags had been hoisted during the night to the electric-light standards in the principal street of Asmara, and even to the two flagstaffs of Government House, as well as to the minaret of the mosque. The chief of police found an Ethiopian flag covering his desk and a portrait of the Emperor Haile Selassie on his chair. Portraits of the Emperor had been posted on the walls in all parts of the town, accompanied by statements that the British, when desiring Eritrean help in fighting the Italians, had promised reunion to Ethiopia. Fulfilment of the promise was now demanded, with a warning that trouble would follow if it were denied.

On February 26, 2,800 Eritrean police proclaimed their intention to resign unless Italian law was abrogated, and their refusal to continue in the position of inferiority to Italians.

Ethiopia's southern frontier, contiguous to the ex-Italian colony of Somalia, which fronts on the Indian Ocean, is also a source of anxiety. Here also Italy made a new frontier after the conquest, and in this case British negotiators insisted upon retaining the new Italian frontier. The Ethiopians accepted this with reluctance, but only for the term of the two-year agreement.

Thus, instead of getting back the territority fronting on the Red Sea that was lost in 1890, Ethiopia has also been deprived, for the time being at any rate, of a substantial wedge of the adjacent Ogaden province, which it possessed until the Italian conquest of 1936.

Moreover, in order to obtain resumption of its self-government Ethiopia was prevailed upon to concede to British military occupation a further area of the Ogaden bordering French and British Somaliland.

Here too the propagandists of dismemberment are at work, suggesting that Ethiopia should not recover that part of its national territory in the vast province of the Ogaden which has been taken into Italian Somalia and should even lose more of that province, and that a new state under the rule of Britain or some other European power should be created there. Having regard to the current talk about Italy's "earning" better terms by assistance to the Allied forces, and the too common and most dangerous war-time practice of making ill-judged promises to those whose aid is desired in battle, it is important to insist that no bargain be made with Italy at Ethiopia's expense.

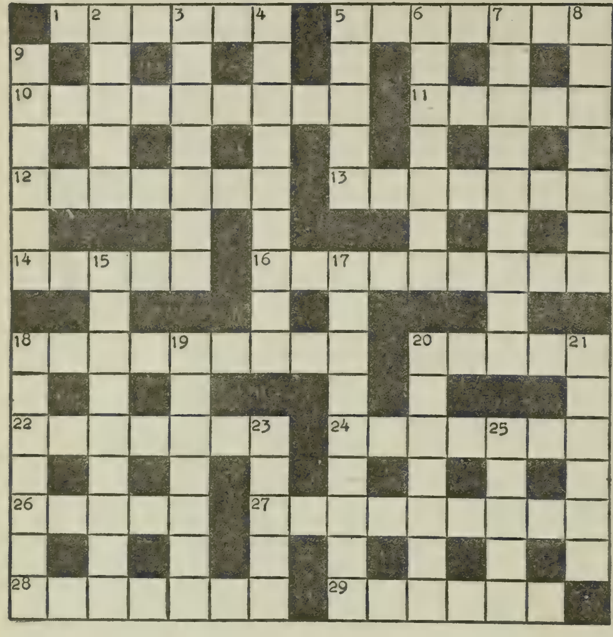
Various glosses have been devised for recommending proposals which would involve the unprincipled robbery of a brave and loyal people, whose homelands are the only substantial territory remaining to any African race. Enlightened British and American opinion recognizes that the colonial era must give place to African progress and self-government, but the spectacle of Ethiopia developing into a modern, self-governing democracy, with a parliament elected by popular franchise, with industry and agriculture promoted by cooperatives, with sick insurance, modern primary, secondary, and professional schools, and so forth, is not welcome to those who desire to keep the African people in perpetual subjection.

E. SYLVIA PANKHURST

Woodford Green, England, June 10

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 71

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Fancy finding him in the R.A.F.!
5 Literature of the ancient Moroccan
10 Cruel dons (anag.)
11 A dead donkey is rare, but this is rarer
12 Air tent (anag.)
13 At all
14 Suggesting that women's make-up is largely superstitious
16 Patronizing people, relatively speaking
18 Where Haroun al-Raschid dined
20 Breeziness?
22 "I will kill thee a ------ and fifty ways" (As You Like It)
24 Vegetable that may suggest what people do who want beer
26 O to make this a river of France!
27 Italian composer the French call Gray, we Green
28 Not a favorite son, as a rule
29 May mean a tie sooner or later

DOWN

2 Make amends an hour after midnight
3 Where the aircraft get hung up in bad weather?
4 Fictitious land of historical romance in S. E. Europe, discovered by Anthony Hope
5 A sail as seen from part of an island
6 English sea captain and novelist; author of Mr. Midshipman Easy, Diary in America, etc.
7 Became so enamored of his own image that he pined away and was metamorphosed into a flower
8 "Carved with figures strange and sweet, All made out of the ------- brain" (Ancient Mariner)
9 So Mike is in the North
15 Prioress in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales ("full pleasant and amiable of port")
17 Burns likened them to poppies—you seize the flower, its bloom is shed
18 Here in lettuce
19 His changing King Atlas into a mountain was no mean feat, as feats go
20 One whom "we see through a glass, darkly," perhaps
21 A donkey turns up in a Black Sea port
23 Couch large enough to hold a prima-donna!
25 City of Ohio

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 70

ACROSS:—1 PECKSNIFF; [illegible] AARON; 9 QUILLET; 10 IN CLINK; 11 EVE; 12 CANVAS; 13 DEAD; 15 SPECTRUM; 16 BATTLE; 18 LAGADO; 20 HOMELESS; 23 PEAR; 24 AMELIA; 25 TOW; 28 TOPSAIL; 29 PANNIER; 30 ROSES; 31 REPORTERS.

DOWN:—1 PIQUE; 2 CHINESE; 3 SOLICITUDE; [illegible] ISTANBUL; [illegible] FRIDAY; 6 ARCH; 7 RAIMENT; [illegible] NAKEDNESS; 14 WAGE-EARNER; 15 SALTPETER; 17 LOLLIPOP; 19 GRAMPUS; 21 ENTWINE; 22 AMBLER; 26 WORMS; 27 LAWS.

RESORTS

Twin Pines
on Trout Lake

An ADIRONDACK Adult Camp; Complete — Modern
4 doubles tennis courts; cement handball courts; swimming, boating, etc. Hotel comforts — camp informality. All rooms for 2.

TWIN PINES
J. Saidel, Manager
P. O., Lake George, N. Y.

MERRIEWOODE
A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes. Interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails. Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping-pong, square dancing. Intelligent, gay companionship.
$38 and $42 weekly Olive H. G. Baron, Dir.

CAMP ANNISQUAM
Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director

This Adult Camp...
in Gloucester is [illegible] hours from New York . . . CAMP ANNISQUAM offers a complete change of air, scenery, and people . . . Salt water swimming, sailing, fishing on premises . . . dancing, tennis, trips, and all sports.
Write for booklet and rates

RONDAX... ADULT CAMP
ON RONDAXE LAKE (in the Adirondacks). All sports—Informal. Free of hayfever. Amer.-Jewish cuisine. Schimmel-Gould Mgt. N. Y. Off.: LO 5-3716 or write to OLD FORGE, N. Y.

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.
ALL SPORTS — Open All Year
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

MAMANASCO LAKE LODGE
RIDGEFIELD, CONN. Phone 820
Summer beckons again to the most wonderful little resort for your vacation or for a week-end. Ultra modern accommodations. All outdoor activities; [illegible] own 1½ mile long lake. Varied indoor recreations. Informal, congenial surroundings. Famous cuisine. Only 50 miles from city via excellent transportation facilities. Moderate rates.

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N. Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
[illegible] ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

WESTERN VIEW FARM
25th Season
TED OHMER
New Milford Connecticut
Telephone: NEW MILFORD 440

GRANITE LAKE CABINS—With private baths; Simmons beds. Water sports, excellent home cooking. Adults only, $60 a week double. Box 77, Munsonville, New Hampshire.

ROMAINE VILLA, Monsey, N. Y. Meals for better health. Ideal for rest and convalescing. Limited accommodations. Spring Valley 525.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 15, 1944 · NUMBER 3

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 57

EDITORIALS

The Monetary Conference 60
Inside Red China 61

ARTICLES

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 62
The Cross of Gold by I. F. Stone 63
50 Years Ago in The Nation 64
Goodby to Revolution! by J. Alvarez del Vayo 65
Have Faith in France by Joseph Chapiro 68
Willkie's Choice by Arnold Beichman 70
In the Wind 71

POLITICAL WAR

Those Gentle Danes by Gunnar Leistikow 72
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 73

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 74
Deadly Praise by Keith Hutchison 74
How to Deal with Japan by T. A. Bisson 75
A Memoir of Duffus by Solomon F. Bloom 76
The Soviet Economy by Heinz H. F. Eulau 77
Laws and Responsibilities by Albert Guérard 78
In Brief 81
Films by James Agee 81
Music by B. H. Haggin 82
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 83
CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 72 by Jack Barrett 84

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Editor Political War Section J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON ▪ MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON
Director of Nation Associates LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL · JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER · REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE VISIT OF GENERAL DE GAULLE WAS a skilful job of diplomatic engineering. Obviously an agreement between him and the President could not be delayed. The practical problems created by the invasion had to be met in practical political terms; no longer could French claims be dismissed as "irrelevant." The Committee of Liberation is functioning as a government on French soil to the apparent satisfaction of both the people and the Allied High Command. The British have hammered out a series of agreements governing the administration of freed areas similar to those made with Belgium, Holland, and Norway. Mr. Churchill dramatically revealed his dissatisfaction with the American position by begging the Commons not to debate the matter. Obviously the stupid stalemate had to be ended by some maneuver which would save Mr. Roosevelt's face and yet give to the French Committee the substance of its demands. As we go to press, no announcement of the results of General de Gaulle's meetings with the President has been issued. But the emphasis in the press on the friendly nature of the talks and the desire of both men to avoid issues which might impede agreement provide a good clue to the result. General de Gaulle will take back to Algiers the de facto recognition of the government of the United States. It will not be called that. But the sort of working arrangements that have doubtless been arrived at constitute de facto recognition. As for Mr. Roosevelt, he has at last withdrawn from an untenable position, however he may have screened his retreat with diplomatic reservations. For this we must be thankful; but it is an unhappy fact that this country has again been driven by events to adopt a policy that political wisdom dictated from the start.

*

MR. CHURCHILL'S STATEMENT ON THE ROBOT bombs makes it clear that London is once again on the front line. The number of deaths among civilians caused by the robots is actually greater than the number of fatalities suffered by British soldiers in Normandy during the same period. While casualties to date are far fewer than they were in the first months of the 1940 blitz, the ceaseless, indiscriminate nature of the attack places a heavier burden on the civilian population than the earlier raids inflicted. Spells of bad weather, instead of impeding the robots, actually permit an intensification of the terror. Despite the vast amount of destruction that is undoubtedly being done to civilian property, the robot bomb has as yet to prove of value as a military weapon. The quotations from the Nazi press cited by Argus elsewhere in this issue make it evident that the robots' primary purpose is to demonstrate to the German people that their government is capable of retaliating for the destruction suffered from Allied air raids. Wreaking vengeance upon a civilian population is of course not new to German practice. The original blitz on London was of the same character, and for months after the Nazis had suffered defeat at Leningrad the population of that city was subjected to shelling at least as severe as the robot attacks on London. Leningrad survived, and so will London.

*

THE REPLACEMENT OF VON RUNDSTEDT BY von Kluge as Supreme Commander in the west has been interpreted in various ways, but the most plausible explanation is that at this critical moment Hitler does not want to pit against Eisenhower and Montgomery a general he does not entirely trust. On several occasions the cold shrewd judgment of von Rundstedt, who is considered the ablest chieftain of the German army next to Brauchitsch, has been known to conflict with the emotional convictions of the Führer. Even two years ago von Rundstedt was reported to have given up hope of a German victory. But apparently, his replacement involves something more than conflicting temperaments. Reports from neutral countries have implied that the Marshal, who has never been a party man and whose hostility to party control is a matter of common knowledge, had established contact with people who have easy access to Allied commanders. Talk of peace feelers has been in the air, interlarded with references to German generals of the old school. To a nation which "has burned its boats and has nothing more to lose," as Dr. Goebbels put it in his last article in Das Reich, a General who had not yet burned his boats and who thought that something could be saved by a timely capitulation was bound to seem an untrustworthy leader of the army in the west. This interpretation is far more credible than the official stories of ill health and the rumors that von Rundstedt was ousted because of his failure to halt the invasion. If it is correct, it would prove that Hitler still has the last say, and it would negate many theories about the comparative strength of the Wehrmacht and the party.

*

REPORTS OF THE MASSACRE BY THE NAZIS OF from 1,500,000 to 1,750,000 Jews during the past two years have been received from several apparently authoritative sources. The murders are said to have taken place at two "model extermination camps" at Auschwitz and Birkenau in Upper Silesia, and the information about them, which was obtained from survivors, has been carefully checked by the Very Reverend Paul Vogt, head of the internationally known refugee organization, the Flüchtlingshifte, of Zurich. The reports, well documented though they are, seem too terrible for credence. Yet the evidence is overwhelming. Speaking before the House of Commons, Anthony Eden confirmed earlier stories of the deportation of 400,000 Hungarian Jews, of whom 100,000 have already been slain in the Silesian camps. And official Soviet commissions have confirmed similar mass executions of Jews in a number of Russian cities. In many instances the names of the individuals who are directly responsible for these murders are known, and these men will unquestionably be punished as provided in the three-power statement issued last November in Moscow. But these are not crimes for which a few individuals alone are responsible. Blame must also be placed on the German people for tolerating, without visible protest, a government which has gloried in its ruthlessness toward the Jews and other minorities.

*

JESSE JONES'S FRONT-PAGE EDITORIAL IN THE Houston Chronicle ever so gently chiding Texas anti-fourth-termers was a minimum gesture for a Cabinet officer, a political necessity rather than a sincere expression of loyalty to his chief. "Usually well-informed political gossip" is cited by the New York Herald Tribune as the source of the report that Jones was given "anything but gentle treatment" at a recent conference with the President and that he disclaimed any knowledge of the Texas revolt. The disclaimer, like that made by Jones's associate, Will Clayton, is incredible. Jones's nephew, George Butler, is chairman of the Texas State Democratic Executive Committee and a leading figure among the anti-fourth-termers. Lamar Fleming, one of the principal executives of Clayton's cotton concern, was one of the framers of the plan to free Texas electors from their traditional obligation to cast their votes as directed. Clayton, under pressure, at least issued a forthright statement—"I do not approve." But Jones merely said that "on reflection there is good reason to believe that the [Texas State] convention acted in the heat of political controversy." This may be read either as a statement of fact or as a mild rebuke, and is hardly sufficient amends from a Cabinet officer who has been linked to an intrigue against his chief.

*

THE JONES-CLAYTON STATEMENTS REFLECT the collapse of the anti-Roosevelt movement in the South, which now hopes only to block Wallace and to prevent the party from matching the Republican planks on FEPC, poll-tax, and anti-lynching legislation. Assorted forces supporting Rayburn, Douglas, Truman, and McNutt for second place on the ticket seem to be ganging up on Wallace, and there are reports that the President, while still in favor of the Vice-President's renomination, will not attempt to dictate it. We hope those reports are untrue. The future of the New Deal at home and of international cooperation abroad may rest on a wise choice for Vice-President, and the only wise one we can see in this perspective is Henry Wallace. The Southern anti-New Dealers are licked anyway and have nowhere else to go; their hopes of a coalition with the Republicans were destroyed at Chicago. We hope the President will not only throw his weight behind the Wallace renomination but do what he can to see that the Democratic Party matches the Republican Party's stand on the Negro. That much is due in all justice to the black man. Politically, the South must vote for Roosevelt in any case, but a strong and honest position on the FEPC, poll taxes, and lynching would be of crucial importance in several key Northern states.

*

GOVERNOR DEWEY'S FIRST PLEDGE TO THE nation, in his acceptance speech at Chicago, was "that on January 20 next year our government will again have a Cabinet of the ablest men and women to be found in America." The emphasis he gave to this promise and the manner in which it was hailed in the Republican press both suggest that it is to be featured in his campaign. However, a pledge of this sort remains unimpressive until it descends from the general to the particular. Voters are likely to ask just what men and women Mr. Dewey has in mind: they will want to see whether his definition of ability coincides with their own. It is doubtful whether this legitimate curiosity will be satisfied, since Mr. Dewey told reporters at Chicago that he was not picking his Cabinet at this time. Yet it would be unfair to make the broad accusation that the G. O. P.'s candidate is selling pigs in pokes, for the platform on which he stands gives us a strong hint about the identity of one future Cabinet officer if there is a change of Administration next year. The Department of Labor, it declares, should embrace all agencies dealing with labor and should be headed by a real labor representative. We assume this is a pledge that the post will be given to a union leader if Mr. Dewey wins the right of appointment. But what leader, and from which of the four major labor groups in the country? There are circumstantial rumors around that the answer may be "Big Bill" Hutcheson, septuagenarian boss of the A. F. of L. Carpenters' Union. Hutcheson, long the G. O. P.'s tame labor leader, is not only prominent in A. F. of L. councils but close to John L. Lewis. True, nobody would pick Big Bill as among the "ablest" men in the country, and he is neither young nor vigorous. But the Republican range of choice is so limited that Mr. Dewey may have to overlook these defects.

ALTHOUGH THE ARMS PROGRAM IS LAGGING in some sectors, cutbacks have resulted in idle men and machines elsewhere. This has increased the pressure for immediate reconversions of unemployed facilities to the production of much-needed civilian goods. It has also led to a tense situation in Washington, where Chairman Nelson of the War Production Board is at loggerheads with most of the vice-chairmen, with the army and navy, and with the War Manpower Commission. On June 19 Nelson signed orders making available materials for the construction of working models for post-war production, canceling limitation orders on the use of aluminum and magnesium—now plentiful—and permitting manufacturers to purchase machinery, tools, and dies wherever possible without interference with war production. Shortly afterward the WPB chairman became ill, and in his absence these orders have not been put through. According to Senator Truman, who is strongly supporting Nelson's proposals, the opposition from within the board is inspired by the large corporations which are still fully engaged on armament work and fear small competitors may be allowed to get ahead of them. The army, navy, and War Manpower Commission are concerned with the severe labor shortages in certain vital production fields, including foundries, coal mines, tank arsenals, tire plants, and shipyards. They believe that unemployment elsewhere might be a helpful factor in steering labor to the shortage areas. It is not clear, however, that aircraft workers who lose their jobs on Long Island can be persuaded to migrate to Akron to make tires. And it is certain that the problems of reconversion will be multiplied if we wait to start until all war contracts are completed and everyone can turn to civilian production simultaneously.

*

SO THEY SPRAYED PARAFFIN ON THE BIG TOP after they had dissolved the paraffin in gasoline. It was fine for waterproofing canvas, they said. And it was the biggest big top in the world. But it didn't rain that afternoon in Hartford. It was hot with midsummer heat. Circuses are for summer time and all the kids were there. The fire, they say, took about three seconds to climb from near one entrance right up to the top of the center pole, and in ten minutes it was all over and a hundred and forty-odd people had been burned to death—most of them children. We thought we had grown used to death and disaster; they are part of our tragic era. But this was close. These were not statistics transmuted into the costs or rewards of victory; they were burned bodies in a gray armory in a New England town. Perhaps our grief and horror relate us more closely to the suffering of our devastated world. That is not enough. For these deaths in Hartford were needless. Let us say it. Whatever the court may decide, we say these deaths were due to criminal negligence. If the law was violated in a failure to provide a fireproof tent, then those responsible should be punished with severity. If the law permits an unfireproof tent, saturated with paraffin, to house six thousand people at a circus, then we all share in the criminal negligence that holds human life so cheap. It is poor atonement for this crime to insist now that by law, and by the enforcement of law, we make impossible a repetition of the tragedy.

The Monetary Conference

BRETTON WOODS," says I. F. Stone in an article on another page, "is a historic battle." So it is, but it is only one engagement in a war of political and economic ideas which is being fought on many fronts. The prolonged struggle between internationalists and isolationists, the bitter conflict between the advocates of a planned economy and the champions of laissez faire, the renewed fight between free-traders and tariffists, all these campaigns are part of the same war. If international political relations remain in a state of anarchy after the war, what hope is there of economic cooperation? Or if commercial relations between nations are allowed once again to degenerate into a game of beggar-my-neighbor, how secure will be any organization to maintain peace? Finally, if the great industrial nations permit their domestic economies to collapse, what is there to prevent another and worse world depression breeding dictatorships and wars?

"Peace is indivisible," Maxim Litvinov once said at Geneva, and Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, in his opening address to the United Nations Monetary Conference, echoed: "Prosperity is indivisible." The truth is that peace and prosperity are indivisible and to secure either we must concentrate on establishing both. That, in itself, is not a hard idea to establish in the minds of the citizens whose votes are the decisive weapons in this battle for the future. But many of its implications are, admittedly, difficult to grasp. We are grateful, therefore, that the Bretton Woods conference has been flung open to the press and that the American delegation is making conscientious efforts to assist reporters in making the issues clear.

The basis of the conference discussions is a draft proposal for an international stabilization fund drawn up by the technical experts of some thirty of the participating nations. It is not necessary, as Mr. Harry White, the American delegate who is acting as spokesman for the conference, has pointed out, for all the forty-four countries represented to ratify any agreement reached before the fund can be set up. It may begin operations when approved by governments contributing 65 per cent of the aggregate quotas. However, agreement between Britain and the United States, the two greatest trading nations, is absolutely essential. And these two countries, the one representing international debtors, the other international creditors, tend to suspect each other's motives.

We have for so long been accustomed to think of Britain as the international money-lender par excellence, that it is perhaps hard to realize how fundamentally its position has changed during the course of this war. From one point of view, it is today a bankrupt nation. Not only has it spent a large part of its international resources—gold and foreign investments—in prosecuting the war, but it has had to give I. O. U.'s to countries supplying it with goods for which it could not pay by means of exports. By the end of this year blocked sterling credits belonging to other nations will amount to $12 billion—not far short of Britain's total foreign investments before the war. These credits will eventually have to be paid off in the form of British services and goods. But that is not the only reason why Britain will have to expand exports far above their pre-war level. Before the war it consistently bought from other countries far more than it sold and settled the balance by means of shipping and other services and the proceeds of its foreign investments. As we have already noted, these investments have been largely liquidated; hence, in order to maintain its international balance of payments, Britain will either have to sell still more goods abroad or curb imports drastically. The second alternative would mean a terrific cut in the British standard of living and would have catastrophic effects on the economies of the many countries that have relied on the British market to absorb their surpluses. Consequently, if ways cannot be found to develop an expanding economy for the world, thus enabling it to enlarge its exports sufficiently, Britain is likely to be forced to adopt an elaborate barter system and organize its chief suppliers and customers as a closed sterling bloc. It is hardly necessary to point out how adversely such a development would affect American interests or how little conducive it would be to world peace.

A post-war expansion of exports is not such a critical necessity for the United States, but it may have an important bearing on our prosperity. The heavy industries, whose capacity has grown so much under the pressure of war, will not be able to find an outlet for all their production at home. And there will be eager buyers in the war-devastated countries for our capital goods. But if we want to expand exports we must also increase our imports to an even greater extent or, as Britain did throughout a large part of the nineteenth century, add constantly to our foreign investments. In any case the provision of credit to foreign customers will be necessary in the immediate post-war period, for until their economies have recovered they will not be able to sell us their goods. Therefore, unless we want to isolate our economy, we shall have to provide loans in one form or another. Is this job to be left to the haphazard operations of private bankers, as it was in the twenties, or are we to cooperate in constructing new channels of international credit less liable to choke just when they are most needed? The proposed International Stabilization Fund—really a device for providing short-term credit—and the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development—a plan for making available long-term loans—offer a means of putting surplus American capital to work both for our own good and that of the world. But before this hope can be achieved the Panzers of Wall Street must be overcome. Bretton Woods is the first skirmish; the final battle will be at the polling booths.

Inside Red China

FOR the first time since the establishment of the Chinese Nationalist government a party of regularly accredited representatives of the foreign press has been permitted to visit the areas controlled by the Chinese Communists and to cable dispatches abroad. The report of this group is especially significant since it is the first occasion on which neutral observers have been able to check on the favorable picture presented earlier by several travelers who, whatever their competence, could be said to be predisposed to see the best in "Red China." It is important also in view of the negotiations said to be under way at Chungking looking to a war-time settlement of the long dispute between the Kuomintang government and the Communist regime in the northwest.

So far most of the dispatches from the correspondents visiting in Yenan, capital of Red China, have been necessarily brief. Having passed through Chungking's rigid censorship, they may be somewhat incomplete. Yet enough has already come out to dispose rather effectively of the persistent Chungking reports that the Communist areas were an "economic vacuum," that the Communists had taken advantage of the united front to undermine Chiang Kai-shek, and that the Red Army had refused to fight the Japanese.

The report on the economic achievements of the Communist regime is particularly striking in view of the conditions of acute poverty described by all the earlier observers. It has been generally assumed that conditions had further deteriorated under the impact of the war and Chungking's economic blockade. Yet the New York Times correspondent reports that "the formerly barren north Shensi country, which previously had not recovered from the devastation and depopulation of the great Mohammedan revolt of the eighteen sixties . . . has been transformed into an area of intensive cultivation, stock breeding, and handicraft industry." He adds that "the area has created sufficient food and clothing for the Eighth Route Army units . . . who are among the best-clothed and best-fed the writer has seen anywhere in China." Harrison Forman, writing for the New York Herald Tribune, describes in some detail how the soldiers of the Chinese Red Army have reclaimed tens of thousands of acres of mountainous, wild wasteland and transformed it into a "patchwork quilt of fields of wheat, millet, cotton, and corn."

Despite the blockade, the effect of which has been felt primarily in the shortage of medicines and heavy munitions, the reports show that the population and troops in the Communist areas are enthusiastically loyal to the Chinese government and the United Nations. The Times correspondent speaks of "a realization of the nearness of the counter-offensive against Japan, in which the Communist armies and guerrillas want to participate to the fullest," and adds that "there is no doubt that the Communist armies . . . are valuable allies in the anti-Japanese war." Mr. Forman quotes Mao Tse-tung, chairman of the Communist Party of China, as stating that it was the purpose of his party "to support Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, to persist in Kuomintang cooperation as well as cooperation with the whole people of China, to struggle for the overthrow of Japanese imperialism, and to build an independent and democratic China." The charge that the Eighth Route Army has refused to fight is refuted by the fact that nearly all its weapons have been captured from the Japanese.

It seems hardly likely that the Chungking government would have permitted these reports to be cabled to America unless there was definite prospect of an early reconciliation between the Kuomintang and the Communists. But as yet there have been no reports from Chungking to indicate that progress is being made in the protracted negotiations. On the contrary, little more than a week ago the Chinese Minister of Information repeated the charge that the Eighth Route Army had refused to attack the Japanese when ordered to do so. This charge may be technically true, for it is obvious that relations between the Kuomintang and the Communists have disintegrated to a point where little active military cooperation is possible. As Americans we are not concerned with the charges and counter-charges made against each other by these two powerful Chinese factions. What does concern us is an ending of the internal struggle so that all the resources of China can be turned against our common foe.

Freda Kirchwey will be the guest of honor at a Bastille Day celebration next Friday evening, July 14, at Hunter College, in New York. France Forever, under whose auspices the meeting is being held, has announced that Henri Etienne Hoppenot, minister plenipotentiary and delegate of the French Provisional Government, will be present.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

Break-through and Break-out

BREAK-THROUGH on the east, break-out on the west: those were Germany's two bad breaks last week. Earlier, Adolf Hitler had said at General Dietl's funeral: "How could a struggle which has behind it all the fanaticism of a nation end otherwise than in victory, quite irrespective of what the situation may be at the moment?" Fanaticism was not enough between Polotsk and Kovel, or between Caen and La Haye du Puits. Mountains and lengthening Allied supply lines might aid the defense in Italy, but in the east and west overpowering strength, superior generalship, and command of the air answered Hitler's desperate question.

By last Sunday the break-through on the east extended some 375 miles, from Polotsk southwest to Kovel and beyond it to the line of the Polish Bug. Sixteen days of whirlwind fighting on the White Russian front saw the Red Army advance as much as 225 miles—14 miles a day, which means a broken and disorderly German retreat: five major fortresses, from Vitebsk 160 miles south to Zhlobin, were taken in six days from the opening of the offensive. Not only were these fortresses reduced on four successive days, but the defenders were largely killed or captured where they fought, so that there was no chance for effective rearguard action covering the retreat to previously prepared positions in the rear.

One result of this was that the Russian rate of advance hit thirty or thirty-five miles a day in some cases, as good as anything the Germans did in Poland or France. Another result was that the two Russian armies on the flanks of the break-through, Cherniakovsky's Third White Russian Army in the north and Rokossovsky's First White Russian Army in the south, were able to execute a classic pincers against Minsk. Last winter one would have expected Minsk to hold out for weeks or months; instead, it was a matter of hours. And the slower advance of Zakharov's Second White Russian Army from Mogilev directly toward Minsk paid a good dividend in the form of a considerable encirclement east of Minsk, which cost the enemy several thousand more troops.

This is the true aim of Allied strategy—to destroy the enemy where he stands, rather than to drive him back to a new line where he can fight another day. In this, of course, the Germans have aided by their policy of holding ground instead of attempting to cut their losses. From June 23 through July 8 the Germans lost 275,000 men on the White Russian Front, according to Soviet communiqués; and even after adding a pinch of salt and subtracting x thousand, this is a tremendous loss.

Nor is that all. As fresh news of German disasters came in day after day, I moved my little red pins across the map and guessed at probable new lines on which the enemy might hold for a while. Bagramian's drive in the north from Polotsk toward Dvinsk threatened to cut off all the Germans in Latvia and Estonia; obviously Dvinsk would be defended strongly, and the line would run southwest through Vilna and Grodno to Bialystok, thence south through Brest-Litovsk to Lvov and the Carpathians. A good holding line in front of this strong position would have been Vilna-Lida-Baranovichi; but Baranovichi fell Saturday, Vilna was entered the same day, and Lida fell Sunday.

The military experts of the German High Command, luckily, are having a worse time than the military experts of the American press, because a wrong guess for them means another five divisions lost. In the case of Vilna, it may mean twenty-five or more divisions. Strategically, the denial of rail transit through Vilna is almost as serious as the loss of Dvinsk: the German troops in the north can now get home only via the secondary line west from Dvinsk through Lithuania to Tilsit, or via the coastal line through Riga.

Faced with the terrible pressure of three fronts, the Germans have begun showing a tendency to cut their losses, as witness the evacuation of Kovel and the reported withdrawal to the Bug—the line from which the great Russian misadventure started three years ago last month. Perhaps a similar decision is already being taken in the north, and the enemy's army group will be pulled back before Bagramian reaches Dvinsk.

Russian strength, speed, skill, and strategy make one hesitate to predict a stopping-point for this rapidly developing German disaster. Behind Vilna lies Kaunas, from which the Niemen runs south to Grodno; but the Red Army crosses big rivers without drawing breath. Brest-Litovsk is an exceptionally strong fortress; but so was Minsk. Granted that the Germans get fresh troops into position and that the Red Army outpaces its reinforcements and supplies temporarily, we may see a halt on the general line Riga-Brest-Litovsk-Lvov, with the Germans withdrawing from the north and from the Pripet salient thrust between Baranovichi and Kovel. Then there is Zhukov's massive First Ukrainian Army waiting south of Rokossovsky; and westward for the Germans, a much shorter line from Königsberg through Warsaw to Krakow. Behind lies Berlin.

The break-out in the west, presaged by the week-end fall of Caen and La Haye du Puits, is on a smaller scale but will prove as decisive. The Allied story has been one of hard fighting and sound preparations; the German, one of missed opportunity. The British and Canadians on the left flank defeated superior German armor piecemeal, which means that the strategic counter-attack to drive the Allies into the sea will never come. American troops showed their flexibility by turning amphibian on the right flank, and wading across flooded ground to seize important communications centers.

The beachhead battle is over; the man who failed to prevent the establishment of the beachhead is unemployed, his place taken by a good defensive general apparently more acceptable to the Nazi Party and to the "suggestions" of his underling, Rommel; war of movement in the west is about to begin. The rumor that Hitler has taken personal command in the west is a source of modest gratification to the Allies, who have four-to-one superiority in fire power and overmastering strength in the air, while the Luftwaffe and the German ground forces fight over gas and oil already cut 70 per cent by Allied air attack. Berlin is not much farther from Caen than it is from Kovel.

The Cross of Gold

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 6

MAY I offer a few tentative observations toward an understanding of what is happening at the United Nations Financial and Monetary Conference at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire?

1. The United States, with most of the world's gold, must find some way to revive the gold standard, or see this metal lose much of its value.

2. Its only major ally in this is the Soviet Union, a large gold-producing country.

3. But the Soviet Union, as a Socialist country, is interested in gold only as an export commodity, whose value it wishes to maintain. As a Socialist country, it is largely insulated from the difficulties created by an international gold standard and the necessities imposed by such a standard on domestic policy.

4. That these difficulties are enormous is shown by American experience under the New Deal. Though the world's richest country, we were forced to suspend the gold standard in order to be able to embark on a program of deficit financing, credit expansion, unemployment relief, and public works for economic revival.

5. Had Mr. Roosevelt not suspended gold payment, these measures would have brought about a flight from the dollar that would have further depressed prices and intensified the economic crisis.

6. The crisis itself was largely due to the fact that poorer countries had to dump their products on the world market at any price they would bring in order to obtain gold to pay their debts.

7. Revival of the conventional gold standard would again subject other nations, and our own, to these cyclical disturbances in all their intensity, and make it impossible for them to use monetary management and spending to cushion the effect on the domestic economy.

8. Just what this means may become clearer if we look at the case of Britain. Britain, with little gold left, is no longer the traditional citadel of the gold standard. The extent of the revolution which has occurred in British financial thinking may be seen from the fact that J. M. Keynes, once a heretic for his opposition to the gold standard, was forced to defend himself in the House of Lords last May from a charge that he was trying—by his negotiations with the United States Treasury—once more to link Britain with gold. "I confess," said Lord Addison in that debate, "I have never been convinced that to dig gold out of the ground in South Africa and to bury it refined in a cellar in the United States is, in fact, adding to the wealth of the world."

9. Closely linked with this new British attitude toward the gold standard is the new and equally revolutionary British attitude toward the problem of post-war employment. The official Report on Employment Policy presented by Lord Woolton as Minister of Reconstruction states: "The Government are prepared to accept in the future the responsibility for taking action at the earliest possible stage to arrest a threatened slump. This involves a new approach and a new responsibility for the state. It was at one time believed that every trade depression would automatically bring its own corrective, since prices and wages would fall, the fall in prices would bring about an increase in demand, and employment would thus be restored. Experience has shown, however, that under modern conditions this process of self-recovery, if effective at all, is likely to be extremely prolonged and to be accompanied by widespread distress, particularly in a complex society like our own." That is the end of classical economics in Britain.

10. To carry out the purposes indicated, the British intend to keep the rate of interest low and prevent the flight of capital abroad. "We abjure," Lord Keynes said, in terms that must sound downright blasphemous in

Wall Street, "the instruments of bank rate and credit contraction operating through the increase of unemployment as a means of forcing our domestic economy into line with external factors."

11. This trend toward positive governmental interference to combat the trade cycle is world wide.

12. Only in the United States is there strong opposition to this trend. This comes from banking circles and their academic satellites. There is agreement (1) on the need to take some steps to revive international lending and (2) to help stabilize world currencies. But the American banker's approach is indicated in the hearings held here by the House Foreign Affairs Committee on the resolution by Representative Charles S. Dewey, Republican, of Illinois, for a central reconstruction fund.

13. What sticks especially in the banker craw is that the international stabilization fund and world bank proposed at Bretton Woods would considerably reduce the power of the private international banker. The present American government and any British government will be committed to a cheap-money policy, and the bank would give lenders a bargaining weapon with which to hold down interest rates. The proposal for the world bank says it "shall make no loans or investments that can be placed through the usual private investment channels at reasonable rates." The last three words are the key to that.

14. The Dewey hearings indicate that what the bankers want is a small central reconstruction fund, run entirely by Americans, without international interference, and able to dictate "sound financial policies"—that is, a balanced budget and no social experiments—to countries which want to borrow. The kind of program envisaged by the British is exactly the kind of "unsound financing" American bankers wish to prevent. Representative Dewey, an assistant secretary of the Treasury in the '20's and once financial adviser to Poland, reflects the conventional banking point of view. "If a country proceeds on an inflationary spending policy," he told the committee, "it results in injuring its foreign credit. When a country tries to live within its means, it will be able at all times to get credit throughout the world to assist in its normal development; but if it tries to lift itself by its bootstraps and tries to do everything that it would like to do before the economy of the country is sufficiently strong to support it, why it is going to collapse." Dewey's favorite anecdote in illustration of sound financial practice is the story he tells of how he prevented the city of Warsaw from borrowing $20,000,000 for slum clearance and housing. That, from a banking point of view, was an unproductive loan—though many of Dewey's banker friends were quite willing to lend huge sums at 8 per cent to Latin American dictators to build marble outhouses.

15. The main job of foreign lending, in Representative Dewey's view, which is the Wall Street view, must be done by the private bankers, though "they may have to come to some department of the government, such as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation . . . to get assistance when the period is a little too long or when . . . they themselves might be in straitened circumstances for working capital." In other words, they are quite willing to let the government share the risk, provided they have the power.

16. The United States Treasury is trying to work out a way to give our gold some value as a standard without crippling other nations economically. Wall Street, with the world's greatest aggregation of capital, is fighting to maintain its power after the war. The technicalities may be dull, but Bretton Woods is a historic battle.

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

WHETHER WE LIKE IT OR NOT, we must admit the cold fact that the income tax has come, and probably has come to stay. Recognized by economists as, theoretically, a just and even an ideal tax, it has cunningly been put into a form to give it the greatest possible strength with the masses of a democratic country.—July 5, 1894.

THERE IS NO QUESTION that these men (Gilbert and Sullivan) have created a new school of English opera, the first since Purcell, which did not live long. Probably the new school will not live far into the next century, but even if it dies, it will have supplied an enormous amount of harmless entertainment and hilarity to hundreds of thousands of theatergoers, hilarity never aroused at the expense of propriety.—July 12, 1894.

THE COLLAPSE OF THE PULLMAN STRIKE is not the most important development of the week. Transcending this in significance is the demonstration that such a strike can never again be so formidable in this country. . . . It is now universally recognized that such a strike as Debs ordered is a rebellion, and that the people of the United States will promptly suppress rebellion. . . . The next upstart who orders the laboring men of the land to make a national boycott will fare about the same way as a man down South who should propose that his section secede from the Union.—July 19, 1894.

THERE ARE FEW NAMES in current French literature more popular than that of Guy de Maupassant. He belongs to that realistic school of novelists which had for its first leaders Flaubert and the Goncourt brothers. . . . On the whole, Maupassant's books will remain for a while as a curious document on the manners and thoughts of the end of the nineteenth century in France. Such men as "Max Nordau" will cite them as proof of the decadence and degeneracy of the Latin race. Though their form is sometimes very perfect, it is doubtful if they will take a permanent place in French literature.—July 19, 1894.

Goodby to the Revolution!

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

SINCE the dawn of June 6, when British and American soldiers stepped on the soil of France, victory has been the faithful companion of the Allies. On all fronts, with the single exception of China, the enemy is being beaten day and night, on land, on the sea, in the air. Even those who have been most cautious in their predictions have been impressed by the excellence of the preparations and the perfection in the execution of the plans. Military events could not move faster or better. The United Nations have enjoyed first-class leadership in the military field.

It was to be expected that with the approach of victory the disparity between the way the war has been conducted in the field and the way it has been conducted politically should become more striking. This disparity can best be visualized if we imagine two commentators, one military and one political, both writing on the outlook for the war. The military critic need not restrain his optimism, but even the most cautious writer runs the risk of sounding too confident when he discusses the political prospects. The capture of Minsk took only forty-eight hours. The recognition of De Gaulle has already been delayed for ten months, and though his visit to Washington may have proved useful in many respects, it did not produce recognition. The war is already five years old, and the true climate of Europe has not yet been grasped.

Militarily, the most daring expectations have been fulfilled. Politically, the most modest hopes have been frustrated. If there is a different policy for Europe from the one we have known until now, it is the best-kept secret of the war.

With regard to the enemy countries no plan has been announced beyond unconditional surrender. But already in Italy we have seen how inadequate this formula proved. It may be that there the Allies expected they would advance by taking town after town. Based upon that assumption, their program was very simple. In each town the Allies occupied, they would put AMG authorities to work and relegate broad political problems to the indefinite future. But when the whole fascist structure suddenly crumbled with the overthrow of Mussolini, a political vacuum was produced for which the Allies were entirely unprepared.

The same thing may happen with Germany. It is possible that the Germans will be finally knocked out on their own soil. But it is also possible that the collapse will take place outside the frontiers, through the defeat of the German forces in the east and in the west. Many situations could then arise. Suppose, for instance, that inside Germany Arbeiterräte (workers' councils) like those created in 1918 should spring into existence. In such a case, military occupation might prove a nebulous policy, incapable by itself of meeting the complex problems of German political and social revolution. Have the Allied strategists devised a policy to meet such contingencies?

FAILURE AFTER FAILURE

But if the need for caution in dealing with enemy countries sufficiently explains the tendency of the Allied governments to leave the entire political problem to military leaders, such an attitude is without justification for the rest of Europe, which is ready for democracy and which is dying for democracy, just as the Allied troops are doing. Wherever the anti-fascist forces in the occupied countries have scored a success, it has not been with the support of Washington and London, but against their will. In not one case has the official policy of the Allies led the process of democratic restoration. To what has this failure been due? Partly, of course, to the fact that what the tories of both capitals have in their hearts is the survival of the social regime of the pre-war era rather than a victory of the peoples. But it is partly due, also, to their inability to understand the political climate of the new Europe. To imagine, for instance, that the maquis forces were going to allow their conduct to be affected by the fact that certain outspoken opponents of De Gaulle had achieved social position and influence in Washington was to ignore what has been happening in France since 1940—indeed, since 1934. And to think that after three years of open war in Spain and five years of secret war against Franco, the Spanish people, in order to cater to the British love of kings, were likely to accept the elevation of Don Juan betrayed not only a diehard attitude but a stupid one as well.

Thus the reactionary spirit coupled with political misunderstanding has led the Allies from failure to failure. This long chain of political defeats has a common characteristic. In each case the Allied rulers have tried to support the right and have ended by being obliged to accept the left. It has happened again and again, from the attempts to create an atmosphere favorable to the restoration of the old monarchies, as in the famous episode of Otto of Hapsburg's Austrian battalion, through the support given to the King of Greece and Mihailovich, down to the attempts to build Allied policy in the "liberated" areas around Giraud and Badoglio.

In no case has the policy proved ultimately successful. The Hapsburg adventure fizzled out amid general laughter; Mihailovich had to give way to Tito; Giraud disappeared from the political scene; while Badoglio could not spend one night in Rome as Prime Minister. Not even at the zenith of Allied military power have the peoples of Europe showed the least disposition to permit the policy of appeasement and compromise to decide their destinies. Even as a "hard-boiled," "realistic" policy—and to hell with the Four Freedoms!—it has been a failure, leading to nothing except the discredit of its promoters. If this has happened during a period of military triumph, one can easily imagine what will remain of the political authority of the Allies if they insist on the same course when the glamour of battle has faded and all kinds of annoying and thorny problems have replaced the excitement of the fight. It is therefore high time that the reactionary plans of the leaders be thrown aside as mischievous and unrealizable and that a policy based upon European facts emerge to fill the political vacuum which the lack of a responsible, democratic conduct of the war has created.

BURLING

FIRST TASK: END FASCISTS

The policy of favoring the most reactionary elements has had as its basis two factors, one of them difficult to change, the other easier to overcome. The first is monopoly capitalism, whose power and future hopes are directly menaced by every swing to the left in Europe. It is difficult to come to an agreement with the representatives of those financial interests which plan to draw Europe into their cartels as a deaf and dumb associate. They know with which groups they can deal, and they will support every effort to keep, or put, those groups in power. But there is a second element that can be won and made helpful to the democratic cause: namely, that large section of Allied opinion, particularly American opinion, which has accepted the official policy of the Allies not because it wants to see monopolistic capital the victor but simply because it has not understood what has been going on in Europe during the last fifteen years and therefore cannot understand what is going on now.

These people do not realize that fascism has divided Europe into two irreconcilable camps, that long before hostilities with the Axis coalition had begun, the fight against fascism had assumed the character of a war. It was a fight to the death in which people killed and were killed. It was more embittered and more violent than many civil wars. It was civil war, and a war without truce, without any prospect of conciliation. To destroy or to be destroyed: no space for a negotiated peace. For an American liberal, even for an American labor leader, indeed for anyone who has lived in the free atmosphere of America, the intensity of that fight is difficult to grasp. Americans have not lived under terror, perceived the meaning of police rule, endured the torture and death of their closest associates, experienced the vulgar brutality of fascist agitation smearing everything noble in man. They could sympathize with us European democrats but could not share entirely our hate.

In Europe the anti-fascist masses had decided to put an end to fascism forever when the war broke out. The war concentrated the struggle on the defeat of Hitler and the Axis coalition, but the underlying nature of the fight did not change. The bitter political conflict which had divided Europe was incorporated into the war of armies and machines. Everywhere the fascists and appeasers of 1938 and 1939 became the collaborationists of 1940. A repulsive M. de Brinon who before the war was hated as fascist was now doubly hated as fascist and as Quisling. Europe has had thousands and thousands of De Brinons. But it is not the individual but the regime, the movement—fascism itself—that must be destroyed. The end of the armed power of Hitler and Mussolini is a prerequisite to all else, but it will not mean the end of fascism, not after the policy of temporizing with fascism that has been practiced in these last four years. For the peoples of Europe the fight against fascism will still be an unfinished job. In North Africa, in Italy, in France, in every land that has so far been liberated, the people have shown their determination to get that job done. The first principle of a new, genuinely democratic policy on the part of the Allies must be to permit the people to do it. This will not be easy. American authorities have a strong predilection for "order"—even at the expense of freedom. And without a clear understanding of the irreconcilable nature of the political conflict in Europe, the natural tendency of American administrators will be to put obstacles in the way of the democratic forces. This tendency must be restrained if the war against fascism is to be conclusively won.

FULL POWER TO ANTI-FASCISTS

In America democracy exists, at least it has until today. In Europe it must be re-created. The first thing, therefore, that Americans must understand is that in the Europe of today and in the Europe of after the war, the democratic process will be quite different from what it is in the United States. That is why the AMG cannot fill the vacuum produced through the destruction of normal and free political life. The people themselves, through their own authorities, must take charge of the situation. More concretely, each national government, provisional or not, in so far as it actually represents the elements of resistance, must direct the arduous process of reestablishing democracy.

It will be a hard task and not a very pleasant one, but it must be undertaken and carried through to the last consequence. It is very well for the honorable Signor Orlando, with his eighty-five years and his liberal ideas dating from the pre-Mussolini era, to oppose the eradication of fascism on the ground that "fascism was never strong in Italy and that there is nothing to eradicate"—as he told Herbert L. Matthews in an interview published in the New York Times on June 30. But the workers of Milan and Turin who, only twenty-four hours after the downfall of Mussolini, went into the streets to fight both German and Fascists, knew better. And the French anti-fascists who two weeks ago killed Philippe Henriot, the Goebbels of Vichy, also knew better. And they know too that even the elimination of all the Philippe Henriots that infest Europe will not settle the question. To destroy fascism is something more complex than a problem of justice or revenge. Even in defeat fascism will try to raise its head. The restoration of democracy in Europe requires more than pious words and noble wishes.

It requires political experience, moral authority, knowledge of the people, of the masses, of the corrupt machinery of the past that must be destroyed. It requires understanding of the organizations, the union leaders, the men in the village, in the town, in the nation, who can be trusted with the process of democratic restoration. The fight will not cease with the firing of the last bullet, with the expulsion of fascists and collaborationists from power, with the liberation of the entire country, not even with the proclamation of formal peace in Europe. A period will follow in which the forces of fascism under every disguise, even the democratic disguise, will try to survive and to prepare for the next coup. To face that danger we must have at the head of every European government, provisional or permanent, people hardened in the fight against fascism, alert to the desires of the nation but at the same time ready to resist the demands of irresponsible groups inside the country, conciliatory and responsive in their relations with the Allied powers but ready also to resist any pressure from outside which would substitute favored reactionary elements for representatives of the popular will. The creation and protection of democracy in Europe requires strong governments in the period of transition.

In the economic field the problems that every state will have to settle call for a great deal of imagination, of audacity, of readiness to break with the social conceptions and the social privileges of the past. All persons acquainted with the present European situation agree that the reorganization of Europe will demand many socialistic measures. The liberation forces in every country have come out strongly in favor of increased public control over major industries and the national resources. For that, too, a strong government is necessary. Both political and economic conditions point in the direction of increased executive power. How this power can be controlled by the popular will, how to combine collectivism and freedom—these are the great questions that will confront post-war Europe. They can only be answered by the people themselves. Interference from outside, however well meant, can only produce, in magnified degree, the "chaos" which the AMG was created to avoid.

WHY EUROPE MUST GO LEFT

Europe must go to the left for many reasons. The first is the treason of the right. Everywhere the right as a whole, out of hostility to any form of European New Deal and out of fear of Russia, sympathized with fascism, forced the Munich capitulation, and advocated an understanding with the Axis powers. It was the "two hundred families" who wanted fascism in France before 1939. It was again the "two hundred families" from whom the greatest number of Vichy collaborationists derived. This alone would have been enough to push the peoples of Europe to the left.

Then there is the immense appeal of the Russian victories. It may be easy for capitalists and politicians to draw a distinction, when it suits them, between Russia and the Russian regime; to acclaim the heroism of the Russian armies and the ability of the Russian generals as qualities inherent in a great nation which has always been known for its pride and its courage. But to the common man, whose century Henry Wallace has announced, the Russian victories are more than that: they are victories of the only proletarian state in the world. Neither the Bolshevik purges, nor Russia's pact with Germany at the beginning of the war against Hitler, nor the Soviet recognition of Badoglio, whether or not they momentarily dampened enthusiasm for Russia, have altered the fact that the present Russian state was born of a socialist revolution and that an economic system prevails in Russia today quite different from the capitalistic system. To the peoples of Europe, that Socialist Russia which has so ably organized production, which has created the best army in the world, which has drawn its factory foremen, its engineers, its generals from the working class, remains an inspiration. This does not mean that the peoples of Europe would welcome in their respective countries the introduction of a system exactly like the Russian. We have already the report from Oscar Lange that the officers and soldiers of the Polish army organized in Russia expressed their preference for a non-Communist Poland. But the example of Russia greatly encourages Europe to move in the direction of socialism, if not toward a proletarian dictatorship.

Thirdly, British-American policy in itself, by supporting the most reactionary elements everywhere, has produced a defensive move which, in practice, has become a further move toward the left. In 1941 De Gaulle, who never expected to be rewarded for his fight against Hitler with the hostility of Washington, surrounded himself with representatives of the French bourgeoisie. These were the men most easily available—young diplomats stranded in London by the collapse of France, refugees who had had sufficient means or power to escape in the desperate days after the surrender—and they represented the element from which De Gaulle himself emerged. Darlanist expediency led De Gaulle to seek support among the forces of resistance in France and encouraged their sympathizers in North Africa to resist the maneuvers of Washington. He found this support mainly among Socialists and Communists, who comprised the bulk of the resistance movement. By taking a position against him, Washington pushed De Gaulle toward the left and at the same time reconciled the left to him.

Nor did the warm-hearted words about Franco spoken by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons have a different effect. The answer to that ill-inspired tribute was a stiffening of guerrilla activities and a call from the leaders of the underground to the Spanish people to "prepare for the coming rebellion." This was the first time since the end of the Spanish war that such an expression had been used in an illegal manifesto. That, inside Spain itself. Among the political exiles Mr. Churchill's speech resulted in a series of statements by the most temperate leaders of the Republican parties which even the left Socialists could not have strengthened. Thus in Spain as in France Anglo-American policy has succeeded in making the trend more radical.

For two years reports have come out of the occupied countries which have reflected very well the state of mind there. As early as 1942 André Philip, a moderate Socialist just escaped from France, a member of De Gaulle's committee, gave an impressive picture of the discussions that were going on in the French underground about the post-war world. He described a new Europe in the making. But to the State Department and the Foreign Office the view of diplomatic experts of the old regime like M. Alexis Leger, or of amateur diplomats like Señor de Madariaga, seemed more important than all the news coming from inside Europe. On the other hand, certain distinguished columnists like Anne O'Hare McCormick have interpreted the stories of the hungry and tired populations as proof of an apathetic Europe. We hope that they will pay equal attention, not only to the organized struggle of the people of France, but to the deep significance of the Copenhagen strike—a strike that symbolizes something more than natural patriotic hate of the invader. It clearly reveals how the very peaceable Danish worker has become a revolutionary through the development of the anti-fascist fight.

The mistake of not having seen clearly the dangers inherent in Hitler's rise to power has been paid for by a war. The mistake of not seeing the meaning of the war may be paid for by another war. But before that we may be confronted with a tragic and ironic situation—the liberated countries of Europe struggling to free themselves from their liberators.

Have Faith in France

BY JOSEPH CHAPIRO

IN THIS week of the great French national holiday, Bastille Day, which coincides with the first stage in the liberation of the old Norman soil and with the arrival in the United States of General Charles de Gaulle, it is well to reaffirm one's faith in France: in the France of Joan of Arc which drove out the enemy from abroad; in the France of 1789 which cleansed its soil of the enemy within and proclaimed the immortal principles of liberty, equality, fraternity; in the France which, plunged into the mire by its traitors, is now slowly emerging, purified by the blood of its heroes.

There is a well-known adage that every man has two countries—his own and France. That is why four years ago when France went to pieces militarily and even seemed to deny its moral self, every civilized man felt stricken in his most cherished ideals. This nostalgia, this insatiable idealism which we call the esprit européen is conditioned less by geography than by spiritual needs. For one can be a good American or a good Englishman and at the same time a "good European." Did not the insular Winston Churchill, in the course of his last great speech before the House of Commons, claim for himself the title of "good European"? But there can be no Europe without France, which is its essence, as Paris is the essence of France.

It is natural, then, that at many different times Paris has been considered the spiritual capital of the world, the source of its ideas and tastes. Yet Paris, in the course of its history, has often been occupied and sacked by predatory invaders. In the nineteenth century alone and in the space of less than sixty years it was taken three times by enemy armies. In June, 1940, the heart of France, Paris, was again struck a blow so violent that the whole nation was brought to ruin. A hysterical mistrust of France seized the world. "France is finished!" "France is dead!"—these words were on all lips. No one remembered that such charges were as old as France itself. They return to the lips and the pens of witnesses of French history as regularly as the refrain of old French songs. For the thousand-year past of France contains as many disasters as periods of glory.

No other great European nation has been, through the centuries, alternately so despised and so admired, so pitied and so envied; no other has so often been pronounced dead and then extolled for its vitality and overflowing youth. "I have been told that never before was there so much baseness in the world, so many crimes, so many sins, so many vices, as today in France," Henry V of England said to Charles d'Orléan, after taking him prisoner at the Battle of Agincourt in 1415. It may be argued that this severe judgment was uttered by an enemy. But it differs no whit from French testimony given in the same century. Indeed, is there any more poignant or more sincerely despairing account of the moral, intellectual, and material disintegration of France than that of the anonymous author of "Le Journal d'un Bourgeois de Paris," covering the period 1405 to 1449?

Yet scarcely had Joan of Arc appeared and her work been completed when the country began to recover with astonishing rapidity. A new age was born—the age of the greatest French poet and the greatest French painter, the age of Villon and Fouquet. Less than a century later the spirit of the age was reflected in a very different book from that of the gloomy Parisian bourgeois. Ronsard's "La Franciade" presented a dazzling image of a happy France, the envy of all Europe, and Rabelais's ribald laughter shook the farthest corners of his country. But even in the sixteenth century this brilliant France was more than once darkened by disaster. Francis I was captured by the Spanish and to obtain his freedom had to sign in 1536 the famous Treaty of Madrid, which despoiled his kingdom of some of its richest provinces. Yet as always France recovered rapidly and again became so powerful that it could force Charles V to renounce the Spanish throne. But no sooner had it gained this victory than it was torn by internal and religious strife. The misery of the people mounted to a climax. Finally, Henry II established order again, to die at the hands of an assassin shortly afterward.

The grand siècle of Louis XIV, when France was the richest and most powerful country in Europe, also witnessed disasters rivaling those of preceding centuries. In fact, at the end of the seventeenth century and the beginning of the eighteenth, during the War of the Spanish Succession, France was in such straits that observers spoke of it in the same terms that had been used by the contemporaries of Joan of Arc. Hardly one-tenth of the people had enough to eat. Even the king's ministers, we are told by Fénelon, were reduced to "living a vie de Bohême and not at all like men who rule the country." Nevertheless, France recovered, and the eighteenth century became the age of Rousseau, Voltaire, and Diderot, the glorious century of the Encyclopedists.

In 1789 the Revolution began; in 1793 France was invaded from all sides—north, south, east, and west. With magnificent élan the revolutionary armies expelled the enemy. In 1797 came financial bankruptcy. Two years later French currency was the most stable in Europe! Napoleon made the world tremble; then his empire crumbled and France was again invaded. During the nineteenth century collapse and recovery succeeded each other as before, the greatest disaster being the defeat of 1871 and the consequent territorial mutilation and economic ruin. But when the government launched a domestic loan a year later to obtain funds with which to redeem a part of the territory occupied by Prussia, the country was so far restored that within twenty-four hours the loan was oversubscribed fourteen times.

Thus the inexorable rhythm of French history has never varied. The lesson of that history, however, has not been learned. Funeral orations over France have continued to alternate with dithyrambic praises. The contradictory judgments of observers are not to be explained solely by the changing course of events. But the events do much to explain the individual and collective character of the French, which is the source of our faith in France. A contemporary French poet has remarked that his compatriots are the most open and at the same time the most enigmatic people in the world. Their frankness and their lack of hypocrisy make it easy to study them and lead one to believe that one knows them. Then suddenly a storm breaks, the Frenchman reacts in an unexpected manner, and one perceives a side he has not shown before.

This dual nature is the product of his native soil and his history working in opposition to each other but both fashioning him simultaneously and unceasingly. No people are a more faithful image of their country than the French. Observe them closely and you note the same proportion, the same gaiety, the same harmony as in the aspect and products of the land. But in each Frenchman is another man whom history has hammered rudely on its forge, repeatedly dealing him heavier blows than the people of any other great European nation.

The history of the French has developed characteristics which give sharpness to their criticism and gravity to their thoughts. A Frenchman knows how to be serious without appearing to be, often masking his earnestness with a gentle irony that borders on insouciance. In reality he is as thoughtful as he is gay, as profound as he is jolly. In France originated most of the currents of thought that have nourished Europe for the last four centuries. France is the home of fruitful skepticism and creative criticism. It is the home of the democratic revolution and of socialism, too, for socialism was formulated in France long before Karl Marx gave it a scientific base. France is also the country where racial equality was first proclaimed and realized. France was the first great power that allowed Negroes to take part in the government; a black deputy from Haiti was even elected vice-president of the Chamber of Deputies. And no one took umbrage when he married a white Frenchwoman.

These extremes in French character can be, one admits, most disconcerting. But if you look closely you will see that instead of being mutually exclusive they form a remarkable harmony, a harmony that is manifested in that common sense which, according to Descartes, is the most widely shared thing in France. A violent shock can for a brief period dissociate the elements in this harmony, but they are soon reunited. French stability and balance are shown in the way France remains faithful to tradition while constantly renewing itself either by revolution or by conscious evolution. It may be said that the French are the only people in Europe who without breaking with their past have been able to turn it into a revolutionary factor. I still recall the thunderous voice of Jean Jaurès, the great Socialist tribune, who was so thoroughly imbued with the French tradition. When his reactionary adversaries in the Chamber of Deputies accused him of betraying the French heritage, he turned the charge against them. "It is we who incarnate the true French tradition," he cried, hammering each word home with his fist. "You guard the ashes; we carry the torch."

Logically enough, these traits of character have produced in the French another characteristic of prime importance for their future—a passion for unity. Their regional diversities have made them a savagely individualistic people, while their history has endued them with a spirit of unity which has emerged each time it has been necessary to remake France. However quarrelsome and divided into bitterly antagonistic political parties, this people has always recovered its unity when the enemy dealt it a blow which the world thought mortal.

That is why, apart from the Revolution, the points around which its history has crystallized have not been great events but the names of persons who embodied French unity. Today this unity is forming around the name of Charles de Gaulle. In other times the General might not have been so much to the people's taste. For France has learned to distrust generals in positions of political power. Its experiences with Napoleon, MacMahon, Boulanger, and finally with Pétain were such that it has no wish to repeat them now. What draws the French irresistibly toward De Gaulle, and what France will never forget, is that in the midst of the most appalling confusion and the most formidable treason ever plotted on its soil Charles de Gaulle was the first to rise up and declare that the invasion was only a battle lost, that France was continuing the war at the side of its allies and would continue to fight until its liberation was complete.

Have faith in France! It is no older and no more effete than it was at the time of Joan of Arc. Let us recall how often France has aroused the admiration of the world after a collapse that seemed fatal, and how each time all humanity felt rejuvenated. It will be the same now. It is the rule with France, the rhythm of its history, the cadence of its national life.

Willkie's Choice

BY ARNOLD BEICHMAN

IN 1940 Wendell L. Willkie received 22,304,755 votes, an all-time record for a Republican Presidential nominee. Normally, an unsuccessful candidate remains titular head of his party, is its spokesman on major issues until the next convention. In Willkie's case his defeat ended his importance among the Republican Party political mechanics. Despite his personal popularity with Republican voters the G. O. P. bosses regard him as the little man who wasn't there, and how they wish he'd go away.

Willkie is an incubus weighing on the party councils. Governor Dewey, the party's Presidential candidate, dislikes Willkie personally—Willkie heartily reciprocates his feeling—but yearns for a kind word of indorsement. Willkie's credo is anathema to the McCormicks, the Hoovers, and the Deweys. Willkie is the Republican Party's "that man." The party leadership will damn him if he does and damn him if he doesn't.

The question is: What will Willkie do?

At this writing, the 1940 Republican standard-bearer has avoided committing himself to the Dewey candidacy. On the day of the New York Governor's nomination, Willkie offered his congratulations, and Dewey sent a cold thank-you reply. Since then, there has been a batch of stories inspired by Dewey forces that Willkie is getting ready to come over. Minor appeasement offers have been made by Dewey, all ineffective. Willkie is interested in principles and platforms, not in prestige or personalities. A yarn that Clare Luce had conferred with Willkie on the possibilities of a negotiated peace between the two men was killed by Willkie's statement that he hadn't talked with Mrs. Luce in several months.

Four courses are open to Willkie: (1) he can indorse Dewey and participate actively in the campaign; (2) he can remain silent until the very last minute and tell inquiring reporters on Election Day that he voted for Dewey; (3) he can indorse F. D. R., whose fourth-term candidacy is a certainty, and campaign on his behalf; (4) he can withhold indorsement of either nominee and carry on a needling "educational" campaign in line with his own views. Unless some major concessions are made to his forthright stand on international cooperation, I doubt that Willkie will actively campaign for the Republican ticket.

His only two public statements since June 26 have been a criticism of the Republican Party's plank on international cooperation, which he implied was both meaningless and a phony, and a few words to show his irritation at the expulsion from the post of G. O. P. national treasurer of his friend and supporter Sinclair Weeks, and at the election as vice-chairman of Werner Schroeder, a disciple of the Colonel McCormick school of isolationism and misanthropy.

Privately Willkie has been more outspoken. He is reported to question the political integrity of Dewey, the firmness of his belief in anything except the narrow toryism of his supporters. Willkie has made it clear that his differences with the McCormick-Hoover-Dewey school are not on foreign policy alone but on domestic affairs as well—labor, treatment of minorities, price control.

Even a cursory reading of Willkie's articles published before the Republican convention will disclose how vast is the area of disagreement between him and Dewey. Max Lerner has described Willkie's philosophy as "creative conservatism." I would go farther and say that Willkie's philosophy is rapidly developing into a creative liberalism. Whether or not you think Willkie means what he says, it cannot be denied that he has spoken incisively and in the best liberal tradition.

In their present state of mind, Dewey and his advisers feel little need for Willkie's support, although, perversely, they'd love to have it. They know his backing may well mean the electoral votes of California, Oregon, Washington, and several of the New England states. Willkie's price is not a Cabinet post, or an ambassadorship, or some other plum. Willkie simply wants to drive the primitives who control the Republican Party out of power. To him, they menace the party's future, and, more important, they menace the possibility of genuine contributions to a better world order by the United States.

But Willkie is a politician as well as a maverick statesman. Though party regularity is not the shibboleth to him it is to the ward-heelers and precinct captains, it is a weighty consideration; it must weigh with a man who still dreams of achieving the Presidency.

Willkie's political future is, faute de mieux, entwined with the future of the Republican Party. The defeat of Dewey by Roosevelt would strengthen Willkie immeasurably. On the other hand, if Dewey should be elected, Willkie would be kaput. Dewey's victory would be interpreted as a repudiation of his rival's principles, and Willkie's importance in the Republican Party would become minimal. Willkie is of course aware of all this.

The most formidable problem which he faces is the need to make a decision in the near future. A protracted silence on his part can only weaken the importance of his ultimate choice. His war of nerves on Dewey and his cohorts may be irritating to Dewey, but it can also become boring to the average American voter. Essentially, Willkie has made his decision, even though it may be as subconscious as it is unspoken. The course of the campaign can only strengthen his mistrust of Dewey, no matter how far over Dewey goes to escape the McCormick millstone around his neck. If Willkie finally breaks his silence and indorses Dewey, it will be the most reluctant and insincere decision he ever made.

I know Willkie. Whatever his weaknesses, insincerity and pussyfooting are not among them.

In the Wind

THE CREDIT GUIDE COMPANY of Marshalltown, Iowa, is circulating a "patriotic" leaflet advising all Americans to reject the "most sinister, dangerous, and revolutionary legislation ever introduced in the American Congress" —the Wagner-Dingell bill. "Do you want an 'OPA' to ration your medical care?" the company asks. "Do you want to wade through government red tape to secure medical supplies from some bureaucratic clerk who thinks in terms of cost rather than of your medical welfare? (Under similar systems, only those drugs listed by the government can be prescribed.)" The Credit Guide Company derives a good part of its income from collecting on overdue bills for Marshalltown doctors.

GOOD-NEIGHBOR NOTE: Some merchants in nearby nations, Printer's Ink reports, now advertise that their goods are not from Argentina.

COLUMNIST CEDRIC ADAMS, in the Minneapolis Star Journal, says that delegates, alternates, and speakers at the Republican convention were all schooled to make no mention of democracy. Republic is the word.

THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS sent six reporters with identical theoretical income-tax data to six different deputy collectors in the Revenue Building in Washington. They came back with six different answers. The returns were $17.39, $6.73, $12.15, $16.31, $12.20, and $16.77. Another reporter then went to the head of the department, who called in his super tax expert, who, after some time, emerged with what the chief said was the correct answer—$19.33.

ADVERTISEMENT IN THE NEW YORKER: In war as in peace McCall's is edited directly to the three primary interests of the American Woman—Her Heart, Her Home, Herself.

FESTUNG EUROPA: According to the Yearbook of the Bank of the International Settlements, Germany's foreign clearing debts for goods delivered up to September 30, 1943, reached 54,600 million marks. Creditors in order of rank were: France, 4,400 million; Holland, 4,010 million; Belgium, 3,845 million; the "Protectorate," 2,425 million; Italy, 2,000 million; Denmark, 1,890 million.

Those Gentle Danes

BY GUNNAR LEISTIKOW

IF THERE is any truth in reports from Stockholm, the Danes have won a major political and moral victory. The Germans must have suffered a tremendous loss of face in all occupied countries, for they acceded to Danish demands only after their threats to starve and bomb Copenhagen had failed completely to impress the strikers. Fantastic as this failure may seem to a world accustomed to Nazi ruthlessness, it is not entirely inexplicable if one reviews German actions in Denmark during the past ten months.

On August 29 of last year, when the Danes refused to make further concessions to the German will—to surrender Danish saboteurs to the mercy of German courts or to deliver Danish Jews to German executioners—the Nazis proclaimed a state of siege. They disarmed the Danish army after several days' fighting, dismissed the government, and made the king a virtual prisoner.

At that time everyone expected the Germans would carry out their threat to proclaim Denmark a "protectorate" and let the Gestapo rule it. But they did not. Instead they did their utmost to persuade the Danes to resume the administration of their own affairs. They went to the prisoner-King and asked him to appoint a new Cabinet, even one of his choosing. The King said that was impossible. In the first place, he was a prisoner; his hands were tied. In the second place, since he was a constitutional sovereign, he could not appoint a new government without accepting the resignation of the old—and by preventing the old government from functioning, the Germans had automatically deprived it of the power to resign.

All right, the Germans said, we shall see. They assembled, by force, the members of the old Cabinet and told them either to resign or to resume their functions. The ministers unanimously refused to do either. This, they said, is a meeting of Cabinet ministers, certainly, but it is not a Cabinet meeting because it has not been summoned in the proper way. The Prime Minister added that he was unable to summon a Cabinet meeting because the Germans prevented him from functioning by their extraordinary measures of August 29.

The Germans went to Parliament. Look here, they said, this is ridiculous. We want to play ball with you, and what does your government do but start a sitdown strike. Get another government, and we will be friends. The representatives of Parliament's five parties declared—unanimously—that Parliament still had full confidence in the old government. It was certainly not their fault that the Germans prevented it from functioning.

Exasperated, the Germans went back to the King. But he was a constitutional monarch, and he could do nothing against the advice of Parliament. The truth was that the Danish politicians were none too eager to assume further responsibility for what was happening in the country. They had actually felt a sense of relief when Danish autonomy was kicked overboard.

The Germans gave up. The Danes were given a good dose of the Gestapo. However, in comparison with the treatment accorded other German-occupied countries, they were handled gently: fewer shootings, fewer mass arrests, no interdiction of political parties or unions, no seizure of newspapers. The state and local administrations were allowed to function.

The Danish answer to even these half-hearted concessions was a wave of sabotage unequaled in any other occupied country. Two hundred acts of sabotage were reported in the last four months of 1943, ranging from wrecking of troop trains to destruction of well-guarded war plants—an average of fifteen to twenty cases a day in a country of less than four million inhabitants.

The Nazis answered in kind. If the Danes bombed factories, the Germans bombed crowded movie houses. If the Danes killed traitors, the Germans answered with the murder of well-known Danish patriots. To do the dirty work, they formed a special gang of a few thousand ruffians, the Shalburgkorps, named after a Danish Nazi who had fallen as a volunteer in Russia. This corps is advertised as a legion of Danish volunteers to fight bolshevism. Actually, it was commandeered from the German minority in North Slesvig, traditional Dane haters. After some toughening up at the eastern front, the corps was sent to Denmark on a "furlough."

Such is the background for the events which began on June 22 with the demolition by saboteurs of Denmark's largest machine-gun plant. The situation developed into a general strike when the Germans established martial law, made wholesale arrests of union leaders, and shot eight hostages. Unrest spread. Hundreds of people were killed. When the Germans shut off water and supplies and threatened to bomb Copenhagen, the Danes dared them to go ahead. The Nazis balked, as they had done the previous summer, apparently more jittery than their captives.

After August 29, 1943, the Danes interpreted the Germans' vacillation as a sign of weakness—which it probably was—and acted accordingly. They will hardly interpret German hesitancy differently this time.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IN THE official bulletins of the German army command the winged one-ton bombs which have been shot into southern England since June 16 are called simply "V-1" (Vergeltungswaffe No. 1)—without further explanation. The bombardment is described, quite undramatically, as "harassing fire" or occasionally as "retaliation fire." No more than a few short paragraphs a day are given to the whole affair. As so often in the last two years, the generals are making an unmistakable effort to keep their record free of breathless exaggerations and boastings. They leave that to Goebbels's department.

The ecstasies in which the Propaganda Minister indulges and which he seeks to arouse are all the more colossal. His method at first was to try to convince the public that it was already in a state of tremendous excitement and bliss about the new weapon. The Nationalzeitung of Essen, for example, published the following on June 17:

> Newspapers can always gauge the degree of interest evoked by a piece of news by the number of inquiries received at their office. Judged by this standard, we must assume that yesterday's High Command communiqué has aroused more interest than even the news of the Anglo-American invasion. On Friday afternoon our telephones were not silent for a moment. People kept asking excitedly whether the news was actually true.

A newspaper in Pommern declared:

> The German people intend to savor the new facts about the retaliation weapon to the very dregs, like a delicious nectar.

A paper in Central Germany went into raptures:

> Retribution has come! The tension which we have felt for so long has found its outlet. The tremendous pressure of the period of waiting has been relieved. Retribution has come for our murdered workers! Retribution for the travelers killed in trains! Retribution for the men, women, and children slaughtered in the fields and on the high roads! Retribution for many tens of thousands of injured civilians! Retribution for gutted German towns and villages! Retribution for gutted hospitals!

In the succeeding days one new device after another was used to whip up the people's feelings. Horrible names were coined for V-1—"dynamite meteors," "hell hounds," and the like. How "the enemy was seized by fear," and why, was dwelt on voluptuously:

> England is exposed to the hell hounds without any chance of adequate defense. The effect of the new weapon is tremendous, and it may be assumed that its impact on the people, as on the buildings, is many times greater than that of the heaviest Anglo-American terror bombs. (Nationalzeitung, Essen.)

The alleged groaning and whining of the English and their despairing appeals to German humanitarianism were ridiculed:

> We expect that either directly or through intermediaries appeals will soon be made to our notorious kindliness, but we have lost all such feeling. As long as there are English towns, we will remember that there is not much left of many of our towns. As long as there are tongues to cry for mercy, we will remember that our hatred must outlaw all compassion. Recalling what the British have done to us, we will not have the slightest pity if the number of Britons killed vastly exceeds our own casualties from bombings. Now the enemy knows that the threat of retaliation was not propaganda but reality. (Münchener Neueste Nachrichten.)

Still more violent and decisive surprises than the hell hounds were announced for the future. In a speech delivered in Leipzig on Gutenberg's anniversary State Secretary Neumann of the Propaganda Ministry said:

> The V-1 is doing its work. More weapons, even more effective, will follow. All this is only the beginning.

And of course he seized on the opportunity to boast that here was one more proof of the truth of every promise and every announcement of the Führer's:

> We have not forgotten the mocking smile of many compatriots when we spoke about revenge. Some people regarded us as deplorable fools who did not realize that the Führer promised revenge only to keep bombed-out people in check during terror raids. Now it is our turn to look around with a mocking smile. Just as his promise of revenge was redeemed by the Führer, so also will be his promise that the enemy in the midst of his invasion will suffer an annihilating defeat.

One wonders what has been the effect on the public of this superhuman propaganda effort. The Swiss correspondents have the impression that the trick has once again been successful. The correspondent of the Appenzeller Zeitung wrote on June 21 that the German people for the moment were "drunk with the glowing reports of the terrible effects of the hell hounds." A dispatch to the Sankt Galler Tagblatt of June 25 also spoke of the undoubted temporary effect on "the childishly gullible German public of the huffing, puffing, screaming hellish concert of propaganda." But the grim reality is bound soon to darken the glowing visions of approaching victory. Six days after the start of this new period of delirium, according to the Basler Nationalzeitung, an ironical inscription was chalked on the walls of buildings in Hanover:

Jetzt zieht man schon Grossmutter ein—
Soll das wohl die Vergeltung sein?

(Now they are drafting even Grandma—
Is that what they mean by retaliation?)

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

IN "A Walk in the Sun" (Knopf, $2) Harry Brown has written a vignette of the landing of an American platoon on a beachhead in Italy. The platoon has been assigned the objective of occupying a farmhouse six miles inland and destroying a bridge that lies just beyond it. The lieutenant in command is killed in a freakish way before the men land; the sergeant who takes over is killed immediately afterward. A second sergeant goes to pieces when half the distance is covered—six miles can be very long—but the job is completed under the direction of a corporal. The men meet with no real resistance until they reach their objective, but several of them are wounded or killed by passing planes.

Mr. Brown gives us a vivid picture of the behavior of a group of men set down in a strange country to carry out an isolated assignment which tends to seem unreal and irrelevant. The dialogue is good and often funny. The "lines" and jokes in these passages are reminiscent of the artificial patter one hears over the radio, but they are probably authentic. I have the impression that American talk, when other people are listening and especially when the talkers are under a strain, tends to be more and more an imitation of the radio and movie imitations of American talk.

"A Walk in the Sun," like the action it describes, is a small marginal operation successfully carried out. But it reads like a case history rather than an imaginative evocation. Mr. Brown writes within what might be called the New Yorker convention. His prose is deft. It is also self-conscious and self-protective. His is a behavioristic account of war and death as it might be recorded by a telescopic camera with a sound track attached. The New Yorker convention is an effective one. It is also limited. The writer who is so constantly careful to keep his distance from his material, whose restraint is a matter of convention rather than of feeling, is not likely to produce first-rate fiction; by the same token he may well produce, as Mr. Brown has done, an expert and ingratiating facsimile.

For the other kind of restraint read Flaubert's A Simple Heart. It is almost enough to compare the two titles. The beautiful story of Félicité is on my mind because I have just read it again in the most recent edition of "Three Tales"—a volume in the New Classics Series (New Directions, $1). Harry Levin has written an introduction.

N. B.: I am poaching on Diana Trilling's fiction preserve because she is taking a brief vacation. She will resume her regular comment in a few weeks.

Bernard Shaw is recorded as having said that when people ask him what has happened in his long lifetime he does not refer them to the newspaper files or to the authorities but to Upton Sinclair's novels—the latest one is "Presidential Agent" (Viking Press, $3). Mr. Sinclair must certainly have the complete files of the New York Times or at least the Index at his elbow as he writes. His energy and good-will are beyond dispute. So are his brashness and his naivete. And the uncomplicated, eager vulgarity with which he concocts bedroom scenes between his overworked robot, Lanny Budd, and President Roosevelt leaves me gasping.

> The President was lying in bed, wearing pajamas of blue pongee covered by a knitted blue sweater, crew-neck style. . . .
>
> So the two conspirators were alone. Lanny took the chair by the bedside, and the other coughed slightly and reached for his handkerchief. "I am supposed to have a cold," he said. "I am growing suspicious of my subconscious mechanism, for I notice that I develop the sniffles whenever I have a tiresome schedule like today."

Surely if Mr. Roosevelt reads this book he will have one, if not a hundred, of his most embarrassing moments.

Someone put forward the other day the common, always dubious argument that Mr. Sinclair's effort, while it may not be art, is nevertheless valuable. In this case the reasons given were that Mr. Sinclair is dispensing the accumulated knowledge of a long lifetime, that his point of view is "enlightened," and that a great many people will learn a lot about world affairs from the liberal point of view by reading his books. That assumes, in the first place, a capacity to put up with, let alone believe in, the peripatetic, ubiquitous, omniscient, and fatuous Lanny Budd which I for one don't possess. It also assumes the desirability of justifying everything that Roosevelt has done. I can't say I read the whole book, but what I did read of it was, among other things, a continuous apologetic for F. D. R. I'll take my history straight—though it should be said that any resemblance between this book and fiction is purely coincidental.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Deadly Praise

GIRAUD AND THE AFRICAN SCENE. By G. Ward Price. The Macmillan Company. $3.

GENERAL GIRAUD faded out of the French picture so suddenly that this book, which came to praise Caesar, serves instead to bury him. It does this job effectively—so effectively, indeed, that anyone seeking to resurrect the General will find this literary tombstone a heavy obstacle. For it proves, unintentionally of course, that however brave a soldier Giraud may be, he lacks the savoir-faire which is indispensable to a political leader. The very fact that he gave this book his official authorization is eloquent: did he not know that G. Ward Price, bright star of the London Daily Mail, was distinguished chiefly for his pre-war eulogies of the fascist dictators?

Mr. Price has, of course, ceased to extol Hitler and Mussolini, but he still seems to find their ideas attractive and looks with an approving eye on those men in the United Nations camp who are tainted with them. Thus we find him extolling such unsavory figures as Lemaigre-Dubreuil, the peanut king of West Africa, who recently fled from Algiers to Spain.

This notorious collaborationist is pictured as one of the heroes of the Allied landing in North Africa, although the most that can be said for him is that, having done well out of his business dealings with the Germans, he was smart enough to see the wisdom of reinsuring his profits with the Allies.

Mr. Price's account of the months immediately following the North African invasion skims lightly over the facts. He defends the policy of cooperation with the Pétainists on grounds of principle as well as expediency. He seeks to give the impression that only "Jews and Communists" supported De Gaulle and excuses the prolonged internment of the Spanish Loyalists—all "Communists" to him—and other anti-fascist prisoners.

Naturally Mr. Price is cool to the claims of the Committee of National Liberation to represent the French people and even goes so far as to imply that it has no influence within France. Frenchmen, he suggests, are likely to prefer, after liberation, a government headed by the almost forgotten President Lebrun, who could constitutionally summon a National Assembly composed of pre-1940 deputies and senators. Realizing, however, that such a solution would, in fact, be violently opposed, he hints that the Allied General Staff might seek to push General Giraud forward as a man "standing outside and above politics."

In a comparison meant to be flattering Mr. Price speaks of Giraud as a new Marshal MacMahon. After the defeat of 1870 MacMahon was elected to the Presidency by the Royalists, who hoped he would prepare the way for a restoration of the monarchy. "MacMahon's own instincts," says Mr. Price, "inclined him that way, but since it gradually became clear that the Republican Party was the strongest in the state, the Marshal's own sense of constitutional duty led him to resign his office." This quoted sentence represents British understatement at its worst. It pictures a conservative old soldier patriotically and gracefully submitting to the voice of the people, whereas MacMahon and his backers almost plunged France into civil war by their obstinate resistance to the mandate of the voters.

France does not want another MacMahon and will not thank Mr. Price for the offer. Yet we should perhaps be grateful for this book, which by its deadly praise may do more to kill the Giraud legend than a dozen deliberate exposures of it. KEITH HUTCHISON

How to Deal with Japan

NIPPON: THE CRIME AND PUNISHMENT OF JAPAN. By Willis Lamott. The John Day Company. $2.50.

SINCE Pearl Harbor the flood of books explaining how Japan "got that way" has given us the comfortable feeling that we now understand our enemy in the Pacific. This is an illusion. We don't really know so much about him, as Willis Lamott's thorough study of how the Japanese mind was molded during the thirties helps us to discover. For one thing, the language barrier is too difficult for more than a handful of Westerners to cross. We have never read Japanese fascist literature in its originals, nor even had a "Mein Kampf" in translation. It is significant that the only book comparable to the present volume in its intimate probing of the debasement of Japanese thought—D. C. Holtom's "Modern Japan and Shinto Nationalism"—was also written by a man who had mastered the language and entered into the arcana of Japan's fascist ideology. Nor is it an accident that both men were professionally interested in religion and were, by their work, brought into direct contact with the Japanese school and classroom.

A psychological barrier also exists. The peculiar essences distilled from emperor worship lie outside the range of our normal experience. To dismiss them with the epithet "fantastic" is to turn our back on the path to understanding and effective post-war remedial action. Japan's present rulers, in Lamott's striking metaphor, have created a nation that is "physically . . . as modern as a two-man submarine but mentally . . . neolithic." More descriptively, they have found "in a primitive and archaic tribalism the sanctions for life in industrial society and the motivation for world conquest." But neither metaphors nor summary generalizations are a substitute for the tracing out of these patterns of thought in detail and for a demonstration of how they were coercively imposed by every device of indoctrination against stubborn popular opposition through a decade of effort. And Mr. Lamott has done an invaluable job of interpretation in this succinct handbook of Nipponese ideology.

Lacking such a picture as his of the concrete reality, we have too often sought to piece out our thinking by resort to supposed parallels which do not in fact exist. Analogies between Nazism and Nipponism are deceptive. Japanese ideologists wield a more potent weapon than any in the Nazi armory. The ruling classes are the same in each case: the giant monopolists, the great landowners, the military caste. The ends sought are the same. But to attribute to Nipponism, as a tool of Japan's ruling oligarchy, the characteristics of Nazism is to water it down. The Führer, the party, even the German absolutist state, German blood and the German master race, are secular far more than mystical instruments and concepts. Against these set an "unbroken" line of god-emperors, "bodily, biologically . . . the State" and descended from the Sun Goddess, whose blood is shared through a different lineage by all members of the nation-family living in the God-favored land of Japan. On this foundation the finished ideological structure of Nipponism was reared during the past decade. The completed apologetics "boldly identifies the living emperor with the soul of God and the unifying life or spirit of the universe and asserts that the emperor is the earthly manifestation of the Sun Goddess, 'the progenitress of the whole cosmos.' To Japan, the divine land, under the leadership of the Son of Heaven, is intrusted the divine task of creating a universal family comprising all mankind and of chastising perverse nations impeding the carrying out of this celestial undertaking."

This is the context in which the "holy war" in China must be viewed, and likewise the creation of a benevolently ruled kodo (imperial way) state in Manchuria. Japan's synthetic fascist party naturally becomes the Imperial Rule Assistance Association. And the supremely effective all-embracing slogan of hakko ichi-u makes "universal brotherhood" synonymous with "universal sway of the emperor."

The centrality of the god-emperor in this ideology of conquest by a master race is the inescapable finding of Lamott's study, as it was of Holtom's. Subtract the emperor, and the whole edifice collapses; keep the emperor, and the liberal, democratic forces in Japan are saddled with an enormous handicap, even if the "moderates" form the first postwar government. For the so-called "moderates," representing the court circle, the business monopolists, and the great landowners, also want the god-emperor as a buttress to their privileged minority rule. To keep the emperor in this "stabilizing" function also means to keep him in his conquering mission. "No liberal reformer of Japan should be trusted," writes Lamott, "who hesitates to deal radically with the problem of the place and person of the ruler. It cannot be reiterated too often or too emphatically that since the ideas of racial superiority, world mission, and the perpetuity and world-wide extension of the imperial rule are so closely tied up in the sacrosanct figure of the emperor, Japan will always be a menace to the world so long as the garments of divinity are permitted to cling to this particular specimen of the genus homo. If this ghost is not exorcised at the outset, it will rise up to haunt future generations."

How is the ghost to be exorcised? Lamott charts the only thoroughly adequate course. First, there must be an overwhelming military defeat; Japan's fascist oligarchs have provided for every contingency except total defeat. Second, the resulting "disturbances . . . will be salutary," and should not be curbed. "Social chaos may determine the course of constitutional changes more definitely than outside interference, and here it is possible that an army of occupation may defeat its own ends by curbing popular uprisings out of which change will be forced and new leadership emerge." Third, a new "moderate" government formed by "political scene-shifting" should not be accepted lest it destroy the possibility of advance. "The only safe rule to go by is one that no government set up by the ruling classes of Japan in order to deal with the victors after the war can be trusted. . . . Constitutional government superimposed from above has been tried in Japan and has failed miserably, because no people is ever appreciative of rights and privileges for which it has not struggled, fought, and died." Fourth, popular initiative should be encouraged, even if the results are temporarily chaotic. "Indeed, it is foolsh to assume that any effective degree of democratic government can be achieved in Japan without such a surge from below. . . . The realization of social and political democracy in the future depends upon the achievement of popular self-consciousness and self-realization, which can come as the result of a social and political overturning of the extent that may be expected only after a disastrous and overwhelming defeat in war. The power of the demonic national ideology, moreover, cannot be broken by any 'tinkering with the works' but only when the authorities can no longer boast that Japan alone among the nations of the world has never had a revolution, and that social and political rights have been gained not by popular demand but by imperial benevolence."

T. A. BISSON

RUSSIA
THEN AND ALWAYS

What makes RUSSIANS act like RUSSIANS?

By Nina Verhovskoy Hyde and Fillmore Hyde

IN the new Russia of today, the old Russia of common land and cooperative effort survives and, in many ways, prevails. Russia Then and Always traces Russia's culture and traditions that are the heritage of the modern Russian and distinguish him from the modern American, Frenchman, or Englishman. It is a book that will enable Americans to understand the psychology, the beliefs and the prejudices of Russians today—and their role as a nation in the making of tomorrow. Maps. $3.00

2 W. 45th St. Coward-McCann, Inc. New York 19

A Memoir of Duffus

THE INNOCENTS AT CEDRO: A MEMOIR OF THORSTEIN VEBLEN AND SOME OTHERS, WITH THE ADVICE AND CONSENT OF WILLIAM M. DUFFUS. By R. L. Duffus. The Macmillan Company. $2.

IN THIS charming essay in nostalgia R. L. Duffus of the editorial staff of the New York Times has tried to seize two moments: his germinal twentieth year in the neighborhood of learning at Stanford University, and a sense of the emanation of Thorstein Veblen. He has succeeded in recreating the first, and we experience his internal confusions and his reaction to his father and elder brother, to an ailing and sophisticated graduate student, a Marx-quoting cook, and perhaps the greatest economist of the Western Hemisphere. This was the undomesticated personnel of the community which Veblen assembled in 1907 with bohemian spontaneity and brooded over with his wit and eloquent silences. Bound by no "cash nexus," the inhabitants of Cedro Cottage live at peace with nature and the domestic animals and at war with the surrounding world of capitalism and convention, which they calmly analyze and refashion after dinner and in spare minutes during the day. Mr. Duffus longs to return to Cedro; his evocation of it is a labor of love, and we share his affection for the callow youth who was father of the man.

Young Duffus was molded by Veblen in a way that was necessarily vague to him at the time and, alas, also to us now. His memories of the institutional economist, who is "this book's reason for being," are too discrete and few to bring him to life again. The great man appears mostly as the socio-economic system of Cedro, in short abstractly. A sage and morose Thoreau, he moves in limbo, disemboweling sacred dogmas, doubting natural laws, smiling at the supposed superiority of Occidental man over Oriental, of civilized over savage, and insisting that business thrives on waste. The undergraduate felt his fascination, but what of the influence, then or later? The social-mindedness of Duffus seems to be an inheritance from the family background rather than from the master. The one passionate outburst in this urbane essay is a defense of social security, and it is occasioned by the death of the father from an occupational disease. The author lays claim to two legacies from Veblen—a skepticism of accepted values and an appreciation of good workmanship. Skepticism was hardly peculiar to Veblen, and the emphasis on the importance of the instinct of workmanship is but one of the various factors of his attitude. Is it irrelevant to ask where in the New York Times is the Veblenian influence of this member of its editorial staff? It probably is, for "Cedro" is romantic memory with little significance for our understanding of Veblen or of the fate of his thought. SOLOMON F. BLOOM

The Soviet Economy

MANAGEMENT IN RUSSIAN INDUSTRY AND AGRICULTURE. By Gregory Bienstock, Solomon M. Schwarz, and Aaron Yugow. Edited by Arthur Feiler and Jacob Marschak. Oxford University Press. $3.

THE STRUCTURE OF SOVIET WAGES, A STUDY IN SOCIALIST ECONOMICS. By Abram Bergson. Harvard University Press. $3.50.

IN 1944 James Burnham published a tract on the shape of things to come, predicting the emergence of a new class, the class of managers, whose rise to power he considered inevitable because they are becoming, he asserted, the real controllers of the means of production in the large industrial states. The Soviet Union, according to Burnham, already is a managerial state. Its rulers, he said, "are, of course, the men who are running its factories and mines and railroads, the directing members of the commissariats and subcommissariats of heavy and light industry and transportation and communication, the heads of the large collective farms."

Needless to say, Burnham's thesis was properly excoriated at the time by democrats and socialists alike. Its methodological weakness and political irresponsibility could fool only the naive. Now we finally have an empirical study of Soviet management whose overwhelming evidence obviates Burnham's categorical assertions in this uncertain area of sociological inquiry. The decisive characteristic of the Soviet economy is not managerial rule but overall planning under the political direction of the Communist Party. The individual manager is merely a cog in the gigantic wheel of socialist planning. The manager participates of course in the making of the plan, and he necessarily plays an important part in adjusting the plan in accordance with practice. But for all practical purposes he has only one outlet for his independent energies—namely, the reduction of real unit costs of production. With regard to output, expansion, wages, and prices he is subject to the dictates of the planners.

FARRAR & RINEHART, N.Y.

ROBERT ST. JOHN says:

"A book which will add much to an understanding of that corner of the world where . . . two world wars have started and where a third may already be spawning. Besides that, it is sprightly reading."

HEADQUARTERS Budapest

By ROBERT PARKER

Former Eastern European Chief of The Associated Press

FROM the powder keg of Europe comes this expert newspaper man's explosive account of current history in the making. Must reading for every American who thinks he knows or who wants to know what manner of yeast is responsible for the constantly bubbling ferment in the Balkans. Robert Parker was with the German Army on its march into Poland in 1939; he saw Hungary, Rumania and Bulgaria taken by the Nazis; he covered the Russian conquest of Bessarabia. His headquarters in Budapest was one of the best listening posts in Europe, and from the spring of 1942 up to a few months ago he was OWI Chief in Turkey. His thrilling personal adventures and reports of intrigue make Oppenheim read like Mother Goose. $3.00

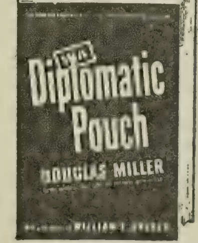
If earlier conflicts between managers and the Communist Party have been largely eliminated and the managers enjoy today a greater prestige than in the previous years of experimentation, this cannot be ascribed, as Burnham would have it, to managerial control of the means of production. It is rather due to the fact that most managers are party members. Already in 1936, 100 per cent of all chiefs of trusts, 97 per cent of all enterprise directors, and 82 per cent of all construction chiefs were Communists.

The Burnham thesis is tentatively supported by only one of the authors, Mr. Schwarz, whose hypothesis that Soviet managers might constitute the nucleus of a new ruling class was not found sufficiently borne out by facts in the opinion of the other authors. Inequality of educational opportunities would seem to be at the root of such a development. But as this inequality may be due to limitation of available state finances and the needs of war preparation rather than to a deliberate policy of fostering it, the hypothesis is open to question.

The study is not primarily concerned with the status of management at the present time, or rather at the outbreak of war in 1941, but traces the evolution of relations between managers, party, and trade-union committees. Nor is it exclusively concerned with management. It gives perspective to the particular problem of management by dealing with planning of industrial and agricultural production, banking controls, hiring and wage policies, procurement and sale, the questions of output, cost, price, and profit in the Soviet socialist economy.

WILLIAM L. SHIRER
reveals:

"I once urged Ambassador Dodd to pressure the State Dep't, or the Dep't of Commerce, or Pres. Roosevelt, or God—to get these reports published."



Douglas Miller blitzed Washington with his amazingly prophetic tip-offs when he was one of the unheeded few who saw at first-hand why "You Can't Do Business With Hitler." "VIA DIPLOMATIC POUCH", for the first time, breaks the secrecy which has hitherto concealed these, his confidential findings. "Actually," says Quentin Reynolds, "'VIA DIPLOMATIC POUCH' supplements all other books on Germany . . . The material is as new today as when Miller wrote it and even more timely."

$3.00 at all bookstores

DIDIER, PUBLISHERS, 600 Madison Ave., N. Y.

The almost simultaneous appearance of Mr. Bergson's careful study of Soviet wages is fortunate because the question of how Soviet wages are fixed is not fully answered in the management study. It will undoubtedly be seized upon by those who are anxious to prove that Russia has a non-socialist economy because of inequality of wages. It is to the author's credit, therefore, that he points out, as the full title of his book indicates, that wage inequalities are not contrary to socialist economics. Complete equality of income distribution as a criterion of socialism has been rejected by socialists ever since Karl Marx in his "Critique of the Gotha Program" (1875) suggested that in the earlier phases of socialism incomes might be determined on the basis of productivity.

If the Soviet planners found that wage scales, varying according to occupation, skill, and productivity, are necessary for maximum output and to avoid shortage of skilled labor and rapid labor turn-over, one may speak of "capitalist wages." But one cannot call Soviet economic institutions, wage structure included, "capitalist," as only recently the New York Times did in one of its most ill-informed editorials on what was alleged to be Russia's "new capitalism."

While the differential wage system distinguishes the Soviet economy from the ideal of communism rather than from competing economic systems, it is, as Mr. Bergson points out, socialist nevertheless for two reasons: first, the ownership and management of the greatest part of the country's industrial resources by the government; and, second, the direction and integration of this sector by a system of planning. Moreover, even if Soviet wages resemble capitalist wages with respect to inequality, Soviet profit is radically different from capitalist profit. It is the nature of profit, not of wages, which distinguishes the socialist from the capitalist system.

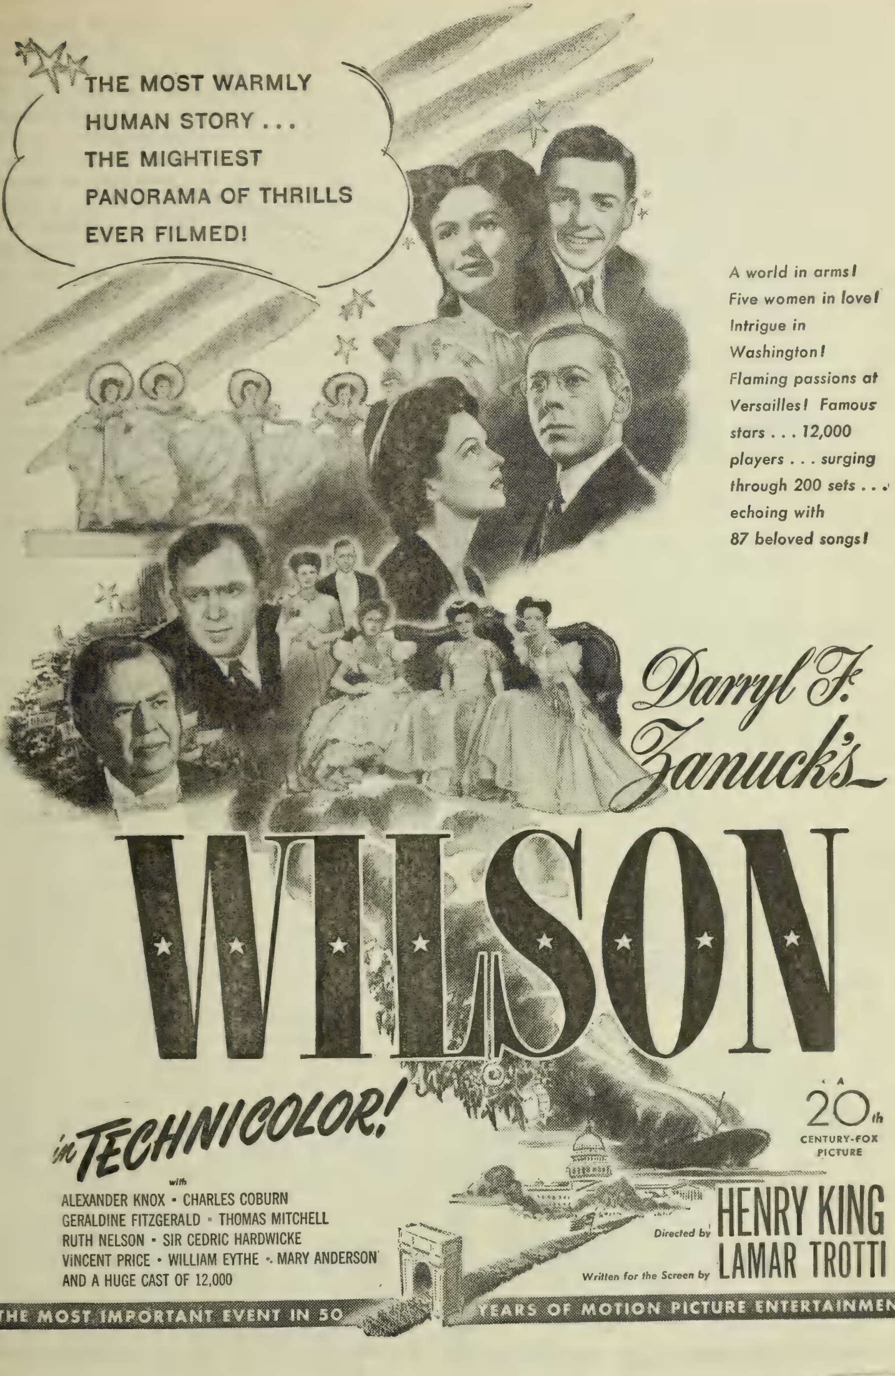
In the current epidemic of books on the Soviet Union these two scholarly studies are rare exceptions. Although limited in scope to particular problems, tentative in their conclusions, and frankly aware of the experimental nature of everything that goes on in Russia, they convey a more thorough "understanding" than the grandiose efforts of the so-called "interpretative" commentators in either the pro-Soviet or the anti-Soviet camp. HEINZ H. F. EULAU

Laws and Responsibilities

THE COMING STRUGGLE FOR PEACE. By André Visson. The Viking Press. $3.

THE title, inspired by John Strachey's challenge and prophecy "The Coming Struggle for Power," is not strictly accurate. This is not a work of political philosophy. Visson does not define "the coming struggle" in terms of a broad issue. The subtitle is far more to the point—Conflicting Forces and Aspirations Which the United Nations Will Have to Face. It is a case book, the clinical description of ailments which, as the author presents them, might have no connection whatever.

Let us accept it as such and be thankful. Even the conscientious and well-informed reader cannot keep in mind the morbid symptoms that torment forty separate nations.



THE MOST WARMLY HUMAN STORY . . . THE MIGHTIEST PANORAMA OF THRILLS EVER FILMED!

A world in arms! Five women in love! Intrigue in Washington! Flaming passions at Versailles! Famous stars . . . 12,000 players . . . surging through 200 sets . . . echoing with 87 beloved songs!

Darryl F. Zanuck's

WILSON

in TECHNICOLOR!

A 20th CENTURY-FOX PICTURE

with
ALEXANDER KNOX • CHARLES COBURN
GERALDINE FITZGERALD • THOMAS MITCHELL
RUTH NELSON • SIR CEDRIC HARDWICKE
VINCENT PRICE • WILLIAM EYTHE • MARY ANDERSON
AND A HUGE CAST OF 12,000

Directed by HENRY KING
Written for the Screen by LAMAR TROTTI

THE MOST IMPORTANT EVENT IN 50 YEARS OF MOTION PICTURE ENTERTAINMENT!

BURLINGAME

RESORT

In the Heart of
The Adirondacks
SCAROON MANOR
HOTEL on SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE
ON PREMISES
9 Clay Tennis Courts
8 Handball
Courts

MOTION PICTURE

Paramount Presents
"AND THE ANGELS SING"
In person
PERRY COMO
JERRY WALD
His Clarinet and Orchestra
Now Playing PARAMOUNT Times Square

STAGE PLAYS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (In association with Jack H. Skirball)
JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL
The FRANZ WERFEL – S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN
LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS
J. EDWARD BROMBERG
MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED
Evgs. at 8:30. Mats. Thurs., Sat.

MICHAEL TODD presents BOBBY CLARK in
MEXICAN HAYRIDE
by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.
AIR CONDITIONED

BLOOD DONORS NEEDED!

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

He will find them catalogued in these pages with two essential qualities of the reference book—lucidity and balance. Visson eschews the inevitable pedantry of the doctrinaire and the no less inevitable egotism of the correspondent: "Stalin told me . . ." He is fair, even in cases where fairness is almost a miracle, Russo-Polish relations, for example, or Zionism.

The very first virtue of a reference book is accuracy. Wherever I could check him, I found Visson reliable. This, however, applies only to the contemporary scene. His eyesight grows dim beyond the last decade. The First French Republic did not come in 1791, nor was the Third founded in 1871, after the Paris Commune. MacMahon was not in power "in the transition period between the Empire and the Third Republic (1871)." Boulanger did not "fall short of his political ambitions in 1892," but three years earlier; he committed suicide in 1891. The Entente Cordiale was signed in 1904, not in 1907. This is not carping: I appreciate the book, and should prefer to indorse it unreservedly. But a work of reference has to meet definite and exacting tests. Five dollars for an "Encyclopædia of World History" would be well invested.

The limits that André Visson set himself are rather hard to understand. He deals exclusively with the United Nations and a few neutrals. But the problems of Spain, Turkey, and Eire, for instance, are no less important to us than those of Sweden. He devotes much space to the Middle East and none to India. But Great Britain's policy in the eastern Mediterranean, Iraq, and Iran is still greatly affected by its desire not to sever connection with its Asiatic empire. Out of three hundred pages, less than eleven are given to the Far East: they might as well have been omitted. Above all, M. Visson plays Hamlet without the Prince: the problem of peace is the problem of Germany, which he leaves out altogether.

This is claimed to be "a book for diplomats, and in the years ahead every free man and woman on earth will be called upon to learn the laws and assume the responsibilities of diplomacy." Let me underscore two words—laws and responsibilities. Guiding principles do count; else we shall "muddle through somehow" into a third world war. The description of morbid symptoms, per se, will not lead to a diagnosis and a cure. The effect on the average American reader might be simply to revive isolationism: "These Europeans have always been fussing, and always will be. Let us stay at home and mind our own business." Such a book would be dangerous unless it were read in connection with Willkie's "One World." For the solidarity of nations is the first "law" to be mastered.

"Responsibilities": a durable peace will not depend on a purely empirical patching up between local factions, say Chetniks, Ustashi, and Partisans. It will depend on the solution of two great problems, each of which demands an act of will, that is to say, an act of faith. Will the United States choose world democracy, triple-headed imperialism, or isolation? Will Germany be integrated or caged? We must not, like Rousseau, "brush aside the facts." But the mere accumulation of unrelated facts, as in this valuable and intelligent compendium, throws absolutely no light on the fundamental issues.

ALBERT GUERARD

IN BRIEF

THE VOICE OF NORWAY. By Halvdan Koht and Sigmund Skard. Columbia University Press. $3.

Designed as a tribute to the unconquerable spirit of Norway, this book considers that nation's history and culture as a part of the heritage of mankind. Dr. Koht, former Norwegian Minister of Foreign Affairs, sketches his country's history as a twofold struggle, for national organization and for individual liberty—a manifestation of the true Nordic spirit as opposed to the Nazis' caricature of it. The second half of the book, by a former assistant professor of comparative literature at the University of Oslo, provides a spirited panorama of Norwegian letters. The reader is offered some delightfully fresh views of Holberg, Ibsen, and Bjornson, both as artists and as human beings. Agreeably free from the academicism and complacency which sometimes mar such national efforts at self-evaluation, "The Voice of Norway" is a truly stirring account of a people who have stood from earliest times for freedom under law.

THE FRENCH COLONIES: PAST AND FUTURE. By Jacques Stern. Didier. $3.

In 1939 France and its empire had a combined population of 110,000,000—larger than Japan's and almost as big as that of the United States. M. Stern, former French Minister of Colonies, makes out a case for the French Empire as a factor in the making of the peace. Particularly disturbed by Wendell Willkie's notion that the colonies must be given back to their inhabitants, M. Stern expatiates on French efforts at education, religious tolerance, and political equality among colonials. As a history of France's possessions and its attitude to them, the book is clear and informative. Nevertheless, the reader cannot but feel that M. Stern's reiterated implication that France's only stake in its colonies is a detached passion for their good, is simply a duplicate of the Pecksniffian attitude long held by another nation of imperialists, across the Channel.

July 5 to August 5
EXHIBITION OF
NEW WORK
10 New York Artists
Oils . Water Colors . Drawings $5-$125
Open until 9 p.m. daily except Sunday
133 W. 44th St., near Broadway

McCARTHY OF WISCONSIN. By Edward A. Fitzpatrick. Columbia University Press. $3.50.

As the author of the celebrated "Wisconsin Plan" (1912), Charles McCarthy wrote a dedication to that volume which Sandburg might have signed, and was himself a character to inspire Dos Passos. Dying early at forty-four, he had applied the kind of will to succeed that we facetiously associate with Horatio Alger's heroes to a wholly selfless, un-Alger-like struggle for social betterment. The son of poor Irish immigrants, McCarthy took a brilliant Ph.D. in history and became a powerful social engineer and instigator of intelligent experimental legislation in Wisconsin during the era of the senior La Follette. His major contribution was the Legislative Reference Library, which made authoritative sources of political and economic information readily available to Wisconsin lawgivers—a brilliant innovation at the time and an important adjunct to the democratic process. McCarthy won the recognition of Lord Bryce; he assisted both Wilson and Theodore Roosevelt in the drafting of their competing Presidential platforms. But he sought nothing for himself except to serve his nation. Colonel Fitzpatrick's book is a dignified, vigorous, and always readable introduction to the career of an enlightened and warm-hearted man who might well serve as a model for the American public servant.

ONE HUNDRED GREAT YEARS. The Story of the Times-Picayune from Its Founding to 1940. By Thomas Ewing Dabney. Louisiana State University Press. $4.

The New Orleans Times-Picayune came to the fore by its coverage of the Mexican War. Ever since, it has been one of the most influential of Southern newspapers. Mr. Dabney's book is not what his subtitle would lead us to expect, the story of the newspaper; he has forgone this to write the story told by the newspaper. In other words, this is not a contribution to the history of journalism, but simply one more backward-looking volume of the "Only Yesterday" type. Unfortunately Mr. Dabney lacks the lively touch needed to keep that kind of book rolling; nor does he possess the incisiveness or the selectivity of details required of the soberer historian. But for all that, this stout, incoherent volume is engaging to dip into, as the files of any long-established newspaper usually are.

FILMS

IN Humphrey Jennings's "The Silent Village" Welsh miners movingly pretended that Germans had made a Lidice of their town. In Cavalcanti's "48 Hours" (from a story by Graham Greene) some very good professional and unprofessional actors pretend that disguised German parachutists try to capture a Gloucestershire village. The thing never seems really to have happened, as "The Silent Village" almost did; nor is the film the fanged masterpiece Hitchcock alone might have made it; but it falls on a very solid stool between. The village types are the sort of entomologically observed, remarkably lifelike, charming dolls which not only Greene but Coward and Waugh so often create instead of characters—a dear-old-boy rector, his passionate, constricted daughter, the merry, warm old woman who handles the switchboard and the mail, the robin-like lady of the manor, the marked-down Heathcliff who helps the Germans, etc., etc. Well written and directed and beautifully played, these characters are not to be scorned, even though they are the soberer, still self-satirizing and self-congratulatory grand-nieces and nephews of Gilbert and Sullivan; we have never yet managed to set up in films as good a portrait of an American small town, and there is poetic force in this puppetry though it lacks complexity and depth.

When men kill in this film they do it much more abruptly and simply than in ours; the reactions of women who kill or cause death—most of them have to use guile to get within striking distance—are seriously studied, and good and terrible to see. I only wish this cleavage by sex had not been as oversimple as knocking shale apart. I think the best of "48 Hours" is neither in its people nor, mainly, in their exciting, melodramatically plausible actions —aside from one gentle, marvelous, awful shot in which four cycling Home Guards oscillate and spill under machine-gun fire—but in its relating of the people and their actions to their homes, their town, their tender, lucid countryside. As the audience watches from a hill, with the eyes at once of a helpless outsider, a masked invader, and a still innocent defender, a mere crossroads imparts qualities of pity and terror which, to be sure, it always has, but which it seldom shows us except under tilted circumstances. And at moments,

RESORTS

What you really want is Everything

—and "everything" that makes a dream vacation at Chesters' includes: FAST CLAY TENNIS COURTS ▪ LARGE FILTERED POOL ▪ PRIVATE LAKE ▪ and many exciting etcetera's . . . Swell adult fun. Open-hearth Fires. Music Treasures. Dancing Instruction. Arts and Crafts. Entertainment Staff that really ENTERTAINS! . . . Food? Mmmmmmmm.

Accommodations from regular to DeLuxe. Attractive rates throughout the Summer. Easy to reach by train, bus, or door-to-door taxi service.

WOODBOURNE. N.Y. Tel. WOODBOURNE 1150
CHESTERS ZUNBARG
A DELIGHTFUL HIDEAWAY IN THE MOUNTAINS

45 Miles from New York City
Zindorest
★ Park Monroe N. Y.
Telephone 4421
A Resort for Adults Only
Exclusive location, 150 acres of unusual beauty. ALL SPORTS. Recorded concert music and many other activities for your pleasure. Last word in accommodations and hospitality.
DIXIE TERMINAL BUSES STOP AT [illegible] ENTRANCE ★

STEP into the SUN
at
FOREST HOUSE
Short Journey
Long Memories
All the Elements
for complete vacationing. Inspiring location (2 lakes), cordial hospitality, finest food and accommodations. All sports of the Season.
Mahopac 688
50 MILES from N.Y.C.
FOREST HOUSE
Lake Mahopac, New York

WESTERN VIEW FARM
25th Season
TED OHMER
New Milford Connecticut
Telephone: NEW MILFORD 440

Twin Pines
on Trout Lake
An ADIRONDACK Adult Camp; Complete — Modern
4 doubles tennis courts; cement handball courts; swimming, boating, etc. Hotel comforts — camp informality. All rooms for 2.
TWIN PINES
J. Saidel, Manager
P. O., Lake George, N. Y.

—MERRIEWOODE—
A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free [illegible] of boats and canoes. Interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails. Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping-pong, square dancing. Intelligent, gay companionship.
$38 and $42 weekly Olive H. G. Baron, Dir.

when the invaders prowlingly approach through the placid gardens of the barricaded manor in the neat morning light, the film has the sinister, freezing beauty of an Auden prophecy come true.

JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

ONE of the college-age readers of this column who amaze me constantly with revelations of how much better musical understanding and taste—to say nothing of better all-around perception and sense—they have than I and my contemporaries had at the same age remarked recently in a letter: "The end of 'The Marriage of Figaro' has been running through my head. Just to think this music—without even whistling it—sends chills down my back. Whatever happens to me, I can reflect that my life hasn't been wholly lost: I have had the opportunity to know that opera, and that part of it in particular."

I have had thoughts of that kind myself in the last two or three years. In my case it is not merely that I have heard or seen certain things, but that I have lived long enough to perceive in them what I am able to perceive now. I have had this thought about pieces of music, about Toscanini's performances, about Markova's dancing. And one of the pieces of music, certainly, has been "The Marriage of Figaro." I got to know it well only when the Glyndebourne Festival recording was issued here, and found it marvelous then; but each time that I listened to it again after an interval I heard new marvels for the first time, while the old ones struck me with enlarged or fresh significance and greater impact; and I can reflect that whatever else has happened to me, I have had the luck to achieve the heightened awareness that enabled me most recently to hear in "Figaro" one of the supreme wonders that have been produced on this earth by human powers.

As with the whole so with the part—the passage that my correspondent wrote about. Its effect, like that of any such passage, comes partly from its context—where it is placed, what it follows. Three hours have been filled with the poignant sorrow of the Countess's Porgi amor and Dove sono; the longing of Susanna's Deh vieni, non tardar; the amused tenderness of her Venite, inginocchiatevi; the confused adolescent emotions of Cherubino's Non so piu cosa son; the ironic menace of Figaro's Se vuol ballare; the mock heroics of his Non piu andrai; the pompousness and malice of Bartolo's La vendetta; the ear-ravishing loveliness of the Letter Duet; the humor and wit of the duets of Susanna and Figaro, Susanna and Marcellina, Susanna and the Count; the comedy of the first-act trio, the great finale of Act 2, the finale of Act 4. Three hours have been filled with the orchestra's running fire of gay, mocking, witty comment that has created the atmosphere of comedy in which even the serious things have happened. And this has continued to the very last: the music has exaggerated comically the pleas for forgiveness, the Count's stern refusals; and even in the hush of amazement and wonder produced by the Countess's entrance the violins have softly chattered their amusement. But then at last there has been an end to all this, and a moment's silence; and it is at this point, as the Count begins his Contessa, perdono, that we hear music which tells us of the sublimity of human forgiveness—music which, after what has come before, is overwhelming. And it becomes even more overwhelming—when it is taken up softly by the chorus, and when it is carried up to a point of superearthly religious exaltation. Then, in the silence which follows, solemn octaves of the strings gently ease us down to this earth again—and to the bustle and fanfares of the final curtain of the operatic comedy. The passage lasts only a couple of minutes; but those two or three minutes, coming after the three hours, create the most wonderful, most impressive moment that I can recall in opera.

It is almost as though Mozart had decided to correct the notion we might have of him as being capable only of what he had given us in the first three hours of "Figaro"—or for that matter what he had given in the slow movement of the Piano Concerto K.467 and in other astounding pages of other great works—and had taken a couple of minutes to make us realize that he could, when he chose, reveal spiritual insights equal to the greatest we have known. That was as much time as he needed for the demonstration; and once it had been made it didn't matter whether he made it again. Those insights were there, in addition to everything else that he communicated through the medium which he used as no once else has ever done; and that use of the medium and what he expressed through it made him the most extraordinary musical artist that ever lived.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Make the FEPC Permanent

Dear Sirs: To those of us who were deeply involved in the struggle to insure continuance of the Fair Employment Practices Committee through Congressional approval of its appropriation for the next fiscal year it is clearly apparent that much of the credit for the favorable Senate vote of last week belongs to the many liberal forces throughout the nation which raised their voices in support of that agency. We know we speak for the millions of minority Americans when we say that by your splendid outspoken editorial of June 10 you contributed greatly to the cause of true democracy.

The FEPC has been granted its appropriation by Congress and has thereby received sanction and backing, but the fact remains that it is still handicapped by its lack of power to enforce its orders. Unless legislation is enacted to make it permanent, it will be abolished when the war ends and the problem of discrimination in employment becomes even more critical.

Awareness of the need for a permanent FEPC was indicated by the fact that even while the Senate was debating the advisability of continuing the present FEPC, the House Labor Committee was holding hearings on the Scanlon-Dawson-La Follette bill to give the FEPC permanent status and authority. Frustration and insecurity, it was demonstrated in these hearings, still haunt millions of minority-group Americans, for although they have made tremendous gains through employment in war industry, they have made practically no advance in any industry which is basic to the peace-time economy. Even when they are now employed, minority Americans, particularly Negroes and Latin Americans, are often denied full union rights, upgrading opportunities, and equal pay for equal work. Walter White, president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, who had just returned from a tour of the war fronts, told the committee: "Wherever I went the question most frequently asked by Negro soldiers . . . was whether or not Negroes on returning home will continue to be confined to bootblack jobs." And in this country Negroes are already finding themselves the first to go as the cutbacks begin.

As the hearings progress and the people generally become aware of the issues involved in the proposed bill for a permanent FEPC, we hope for clarification of many existing misunderstandings. To the people of North, West, and Midwest one fact, which has already been brought out in the committee investigation, is highly significant. That is the fact that only 10 per cent of the closed cases reported by the present FEPC originated in the eight states of the deep South.

What will the post-war reconversion period mean to the industrial centers of the North, West, and Midwest, where 90 per cent of the cases handled by the present FEPC originated? Gunnar Myrdal in his "An American Dilemma" recalls that "after the [First World] war the homecoming Negro soldier met the suspicion and fears of the Southern whites. In the North their new footholds in industry were contested by anxious white job-seekers in the post-war depression. A wave of lynchings swept the South, and even more bloody race riots swept the North."

Dare we neglect to take every possible precaution to prevent a repetition after this war?

Already representatives of most of the outstanding national civic, church, and union organizations have appeared before the House Labor Committee to urge approval of the Scanlon-Dawson-La Follette bill; and on June 23 an identical bill was introduced in the Senate by a group of six Republican and Democratic Senators. This would indicate that we are justified in our belief that the overwhelming majority of Americans are conscious of the dangers of the post-war period and are looking to their government for leadership in protecting the economic rights of minorities.

ANNA ARNOLD HEDGEMAN

National Executive Secretary, National Council for a Permanent FEPC

Washington, D. C., July 3

One Who Voted

Dear Sirs: I have just finished reading a letter signed M. S. and titled Can a Soldier Vote? in your issue of June 10. If Pvt. Polachek actually went through all the tribulations that your correspondent claims he did to cast his ballot, he has my sympathy. Personally, I don't believe a word of it. In contrast, I would like to set forth my experiences with absentee voting in California.

I was sitting in my office one day—everyone in the Coast Guard has his own private office—when another sailor came in and asked me if I cared to vote. Naturally, I answered in the affirmative, and he handed me an application for an absentee ballot. I filled it out in my own inimitable scrawl and sent it to the Secretary of State of California.

From the time I sent in my application until the time I received my ballot, an interim of three weeks, I never once stirred from my office, except for an occasional meal and a cup of grog. When the ballot arrived, I ripped open the envelope, whipped out my pen, and cast my vote in the Democratic primary.

My next step was to get an officer to sign my ballot. At the exact time I desired the presence of an officer, a short ensign walked by. He was my man. I called him in, told him what I wanted, and handed him my pen. He was neither reluctant nor angry with me because I wished to exercise my right to vote. As a matter of fact, the ensign and I had quite a long political discussion. He told me he was voting for Landon, and I assured him he couldn't win. We parted the best of friends. I dropped my ballot in the nearest mailbox, then returned to my office, where I plan to sleep until the November elections, when I will again corner the short ensign.

YEOMAN

Somewhere in California, June 28

CONTRIBUTORS

JOSEPH CHAPIRO was for many years a contributor to the democratic press in Austria and German correspondent for French papers. He has written two books: "Les Origines de la Grande Guerre" and "Der Arme Villon."

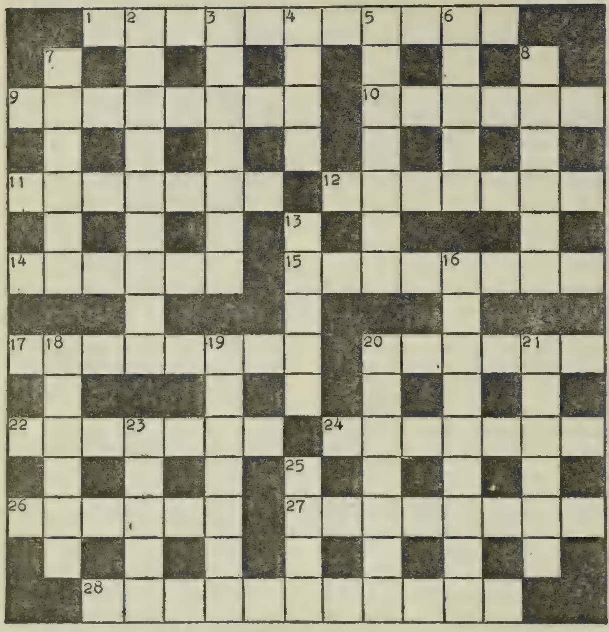
ARNOLD BEICHMAN reports political and labor news for PM.

GUNNAR LEISTIKOW, former foreign editor of the Copenhagen daily Social-Demokraten, has frequently written for The Nation.

T. A. BISSON, a member of the staff of the Institute of Pacific Relations, is the author of "Japan in China."

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 72

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Leading actor's dressing-room? (hyphen, 4-7)
9 What size of paper would you use to make a jester's hat?
10 One stage of a salmon's existence
11 The answer makes clear why it is called the "funny bone"!
12 Produce a drawing from a container with nothing in it!
14 Same again!
15 Beer tray (anag.)
17 Such employment requires shifts to maintain production (hyphen, 4-4)
20 Fled from Apollo and was, at her own request, turned into a laurel tree
22 His opera Salome has provoked much discussion
24 Situation from which there is no prospect of escape
26 Ladies, like soldiers, should keep it dry
27 An additional safeguard to one's understanding
28 Spares trees (anag.)

DOWN

2 Bill's voluble exit (hyphen, 6-3)
3 He lives a retired life, but shows purpose in the end
4 "---- tells a flattering tale, Delusive, vain and hollow. Ah! let not ---- prevail, Lest disappointment follow"
5 He travels to and fro by season
6 Civet (anag.)
7 Troops in formation before a public building?
8 Where Jack spends his leave
13 A place once reared by monk and priest; a tar and bigwig of the East
16 One who values property (Who doesn't?)
18 What! No Act I? What a performance!
19 Puts in, with or without the fifth letter
20 Father and offspring in a Dickens' novel
21 He took a prominent part in the Trojan War, and was extolled by Homer
23 Dared to be venomous
25 This sort of fountain doesn't play in Washington Square

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 71

ACROSS:—1 FATHER; 5 ALMANAC; 10 SCOUNDREL; 11 RARER; 12 ITERANT; 13 ANYWISE; 14 OMENS; 16 NEPOTISTS; 18 CALIPHATE; 20 GUSTO; 22 HUNDRED; 24 SEAKALE; 26 RHINE; 27 VERDIGRIS; 28 STEPSON; 29 STRING.

DOWN:—2 ATONE; 3 HANGARS; 4 RURITANIA; 5 AILSA; 6 MARRYAT; 7 NARCISSUS; 8 CARVER'S; 9 ESKIMO; 15 EGLANTINE; 17 PLEASURES; 18 COHERES; 19 PERSEUS; 20 GLAZIER; 21 ODESSA; 23 DIVAN; 25 AKRON.

RESORTS

The Oaks
formerly
RED OAKS • ELBERON, N.J.
Enjoy all outdoor sports, excellent tennis, ocean bathing, delicious cuisine, in this American plan country estate. On Highway 4N, only 50 miles from N.Y.C. (Jersey Central or Pennsylvania R.R. direct to Elberon.)
Phone Long Branch 2433
Mgt. of Joseph Horowitz

"Fore" the Golfer
Newly Conditioned Course
A Grand "Pro"
New Clubhouse
. . . await your pleasure
. . . 28 miles of beautiful private trails. . . . Also—excellent tennis, boating and fishing on our private 7½ mile lake, golf; game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food . . . congenial atmosphere.
Only 51 Miles from New York
The Glenmere
CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RE. 2-5047

FOR VACATION FUN AND REST
55 Miles from New York a vacation "heaven," breath-takingly beautiful countryside—delicious food—restful indoor activities—invigorating enjoyable outdoor sports: Tennis—swimming—ping pong—volley ball—bowling—outdoor dancing—bicycling—(horseback riding and golf nearby). You're welcome at any time and for any time. Write for booklet.
PLUM POINT
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

SHADYBROOK
MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 963
50 miles from N. Y. C. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Tennis, handball, etc.; golf, swimming, riding. Free MOVIES.
JULY and AUGUST — $40 Weekly; $7 per day
Write for Booklet N. POPPER & SIMON

CAMP ANNISQUAM
Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director
This Adult Camp...
in Gloucester is [illegible] hours from New York . . . CAMP ANNISQUAM offers a complete change of air, scenery, and people . . . Salt water swimming, sailing, fishing on premises . . . dancing, tennis, trips, and all sports.
Write for booklet and rates

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.
ALL SPORTS — Open All Year
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 22, 1944 NUMBER 4

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 85

EDITORIALS

The Health Scandal 88

The People Want Wallace by Freda Kirchwey 89

ARTICLES

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 90

Henry A. Wallace by I. F. Stone 91

The Uses of Air Power by John R. Cuneo 93

He Fields Ohio's Hot Ones by Karl Keyerleber 95

25 Years Ago in The Nation 96

The Class of 1944 by Ordway Tead 97

In the Wind 98

POLITICAL WAR

Japan's Puppet Show by Selden C. Menefee 99

Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 101

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The French Resistance by Jay Allen 102

Story of a Union by Philip Taft 103

G. I. Letters by Marcus Duffield 104

Dali Turns Novelist by James Stern 104

Realist's Eye View by Reinhold Niebuhr 105

Taxes, Post-War by G. R. Walker 107

Films by James Agee 107

Music by B. H. Haggin 109

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 110

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 73 by Jack Barrett 112

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON ▪ MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

ALTHOUGH THE RUSSIANS ARE RAPIDLY APproaching the "sacred soil" of East Prussia, the official German communiqués still start with news of the Normandy front. This can hardly be because the Nazis believe that the threat to the Reich is at present greater in the west, but it may be because in France they are enjoying some measure of negative success. They have slowed down the Allied advance to a crawl, and their grim resistance has led some commentators to express the fear that the Normandy campaign may degenerate into the positional warfare of 1914 to 1918. Certainly the mud that was so characteristic of Flanders is once again proving a major aid to the defense, and the constant rain that has created it has served to cripple our air forces for much of the time. Yet despite these obstacles General Montgomery's men are contriving to move forward, even if very slowly. Gradually they are gaining elbow room and building up the power that will eventually dislodge Rommel and open the way to Paris. Meanwhile the Allied armies in Italy, which had experienced a check, seem to be advancing with a new momentum. This may indicate that the German High Command has been forced to weaken the Italian front in order to attempt to plug the hole in the east. But unless the Nazis withdraw from Italy altogether, they cannot begin to find enough divisions to compensate for their losses in Russia during the past four weeks. As the German radio military commentator, Lieutenant General Dittmar, has admitted, the defense of the Reich necessitates "a radical straightening of the whole front." This aim can hardly be accomplished without a total abandonment of the Baltic states, but it seems probable that once again the Germans have held on too long. Already there is talk of evacuating this region by sea—an operation which promises a field day for the Red air force and navy.

*

THE CHOICE OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AS the Democratic candidate for 1944 has appeared inevitable for a long time. The average American, when he stops to think about it, identifies Mr. Roosevelt with the great events of the last twelve years. The Roosevelt Era is the era of the Great Depression, the Great Recovery, and the Greatest War; it is likely to end with the Great Reconstruction Program for the post-war years. Throughout his terms of office Mr. Roosevelt has fought with varying degrees of success and compromise the war against the dodos who at any human cost sought to drag the country back to the untrammeled capitalism which collapsed in 1929 and the isolationism whose death knell was sounded by the advent of Adolf Hitler. Where he divided the country it was on a fundamental choice between progress and reaction. Where he achieved unity it was in terms of the bold policies needed to save the American people from economic and social chaos and the world from the desolation of fascism. Mr. Roosevelt has proved himself a great war leader. It is almost pathetic at this stage to hear a Republican candidate protest against "civilian interference" in the military conduct of the war and listen to the factitious debate on the office of Commander-in-Chief. Mr. Roosevelt, assumming full responsibility for crucial strategic decisions, has come to represent, for soldier and civilian, the symbol of the greatest democratic war effort in history. The requirements of leadership will be even more exacting in the days ahead. Far in advance of the nation in perceiving the approach of war, Mr. Roosevelt has shown himself singularly blind to the revolutionary forces that are determining the shape of the post-war world. Moreover, the economic dodos are still perched high in Washington. But President Roosevelt has been a man whose greatness shines brightest in times of crisis. He is the only possible leader for the next four years.

*

ROOSEVELT'S RECOGNITION OF THE FRENCH Provisional Government as the de facto authority in France and General Eisenhower's official acceptance and warm praise of the services of the French Resistance mark the end of the long and tortuous trail from Darlan to De Gaulle. To be sure, Mr. Roosevelt still insists on calling the Provisional Government a committee and General Eisenhower has the power to veto its suggestions for military reasons, but to all intents and purposes the Provisional Government is the government of France until such time as an election can be held. The results are already apparent. "General Charles de Gaulle's organization for the relief and rehabilitation of liberated French towns and cities," reads a dispatch from Normandy, "is proving so brilliantly effective in the case of Caen that the preparations of the Allies' civil affairs detachments seem to some extent superfluous. . . . The city is being administered by men appointed to their posts by General de Gaulle long in advance of D-Day. The French preparations were meticulous even to medical orderlies and cooks recruited from among Frenchwomen in England. They all have been working magnificently with our civil-affairs officers and our field commanders." The reason is very simple. The men appointed by De Gaulle could not work at all if they did not have the support of the French population. That is the secret of their success. It is also the secret of the final willing recognition of De Gaulle. We hope the Allies have at last learned that military expediency is expedient only when it coincides with political sense.

*

THE EXPERTS' PLAN FOR AN INTERNATIONAL stabilization fund has been accepted with some modifications by the Bretton Woods conference, which can now give its full attention to proposals for a world institution providing long-term credit. In setting up the fund the chief difficulties encountered were all connected with the quotas which each participating nation must contribute to it. These quotas will govern voting power and also the volume of foreign exchange which a country can acquire from the fund. Hence the tendency was for nations to seek as large quotas as possible. On the other hand, each contributor to the fund must pay in 25 per cent of its quota in gold, or 10 per cent of its gold holdings, whichever is the less, so that an increase in its quota may involve tying up a larger proportion of its bullion reserves. Russia, foreseeing the need of very large imports to restore its devastated areas after the war, wanted a larger quota than the $800 million to $1 billion tentatively allotted to it, but it also wished to reduce the size of its gold contribution in order to have more of the metal available for financing foreign purchases. A new quota of $1.2 billion has now been approved for Russia; on the basis of the existing formula this will involve a gold payment of $300 million unless Russian gold holdings are below $3 billion. If their gold stocks exceed this figure, and there is some reason to believe that they do, it would seem hardly worth while for the Russians to maintain their reservations regarding this item to the point of jeopardizing the agreement. The proportion of the fund's resources represented by gold is not perhaps very important from the point of view of its economic success. But it is important politically, for any attempt to whittle down the "real" values in the fund will make it doubly damned by conservative bankers and Congressmen.

*

THE AGREEMENT REACHED AT BRETTON Woods is, in any case, destined to meet very severe opposition when it is presented to Congress for ratification. Senator Taft has already expressed the opinion that Congress will never approve any scheme remotely resembling the experts' plan which was the basis for discussion at the conference. The proposed fund, he declared, was not large enough for the post-war emergency but would be much too large when normal commercial and financial conditions were reestablished. But how is the emergency to be overcome and such conditions brought about? If an international fund of $8 billion plus is too little, is the Senator prepared to advocate that the United States grant direct credits on a still larger scale? Mr. Taft admits that we shall have to make loans to foreign countries after the war, but he does not want to use the machinery of the international fund, fearing that all the good dollars we pay into it will be swallowed up by penurious foreign nations who will replace them by their own "worthless" currencies. He overlooks the provisions of the plan which insure that the gold value of the fund's resources will always be constant since countries which depreciate their currencies are obligated to increase their payments into the fund proportionately. Our stake in the fund will represent potential purchasing power which, at our option, we can exchange for the goods and services of other countries. It will therefore be worth neither more nor less than an equivalent amount of gold buried at Fort Knox.

*

MR. DEWEY'S DILEMMA ON THE SOLDIER vote was the dilemma of a small politician. He weighed the political capital that might accrue from a last-minute gesture to the armed services against the almost certain loss of hundreds of thousands of New York soldier votes for Roosevelt. For under the present New York state law it is unlikely that more than 80,000 of New York's 800,000 soldiers will have any voice in the November decision. It was the small politician who refused to receive a non-partisan delegation of prominent New York citizens who journeyed to Albany to consult him on the matter. He made no reply to the telegrams of three veterans' organizations petitioning him to open up the federal ballot to New York soldiers before the time limit expired on July 15. A bigger man, confident of his ability to lead the nation in time of war, would have insisted that American soldiers from every state and on every battle front have equal opportunity with civilians to cast their votes. For soldiers above all citizens surely have a stake in democracy. But Mr. Dewey has shown that he has no conception of the grandeur or the awfulness of the issues involved in this world war. If he resents the fact that Mr. Roosevelt acts in his capacity of commander in chief it is because the role seems bigger than Mr. Dewey himself could handle. Mr. Dewey can never be a commander; he has shown that he has some qualifications as a sniper; he can make use of an immediate tactical advantage, but is utterly unfit to think in terms of grand strategy. That is the tragic failure of Mr. Dewey. A private in the Normandy firing line, a soldier's wife in Brooklyn can understand Mr. Dewey's betrayal more readily than his slickest political adviser in Albany.

*

MR. CHURCHILL AND OTHERS WHO BELIEVE that ideological factors are of diminishing importance in the war might pay some attention to what is happening in Latin America. For physically remote as that vast region is from the conflict, and in spite of the primitive political development of many of its inhabitants, it is powerfully affected by the same political cross-currents that are sweeping Europe. Economically Latin America is experiencing a war boom but not enjoying healthy prosperity. Demand for its products makes money plentiful, but the difficulty of exchanging the proceeds of its exports for imports has made manufactured goods scarce and sent prices soaring, causing much suffering. These conditions, in themselves, create political unrest and provide grist for both democratic and fascist propaganda mills. Dictators abound in Latin America, but with the exception of the Argentine fascist junta they have adhered to the United Nations and opened their countries to Allied propagandists who, tactful as they may be, can hardly avoid providing some food for dangerous thoughts. The atmosphere is less healthy for dictatorships. Thus in the past few months we have seen the voluntary abdication of President Batista of Cuba, who by permitting a free election restored democracy to his country, and the sudden collapse of dictatorships in Ecuador, El Salvador, and Guatemala. In the last two, apparently well-intrenched regimes were swept into oblivion by spontaneous civilian uprisings. This is a hopeful sign, and so is the ignominious failure of the military plot against President Lopez of Colombia, head of one of the most democratic governments in Latin America.

*

DONALD NELSON SEEMS TO HAVE TRIUMPHED in the compromise which ended his long and bitter dispute with the armed services and the War Manpower Commission over the resumption of civilian production. Although the four orders which he had prepared covering the initial steps in reconversion were postponed for varying lengths of time, the orders will all be issued during the next month instead of being delayed until after Germany's capitulation as desired by the military authorities. They provide for (1) release of some aluminum and magnesium for civilian uses, (2) release of a limited quantity of machine tools to civilian industries, (3) experimental development models for civilian goods, and (4) a procedure under which individual manufacturers who have excess capacity not needed for the war effort may be permitted to make certain civilian articles. The controversy with respect to these orders revolved chiefly around their probable effect on the manpower situation. The military authorities are fearful lest even a moderate resumption of civilian production induce war workers to leave their emergency jobs in order to seek seniority on permanent civilian jobs. Any large-scale movement in this direction would set back the entire war effort and might delay final victory by many months. On the other hand, it is impossible to justify idle men or idle machines in face of severe shortages of many kinds of essential civilian goods. The War Manpower Commission's recent regulations restricting job changing by male workers of draft age should help to prevent a panicky rush into civilian employment.

*

THE MILITARY SITUATION IN CHINA REMAINS grave despite earlier reports that the Chinese had stalled the Japanese offensive. While the Chinese, ably supported by General Chennault's Fourteenth Air Force, have defended their positions stubbornly, the odds still favor the Japanese. At last report only 160 miles separated the main enemy column driving south from Hankow from the secondary force moving up from Canton. Henyang, though still holding out, seemed doomed. There remained, however, two possibilities of preventing a complete Japanese victory. The enemy appeared to have underestimated the striking power of the Fourteenth Air Force, and there was some hope that constant strafing of his supply lines might yet weaken him so seriously as to check his drive. Also there seemed to be some chance that a Chinese counter-drive northeast of Henyang would succeed in cutting the enemy's lines of communications, thus compelling a withdrawal. A Japanese failure at this stage would of course represent a major United Nations victory, since Tokyo has risked everything on the success of this venture. But although the upsetting of the Japanese time-table is encouraging, it is unsafe ground for optimism. The Japanese are still winning in China.

The Health Scandal

THE inadequacy of prevailing methods of medical and dental care has never been more clearly brought to public attention than in the reports on selective-service examinations submitted to the Senate Committee on Wartime Health and Education. These reports show that more than 4,100,000 of the 16,000,000 draft registrants examined were rejected because they did not measure up to service standards of physical or mental fitness. Still worse, they show that eight out of ten of the registrants had defects of one type or another, and that a large proportion of these defects could easily have been remedied. This was evident particularly in the case of teeth. Captain C. R. Wells of the United State Navy told the committee on the basis of his experience with selective service that 95 per cent of the American people have dental defects and that only 30 per cent of those in need of care are getting it. The army reported that it was working its dentists in eight-hour shifts, using three and a half times as much dental equipment as is normally used each year by the entire civilian population.

Bad though the situation is, it is somewhat difficult to evaluate in scientific terms. Just what proportion of the rejections were due to inborn defects or diseases which could not have been prevented by the best of medical care? We do not know the answer with any exactness. We find, however, that the rejection rate is higher in rural areas than in urban areas, and it is fairly clear that this is linked to the known inferiority of medical, dental, and hospital services in many country districts. Moreover, draft rejections were the highest in the Southeastern states, where incomes are lowest and medical facilities the least adequate. The army has tried to offset these conditions by admitting a limited number of men with remediable defects—such as venereal diseases, hernias, and bad teeth—but with its restricted facilities it cannot take more than a small fraction of such men.

Some light is thrown on this situation by another survey which measures the inadequacy of medical attention under private medicine as compared with a system of insurance. A study made in Nova Scotia by the Institute of Public Affairs at Dalhousie University, Halifax, discloses that families covered by medical insurance received 64 per cent more medical attention, in the form of doctors' calls, than a group of similar size in somewhat better economic circumstances but lacking insurance protection. Children between five and fifteen years of age in the families covered by insurance received three times as much care as those in families depending on the conventional fee system. Nor were the benefits confined to greater attention from the physicians. The insured families had twice as much in the way of drugs and medicines and four times as many dressings as the non-insured families.

The Senate committee would do well to weigh the findings of the Nova Scotia study while it is considering a program to remedy the shocking situation revealed by the selective-service authorities. Other factors, such as ignorance, carelessness, and youthful folly, doubtless account in part for the failure of the draft registrants to seek a cure for their physical ailments, but the lack of funds is the primary reason. The American Medical Association would have us believe that under the fee system the American people are getting as good attention as they could possibly get under any other system. This is explicitly disproved not only by the Nova Scotia survey but by the experience of our own army and navy in maintaining a health level far above that of the civilian population. If there is no financial obstacle, men and women will not normally neglect their health. What is more important, they will be quick to seek medical care for their children. General Hershey has suggested universal military training in peace time to provide the health service that our young men need but have not been receiving. Why not go to the root of the difficulty by extending the same type of medical care as is now provided in the army to the entire population?

The People Want Wallace

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

BY THE time most readers see this issue much will be known that remains hidden as we go to press. Only a writer with the aplomb of an I. F. Stone can keep up with events by definitely announcing the renomination of Vice-President Wallace a week before the vote is taken. I trust he proves as good a prophet as he is a reporter. For myself, I am leaving for Chicago burdened with doubts; but I hope my report on the Democratic convention will be a solid confirmation of the preview provided this week by our Washington editor.

I know only this, as the politicians assemble in Chicago: if Wallace is not renominated, it will be because he is opposed by the back-room boys of the party, not because he has lost the support of the people. The politicians pretend, of course, that their opposition grows directly out of their profound knowledge of the desires of the voters, and one would think this should be the case. After all, to win votes for the party is a politician's chief job in election year. But this time the leaders of the anti-Wallace faction seem to be worrying about something else. They want to win, but apparently they believe they can do so on the popularity of the President alone, and consequently they are willing to forego whatever added strength Wallace might bring to the ticket. That they seriously think Wallace would weaken the ticket is not to be believed. Every test proclaims the contrary. But they do not want Wallace, and since they think they can get on without him they have invented the myth of his loss of favor with the public.

This myth can defeat him in Chicago if the President permits it to. Stone believes the President's letter will indicate such a strong desire for the Vice-President's renomination that it will serve as a directive to the convention. But if Mr. Roosevelt avoids, as he has been advised to do, the tone and language of dictation, the anti-Wallace forces will certainly make full use of the latitude allowed them. For they are interested in nominating Roosevelt—since his candidacy offers them their only chance of electing anybody—while severing as completely as possible his remaining links with the New Deal. This means ditching Wallace, for Wallace is the one remaining important symbol of democratic reform in the Roosevelt Administration.

The details of the maneuvers and the forces engaged against the Vice-President are reported fully in Mr. Stone's Washington letter. The degree to which those maneuvers fly in the face of the wishes of the voters is indicated with startling clarity by several recent polls. One of the most impressive was conducted in New York City during the last few days on the initiative of The Nation under the auspices of the Bureau of Applied Social Research at Columbia University and its results released this Monday.

Of the persons questioned, 54 per cent expressed an intention to vote for Roosevelt; 28 per cent for Dewey; 17 per cent were undecided. These proportions are about what one would expect from a cross-section of the voters in the city. Those registering for Roosevelt were given a list, alphabetically arranged, of proposed candidates for the Vice-Presidency and asked to indicate their preference. The results in percentages were as follows:

Barkley	7.8	Truman	1.1
Byrnes	2.0	Wallace	78.2
Douglas	.9	Winant	2.0
Rayburn	.4	No special preference	7.6

This proof of overwhelming popular support for the Vice-President is important for several reasons. New York is generally considered a doubtful state, and some of the President's advisers have been telling him that the presence of Wallace on the ticket will lessen his chances in a state in which no chances should be taken. The poll answers that argument as decisively as the most timid adviser could wish.

Just by way of comparison it is interesting to look at the results of the latest Gallup poll of Democratic sentiment on the Vice-Presidency. This sampling was for the entire country and a different selection of names was offered. The results were:

Wallace	64
Barclay	14
Byrd	6
All others	16

It is easy to see that, even with the South included, the preponderance in favor of Wallace is enormous.

The issue is clearly one between the politicians and the people. But the will of the people may not register in Chicago unless it is expressed in clear language by Mr. Roosevelt. The politicians are not interested in polls this time; they are interested in ending the era of New Deal reforms.

They are right in believing that the Democratic ticket will get the bulk of the liberal and labor and independent vote in general no matter who is the candidate for Vice-President. Mr. Roosevelt has, it is true, alienated many persons of progressive opinion by his concessions to the big-business crowd at home and by his ambiguous foreign policy. But such persons are not going to vote for Dewey. The danger is that they may not vote at all. If Wallace is rejected at Chicago, progressive Americans who vote for Mr. Roosevelt with misgivings or who stay at home will know that the Old Guard—North and South—has gained control of the party. It is to maintain his own leadership, as well as to assure the nomination of a liberal running-mate, that the President must throw his full strength behind Henry A. Wallace.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

Soldiers Aren't Supposed to Think

POLITICS and the United States army are traditionally oil and water." The banning of the books and magazines, the meager political coverage in army newspapers abroad, and the removal of Colonel Egbert White as publications officer in the Mediterranean theater underline this statement from a War Department pamphlet. These events are not without relation to the war fronts.

We have consistently attempted to fight a profoundly political war without mentioning the war's political bases. Naturally if one starts by banishing international politics from a war, one ends by banishing domestic politics. We are winning the war on all fronts, and neither political discussion nor lack of it will now delay the time-table of victory; but I wonder if many of our fighting men would not fight with better hearts and clearer heads if they were allowed to know the political score, both at home and abroad.

The American army is known abroad as the most politically naive in the world. Armies are traditionally unpolitical, but this most political of wars has changed that: see the revolutionary armies of Germany and Russia, the politically weakened French army, and the alert British army, particularly the Eighth, politically the keenest body of men I have ever known. Not so the American army, whose members are insulated by law from knowledge of the real world.

Army policy is not blameless in this, but neither does it carry the burden of blame. Recent directives of the Morale Services Division have been almost professionally progressive in sound: "The soldier must understand that today's war is but a part of the bigger war which man has been waging from time immemorial in order to win and preserve his freedom. . . . Let those who are cynical, pessimistic, or defeatist look into our past, and let them learn from Washington and Jefferson and Patrick Henry and Tom Paine and Sam Adams and Ben Franklin and Abe Lincoln. . . . All of this leads to a soldier who thinks—and that is the weapon which our enemies can never match."

The American soldier is actively discouraged from thinking. The Soldiers' Vote Act of 1944, as it is laughingly called, forbids the circulation by the military authorities of matter containing "political argument or political propaganda of any kind designed or calculated to affect the result of any election" for federal office. The law, barbed by a $1,000 fine or one year in jail, has overruled the army's directive, and the army, given always to strict interpretation, has decided that Mrs. Bowen's "Yankee from Olympus," "The Republic" (Beard's not Plato's—yet), Mari Sandoz's "Slogum House," and E. B. White's "One Man's Meat" (which includes an essay on the catarrhal trouble of Daniel Webster) are "designed or calculated," and therefore may not be circulated in the excellent Armed Services Editions of the Council on Books in Wartime. Moreover, the Army Orientation Services have decided that the act applies to its work and that there must be no attempt to influence political opinion in any of their courses.

The magazine and newspaper restrictions are more dangerous because less laughable. Under the act, and reinforced by a rather murky "survey" on "soldier preference," the army has banned from its establishments the American Mercury, Harper's, the Atlantic Monthly, the New Republic, and The Nation. Since more soldiers, like more civilians, read Time, Life, Reader's Digest, Collier's, and the Saturday Evening Post, these are circulated, though it might be demonstrated that some of them are rather more calculating and designing than the banned magazines.

The screws are applied also to army newspapers, as Colonel White found when he tried to obtain press-association coverage supplementing Army News Service, whose transmissions are limited by Signal Corps facilities and by the requirements of the small overseas newspapers for which it files. But Army News Service is undoubtedly cautious in its handling of the news, and the removal of this long-time champion of complete news coverage for the troops can hardly inspire confidence in the army's eagerness to make the best of a bad law.

Nevertheless, the fundamental point is that the law is bad. Its questionable section was sponsored by Senator Taft. The Soldiers' Vote Act applies for the duration plus six months, but this section, introduced as a rider to the Hatch (Clean Politics) act, is on the books indefinitely—which means that unless it is modified or repealed, the garrison of Fort Leavenworth won't be able to read the Bill of Rights in 1960.

Senator Taft now says the army "has badly misinterpreted both the letter and the spirit of the law," but when he spoke for his infamous rider he declared, "in case of doubt, throw it out"; and added that Congress would keep an eye on the army's interpretation. The Senator, "whose record in understanding what is going to happen," says Mr. Lippmann, "is not distinguished," has apparently discovered that the army is now keeping its eye on Senator Taft: many soldiers blame the Republicans for this fantastic censorship. This might explain his sudden disclaimer.

The only salvation, for the army and for the Senator, is repeal of the rider. To quote again from the War Department pamphlet: "Let the American soldier have the truth to think about; it is good enough to keep him a good soldier and a devoted citizen."

Henry Wallace—a Great American

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 14

I HAVE checked and verified the Washington Post report that party leaders met with the President at dinner in the White House last Tuesday night and "ganged up" on Wallace. I can also report that with this dinner conference the anti-Wallace bloc shot its bolt and that it will be Wallace at Chicago. The politician-lobbyists, the municipal bosses, the right-wing Democrats, at least one timid White House adviser, and a whole covey of phony liberals have had their say, and it has not moved the President. Mr. Roosevelt made clear to all of them what he had previously told Ed Flynn of New York. He does not want a man over sixty as his running mate—which disposes of several aged hopefuls. He does not want a routine politician—which disposes of several more. He wants Henry A. Wallace of Iowa—which disposes of the rest of them. Wallace it will be.

The big interests of this country do not want Wallace, and they are well equipped with mouthpieces in the Democratic Party. Two of the more obvious were at the White House dinner. One is Oscar R. Ewing. Ewing is vice-chairman of the Democratic National Committee and also general counsel and principal Washington lobbyist for the Aluminum Company of America. Alcoa fears Wallace's anti-monopolistic views. Another is Edwin J. Pauley. Pauley is treasurer of the Democratic National Committee. He is an "independent" California oil operator who is curiously fraternal with the big oil companies, notably Standard of California, his principal competitor. The Standard Oil crowd hate Wallace for his anti-cartel views.

The "practical" politicians were there to reinforce these views with figures. They said Wallace would cost the ticket from 1,000,000 to 3,000,000 votes. Robert E. Hannegan, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and most members of the committee have been part of the anti-Wallace bloc from the beginning. Their efforts broke on the rock of Mr. Roosevelt's "Dutch" stubbornness. The President, who has been prepared to compromise on many things, will not compromise on the choice of the man who might become his successor. From several sources in excellent position to know his mind, I can report that the President feels that only with Wallace in office as Vice-President can he be sure that his great objectives at home and abroad will be pursued.

At least two high Administration figures went to see Wallace on his return from the Far East to ask him to withdraw. One was Judge Samuel M. Rosenman, who usually turns up on the rightist side of the fence in intra-Administration controversies. The other was Secretary of the Interior Ickes. Ickes has two links with the anti-Wallace forces. He is an old buddy of Pauley's, and he picked Ralph Davies of Standard of California as oil administrator partly on Pauley's recommendation. Ickes has been close to the oil trust and the oil trust hates Wallace. Both Ickes and Rosenman also have always been close to Tom Corcoran, who has been boosting Douglas as his first choice and Rayburn of Texas as his second choice against Wallace. As a leading figure in Sterling Drug, a company which was a long-time ally of I. G. Farben before the war and may be so again after it, Corcoran has a stake in revival of the cartel system Wallace has fought.

The weakness of the anti-Wallace bloc in 1940 was its failure to get together on a single candidate. This failure reflected the bloc's underestimate of Wallace's strength. The same weakness is apparent this time. Corcoran has tried in some degree to correct it by an alliance with the forces behind Rayburn, and at one time the Douglas crowd and the Rayburn crowd were prepared to swing over at Chicago to whichever of their respective candidates seemed the stronger. A grotesque incident in the annals of this alliance was Corcoran's effort to get Josephus Daniels to sign an article Corcoran had prepared extolling Rayburn. Daniels indignantly declined to serve as a stooge, and it looks now as though neither Douglas nor Rayburn will cut much of a figure at Chicago.

The chief hopes of the big-business crowd fighting Wallace have been centered on Barkley, and utility interests in New York are said to have used their affiliates out in the country (1) to drum up support for Barkley and (2) to titillate several state governors with the hint that if Wallace can be stopped maybe the lightning will strike them. Georgia Power and Light spokesmen, for example, "contacted" Governor Arnall of Georgia, but unsuccessfully. Similar overtures and soundings have been made by utility interests in Oklahoma, New Mexico, Chicago, and Jersey City. That they have failed is indicated by Hague's statement that he will support anybody the President wants for Vice-President and also by Senator Truman's statement that he does not want the nomination.

The anti-Wallace forces have been skilful in using the press, but unfortunately for them the President and not the press will decide the nomination. For several weeks the Douglas forces have tried to get leading labor leaders to indicate that they would support Douglas if they could not get Wallace. R. J. Thomas of the automobile workers was one of those approached, also unsuccessfully. Even the night before the joint Murray-Hillman press conference, some newspapermen fell for the report that the C. I. O. was considering a second choice in the event that Wallace could not be nominated. Ickes telephoned Hillman in an effort to get the Political Action chief to name an alternative. All that failed with Murray's statement, fully backed by Hillman, "We have no other choice and we're not doing any trading."

The argument that Wallace will lose the party votes is being combated here by two important groups. One is the C. I. O. and the other the Negroes. The C. I. O. has advanced the view that in several key Northern states, notably New York, the presence of Wallace on the ticket will increase enthusiasm and make it possible to get out a larger vote. I think the argument is a sound one, and I think that if Wallace loses the ticket any votes it will be largely in areas, such as the South, that Roosevelt will carry anyway.

The South's bargaining power has largely been destroyed by the strong position taken in the Republican platform on the FEPC, lynching, discrimination in the armed forces, and the poll tax. Talk of a coalition between the Republicans and the right-wing Southern Democrats proved the idlest kind of speculation at the Republican National Convention, and no one there ever took the rumor of a Dewey-Byrd ticket seriously. Disgruntled Democrats in the South cannot affect the outcome in November, but the Negro vote might easily prove decisive. The convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Chicago Sunday night is expected to indorse Wallace strongly, and his nomination might solve a leading Democratic problem. The party can weasel or keep silent on the Negro question in the platform, thus placating the Southerners, and still carry the bulk of the Negro vote by renominating Wallace. For Roosevelt and Wallace provide a better guaranty of better treatment for the Negro than any promises in the Republican platform.

For a day or so the anti-Wallace forces thought they had won something of a victory when the President announced that he would run without making Wallace's nomination a condition as he did in 1940. That belief was dissipated on reflection. The President could not say, "If the people command me . . . I have as little right to withdraw as the soldier has to leave his post in the line," and then say that he would not run unless he had Wallace as his running mate. Those who know what the President has been thinking know that the key to his stand for Wallace is in the second paragraph from the end of his letter to Hannegan. The President wants as a possible successor a man who will carry on the objectives he set in that letter, the objectives of a permanent peace abroad and full employment and a higher standard of living at home. To Roosevelt, as to millions of Americans, that spells Wallace.

May I be permitted to cast my own vote on the eve of this historic decision? I have met and talked with the Vice-President, and in recent weeks I have questioned many people who have been associated with him in the Department of Agriculture and in the Board of Economic Warfare. I have been reading the newly published collection of his past speeches and articles in "Democracy Reborn." I think I have a good picture of his weaknesses and of his strength. He has not Mr. Roosevelt's robust human qualities or his extraordinary capacity for politics. He is not always wise in his judgment of people. He is shy and does not always "go over" with audiences. But he is extraordinary in his honesty, especially his honesty with himself, in his understanding of man and history, and in his vision.

Like Roosevelt, Wallace grew to wider understanding in Washington. But like Roosevelt, too, he compromised when the forces against him proved too strong, as in the famous purge of Jerome Frank, Lee Pressman, and Gardner Jackson in 1935 under pressure from the milk trust, the planters, and the packers. Like Roosevelt, he is not a revolutionist but a democratic leader trying within the limits of political possibility to correct the economic evils of our society and to help its underprivileged. He offers the kind of leadership that alone holds out hope of peaceful and gradual reform in our society, of the achievement of security and employment by combined private and governmental action. In a time of crisis, such as we may encounter after the war, he would acquit himself with greatness. Few people understand the problems of our society and of the world so well, and few have his broad humanity, his tolerance, his concern for people, few that genuine personal saintliness that is Wallace's. I think we may count our country fortunate in having in a single generation two leaders of the stature and vision of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Henry A. Wallace.

The Uses of Air Power

BY JOHN R. CUNEO

THE difficulty of an invasion of Europe against the opposition of a nation situated like Germany can scarcely be exaggerated. With its interior lines of operation and excellent land communications Germany might have been able to concentrate an overwhelmingly superior force at any invasion point. It was the aim of the Allied air force to negate those advantages.

The first requirement was appreciably to reduce Germany's entire war potential. This was the mission of the strategic air forces stationed in Great Britain. "Strategic" air forces do not usually pave the way for a surface offensive. By official definition their aim is "the defeat of the enemy nation." However, their failure to accomplish this turned their bombing into an effort to spare the invasion forces a "blood bath" on the beaches.

The question arises whether the strategic air forces should now be converted into tactical air forces—that is, air forces cooperating with ground troops directly against the enemy armies. The fear has, in fact, been expressed that, once the invasion was started, General Eisenhower would insist on all available air strength being used in support of his ground forces. No criticism of the General is implied in this; similar fears are as old as strategic bombing. For example, during discussions in September, 1918, about the formation of an inter-Allied bombing force, Marshal Foch proposed to reserve the right to use all or a part of such a force in the ground battle. Whereupon the British Air Staff prepared to recommend to its government the withdrawal of its long-range bombing squadrons to England in order to preserve their independence.

No reason exists why there should be any conversion of one type of air force into another. The strategic air forces can easily be joined with the tactical air forces and assigned to tactical objectives when support for ground action is vital. This had to be done at the time of the invasion because it was imperative to gain a foothold on the beaches. In such an emergency the front lines are not affected quickly enough by injuries inflicted by normal strategic missions.

Simultaneously with blows at the German war potential the air arm carries on the fight for aerial supremacy. This is the task of both the strategic and the tactical air force. Air supremacy is the first requirement for success in any surface operation—land, sea, or amphibious. Its importance has been clearly recognized only during the present war, though a realistic study of the First World War would have revealed it. In fact, General von Bülow wrote in a memorandum issued on January 30, 1917, "The struggle for supremacy in the air must therefore precede the artillery battle" ("Experiences of the German 1st Army in the Somme Battle"). The artillery, of course, opens the surface phase of the battle.

"Air supremacy" is a glib phrase often misunderstood. Basically it signifies a state of moral, physical, and material superiority which enables its possessors to conduct at will operations against the enemy both in the air and on the earth's surface. It is not necessarily possessed by the side which destroys the greatest number of airplanes. It does not necessarily totally deny to the enemy a place in the air. The opportunities for evasion in the cubic area of the aerial battlefields make that impossible as long as the enemy has any air strength. For instance, Allied air superiority could not prevent the disastrous German air raid on the port of Bari on December 2, 1943, but this isolated failure was no contradiction of the Allied claim of aerial supremacy.

Air supremacy is gained by a variety of means. First a fighter defense and offense must be established—including, besides aircraft, a ground warning service. Both the strategic and the tactical air force contain fighter as well as bombing craft. Victories in aerial combat are supplemented by raids on enemy air bases. The blows of the strategic air forces at German aircraft factories and oil fields are to the same end. These attacks not only destroy the enemy's air strength but compel him to divert his aircraft to defensive missions. Obliged to parcel them out in order to cover all possible areas, he loses the advantage of a massed air offensive.

In February, 1944, the fight for aerial supremacy mounted toward a climax. From that date on the Allies made a concerted all-out attempt to destroy both the German aircraft industry and the defending German aircraft.

After aerial supremacy is gained, the third phase of aerial preparation for a great operation such as the invasion begins—the isolation of the battlefield. This is principally the function of the tactical air force, although if necessary the strategic air force can cooperate. Isolation of the battlefield means preventing the enemy from moving troops and supplies into or within the theater of operations. It can be accomplished by disrupting his lines of communication, destroying his supply dumps and other installations, and attacking his troop concentrations in rear areas. The denial of food, ammunition, and reinforcements "softens up" the enemy for the attacking ground troops.

BURLINGAM

Attention should be directed to the words "disrupting lines of communication." Despite the tremendous development of modern bombing it is apparently still true that air attacks cannot sever rail communications for any great length of time. Their object is rather to cause disorganization. Rail traffic depends on everything working smoothly; congestion is easily created and hard to clear. Highways are even more difficult to block than railroads, and disruption again is the aim.

Since sufficient artillery cannot be landed in the early stages of an invasion, aerial bombing is used to soften up military installations on the coast. (Naval batteries are probably more effective, but they cannot be brought to bear in large enough numbers to make up for the missing artillery.) This is probably the least successful employment of the air weapon. The ability of modern fortifications to withstand bombardment is astounding, as was demonstrated by the bombing of Cassino on March 15, 1944. Once the invasion army has established its beachhead and can bring in the necessary artillery, the air forces can make their most effective contribution by attending to missions beyond the battle zones.

By accomplishing these various tasks the Allied air forces denied to Germany the advantages of its interior position. The invasion fleet could then sail. At that moment the tactical air force assumed another task—collaboration with surface troops.

There should be no such thing as an "air umbrella," though the fighting men on the ground as far back as 1915 demanded this protective roof. The Allies first recognized the fallacy of the conception. In a series of conferences in the fall of 1915 between General Trenchard of the Royal Flying Corps and Commandant du Peuty of the French air service it was agreed that airplanes could not be set to patrolling a beat, like policemen, over ground forces. The Germans saw the error of attempting it during the battles on the Somme in 1916. The airplane is an offensive weapon and to be used effectively must be employed on offensive missions. It accomplishes nothing by circling over the heads of invasion barges or infantry on beaches. Air "protection" is furnished by striking at enemy air bases and supply centers far behind the battle lines.

When the tactical air forces attack selected objectives in the battle area, they must be in close coordination with the ground forces. Information and orders must be constant, clear, and definite. Airmen in the heat of action sweeping near the ground at terrific speeds cannot be expected to gain a clear idea of the battle situation. If the teamwork is not perfect, they are likely to expend their energies and perhaps their lives on targets of minor importance.

As the invasion of France turns into a land offensive we shall probably find the strategic air forces returning to their blows at Germany's war potential, all forces trying to maintain aerial supremacy, and the tactical air forces engaged in isolating the battlefield and answering emergency requests for assistance by hard-pressed infantry units.

What is the counter-action of the German air force? Compelled to turn to fighter aircraft for defense purposes, Germany is unable to employ bombers to force the Allies on the defensive. The robot bombs to some extent are serving as a substitute. Tons of bombs have been dropped on the rocket coast, and airplanes have been set to chasing the robots—a welcome diversion to the Germans. The proportions of this diversion seem minor at present, although they may very possibly increase.

The Germans seem to have decided to hold back their air strength either for the defense of the homeland—as the British did in 1940—or in anticipation of other landings. Reduced as it may be, we must always remember that it can be assembled in force over any particular sector in which the decisive action may seem to be developing.

In World War I the Germans were brilliant in their recognition of the possibilities of the air weapon in this respect. Although far inferior in total air strength to the Allies, they managed to give battle in the air over the decisive sectors up to the last. For example, in March, 1918, when the great German offensive was launched, the German army had a total of 1,264 airplanes along the front from Switzerland to the sea. On the front of attack 724 planes were concentrated—approximately 57 per cent. The rest were spread thin along the other fronts. Post-war German field-service regulations flatly stated that formations not taking part in the decisive battle must dispense with aircraft.

To counter Allied air action, the Germans must accept battle for air supremacy. Without air supremacy no move of a major character can succeed in modern warfare. It is the keystone of all operations.

Space has limited this discussion to the combat functions of the air forces. The missions of other units, such as reconnaissance aviation, coastal patrol, and the troop-carrier commands, should not, however, be overlooked. They are an essential part of the pattern of an invasion.

In invasion operations as in any offensive of surface forces, the air weapon is a member of a team seeking to defeat the enemy's armed forces. There is no question of victory through air power: the limitations of the air weapon are recognized, and it is assigned only the roles in which its unique power can be best employed. Yet if it is not the only cog on the wheel of the war machine, it is one without which the invasion could never have been set in motion.

He Fields Ohio's Hot Ones

BY KARL KEYERLEBER

Cleveland, July 13

THE biggest man in Ohio politics today, the despair of the boys in the back room but the idol of the voters, is the strapping son of a Slovenian steelworker. If some future Hoyle codifies the rules of the political game, it will probably be found that Mayor Frank J. Lausche of Cleveland has broken every one of them. His most recent performance was to enter the Democratic primary as a candidate for governor just a week before the deadline for filing petitions, without the support of his home-county organization and with a campaign chest as bare as Mother Hubbard's cupboard. Last man to the starting-line in a five-man race, he polled more votes in his first state-wide campaign than all four of his opponents together.

Next November Lausche will be opposed by Cincinnati's Mayor James Garfield Stewart, no mean vote-getter himself. Stewart is the man who made the gesture of nominating Governor Bricker for President at the Republican convention in Chicago.

Although the trend in Ohio as in the nation has been Republican, Lausche is regarded around here as a nice bet to reverse it. Clevelanders may be prejudiced, but there is solid ground for the belief that he will win the governorship. Lausche has shown a rare gift for gathering votes from well-tilled G. O. P. fields. He left the Court of Common Pleas to run for mayor in 1941—literally by popular demand and with the support of all three Cleveland newspapers—and won this Republican stronghold's highest executive post by 50,000 votes, the biggest majority ever recorded here. Last year Lausche was reelected by 67,000 votes—to become the city's first Democratic mayor to serve two terms in thirty years.

Lausche is a big, rugged man with a mop of curly black hair which seldom knows the restraint of a hat. He has been called Lincolnesque by admirers, though he has none of the Emancipator's gauntness. What makes the voters go for him?

An incident in the primary jockeying is illuminating. Lausche was invited to Columbus, the state capital, to be looked over by the powerful Franklin County Democratic Central Committee. Gatherings of this kind often have the atmosphere of Alumni Day on the campus, with the "party" substituting for Alma Mater. One might expect some stress on the need for being a good Democrat, some talk of spoils. Lausche told the committeemen: "As governor my sole objective will be to render justice to all of the people of Ohio. In this troublesome, perilous time we must be Americans first and Democrats second." Pretty corny, thought several committeemen; that stuff ought to be saved for the voters. They settled back, drew on their cigars, and waited for this big guy to bid for their support. But Lausche didn't butter anybody up. He promised no jobs. He would welcome the committee's support, but they would have to take him on his own terms.

When they had recovered from their astonishment, the committeemen took a vote. They passed up a hometown candidate and indorsed Lausche. Once more the Cleveland mayor had shown an amazing ability to sell himself. He does it in party halls, in coal mines, and at the Chamber of Commerce. His strength crosses party and class lines. It was whispered when he launched his belated campaign that some of the backing came from Republican business men. He has also been called the candidate of the C. I. O., whose indorsement he received in the primary. He is considered the most democratic mayor Cleveland has had since Tom L. Johnson, whose statue was set up in a public square.

Politically, Lausche is a little to the right of the early New Deal but to the left of the position lately taken by President Roosevelt (the distinction is mine, not Lausche's). What he thinks of the New Deal's chief architect he revealed in a recent speech: "Under Roosevelt America has taken on a social vision that it never had before. The problems of the aged, the blind, the healthy man who was unable to find work in depression times, the problem of the farmer who was in danger at times of losing his property because of falling food prices—all these were given greater recognition under him than ever before in history. Many of the things he did are bound to make for a better America."

Lausche, who came up from the other side of the railroad tracks, shares Roosevelt's social vision. But he has never called anybody an economic royalist, and while he believes that social-security laws are here to stay and "in all probability will be further extended," he is all for using the soft pedal on government interference. He once defined a "free-enterprise" economy as meaning "free from compulsory labor, free from exploitation by employers, unregulated monopolies, or arbitrary public authority."

As a judge Lausche gained a reputation for being fearless, liberal, and humane—and once his mind was made up, intensely stubborn. He used to sweat over decisions. He still sweats to clarify his thinking on big issues. On the subject of a lasting peace, he believes that there must be some world organization "able to deal decisively with those nations which harbor ambitions for world domination and enslavement of little nations." He is certain the government will have to act as a stout backstop for private enterprise to keep up employment in the post-war years, but he gives you the impression that he definitely does not think the government should at the same time do all the pitching and play the outfield, too. On the other hand, he sees the trend toward big government as inevitable and has little patience with arguments over states' rights. He recalls that a lot of Ohio Republicans who argue about them today paid no attention to the protests of Ohio communities when the state usurped local authority.

A crack ball player, Lausche turned down a professional career in favor of the law: "I took the long view; a baseball career is short." As third baseman, Lausche once set a world record for plays at one base by handling nineteen chances in a sandlot game. He still handles everything that comes his way and still takes the long view. When he was on the bench, fellow-judges used to funnel all the tough labor cases his way—for city judges are elected, and everybody knows that a ticklish labor case is likely to cost votes no matter how you decide it. Well-meaning advisers tipped off the earnest Lausche that he was being taken for a ride, but he continued to field all the tough ones.

As mayor, he scooped up another tough one last fall. Shortly before the November election craftsmen employed by the city were demanding pay raises. Lausche thought that their claims were unjustified. He was warned that if he fought it out he would be committing political suicide; he should temporize, or pass the buck to the Council. But he stood by his convictions and let political expediency go hang. If he lost votes, nobody could point to them in the subsequent landslide.

More than on anything else Lausche's strength today rests on his record as a war mayor. It is an unspectacular record, which is a way of saying that he has headed off trouble before it broke. Before the Office of Defense Transportation was organized in Washington he had created a special War Transportation Committee and taken the lead in staggering working hours and promoting ride-sharing. He formed the Mayor's War Production Committee, forerunner of the War Production Board's labor-management committees. "We didn't try to settle the disputes," he said. "We aimed to keep the men working until regular machinery could handle the disputes." He set up a committee to deal with community health which became a national model. And he set up a committee to iron out racial problems. Cleveland, with all the potentialities for trouble that elsewhere have flared into ugly blots on the nation's war record, has had no race trouble and not one prolonged strike.

Strangely enough, one of Lausche's most vexing problems has been his relations with the city's own employees. Cleveland had a brief transit strike and almost had a second. Though he won a reputation as a friend of labor when he was on the bench, the Mayor has been frequently embroiled in disputes with unions representing city workers. In this he is to some extent the victim of circumstances, since he has been obliged to refuse wage demands that outstripped city revenue.

In the Ohio primary Lausche was thought to have White House backing. This may be putting it mildly; it has been said that he was drafted by the Administration to strengthen the Democrats' hand. However that may be, there are many who believe that this rugged, outspoken man has made a good start on the road that leads to high places.

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE ILLUSTRATED DAILY NEWS, the rather mysterious new newspaper which appeared in New York last week, does not represent an original departure in American journalism. Tabloid in form, it is the second newspaper of that size which has made its bow before the metropolitan public; and as for illustrated dailies, the Graphic figures in the memory of more than one New York boyhood. Neither of these precedents yields any prospect of commercial success for the present venture, which starts off, however, with considerable advertising, cheap pictures, and cheaper paper. —July 5, 1919.

FOR OURSELVES WE HAVE TODAY only pity for the weak, compromising, morally defeated man who returned from Paris on Tuesday. . . . No amount of self-deception, no amount of beautiful language and imagery can hide the truth that those liberals who most warmly welcomed his Fourteen Points and fought for them tooth and nail are today disillusioned, disheartened, discouraged, because, after all his promises to the plain people of Europe, Mr. Wilson did not, when the final showdown came, appeal over the heads of the men who euchred him on every trick.—July 12, 1919.

THE ALLIES HAVE ACTED PROMPTLY in lifting the German blockade after the formal notification of the ratification of the treaty by the Weimar Assembly, and a wild rush is on by the Allies and America to get the larger share of the trade with Germany—and yet it is only a few months ago that many of the leading firms in New York and London were hanging out signs announcing that they would never do business again with the Huns. Already a New York bank has announced that it will open a branch in Berlin without loss of time, and we hear of many private firms that are extending generous credits to former German customers. This is altogether gratifying and was to be expected in view of the artificial nature of much of the hatred deliberately created for war purposes.—July 19, 1919.

The Class of 1944

BY ORDWAY TEAD

I HAVE spoken this spring at several commencements at both colleges and secondary schools. I have met the graduates; I have talked to the teachers. I have tried to take the responsibility seriously and not offer pollyanna truisms or make pleas for impossible challenges. And I have tried—often with a lump in my throat—not to be too oppressively somber about it. Nor are these commencements the only occasion of my contact with this age group.

I have come through it all with a fairly unified impression—about the young people and about the process they have been exposed to. By and large they are a fine bunch of youngsters. The notion that they are "soft," disorganized, frustrated, or discouraged just isn't so. Those are middle-aged judgments read into conduct and appearances which are no doubt different from those of a few years back and which often have a touch of bravado, of whistling to keep one's courage up. The oldsters too often impute their own state of mind to the young, forgetting that this graduating class had no experience of the First World War, never knew the follies of the twenties or the dejections of the thirties. Young people accept, for better or for worse, the world as they find it today.

This means they are realists who tend to be what William James called tough-minded. They have wonder and genuine humility, but they are not glib verbalizers about their feelings. They are curious and inquiring—reserved and puzzled perhaps, but not enough to let it dampen a good healthy animal delight in being alive and being aware of the other sex. In sheer honesty and straightforwardness they have the older generation put to shame, although "shame" is a trait many are all but innocent of in its literal physical sense. Their total attack on life is robust and spontaneous. They ask for no special sympathy; they ask rather not to be "kidded," and to be shown where and how to get at some job which they can do. Give us this day our daily activities which make some sense to us—is the unsaid but prevalent prayer.

I say sincerely that they are a better lot than in a certain sense we deserve, we who have fumbled and bungled and rationalized through the last quarter-century. To what is this due? Whence this unearned increment of psychic vigor?

I do not know the answer beyond affirming that with all our educational confusions I am sure we are doing a better job on the whole than was done on us in the formal educational process. I think I know something of present shortcomings in the schools and colleges, public and private alike. But the fact remains that some gains have been made. And they are these. We are getting beyond pure "book learning." Music and dramatics, student assemblies and war efforts, more planned social occasions for boys and girls together—all these help. Summer activities which are educational in a broad way are consciously sought. While the improvement is by no means universal, there are more equal, more friendly relations with Negro and Jewish students than existed a few years ago. The young people are less race conscious and less creed and color conscious than their elders. And on the whole the teachers are more liberally disposed in these matters than the parents. I remember well one head mistress of a swanky school who talked practically all through dinner of her frustrated effort to enroll several Negro students. And I have seen mothers become distinctly unpleasant in trying to argue their daughters out of selecting a Jewish girl as a roommate.

Our effort to educate the whole man is no longer a matter of lip-service, however far we may still be from the goal. The emotional and physical aspects are getting more attention; we emphasize a better diet—despite the prevalence of "cokes," hot dogs, and cigarettes. On the whole, also, teachers are more companionable and less stand-offish with students; a cooperative attitude is now prized above a domineering or aloof one.

As a constantly vocal critic of education, I am not forgetting other aspects of the picture. As important as any is the equivocal attitude of many conscientious middle-class parents toward the schools, their practice of shipping their offspring off to private schools from the age of ten or twelve. Without doubt there has been a syphoning off of responsible concern with the prob-

Order in Spain

[The following paragraphs are taken from a recent letter to Franco's Minister of War, General Asensio, by José Maria Gil Robles, leader of the extreme rightist Catholic faction, now in Lisbon. The testimony of Gil Robles is the more impressive since he was himself responsible, as Minister of War in 1935, for the brutal repression of the uprising in the Asturias.]

But let us be sincere. In many provinces we are living practically under anarchy: attacks on farms, robberies, banditry, owners unable to visit their properties, travelers being kidnapped.

It is my absolute conviction that in this case the victor [Franco] will never have peace, especially since the vanquished are convinced that they will become victors themselves through the help of the entire world. The authorities may multiply the formation of armed forces; they may shoot people by the hundreds. Nothing will be achieved.

lems of public education. Influential and educated parents in many communities go on the boards of private schools and leave public education to the politicians.

Again, one is depressed by the age of the members of educational bodies, both public and private. I will hazard the guess that whether it is a school committee or a college board of trustees, the average age of the incumbents would stack up to between sixty and sixty-five years. This means that these worthies had their own school experience in the '80's and '90's, and educational theory and practice have radically changed since then.

To teach typical school boards that yesterday's "frills" are today's essentials is a slow task. To convince them that good education costs more than we spend, that higher salaries are necessary to attract stronger persons as teachers, is often a difficult task for school administrators—especially when property-owning friends want the tax rate kept down. We still prefer capital outlays to better salaries, equipment, and books.

The members of the class of 1944 have a lot to learn. It isn't a world of their making. But they are moving into it with surprising confidence and verve. What it all says to me is that the schools and colleges deserve better and always better at our hands—more informed and sustained citizen oversight of the public teaching effort, more carefully selected teachers, and bigger budgets to foot the necessarily high cost of going beyond "book learning" to active experience learning.

Coming in The Nation

MOHANDAS K. GANDHI'S proposal to break the Indian communal deadlock by partitioning India into Moslem and Hindu states has been followed by a pledge not to renew the campaign of civil disobedience during the war but to help in the Allied war effort. Louis Fischer, whose first-hand account of conversations with Gandhi appeared in The Nation shortly after the Cripps mission, will discuss the full significance of these latest sensational developments in the coming issue.

LIEUTENANT JEROME H. SPINGARN, home on leave after a year and a half in the South Pacific, discussed with members of The Nation's staff the problem that front-line soldiers, sailors, and marines face in their isolation from news and topics of interest on the home front. At our suggestion, he has outlined the critical situation in an article that will appear soon.

THE SHADOW AND SUBSTANCE of television is the subject of an enlightening story told by Alan Barth of the Washington Post. The Nation will carry it soon.

In the Wind

THE NEW JERSEY REPUBLICAN Finance Committee is sending out a form letter to its rank and file, seeking funds for the 1944 campaign. The committee is embarrassed by the circumstances which have made such an appeal necessary. "Twelve years of the New Deal," the letter says, "has leveled fortunes; therefore the former large contributors no longer write large checks. We must now look to thousands of contributors for sufficient financial support."

EDUCATION FOR DEMOCRACY: The K. O. Lee Company of South Dakota, manufacturers of machine tools, is writing to the firms with which it has done business advising them that "the management of every business has a great opportunity for carrying on an educational program among its employees by weekly or semi-monthly inclosures in pay envelopes." The company suggests that the Committee for Constitutional Government, or other sources, will provide firms with suitable envelope stuffers on the "fallacies of the New Deal." The K. O. Lee Company, of course, has acted. It is stuffing envelopes of employees with "New Deal and Diocletian," a speech delivered by Clayton Rand before the Rotary Club of Gulfport, Mississippi.

DURING THE RECENT HEARING on the new Price Control Act, Printer's Ink reports, Representative Taber was going through the OPA pay roll, item by item. He showed considerable distress when he discovered that a $75-a-week newspaper reporter was listed as receiving $6,000 a year. Turning to James F. Brownlee, senior deputy administrator, Mr. Taber said, "I see that you are getting $8,000 a year. Do you mind telling us how much you got before you came here?" Mr. Brownlee, a former executive of General Foods and Frankfort Distillers, modestly admitted that he had been forced to worry along on $125,000 a year. Whereupon Mr. Taber lost all interest in the pay roll.

SLIGHT-EXAGGERATION DEPARTMENT: Technocracy, Inc., tells us that for the first time in history "technology has made it possible to be utterly ruthless." The Flying Wing, super-bomber designed and proposed by Technocracy, Inc., could drop 275,000 tons of bombs in one single raid of 5,500 planes! It has a wing spread of 330 feet and can carry fifty tons of bombs for 6,000 miles and return without refueling. (The largest bomb load of Allied planes is reported to be eight tons, and the longest tactical range 2,000 to 2,500 miles. The colossal B-29 has a wing spread of 141 feet.)

FESTUNG EUROPA: Vacations have been prohibited in all Nazi-controlled war industries in Norway, and Nazi-controlled newspapers have been forbidden to publish anything that might lead workers to want a vacation. Workers who take a vacation face a court-martial.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Japan's Puppet Show

BY SELDEN C. MENEFEE

THE Japanese have long since surpassed the Nazis in the science of manipulating Quislings. They have established some form of collaborationist government—under strict Japanese control, of course—in every country of occupied Asia. At present, however, the whole puppet show is coming unstrung.

Japan has not only been relatively successful at this hypocritical game in the past, but was the first to play it. Korea was annexed in 1910, and with considerable finesse for those times. The Japanese ambassador in Seoul hired a band of assassins to kill the Korean queen, after which the younger of the two princes royal, Yi Eum (called Gin Ri by the Japanese), was pressed into marriage with a Japanese princess. The crown prince, Yi Ewa, is still a prisoner in Korea, and Japan may try to make a puppet king of him when the war is plainly lost.

In Manchuria Henry Pu Yi, last of the Manchu dynasty, was held in Tientsin until he was made "Emperor of Manchoukuo" in 1933. Like Yi Eum, he is only window dressing; the real Japanese Quislings in Manchuria are General Chang Ching-hui, who is now Premier, and the Japanese-educated Dr. Chao Hsin-po, now president of the Legislative Yuan. There has been little news of opposition to Japan in Manchuria, although guerrilla resistance still persists in some areas.

In sections of Asia occupied since 1937 the Japanese puppets are having more trouble. As it becomes plain that Japan must lose the war sooner or later, rumblings are heard in every part of eastern Asia. Last year the task of cajoling or forcing the native peoples into line for intensified Japanese exploitation was intrusted to a "Greater East Asia Ministry" in the Tojo government. In November six of the leading puppets or their representatives were summoned to Tokyo for a "Greater East Asia Conference." But despite all Japan's efforts, its prestige has been steadily declining as a result of official arrogance, economic chaos in occupied Asia, and Allied victories in the Pacific.

In China the Japanese have had high hopes of their puppet Premier of the Nanking government, Wang Ching-wei. He and Chiang Kai-shek, after all, are the two ranking disciples of Dr. Sun Yat-sen. Apparently Wang was induced to make peace with the enemy by his jealousy or distrust of Chiang, his hatred of the Chinese Communists, and his belief in Dr. Sun's pan-Asian doctrine. After many initial blunders, such as the Nanking orgy, the Japanese have tried to rally the Chinese people behind Wang by a policy of superficial appeasement. They have given him nominal control of the puppet states in North China, surrendered their extraterritorial rights in Shanghai, and turned over to the Nanking regime nearly every right save that of taxing the Japanese. Early this month they put Wang's government in control of six important public utilities which had been run by the Japanese military throughout the occupied period. Currently Tokyo claims that in the campaign to capture the Hankow-Canton railroad Japanese troops have been given strict orders not to rape or loot or to destroy crops needlessly.

All this, however, comes too late. The Chinese regulars and guerrillas fight on. And now Wang Ching-wei, who is sixty-one years old, is seriously ill. An operation to remove an assassin's bullet fired early in the war was unsuccessful, and last March Wang was moved to Tokyo for other operations. So far as is known he is still there. If he dies, it will be impossible to replace him.

In the Philippines a number of politicians have gone over to the Japanese. Chief among them is José Laurel, head of the puppet Philippine government which received paper "independence" last October. A former Yale Law School honor student, Laurel was Secretary of the Interior in the pre-war Commonwealth government. He had made pro-Japanese and anti-American statements before Pearl Harbor and had been accused of accepting bribes for facilitating the settlement of Japanese around Davao, the enemy's secret base on Mindanao. A year ago he was the target of a would-be assassin's bullet.

The most pro-Japanese of the Filipino collaborationists is Benigno Aquino, director general of the fascist Kalibapi, the single political party, and speaker of the puppet assembly. If he had not been so obviously pro-Japanese, Aquino might have been chosen for the top Quisling job. Both he and Laurel have been decorated by the Japanese, who may be trying to play one against the other. Both men have sons married to Japanese girls.

Some other prominent men collaborating with the enemy may be doing so either because they have no choice or because they want to extract concessions from the Japanese. Jorge Vargas, President Quezon's secretary, who was reported to have been left behind to keep order when the Japanese arrived, was made mayor of Manila and then chairman of the provisional government until superseded by Laurel. Later he was named "ambassador" to Japan. Manuel Roxas, a Filipino general who held out with the guerrillas on Mindanao for more than a year after the fall of Corregidor, signed the Japanese-sponsored Philippine constitution immediately after his capture, apparently under duress. Six months later he emerged from "retirement due to ill health" to become head of the economic planning board and take charge of rice distribution in the famine-stricken areas.

Guerrilla warfare continues on all the larger islands, even reaching the suburbs of Manila on occasion—as the Japanese admit. The guerrillas find inspiration in Tomás Confessor, an intellectual leader and former associate of Quezon, who still holds out with a force of men in the southern islands. Laurel grows more desperate by the moment. In February he declared a state of national emergency and assumed dictatorial power over all government agencies and officials. In June he forbade the governors and mayors, who had apparently been getting unruly, to override the rulings of the constabulary. He also created a special Bureau of Investigation to purge his own administration and fired seventy-one members of the Manila constabulary and forty-two employees of the Food Administration. He has taken personal control of the Manila government. Laurel apparently is developing a severe case of jitters as the American forces approach the Philippines via New Guinea and Saipan.

Thailand, like Denmark, is held up as an example of how occupied countries profit by not resisting fascist aggression. The people have been bribed by the "gift" of the two Shan states that were formerly attached to Burma and of four Malay states. But Thailand remains Japan's soft underbelly in Southeast Asia. It has an organized underground movement looking to pre-war democratic figures for post-war leadership.

The unhappy Thai puppet is Premier Luang Pibul Songgram, who is pro-Axis rather than pro-Japanese. After being educated in a French military school, he visited Italy in the twenties and acquired a great admiration for Mussolini, whose picture he always kept in his room. He helped to engineer the anti-democratic coup of 1935, becoming Minister of Defense and, in 1938, Premier. On December 5, 1941, he took dictatorial power under the pretext of resisting aggression and admitted the Japanese into Thailand. Afterward he asked Hitler to be allowed to sign the Tripartite Agreement. The request was referred to Tojo, who turned it down. Pibul repaid this snub by refusing to attend last year's conference of puppet leaders in Tokyo, pleading sickness. Pibul has lately grown more and more melancholy both in his official statements and in the radio speeches he writes under the name of Sammakhai Thai. He tried to resign in 1943, but the Japanese would not let him.

Puppet Premier Ba Maw of Burma, the son of a leader in the Burmese revolt of 1886, was the first Premier under the relatively liberal Burmese constitution put into effect by the British in 1937. Two years later he lost a vote of confidence in the parliament, the British members voting against him. In August, 1940, he was sentenced to a year in jail for preaching sedition. At the end of this period he was not released immediately. His bitterness over these events made him eminently eligible for the post of Burmese Quisling. As Premier he has outlawed all political parties except one. Despite the "independence" granted Burma last year, every branch of Ba Maw's government is controlled by his Japanese "advisers." The forces of the Allies now fighting in Burma have been actively aided by the villagers.

Japan's Indian puppet is the head of the "Free India" provisional government, Subhas Chandra Bose, a former mayor of Calcutta and former president of the Indian National Congress. His record, which includes ten jail sentences under the British regime, is a great asset to the Japanese propagandists. Bose claims to have 300,000 Indian troops, but probably has less than a tenth of this number. The Japanese defeat in India was a great blow to his prestige, and he exerts nominal control today only over the Andaman and Nicobar islands.

In the Netherlands East Indies the Japanese were hard put to find prominent Indonesians who would collaborate with them. They finally seized on Ir. Soekarno, a fiery Javanese nationalist who had been exiled to Sumatra by the Dutch for revolutionary activities, and made him head of the Poetera, or so-called "peoples' movement." But apparently Soekarno is none too reliable; he has disappeared from the radio for long periods and is known to have been under arrest at least once.

Last year a central "council" with several regional branches was instituted with great fanfare in Java to allow Indonesian "participation in the military administration," but this was a patent fraud. Only a few thousand people were allowed to vote, and the Japanese kept the councils under tight control. Now they are trying to build up the native sultans in Java, Sumatra, and Borneo as symbols of self-rule. The Japanese radio admits that guerrillas are still operating in Sumatra and Borneo.

In Malaya, too, British and Indian guerrillas aided by Chinese and Malay civilians are still fighting, or "giving themselves up," as the Japanese quaintly put it. The Sultan of Johore and other native rulers helped the Japanese in the early stages of the war, but the Japanese radio seldom mentions them today.

Indo-China is the only country where the Japanese have not made use of native puppets; there the Vichy French under Admiral Decoux have done the dirty work, under loose Japanese control. But economic chaos resulting from Japanese exploitation and loss of foreign markets has produced great unrest in Indo-China, Malaya, and the Dutch East Indies alike. The Japanese now rarely refer to the "Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere," emphasizing instead "self-sufficiency" in each area.

The whole puppet show in eastern Asia, cleverly conceived as it was, is being disrupted by Japan's military defeats and its unkept promises. Unfortunately, these promises, though they were honored only in the breach, will be an unsettling factor in the situation we shall confront when the Japanese have been swept out. It will then be up to us—the United Nations—to show by our deeds that we mean to keep our own promises of self-government for colonial regions. The recent Congressional resolution reaffirming America's guaranty of independence to the Philippines as soon as the Quislings have been removed, and providing for American bases in the Islands for mutual security, is a good beginning.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IT TOOK the American public a week longer than the German to grasp the real significance of the robot bomb. Not until three weeks had passed did Americans understand that this was no mechanical toy but a diabolical invention. The average German, however, realized after fourteen days that the new weapon would not decisively alter the course of the war, would never win the victory for the Reich. The violent propaganda campaign which had at first convinced him that this was precisely what it would do—as described in this column last week—had only a short-lived success, and if all signs do not deceive us, its rapid and complete collapse marks a turning-point in the history of the war.

Let us see how the situation appeared to the eyes of neutral observers. The Arbeiter-Zeitung of Schaffhausen, Switzerland, reported on July 1:

> When two weeks ago Hitler shot the first robot bombs against England and when the words "The hour of retribution has come" were spread across the front pages of German newspapers, many people thought they saw the silver lining on the horizon. Now hardly anyone talks of or believes in the miraculous new weapon. Hopes have not been fulfilled. Crude facts are speaking. The enemy is advancing in the west, east, and south. Morale is sinking again.

Another Swiss newspaper, the Weltwoche of Zurich, gave a more detailed description on June 30:

> German propaganda referred to the "hell hounds" in almost mystical terms. . . . But in spite of Goebbels's vehemence, the help they brought to the government was of a very temporary nature. For a short time the morale of even the skeptical Wilhelmstrasse received a lift, and Hitler's prestige went up. German soldiers listening to broadcasts from Germany between battles broke into cheers. But the stimulating effect lasted only a few days. Goebbels's predictions did not materialize. Instead, accounts of disastrous defeats poured into Germany from all fronts.

Now that the phantasmagoria of a glorious change due to the new weapon has been dissipated, the common man in Germany sees for the first time the naked reality. He confronts now what, as if with an inherited instinct, he has always dreaded most—a many-front war. Until now the German public has hoped that the fresh masses of the Anglo-Americans would not actually appear on the field of battle. Even on June 6, after the successful landing, it comforted itself with the thought that the enemy would soon be thrown back into the sea and that the western front would forthwith disappear. When that did not happen, hope prevailed for some days after June 16 that Aladdin's wonder-bombs would save the Reich from a three-front war. Now that this expectation has also proved false, the dreaded, fundamentally hopeless situation has been finally—and I believe irrevocably—revealed. For a people as deeply experienced in land warfare as the Germans, no illusions can any longer veil the fact that a war against the armies not of one great power but of three is bound finally to be lost, if only from sheer attrition. As the Sydsvenska Dagbladet-Snaelposten of July 2 expressed it, "the war has been living on credit in Germany for a long time and has now used it all up. The bankruptcy of German propaganda has become complete." The National-Zeitung of Basel painted a similar picture on June 29: "The atmosphere in Berlin is extremely grave. The merciless reality of the three-front war seems for the first time to be fully comprehended. German morale seems to have crashed to a new low."

All reports agree that disillusionment about the "hell hounds" acted on German Stimmung like a blitz. The St. Gall Tagblatt for July 1 spoke of the "grosse Kotzen" —which is inadequately translated as general nausea." A wave of cynicism, it said, was sweeping over the country; one illustration was the sudden appearance of an unprintable filthy version of the song "Lilli Marlene." (This is the German song which American soldiers in Africa adopted for their own.) Of course the home front, whatever its feelings, is forced to carry on; the question is, when will its present mood spread to the army, as it surely will some day? The army is not, basically, compelled to carry on; the army can run away. In this connection a story in the Schaffhausen Arbeiter-Zeitung about a tank soldier from the eastern front is interesting. The soldier spoke of the "depression haunting everybody like a lingering poison." Even the officers, he said, were afflicted with it, and he repeated a conversation he had had with his battalion commander. Once when he brought this officer a paper, "the latter suddenly asked him why he looked in such ill-humor. The soldier shrugged his shoulders and did not answer. But the officer would not let him off. 'Speak out, man,' he insisted. 'You are fed up. If so, you need not be ashamed of it. It's the same with me.' "

BOOKS and the ARTS

The French Resistance

ARMY OF SHADOWS. By Joseph Kessel. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

AMONG French novelists of the late twenties and the thirties there was no slicker craftsman than Joseph Kessel. Somebody, explaining him to an American, once said he had the exuberance of the young Ben Hecht but was otherwise akin to James Cain, with a style like a whip and a preoccupation with amour in its more acrid, unorthodox, and even painful expressions.

After the collapse he stayed on in France until early in 1943 and seems to have had underground connections. Then he got out, and from London, in the spring and summer of 1943, he was "able to see the French Resistance in its most vivid light."

He has written a far from perfect book but has wisely tried to do no more than tell a story, not the story, of the "obscure, secret France, new to her friends, her enemies, and above all to herself." And because he writes with honesty of intention and humility of spirit, he has not marred or smirched the beauty of the thing he describes, the heroism in and of a France where "civil disobedience, individual and organized rebellion have become duties to the fatherland" and "the national hero is the under-cover man, the outlaw. . . . Prisons, executions, tortures, criminal attempts, surprise raids, flying bullets. . . . People die and kill with naturalness." He can be absolved of any intention to exploit the agony and heroism of his countrymen. Nor does he succumb, as other men have done, to the temptation to assimilate the heroisms of others into a legend of his own. This reviewer sees no reason to believe that Kessel intended his Gerbier as a self-portrait, as some have suggested.

He has woven his story around the fabulous career of Gerbier, whom we first meet as he is being checked into a concentration camp. Described by the police as a "distinguished bridge and highway engineer," he is "suspected of Gaullist activities" and is in reality on the general staff of the movement. He escapes from the camp, performs an execution on a comrade turned traitor, slips across to London, where we see him talking at a candlelit dinner table in Belgrave Square of the subterranean life he is about to return to. Then we get his "notebook," supposedly kept after his return to France. We see him in a Gestapo prison. He is rescued by comrades—led by a remarkable woman called Mathilde—who throw smoke bombs over the wall when the machine-gun has already begun to crackle. Then Mathilde weakens and has to be liquidated, on Gerbier's orders, for the safety of the rest. Again he slips away to London and after three weeks goes back to France, "in good health and very calm."

Kessel insists that "there is no propaganda in this book and there is no fiction. No detail has been forced, and none has been invented . . . only facts that have been experienced, verified, and that one might say are of daily occurrence." He had to blur his characters, of course. But, he says, "we are living in the midst of horror, surrounded by bloodshed. I have felt neither the right nor the strength to go beyond the simplicity of the chronicle, the humility of the document." This is not quite true. The weakness of this book lies in the irrepressible craftsmanship that produced such contrivances as the dinner table in Chelsea where so much could be said and the "notebook" that no one but a lunatic—which Gerbier was not—could have kept. Kessel may well have been reborn, but the expert hand of the storyteller who wrote "L'Equipage" and "Belle du Jour" was at work in these contrivances. Still, they do not invalidate the book as a whole.

Far better than the plot itself are the characters, who have the feel of life. There is Jean-François, who carries the messages and the explosives and teaches "simple, serious, and passionate people the use of English sub-machine guns." For him this life was made to order. Mathilde was "yellow, lean, worn out from her household cares and, perhaps because of this, was a woman of very aggressive virtue." She had six children and was an Action Française "fanatic" with a husband who believed in the Marshal. She went to work distributing tracts and was "especially happy when she had to add explosives to the thick bundles of printed sheets." She becomes a specialist in disguises and in managing escapes from prison. But she makes a mistake. She has kept a photograph of her oldest daughter, and when the Germans catch her this gives them their cue. They threaten to send the girl to an army brothel in Poland. And Mathilde cracks. There is the "wife of Felix," who had not known what her husband did until after the Germans shot him. Then she went to work as liaison agent until she was caught and, with her daughter, undressed and tortured—the red-hot pins in the stomach, the dentist's drill into the jawbone. "They did not reveal anything," said the German report smuggled out by a man of the Resistance in the Vichy police. There are many others in this convincing and unforgettable gallery of the men and women of the shadow army, with false names, false addresses, false faces, who cannot expect more than three months of life.

Now the shadow army has become the French Forces of the Interior, integrated to the Allied command. They are fighting in the open in Haute Savoie, in the southwest, and elsewhere. They are lauded in communiqués of the Allied High Command and also—but in a grimmer way—in the communiqués of the Germans, where announcements are made of the execution of "terrorists" behind their sagging front in Normandy and across precarious lines of communication. Their chief has been received, at long last, at the White House, and the guts and spirit that took him there were theirs as much as his. They have made history and not in France alone. They have forced, by their value as a hidden army and by their intransigence expressed through De Gaulle, a revision in a policy that spelled disaster for all. It is high time that Americans got to know their faces. For their battle is not wholly won, not in France or in London or in Washington. There are powerful men whose admiration for their courage is only matched by a wooden incomprehension of the meaning of their struggle—not against the Nazis alone—and by determined hostility to what in the final analysis they must stand for, a cleansing of the political and economic life of France. The enthusiasm for their exploits could flag and probably will. Up to this writing, as our troops advance, the men of the underground are disarmed, in the name of order. Kessel's book should serve as a reminder that they will have to be taken into account, these Gerbiers who have been freed, by the exigencies of a struggle against Nazis, against French traitors, and against frailty within their own ranks, of "all inner struggle, all scruple and pity." Acquaintance with them now may cushion the shock that will be felt in this country when, after the last Nazi has bit the dust (save for those we are keeping pure and uncontaminated in prison camps over here), the cleansing process goes on in France as it well may for awhile. In this respect one might recall that verse in the Marseillaise beginning, "Tremble ye tyrants and traitors," which, as it may be remembered, was written at an earlier moment in French history when traitors at home were leagued with foreign armies. Recently a French politician of the old school recalled a crack once made by Adrian Hebrard, of Le Temps, apropos of French political moeurs to the effect that the river running through Paris was not the Seine but the Lethe—as evidenced, among other things, by the prolonged immunity enjoyed by Le Temps itself. This is no longer true. No, indeed! Memories were never fresher. JAY ALLEN

Story of a Union

TAILOR'S PROGRESS. By Benjamin Stolberg. Doubleday, Doran and Company. An American Mercury Book. $2.75.

THE general suspicion that Benjamin Stolberg, like the bugler of the Grand Army, can only blow an attack seems to be only partly true. Although the old Stolberg occasionally appears, he has chosen a most worthy subject, the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, to show his more mellow side. In fact, the author at times overpraises the innumerable leaders and sub-leaders who saunter through his absorbing pages. Commendation usually reserved for the hallowed dead or for aspiring Presidential candidates is not absent from Mr. Stolberg's narrative. This undoubtedly "livens up" the story, but one begins to suspect a bit of literary exaggeration in these portrayals.

Occasionally the less mellow Stolberg also appears. No one would expect any book of his to be a tedious recital of events, but Mr. Stolberg's comments on Justice Brandeis, for instance, add nothing to the book or to the author's reputation as a social critic. As an embittered and disillusioned leftist Mr. Stolberg has developed a passionate hatred for reformers. This leads him to make a number of unkind and questionable comments on Justice Brandeis.

In general, however, he has written an admirable book. The struggle of the pioneers to establish a union, the first victories and the uphill fight to maintain it, the struggle with a union-wrecking Communist faction which almost destroyed the organization, and its revival and expansion under the leadership of David Dubinsky are recorded here with humor and understanding. Stolberg is at his best when he writes about the career of David Dubinsky, and much space is given to Dubinsky's personal and organization history. In Dubinsky we have a hard-headed pragmatist who still retains some of the idealism which first inspired his entry into the labor movement. Moreover, Dubinsky is content to be an efficient labor leader and does not crave the title of "labor statesman." Stolberg does not like labor statesmen, and the reviewer is inclined to share his prejudices, but he has high praise for the "extra-curricular" activities of the union, such as education and dramatics, the sponsoring of athletics, a vacation resort for members, and so on.

Stolberg ends up on a note of warning. He does not approve of the close alliance between the union and the Roosevelt Administration, and he trots out Samuel Gompers and Mathew Woll to prove his point. First of all, Gompers did not disapprove of workmen's compensation laws, although he did oppose government unemployment insurance and old-age-benefit schemes. What of it? Stolberg also cites the A. F. of L. opposition to government bureaucracy. There is by no means unanimous agreement in the ranks of the A. F. of L. on this point. Does Mr. Stolberg want to go back to a pre-1933 labor movement, one largely confined to the building trades, teamsters, clothing workers, and railroad men? Dubinsky, whom Stolberg admires, is a much more reliable guide in this respect, for he recognizes why the union has supported and continues to support the New Deal more clearly than Stolberg does. Despite the shortcomings of the New Deal the present strength of the labor movement is directly traceable to the efforts of the Roosevelt Administration. The reviewer is aware of the present dissatisfaction with wage-freezing and other governmental policies. Yet even if we grant the dubious argument that the cost of living has risen 20 per cent above the amount indicated by the index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, labor will have increased its real weekly earnings considerably during the war. Let the critics of the government's labor policy show a similar result in any other war period. Mr. Stolberg likewise decries the Popular Front because it "provoked fascist reaction." This highly simplified explanation neglects the basic reason for the rise of fascism—the failure of the economy to furnish a reasonable measure of prosperity and employment. Sometime it might be well to have those who oppose "democratic governmentalism" and at the same time flirt with Socialist ideas propose a program.

Stolberg is excellent at describing the "ups and downs" of the union, interesting and amusing when he deals with the various personalities of the organization, and a bit questionable as a social guide or critic. Nevertheless, his book can be enthusiastically recommended to all who are interested in the labor movement. Not only will they find it enlightening and entertaining, but they will learn to appreciate better the problems of maintaining an honest and efficient union, conscious of its obligation to society and to the needs of its members. Stolberg's book is worthy of its subject.

PHILIP TAFT

G. I. Letters

LETTERS HOME. Arranged and Edited by Mina Curtiss. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

I NEVER LEFT HOME. By Bob Hope. Illustrated by Carl Rose. Simon and Schuster. Paper, $1; Cloth, $2.

LEAVING aside problems of strategy and exploits of the battlefield, Mrs. Curtiss set out to discover what was going on in the minds of young Americans fighting for their country in far-away lands. She examined thousands of letters received in all parts of the country from men in the armed forces, and has published the best of them in "Letters Home." They come right from the hearts of the frightened, unhappy soldiers.

Not all are unhappy, of course; a few men seem to be enjoying the war, such as the gay paratrooper, Lieutenant Falen, who writes to his favorite bartender in Buffalo. "I have to laugh," says he, speaking of his descent in Sicily. "I landed in a high bush with all kinds of bristles and needles . . . all in the southern part of my anatomy. I kept pulling them out for an hour!" The war is not only high adventure but also broadening for Sergeant Cook: "Sure changed my mind on Africa, Durban is a city larger than Little Rock and almost as modern. . . ." As for Corporal Dreyer from Iowa, he took advantage of his travels to swap notes on hog cholera with the Irish, who called it swine fever, and made careful observation of the Arabs' method of irrigation.

At the other extreme we find Private Golub writing to his "Baby Dear" (bride) back in Brooklyn: "The feeling of loneliness is so sharp that it's hard to describe. . . . Despite the fact that you're never really alone it gets everyone. It grips you in the pit of your stomach, crawls up your spine, and pokes right into your brain. It's such a helpless feeling." Somewhere in the middle we find Lieutenant Reginald Thayer, a bombardier from New Jersey, taking refuge in mysticism. "Truly—God rides our ship," he writes to his "Dearest Aunt Marguerite." "Our faith in God is supreme —we will never lose it. . . . God was very good to me today—I actually got some Chesterfields—no foolin'—God is with us, and God be with you."

There would seem to be no danger that the American soldier ever will turn into a world conqueror. The farther afield he wanders, the better his own country looks. He wants to get back home as quickly as possible and stay there and renounce forever this business of fighting.

Take Jack Redinger, from Michigan, who defied his father's wishes in 1941 to become a naval aviator, saying he preferred "a short life doing the things I like, to old age without doing them." He just had to fly, and a year later he did. "We also do strafing hops which are thrilling," he wrote from training camp in 1942. "We come screaming down from two thousand feet, on some wooden rafts anchored off shore and . . . we blast away." Fun. But in 1943, having downed two Japanese planes, he wrote to his father from Guadalcanal: "So you now have an option on a post-war family plane? Well, more power to you. . . . If the Good Lord brings me safely through this I will never trouble Him again to look after me, by setting foot in another aeroplane. . . ."

The prevailing impression made by these letters is that the American soldiers are suffering not only from homesickness but also from bewilderment. Few seem to know what they are fighting for. John Earle does; he is a boy with a Quaker background who volunteered for the American Field Service; he thinks we are "fighting a social battle," and he notes with interest that the British soldier, at least, likes to discuss such things as communism and the Beveridge plan. Another man whose letters reveal awareness is Cliff Gallant, merchant seaman on the Murmansk run, who formerly was a printer, a member of the I. T. U. Nearly all the rest are fighting because they are compelled to, and the army apparently has made no genuine effort to tell them why.

Nor does the army seem to have done much about the malady of homesickness. Loneliness can attack not only individuals but also entire groups of men stationed, say, in Bizerte or Fairbanks. They get to feeling they have been sent to the end of the world and forgotten. Here the U. S. O. is a big help; its troupes of entertainers lift men's spirits mightily. In his book, "I Never Left Home," Bob Hope prints a thank-you letter from a soldier in Sicily who had seen his show. "We have been deprived of home, of our loved ones, and civilization for some time," the boy wrote. "For a few seconds we were back in our natural surroundings and completely happy."

Bob Hope might almost be counted a war hero himself; he has traveled 80,000 miles to various corners of the earth cracking his jokes before more than half the army. Other entertainers have made similar jaunts, but Hope is the first to write a book about it. The book is almost entirely made up of his familiar gags adapted to the various settings in which he found himself. For instance, he was caught in a night air raid in Bizerte without even his undershirt on. "That's pretty bare to be when all that flak's being thrown up into the air and has to come down somewhere. On the other hand, a cotton undershirt isn't much protection, but on the other hand is a silly place to wear an undershirt."

Well, as Simon and Schuster said in their apology for running out of copies, "there's no accounting for taste." The fact remains that Hope's appearances were a godsend to soldiers from Anchorage to Algiers.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

Dali Turns Novelist

HIDDEN FACES. By Salvador Dali. The Dial Press. $3.

ONE infuriating facet of Salvador Dali's complicated character is his refusal to let you like him. He's like a naughty little boy who, the moment he knows his mama has forgiven him his bad manners in public, immediately decides to test her good-will by smacking a lady guest on the behind at a Sunday tea. Just as Dali used to make exhibitions of himself before you had a chance to judge an exhibition of his painting, now he antagonizes you by making himself ridiculous before you have a chance to judge his writing. "Sooner or later," he boasts in the preface to his first novel, "everyone is bound to come to me! . . . How many there are already who are spiritually nourished by my work! Therefore let him who has done 'as much' cast the first stone!" I shudder to think how Dali would behave if no one cast so much as a pebble!

Yet this is just the kind of reception that "Hidden Faces" deserves. Whatever Dali has done has usually been distinguished by some degree of originality. But this book—particularly after the first hundred pages, in which, strangely enough, there are some glimpses of humor—is confused, old-fashioned, derivative, and intensely boring. Dali as a painter has no doubt benefited enormously from a close study of the works of Poussin, Ingres, and Raphael. But Dali as a writer has gained nothing from reading French romantic fiction, from his admiration of Stendhal, "the divine Marquis de Sade," and Dr. Freud. Detailed accounts of the lives of wealthy French aristocrats who live between the Faubourg St. Germain and their country estates and spend weeks doing little but plan a vast ball, Lesbians who smoke opium and sniff heroin, and perverts of a different nature who indulge in a form of "love" to which Dali has given the name of Cledalism (after his heroine)—"pleasure and pain sublimated in an all-transcending identification with the object" —all this, described in a turgid, fake-eighteenth-century prose, plus some observations made by minor characters in favor of a better, less decadent world and American women, all this may make a book, but what about that spiritual nourishment?

I believe that in his autobiography—a book which was seldom dull and for which its translator, Haakon M. Chevalier, did not receive sufficient credit—Dali was being as honest as he could be. You felt that he had never quite forgiven fate for not making him heir to the Spanish throne. And between that book and this you feel that someone has whispered in his ear: "You know, Mr. Dali, in the America of the mid-twentieth century certain sentiments you express are considered—shall we say?—a little reactionary." And having read "Hidden Faces," you feel that Dali's ear was not deaf. In literature no kind of dishonesty pays. Of the black V planted in the center of a bleeding swastika and the i of the author's name "dotted" by a crimson line crowned in gold on the book's dust jacket, I prefer, as drawn by Dali, the latter.

JAMES STERN

Realist's Eye View

PRIMER OF THE COMING WORLD. By Leopold Schwarzschild. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THE bewildered traveler through the mazes of contemporary history is importuned at every way station by a multitude of guides who promise to lead him safely into the future. These guides can be put into two general categories—the optimists and the realists. The optimists assure him that the future will be a land of peace and plenty. They are fairly certain that a world catastrophe must culminate in world redemption. The realists, on the other hand, are full of foreboding about the future, for they regard it, on the whole, as merely a projection of the present. The optimists believe that a revolutionary world situation will create the resources for the solution of the new problems with which it confronts mankind. The realists are not so sure that there are any new problems in history. They see only the emergence of new versions of perennial problems. Having their interest centered upon the perennial difficulties of man's common life, they are inclined to be oblivious to the genuinely novel and revolutionary features in a given period of history. They may be safer guides, on the whole, than the optimists; but their guidance exposes the traveler to risks even more grievous than those encountered in the company of the gay adventurers.

Since America generates on the whole optimistic rather than realistic views of the world's future, it is quite helpful to have a distinguished émigré journalist like Leopold Schwarzschild give us the benefit of the characteristically sober Continental picture of future possibilities. Schwarzschild is a hard-boiled and shrewd student of history who for years after his eviction from Germany conducted a most informative journal in Paris.

Schwarzschild's strategy for world peace is a very limited one. It consists of measures which will destroy Germany's power or inclination to resort to renewed aggression coupled with the hope that meanwhile the three great powers will desire to remain at peace with one another, for "against wars among the big three no preventive means exist except their own will and self-restraint." He believes that Germany must be occupied for a half-century, that the de-industrialization of the nation would prove ineffective, that any forcible education from the outside would be equally futile, but that, despite past failures, an effort should be made to extract 150 billion marks of reparation over a period of thirty years. He cites as proof of Germany's capacity to pay the fact that Hitler since 1933 has obtained about 16 billion marks' worth of military goods a year and has probably expended 60 to

The Liberal Party

ANNOUNCES A

DINNER-FORUM

ON

Liberals and Labor in Postwar America

SPEAKERS

MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT
LEON HENDERSON • DAVID DUBINSKY
DR. JOHN L. CHILDS

CHAIRMAN

DR. GEORGE S. COUNTS

Wednesday, August Second • Seven O'Clock

GRAND BALLROOM HOTEL COMMODORE
Lexington Avenue and Forty-second Street
INFORMAL • TICKETS $4.00 PER PERSON

Send Reservations and Check to:
MR. HARRY UVILLER, Treasurer
THE LIBERAL PARTY
160 West 44th Street, New York 18 • Tel. LOngacre 5-0600

80 billion marks per year for the conduct of the war. The long period of occupation, he believes, would finally break the back of the military cast, destroy the military tradition, and make obsolescent all military instruments known to the Germans.

Schwarzschild not only implicitly but explicitly rejects all war aims which go beyond the immediate purpose of insuring a tentative peace. He warns against "superimposed war aims" such as world-wide democracy or the socialization of wealth or any other cause or scheme for the attainment of a higher justice. He points out that rigorous ideologies will divide rather than unite the world, since there is no possibility of one ideology gaining a victory great enough to become the unifying force for a world community.

In estimating the possibilities of an accord between the three great powers he places the whole responsibility for the future upon Russia, believing that "no one can estimate what direction Russia may take"—probably because "no clear policy has been formulated in Moscow itself." He takes little stock in the argument that a nationalist Russia may be easier to get along with than a Communist one, partly because he is not at all certain that communism and nationalism are as mutually exclusive as most students assume, for "practice and realism mock such theorizing."

In seeking for peace through the preservation of the status quo Schwarzschild goes to the length of extolling the virtues of a laissez faire economic system. The depressions which occur at intervals of seven to ten years, he argues, are "a function of the famous 'automatism' of the system" and are just as necessary and inevitable as the breathing of the human organism. He arrives at the complacent conclusion that "capitalism was and is able constantly to improve the standard of the employed common man. It was and is unable constantly to employ every common man."

There is many a grain of sober wisdom in these observations upon the great problems which confront us. But there is also much chaff. The fact is that Schwarzschild, like many realists, is completely blind to the revolutionary character of our age. He does not recognize to what degree the German menace was and is only an aggravated form of the disease from which a whole civilization is suffering, that political and economic institutions are really seriously at variance with the necessities of a global economy, and that "free enterprise" presents more serious difficulties in such an economy than merely its periodic depressions.

His interpretation of the relation of the three great nations to the future peace may be taken as a convenient symbol of what is right and what is wrong with this kind of realism. He is right in asserting that no present formula for a constitutional world order could preserve the peace if one of the three great powers should not desire its preservation. But he is wrong in thinking that "only their will and self-restraint" can preserve the peace. For even if they had the desire to keep the peace, they would not be able to do so if they could not find at least quasi-constitutional forms for their partnership and for the regulation of their relations to other powers.

Here is a soberness which apprehends the immediate facts

In the Summer Issue of

PARTISAN REVIEW

ARTHUR KOESTLER
The Intelligentsia

ANDRÉ GIDE
St. Mallarmé the Esoteric

JEAN STAFFORD
Hotel Barstow: a story

PICASSO, PAUL KLEE, POSADA
Reproductions of drawings

MR. ELIOT'S IDEAS OF CULTURE: A SYMPOSIUM
R. P. Blackmur William Phillips
Clement Greenberg I. A. Richards

JAMES BURNHAM: The Sixth Turn of the Communist Screw

PHILIP RAHV: De Voto's Folly

WILLIAM BARRETT: Santayana, An Unhistorical Mind

NICOLA CHIAROMONTE: Bernanos and Christian Liberty

NOVELETTE CONTEST
Prizes, $500, $250, $100
Details in Summer Issue

PARTISAN REVIEW
45 ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK CITY 3, N. Y.
Enclosed please find $2 for one year, or $3 for two years of Partisan Review. (Canada, $2.15, Foreign $2.30.) Begin with .... issue.
Name ....
Address ....
City .... Zone .... State..........

with remarkable clarity but is too narrow-eyed to measure the full dimension of the historical situation in which the facts appear. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Taxes, Post-War

PRODUCTION, JOBS, AND TAXES. By Harold M. Groves. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $1.25.

THIS study of post-war federal tax policy is important not only because of the reputation and authority of its author but because it is sponsored by the Committee for Economic Development. It is probable that the CED will have a good deal of influence with Congress after the war when the federal tax system is being overhauled, and it is interesting to get a preview of the measures that this group of business leaders will advocate. The present report is part of a larger study now in progress. Professor Groves assumes responsibility for the ideas expressed, but as the book was written with the advice and consent of the CED Research Committee, comprised of business men, we may suppose that author and sponsors are in substantial agreement.

The objective of the CED is to achieve a high level of post-war employment through full production and expansion of private industry. Professor Groves accepts this objective and has made his recommendations accordingly; they are definitely favorable to business. He proposes to encourage production and investment by integrating corporation and personal income taxes, by repealing the excess-profits tax, by allowing a six-year carry-over of business losses, and by allowing for a more rapid depreciation of plant and equipment. On the theory that high production requires wide markets he would reduce or repeal federal sales taxes. He would encourage risk-taking by a substantial reduction of the rates in the middle and upper brackets of the personal income-tax schedule, by eliminating tax-exempt securities, and by modifying taxes on capital gains and losses. On the other hand, he would strengthen the taxation of estates.

Those who accept Professor Groves's assumptions will regard his program as on the whole well-balanced and sensible, and will quarrel only over its details. Some of his suggestions seem rather intricate and difficult to administer, as he himself admits. But equity, in the field of taxation, often conflicts with simplicity, and compromise is the only way out.

The question remains, however, whether full production and the expansion of private industry can be achieved by the kind of tax reforms which Professor Groves has outlined. Suppose, for example, that we reduce the rates in the upper brackets of the personal income tax and then discover that we have failed to stimulate the flow of so-called venture capital. Must we then reduce the rates still farther? And must we keep on reducing them until investors are satisfied? There is a kind of vicious circle here, for as we reduce taxes on large personal incomes, the larger will be the volume of savings available for investment. But there will not be, on that account, any increase in opportunities to invest. Also, if tax reduction succeeds in its purpose and the extra savings are profitably invested, then large incomes will become still larger and even more savings will require outlet in investment. It would seem, therefore, that even if tax reduction provides a temporary stimulus, it may make the problem of investment even harder to solve in the future than it is now.

As for industry, investment in additional plant and equipment is subject to the law of diminishing returns. Even if business taxes were abolished altogether, we should have no reason to expect a general and continued expansion, sufficient to maintain full employment, in the face of a declining rate of profit.

Apparently, however, Professor Groves thinks otherwise. "The economic system in its normal operation," he writes, "should generate opportunities and incentives for enterprise." Well, maybe it should. But the fact is that with a high concentration in the distribution of income, together with monopolistic controls in industry, it doesn't. Taxes, labor costs, and political climate are not likely to be more favorable to business after the war than they were in the late '20s. And yet during the three-year period 1927-29 less than half the savings made by individuals were actually invested in new productive enterprise.

The CED expects, in a later report, to consider incentive taxation, including taxes on hoarding. It will be interesting to have the business man's answer to these questions: How can investment be induced when the expansion of industry runs up against the law of diminishing returns? How can we maintain high employment unless investment funds are used to provide jobs? Can private enterprise survive if individuals and business concerns are privileged to hoard their funds, in any amount and for as long as they please, without penalty? G. R. WALKER

FILMS

I HAVE not read Chekhov's story "The Shooting Party" from which Douglas Sirk derives "Summer Storm," but it looks as if Mr. Sirk had wanted to be faithful to something plotty, melodramatic, and second-grade, with psychological possibilities in it which he, or his actors, failed to make much of. As a provincial judge going to the dogs under the influence of Linda Darnell, a ruthless peasant beauty, George Sanders gets across no impression of moral disintegration, struggle, helplessness, or compensatory pleasures; even when he allows her innocent husband to be punished for her murder it seems like little more than His Most Embarrassing Moment. Edward Everett Horton, as a twiddling, infatuated provincial count, has lighter baggage to carry and carries it amusingly, within rather amateurish, highly

THE WORK OF ANNA DAMON
a Meeting at TOWN HALL
123 West 43d Street, New York City
Thursday, September 21, 1944
Joint Auspices

MOTION PICTURE

World Premiere

DAVID O. SELZNICK

presents

SINCE YOU WENT AWAY

CLAUDETTE COLBERT
JENNIFER JONES
JOSEPH COTTEN
SHIRLEY TEMPLE
MONTY WOOLLEY
LIONEL BARRYMORE
ROBERT WALKER

IN PERSON!

That Ace Drummer Man

GENE KRUPA
and His Sensational ORCHESTRA

"That Swings with Strings"

Cool

Now Playing Capitol B'way at 51st St.

STAGE PLAYS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (In association with Jack H. Skirball)

JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL

The FRANZ WERFEL - S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN

LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS

J. EDWARD BROMBERG

MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED
Evenings at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30.

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT

SONGS BY COLE PORTER

WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.
AIR CONDITIONED

BLOOD DONORS NEEDED!

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

theatrical limits; in a stagy, but never in a human sense, you realize that the man he is playing and the class he is representing are loose as ashes. Linda Darnell, flashing her eyes and teeth and flexing her glands at both men, is probably the weakest of the three so far as performance goes; but since, in general appearance, she is a kind of person I can imagine going on all fours for, especially if I were a provincial judge, I thought her not entirely ill cast. There are bits of acting and photography in "Summer Storm" which put it as far outside the run of American movies as it laudably tries to be. But most of it had, for me, the sporty speciousness of an illustrated drugstore classic. " 'Speaking of women,' murmured the Baron, toying with his aperient . . ."

It would be nice to see some screen "fantasy" if it were done by anyone with half a heart, mind, and hand for it. But when the studios try to make it, duck and stay hid until the mood has passed. The story of a dancing caterpillar which became an international personality, a political and religious symbol, and a baby Armageddon for science, commercialism, and what is popularly thought of as innocence and idealism might, with great skill, imagination, and avoidance of whimsy, become wonderful. But "Once Upon a Time" is not wonderful. It is just less witty and more gently intentioned than the overrated radio hit—the Corwin "My Client Curley"—from which it was developed; and both, to be plain about it, fancy gossamer as building material and then try to manufacture it out of two-by-fours. "The Canterville Ghost," played in mock-pansy, mock-Shakespearean style by Charles Laughton, is a quondam coward who can only go to his rest when a descendant, Robert Young, proves himself brave in warfare. The possibilities here seem thin at best, but a sufficient understanding of cowardice might still have made them amount to something. Margaret O'Brien is involved in this, too, and gives the film what little charm it has; but more still makes it an unhappy experience. She is an uncannily talented child, and it is infuriating to see her handled, and gradually being ruined, by oafs.

"Candlelight in Algeria" is a smooth routine British melodrama centered on a camera which contains film showing where General Clark and others will meet to plot the invasion of North Africa. There is no harm in it, and no special interest either, except in Walter Rilla's performance and in watching the English try, pretty successfully, to make American types. But one gets tired of saying that the British do this sort of melodrama well. They do; but too often, well is not so awfully well as all that. Educated Englishmen by the gross who have nothing to say and don't even realize it can write well, if by well one means plumply cadenced classical prose, fairly accurate about nothing worth accuracy, without one spark of urgency, insight, or wilfulness in it. I feel that by now they can do the movie equivalent in their sleep, and should not be too highly credited for it, even though our own somnambulistic utterance draws rather on Oley Speaks and S. Parkes Cadman than on Cicero and Burke.

JAMES AGEE

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

MUSIC

MORE than once I have said that what has been written about the "modern music" which the public has disliked has been even worse and more objectionable than the music itself. My point has been that the ad hoc aesthetic formulations, the misstatements and misinterpretation of history, and all the other confusions have been dust in the eyes of people whose ears would not have been fooled. That is, listening to the music these people have known what it meant and what it was worth; but reading about it they have doubted the testimony of their ears and wondered whether there was not something they must learn to hear and understand. I say this as one of those people; and it is the long experience that eventually gave me confidence in my ears and in my impressions of the music that also gave me my present strong objection to the writing about it.

The kind of writing I mean is Paul Rosenfeld's statement—in contradiction to what one heard—that a Rhapsody for orchestra by Wallingford Riegger was "evidently . . . magnificent in texture and consistent in idea, grateful to the ear and lucid in form." And, worse still, his subsequent statement about anyone who was prevented from hearing all this by the work's atonalism: "If indeed one is unable to hear the relation of note to note, freshly, and without past experience, in every composition, whether it be tonal, bitonal, or without any tonality whatsoever, what indeed can one be said actually to be hearing?" As though it were possible to approach anything—and above all a medium of communication—without one's past experience; as though any and every succession of sounds must convey a coherent, significant relation; and as though one's inability to perceive such a relation between any two sounds must set poor, perplexed Mr. Rosenfeld to wondering what indeed one could be said actually to be hearing.

Then there is Aaron Copland's equally wide-eyed, incredible-as-it-may-seem, how-can-such-things-be talk about the "fantastic notions" with which "newspaper writers and radio commentators who ought to know better" have, apparently for the sheer hell of it, misrepresented modern music and prejudiced the public against it—with which Copland tries to persuade us that we haven't ourselves heard the aridities, uglinesses, and horrors of Hindemith, Bartòk, Berg, Schönberg, Stravinsky, and the rest. And his statement of correct notions about the music—with which he tries to get us to hear in those aridities, uglinesses, and horrors an "enriched musical language" and a "new spirit of objectivity, attuned to our own times," that make the music "our music," as natural and acceptable to our ears, as interesting, significant, and valuable to our minds, as people a hundred and two hundred years ago found their music.

From this it is only a step to Virgil Thomson trying with mirrors to get us to believe that the music of 150 years ago, which we are deeply affected by, is as incomprehensible to us as the painting and literature of the past, since it was produced by men "whose modes of thought and attitudes of passion were . . . different from ours," and that we can understand only contemporary music, which we dislike, since it is the product of the thought and feeling of our time.

Then there is what the composers say about their own works. Krenek informs us that talking with piano teachers he had discovered the lack of music using advanced contemporary styles and techniques which they might give their students to play, and that he had therefore composed Twelve Short Piano Pieces Written in Twelve-Tone Technique, whose "musical contents [and] performing difficulty are meant to correspond with the capacity and the interest of normally advanced students and amateurs"—which blandly throws a cloud of dust over the real nature of the twelve-tone technique, the real musical contents of pieces written in that technique, and of these pieces in particular, and the real interest in them of "normally advanced" students and amateurs.

Or Hindemith tells us first that in his "Schwanendreher," a viola concerto on old German folk melodies, he set out to function like the medieval minstrel who expanded and embellished the melodies he played, "preluding and improvising according to his fancy and ability"—which presumably should justify to our ears, as it does to Hindemith's, the music he produces when he expands and embellishes, preludes and improvises according to his fancy and ability. Later he tells us his aim was "to try how the old German folk songs could be adapted for today's concert work, e.g., with a modern arrangement and even in the spirit of the originals" —which again, presumably, should justify the astringency of idiom and aridity of feeling that twist the simple old folk songs into something as distorted and ugly as his own music.

From Hindemith we also get the general pronouncement that "what is generally regretted today is the loose relation maintained by music between the producer and the consumer. The composer these days should never write unless he is acquainted with the demand for his work. The times for consistent composing for one's own satisfaction are probably gone forever, etc." The business-like talk about producer and consumer and demand is intended to get us to accept the idea of composition as a purely commercial activity of setting down black marks on paper, and to accept also the music which results from this activity, when the black marks are translated into sounds which reveal not the slightest trace of the poetic impulse that alone can justify the setting down of black marks on paper.

And Stravinsky, who tells us that Beethoven's greatness lies not in his ideas but in his musical material, tells us also that he himself, in composing, does not express ideas but only establishes order and discipline in purely sonorous schemes. As though "ideas"—which is to say personal emotions, attitudes, insights—could be kept out of music—even the music of a man determined to produce nothing but ordered and disciplined sonorous schemes. And as though we would, even if we could, shut out of our minds the great "ideas" embodied in Beethoven's musical forms, or ignore the poverty of spirit communicated in Stravinsky's sonorous schemes.

B. H. HAGGIN

Coming Soon in The Nation
Surrealist Painting
An Essay by Clement Greenberg
"A Skeleton Key to Finnegans Wake" by Joseph Campbell and Henry Morton Robinson
Reviewed by Louise Bogan

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

44th Street Book Fair Gallery
To September 5
EXHIBITION OF
NEW WORK
20 New York Artists
Oils . Water Colors . Drawings $5-$125
Open until 9 p.m. daily except Sunday
133 W. 44th St., near Broadway

A new, different monthly for open-minded persons

CONTROVERSY

The Liveliest Magazine Published

•

Our purpose is to present all sides of issues and controversies of current importance. Controversy is designed to act as a medium of expressions for all opinions. The bulk of the magazine is composed of forums, symposia and individual opinions.

Before you can be sure you are right you must read what parties of the opposite opinions have to say. Reading Controversy may modify your views, and if not, it will certainly solidify them. The confidence you will have gained in your opinions should be enough reason for reading Controversy. An additional one is that its reading is a lot of fun.

Our new Literary Review department, conducted by Paul Stout, inspires a few criticisms, probably because of the straightforward, frankly critical character of the reviews. Important criticisms of the reviews are published in each issue.

Photos and drawings help make a pleasing appearance and often illuminate the text.

A monthly feature inaugurated in July is our Contemporary Portraits of interesting people and institutions. They are often highly critical and more often than not inspire replies from the subjects. One or more photos is usually included.

Each issue of Controversy is 6 x 9 inches in size, fitted with a tough, long-wearing soft-paper cover. Every issue of 32 or more pages is printed on finely calendered heavy, white book paper.

A few articles and symposia in the coming months' issues are:

Is Our Government Becoming Socialistic?
Internationalism Versus Nationalism
Are We Fighting for a Better World?
Is War Necessary for Prosperity?
Regardless of Your Philosophy: Liberalism in Religion, by Stuart Foster.

Contemporary Portraits: E. Haldeman-Julius. A not altogether complimentary article on the publisher of the Little Blue Books, etc., and the original de-bunker. By John E. McWilliams. Norman Thomas, a sketch of the great Socialist Party leader.

Book and Pamphlet Reviews
Illustrations ▪ Editorial Column

Just mail the coupon, and your first issue will be mailed the day your letter is received.

CONTROVERSY,
212 F & M Bldg., West Chester, Pa.

Gentlemen:

Please enter my subscription for CONTROVERSY Monthly for ☐ 1 year $2.00 ☐ 6 months $1.00 ☐ 3 months 50c. cash. Bill me later if remittance is not enclosed. Full refund if dissatisfied.

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

....

Letters to the Editors

The Church Knows Best

Dear Sirs: Philip Wylie's article Sex and the Censor in The Nation of July 8 was written with little understanding and consequently with little tolerance. He questions the right of postal and other authorities to ban certain books "containing dangerous ideas or forbidden words." In particular, he is concerned about the church. He cannot see what justifies the church in its demand for universal recognition of its dicta governing immoral literature. Here, I am afraid, he is talking precisely in the manner adopted by his "hysterical zealot" who in an insensate fury betrays the common sense of a whole people.

Never, so far as I know, has the church advocated any policy which endeavored to hush up the truth concerning questions of morality or anything else touching upon human welfare. It has too high a regard for the truth to be capable of such a policy. In fact, its consistency might very well bring upon its head any number of anathemas from groups and individuals that do not enjoy such common sense.

Books written about sin and immoral living have never been burned, banned, or purged by the Catholic church, nor has the church urged their removal. Books dealing with humanity in the sink of iniquity are valuable, provided the authors recognize their responsibility to their readers by also recognizing sin for what it is, by accepting sex for what it is, beautiful when controlled, sordid when abused.

Mr. Wylie writes, ". . . but I think it is not going too far to say that the very plain changes in the sex mores of the American people have reached all levels of our society and that such shifts in behavior cannot be arrested or even affected by the withholding of particular printed matter." I think it is going too far to make such a statement. Clearly Mr. Wylie's thinking equipment, not to mention his moral reserves, suffered a lapse somewhere along the line. The not quite apodictic collapse which American morals have suffered, it seems to me, can and must be attributed to the plethora of objectionable "printed matter" which has continued in circulation for the past couple of generations. Moral stamina is a rare phenomenon today, for it has received too many resounding blows from such criminal sources as these "bad books." These bad books have already had a devastating influence in hastening moral decadence. It is time the church, the only reliable judge in existence, was given the authority to stem the dirty tide and repair what has been so unfortunately destroyed.

J. F., U. S. C. G.

New York, July 8

Applause

Dear Sirs: I'm not a regular reader of The Nation—in fact, I hold political views diametrically opposed to practically everything for which The Nation, and presumably its editors, stand. However, during an election year I like to know "how the other half" (?) thinks.

Allow me to congratulate you and to express my whole-hearted applause of your courage and straight thinking in publishing material such as the letter of the Negro soldier and the excerpt from a letter written by a Negro soldier to Yank magazine in your June 3 issue. Until these United States face the problem of their own racial minorities decently, honestly, correctly, we have nothing but impertinence and dishonest heroics to recommend our participation in a war of freedom of all peoples regardless of "race, creed, or color." Material such as this may be of assistance even though, unfortunately, it reaches a minority and probably an already enlightened minority.

I lived in the West Indies and have many valued and valuable friends of Negro blood—perhaps that is why I care so intensely about this matter—although I like to think I'm liberal in an impersonal way on the subject.

MARION ARNOLD LEON

New York, June 7

Something Should Be Done

Dear Sirs: I am an Italian officer, a prisoner of war captured in Tunisia after nearly two years of hard fighting in the African deserts. I was brought up in a very anti-fascist family. My mother, who died last winter, was Jewish. My father, who is a lawyer, has become, since the fall of fascism, chairman of the Syndicate of Lawyers of Lombardy. (We live in Milan.) My brothers, one of whom was in the army, have fled to Switzerland in order to escape German reprisals. They were expelled from school some years ago after the anti-Jewish laws were passed. Many of my friends were in confinement. This is to give you a picture of my family and my true sentiments.

I am only twenty-five years old, but I have had a good deal of experience, in the army, in the war, and in my previous life in Italy, where I knew a lot of people on one side and the other. It has been sad for me to see, during my life in American prisoner-of-war camps that not exactly fascist ideas but fascist habits and fascist ways of thinking are fairly well spread among many of us who actually do not even know what fascism was, or was supposed to be. I think that something ought to be done to win these men to democratic and liberal ideas. But when Dr. Salvemini, on his way back to Cambridge, came to see me he was expelled from the camp! He was a friend of my grandfather, who was one of the leaders of the socialist movement in Milan in the first fifteen years of this century. L. M.

Somewhere in the United States, June 25

There's a Limit

Dear Sirs: We in the army are told that "he who gripes most is the best soldier"; therefore you may consider my candidacy for that honor.

I am still burning over Churchill's "kindly words about Spain." In my book those will rate as "most famous words," but not on the same page as "Cannot remain half slave and half free," "Quarantine the aggressor," "Unite or die," and other fine sayings.

Yes, the day of liberation is near, but that job must be complete. We will smoke out the devil in Berlin and then and there he should be destroyed. How can we allow the rotten heart of the fascist tyrant to regain its strength in Madrid, there to plot against us again? Should we allow our dead to have died in vain?

Agreed that the Spaniards should choose for themselves. The overwhelming majority of them will make another try for a republic, but the going will be as tough as ever if they are still discouraged by the democratic powers—I can't understand why!

Now something else; that was a high-class job Congress pulled off on the soldier-vote bill. Voting could have been made simple; yet most of us aren't going to vote this year. We're not forgetting those who place politics ahead of human rights. There are also things the Negro isn't forgetting. Neither will gold-star mothers if the isolationists have their way. We're taking all this, but there's a limit. CORPORAL

Somewhere in Louisiana, June 30

Reduce Spending

Dear Sirs: In your editorial on page 31 of the issue of July 8 there seems to be a misapprehension with regard to the problem of avoiding inflation. "Savings," you state, are about at the rate of $38,000,000,000 a year, but "only about $13,000,000,000 of this amount is being invested in war bonds or other government securities." You state that bank purchases of bonds are inflationary in effect, while individual purchases are not.

Actually, whether the $38,000,000,000 is held by individuals in the form of currency, or invested in government bonds by individuals has no effect on the inflationary situation. The thing that is needed is not that people should dip into their savings to buy bonds, but that they should reduce present spending in order to absorb the bond issue. In other words, new saving has to be performed, thereby removing additional funds from the market. Only in this way can we really avoid inflation, by reducing the flow of purchasing power to a market on which the volume of available consumer goods and services has been greatly reduced. G. R. HORNE

Windsor, Ontario, July 8

CONTRIBUTORS

JOHN R. CUNEO is the author of "Winged Mars: The German Air Weapon, 1870-1914," a standard historical work, to which he expects to add a second volume later in the year. He contributes regularly to Military Affairs and aeronautical journals.

KARL KEYERLEBER is on the staff of the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

ORDWAY TEAD, an editor and director of Harper and Brothers, is chairman of the Board of Higher Education of New York City.

JAY ALLEN is a well-known newspaper correspondent and columnist.

PHILIP TAFT teaches economics at Brown University.

RESORTS

THE VACATION OF YOUR LIFE
"Go Rustic at Wopowog and love it." Here you will find a spirit of good fellowship and friendliness seldom found elsewhere. ALL SPORTS. Large private lake. Orchestra. Gala B'way Entertainment. 110 miles from New York
Informal atmosphere.
N. Y. Office:
[illegible] 5 Av. Tel. MU. 4-3800
THE ADULT CAMP
WOPOWOG
Lake Salmon, EAST HAMPTON, CONN.

HILLTOP LODGE
On beautiful Sylvan Lake
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
Tel.: Hopewell Junction 2761
R. R. Station: Pawling, N. Y.
Only 65 miles from New York City
EVERY CONCEIVABLE SPORT and RECREATION
Tennis • Night Tennis • Handball
Swimming • Boating • Horseback
Baseball • Cycling, Etc.
OUR FOOD IS TOPS
Under direction of: PAUL WOLFSON & SOL ROTHAUSER
New York Office: 277 BROADWAY COrtlandt 7-3958

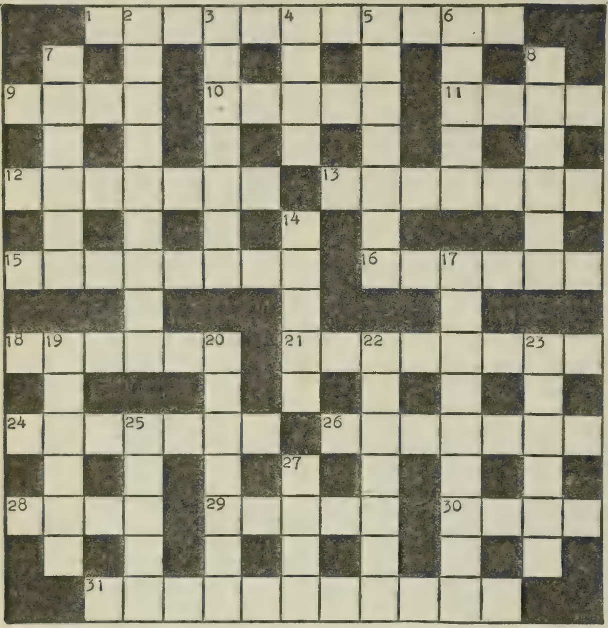
Live YOUR HOLIDAY AT CAMP MILFORD
KENT, CONN.
FOR REAL FUN! A camp for adults only, on beautiful Spectacle Lake—85 miles from N. Y. All social and athletic facilities. Gay informality! No dressing up. Sparkling entertainment. Swell food.
Write for booklet to
MICKEY MICHAELS, Dir.
11 W. 42 St., N. Y.
PEnn. 6-7842
JULY-AUGUST RATE: $44.50

FOR VACATION FUN AND REST
[illegible] Miles from New York a vacation "heaven," breath-takingly beautiful countryside—delicious food—restful indoor activities—invigorating enjoyable outdoor sports: Tennis—swimming—ping pong—volley ball—bowling—outdoor dancing — bicycling — (horseback riding and golf nearby). You're welcome at any time and for any time. Write for booklet.
PLUM POINT
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
[illegible] Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

RELAX, REJOICE WITH SUMMER AT
Lakecrest
on Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.
90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart [illegible] DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N.Y.C. R.R. to Amenia, N.Y. Open all year.
WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATION
EVA BERG, Director Standfordville 4108

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 73

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 How unseasonable bathers overcome preliminary reluctance (three words, 5, 3 and 3)
9 The bell was going before I left
10 "They also ----- who only stand and wait" (Milton)
11 Live-stock
12 "Tea, Paul?" (anag.)
13 Everything in the performance is lacking in depth
15 Pint to me (anag.)
16 It is right before the fire
18 Lieutenant of Othello and tool of Iago
21 Day most of us meet with a new resolution (two words, 3 and 5)
24 Dead men (anag.)
26 Almost any street in Germany or Austria
28 The Great Unknown of literature
29 "For today in this -----, Summoned by a stern subpoena, Edwin, sued by Angelina, Shortly will appear" (Trial by Jury)
30 Platform from which much has been said
31 So called, no doubt, because they take us under

DOWN

2 "No peace for the wicked" (and very little for the ---------!)
3 Sausage (anag.)
4 Four letters of attorney
5 "Quite out of ----- of the poor tourist, peer he binocularly never so neck-breakingly" (A Taste for Honey)
6 There's a fish in the basket already
7 A follower of Mahomet
8 Go and ask for one!
14 The end of the bee
17 I slander this Northerner, phonetically speaking
19 Necessary when shooting
20 Just escapes being average by being too old
22 Medical treatment for harriers in the rain? (two words, 3 and 4)
23 Foreign country where you will find U. S. airs
25 Madame L'Enclos
27 A sort of dado around the dining-room

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 72

ACROSS:—1 STAR-CHAMBER; 9 FOOLSCAP; 10 GRILSE; 11 HUMERUS; 12 CARTOON; 14 ENCORE; 15 BETRAYER; 17 PART-TIME; 20 DAPHNE; 22 STRAUSS; 24 IMPASSE; 26 POWDER; 27 OVERSHOE; 28 TRESPASSERS.

DOWN:—2 TALKED-OUT; 3 RECLUSE; 4 HOPE; 5 MIGRANT; 6 EVICT; 7 COLUMN; 8 ASHORE; 13 ABBEY; 16 APPRAISER; 18 ACTION; 19 INSERTS; 20 DOMBEYS; 21 NESTOR; 23 ADDER; 25 SODA.

RESORTS

45 Miles from New York City
Zindorest
★ Park Monroe N.Y.
Telephone 4421
A Resort for Adults Only
Exclusive location, 150 acres of unusual beauty. ALL SPORTS. Recorded concert music and many other activities for your pleasure. Last word in accommodations and hospitality.
DIXIE TERMINAL BUSES STOP AT OUR ENTRANCE ★

★ STAR LAKE CAMP ★
In the Glorious Adirondacks
Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Canoeing, Swimming, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals. Dietary Laws. Rates: $35.00 a week and $37.50 per person for couples.
Send for Booklet — New York Office
320 BROADWAY Room 1301 CO 7-2667
Sundays, Evenings, Holidays — PR 4-1390

CAMP ANNISQUAM
Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director
This Adult Camp...
in Gloucester is 6 hours from New York...CAMP ANNISQUAM offers a complete change of air, scenery, and people . . . Salt water swimming, sailing, fishing on premises . . . dancing, tennis, trips, and all sports.
Write for booklet and rates

—MERRIEWOODE—
A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes. Interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails. Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping-pong, square dancing. Intelligent, gay companionship.
$38 and $42 weekly Olive H. G. Baron, Dir.

Timberland
AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100
ALL SPORTS ▪ PRIVATE LAKE
MUSIC ▪ LECTURES ▪ CONCERTS
N. Y. OFFICE: 33 W. 42 St. LOngacre 5-3674
The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

HATHAWAY LODGE
Formerly the palatial 592 acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, most of which have open fireplaces and private porches. Tennis, Handball, Swimming Pool, Horseback Riding, also Golf nearby. Marvelous food. Open all year. Attractive Summer rates.
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Tel. Tannersville 299

CHILDREN'S CAMP

SMILING HILLS CAMP
EAST STROUDSBURG PENNSYLVANIA
A progressive camp for boys and girls, from 4 to 12 years of age. All activities. Non-sectarian. Non-regimented. Individual care (Limited to 50 campers)
Write:
James & Nellie Dick, Modern School,
115 Cary St., Lakewood, N. J. Phone 1007

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · JULY 29, 1944 NUMBER 5

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 113

EDITORIALS
- Behind the Generals' Plot 115
- The Fall of Tojo 116

ARTICLES
- "Backward Area" by I. F. Stone 117
- The Battle of Chicago by Freda Kirchwey 118
- With the Red Army in Minsk by Anna Louise Strong 121
- 10 Years Ago in The Nation 122
- Gandhi's New Strategy by Louis Fischer 123
- Television Comes of Age by Alan Barth 125
- In the Wind 127

POLITICAL WAR
- Last of the Scapegoats by Walter Mehring 128
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 130

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
- Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 131
- Too Bad to Be True by Franz Hoellering 131
- History, Psychology, and Culture by Abram Kardiner 132
- Severn's Posthumous Life by Rolfe Humphries 134
- The Smaller Wars by James Stern 135
- Films by James Agee 137
- Music by B. H. Haggin 137

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 139

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 74 by Jack Barrett 140

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON ▪ MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE FULL POWER OF THE RED ARMY WAS unleashed on eight fronts last week, and the faltering Wehrmacht seemed unable to bring it to a halt. For 600 miles—from Ostrov near the Latvian border to Lvov in lower Poland—eight separate army groups of massive strength pushed the invaders back at an unprecedented rate. To Marshal Konev's First Ukrainian Army fell the honor of being the first to drive the Germans back across the line from which they invaded the Soviet Union a little more than three years ago. This southernmost drive, long and anxiously awaited by the Germans, more than justified their worst fears of it. Four German divisions were encircled near Brody and left to be disposed of, while the main thrust continued beyond Lvov, after hurdling the potentially strong line of the western Bug in a single day. The way was thus open for the envelopment of Lvov, and the unhinging of the strongest defense line short of central Poland. In the center the line was twice broken when the great fortress of Brest-Litovsk was flanked both to north and south. To the north, the taking of Grodno and the crossing of the Niemen virtually completed the work. As the week ended, the fate of the German troops in the Baltic states and the existence of the Brest-Litovsk and Lvov bastions hung in the balance. The balance was all tipped in the Russians' favor. Hitler's fantastic order "to defend each meter of territory," so correctly denounced by the captured General Hoffmeister, had paved the way for the largest-scale German disaster of the war. That disaster is not yet complete; but it already looms so large as to make a German retreat to the line Königsberg-Warsaw-Krakow seem inevitable.

*

THE BRITISH-CANADIAN ASSAULT EAST AND southeast from Caen may prove to be the Alamein of the western front. Before last week's powerful offensive the slowness of the Allied progress in Normandy was beginning to cause doleful head-shaking in some circles; but those who knew or guessed how crowded the beachhead was with men and guns remained cheerful. It is useless to expect dash from General Montgomery until he has built up overpowering strength; when he has built it up, one can expect just such a careful, thoroughly prepared hammer blow as he has now delivered. But he is not content with power alone; the feint attack aimed southward from Caen earlier in the week allowed him to achieve tactical surprise, a considerable accomplishment on such a limited front. As at Alamein, the infantry-tank attack was preceded by an intense artillery barrage, this time augmented by what was probably the heaviest aerial bombardment ever directed against an army in the field. More than 7,000 tons of bombs were dropped on strong points and supply dumps in less than five hours, paving the way for a ground advance which covered considerably more ground the first day than the Alamein assault. Rommel obviously learned at Alamein the lesson of not committing his tanks against an attack of this nature; bad weather, limiting air support and miring the ground, may delay the Second Army in its advance toward Rommel's tank concentrations. But the scene is set for the chewing up of most of the enemy's strength in the west; if the chewing up is successful, we may see a break-through comparable to Alamein and a consequently rapid advance to the Seine between Paris and the sea.

*

THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM HAS THE GREAT merits of brevity and simplicity. On the whole it avoids the weasel words, ambiguous phrases, and contradictions that are so abundant in the Republican program, although, like all such political menus, it endeavors to provide a dish for every taste. In respect of international policy it does not go as far as some of us could wish, but it does come out squarely for an international organization with teeth in it—an organization "endowed with power to employ armed forces when necessary to prevent aggression and preserve peace." This is a great improvement on the Republican proposal of "a peace force"—a phrase apparently chosen to conceal the deep division of opinion inside the G. O. P. in regard to the use of collective force to guard collective security. At home the Democrats stand on the record of the New Deal, just as the Republicans do when one boils out the verbiage in their platform. Whatever happens in November, there will be no going back on the New Deal, provided that platform pledges mean anything. Again like the Republicans, the Democrats assert their faith in "free enterprise," but they give the assertion more substance by adding "free from control by monopolies, cartels, or any arbitrary private or public authority." Curiously enough, however, they don't follow this up with a promise to continue to reduce tariffs by means of trade agreements. In view of the twisted nature of the Republican tariff plank, it seems to us that the Democrats missed a bet here.

*

THE PARAGRAPH ON RACIAL AND RELIGIOUS minorities in the Democratic platform has a Southern drawl. It expresses the vague and pious belief that these minorities have "the right to live, develop, and vote equally with all citizens and share the rights that are guaranteed by our Constitution. Congress should exert its full constitutional powers to protect those rights." It would not have been polite, in the presence of so many Southern gentlemen, to mention anything so specific as poll taxes and Jim Crow. The Republican plank was far more forthright—but few Negroes are likely to switch their votes on that account for the simple reason that the record of the Administration is much better than the Democratic plank—and within recent months there has been, on the race issue, too much wholehearted cooperation in Congress between reactionary Republicans and Southern Democrats.

*

THE UNITED NATIONS LIVED UP TO THEIR name at Bretton Woods, and provided a happy augury for the future in the successful conclusion of the world monetary and financial conference. Secretary Morgenthau and his able aides deserve commendation for the technical ability, the personal tact, and the enlightened views that made the meeting and its achievement possible. The world monetary fund promises to combine stability of exchanges with sufficient flexibility to permit each country to use deficit financing for full employment at home. It is thus a victory of Keynesian economic ideas over reliance on the so-called "automatic" gold standard. Emphasis in this monetary system is on government activity to maintain sound domestic economies rather than on the maintenance of a so-called "sound currency" at the expense of prices, wages, and employment. The launching of the new bank for international reconstruction and development was made the happier by a last-minute concession from Moscow, which agreed to its original $1,200,000,000 subscription to the bank after the other countries had accepted a reduction in the Russian quota to $900,000,000. The bank promises to free borrowing countries from dictation by American, British, Dutch, and French private bankers; to keep world interest rates down, and to prevent the kind of unwise lending that proved so disastrous in the twenties, particularly to American investors. The United States makes the largest contribution but stands also to gain the largest benefit. For enlarged world markets are a necessity if our war-expanded economy is to escape a disastrous deflation and maintain full employment.

*

NOT CONTENT WITH HAVING DEPRIVED most of New York's service men and women of a vote through an excessively stringent war-ballot law, Mr. Dewey has misguidedly attempted to make political capital out of his refusal to accept the federal ballot in New York state. He charged the non-partisan committee and war veterans' organizations that had been campaigning for a federal ballot with using "unlimited financial resources" to play "partisan politics with the right of New York State's fighting men to vote." The gist of Mr. Dewey's argument is that the state ballot is superior to the federal ballot in that it permits the soldier to vote for local as well as federal offices. He fails to indicate, however, why he has opposed all efforts to offer the state ballot to as many New York service men as possible through a canvass of their homes, as has been done successfully in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and other states. And he ignores the plain fact that the New York law does not allow enough time betwen the mailing of the ballots and the deadline for their return to permit anything like a full vote from the men on the fighting fronts. As the Republican nominee for President, Mr. Dewey has the satisfaction of knowing that comparatively few soldier votes will be counted against him in the pivotal state of New York. But we suspect that his ill-tempered, petty manner of handling the soldier-vote issue will cost him, across the country, many more votes than he will have blocked in New York.

*

"WE BELIEVE THAT THE BEST SOLDIER IS THE informed soldier. We believe that we can fight a better war and end it sooner with men who know what is happening in the world." This statement by Colonel Robert Cutler, coordinator for the army of the Soldiers' Vote Act, is a cogent answer to Senator Robert Taft, who sponsored the stupid amendment designed to keep soldiers free from political contamination. The tardy repentance of Mr. Taft, who now declares himself in favor of liberalizing the act, is commendable but insufficient. The amendment should be thrown out altogether. There should be no "index" of books for soldiers, election year or no election year. The case of the permitted and forbidden magazines is even more serious than that of the books. The army has just issued a list of 189 magazines which may be distributed without scrutiny for political content. The majority of these are comics, westerns, and story magazines, but in the list are included all the mass-circulation magazines, most of which discuss and analyze news. Absent from the list are The Nation, the New Republic, Common Sense, and the New Masses, none of which could be described as pledged to the support of the Republican Party. The excuse given is that there is no soldier demand for these, an excuse we discount heavily as we consult our subscribers' list and our file of soldiers' letters. We have no complaint that conservative or anti-Administration magazines should have free circulation in the army even in an election year. We do insist that the soldiers have the same access to magazines of liberal opinion. A reactionary Congress is not satisfied with barring as many soldiers as possible from voting; it apparently intends that those who do manage to get a ballot be kept in the dark on the basic issues of the election.

CENSORSHIP, AS PHILIP WYLIE SAID A FEW weeks ago in The Nation, is becoming epidemic. It is ironic that what the army passes as fit for the troops is banned by Postmaster General Walker as unfit for the mails. The Esquire case has advanced one more step in its march to the Supreme Court. The original charge of obscenity was dropped when the case appeared before Judge T. Whitfield Davidson of the Federal District Court and the Postmaster was sustained on the basis of a statute written by members of Congress "brought up on the McGuffey Reader." The ancient law required that second-class mailing privileges be restricted to matter of educational value and the Postmaster could properly rule that Esquire did not fall into this classification. As we survey the list of magazines permitted in the army camps—the thirty-seven "comics," the twenty-six romance and adventure magazines, the thirteen detective magazines, the thirteen movie magazines—we realize in what jeopardy lies our freedom of reading (and looking). For the Postmaster General might, with the same validity, ban any of these. The army and Senator Taft can ban almost any "educational" magazine on the ground of its being political; the Postmaster can take care of the rest. Prepare the bonfires, boys. On the other hand, it may be a good time to repeal at least two acts of Congress so as to retrieve our self-respect as adult and free American citizens.

Behind the Generals' Plot

WHETHER or not reports of actual civil war are confirmed, Germany has reached a crisis comparable to that of September, 1918—a crisis which may prove the prelude to collapse. That is the meaning of the "bomb plot" announced on July 20, for although it is doubtful whether there really was a bomb, it is certain that there was a plot.

In attempting to interpret reports of the situation coming from official Nazi sources, we have to ask: (1) How much of the truth do they contain? (2) What is the purpose of the release of news which reflects so seriously on the internal situation in Germany? The probable answer to the second question is that the news of the attempted assassination of Hitler was broadcast to explain a revolt which was already public knowledge, to justify a purge of the armed forces intended to root out all doubtful elements, and to rally the army and the people around the Führer, once again miraculously saved by "providence." This is the technique of the Reichstag fire and the Röhm purge of June, 1934, and these analogies suggest in turn that there was no bomb; it was invented to dramatize Hitler's counter-measures.

Among these measures was the appointment of Heinrich Himmler as Commander of the army at home. News of his appointment reached Sweden the day before the "explosion," and the day after a reported mutiny of two divisions in East Prussia. It is still impossible to sort out fact from rumor. When Hitler made his speech to the nation telling of his providential escape he referred to "a very small clique of criminal elements which will now be exterminated quite mercilessly." Two days later in an order of the day addressed to the army he said: "I know that you will fight with exemplary obedience and loyalty until victory is ours, in spite of all." Evidently he considered the appeal necessary.

Meanwhile the purge was apparently proceeding as Dr. Himmler ordered. Berlin announced that Colonel General Ludwig Beck was "no longer among the living." Other reports put the number of generals involved at a figure as high as fifty. It is significant that no protestations of loyalty have as yet come from top-ranking leaders such as Marshal von Brauschitsch, Field Marshal General Albert Kesselring, commander of the Italian front, Field Marshal General Walther von Modl, commander of the Russian front, or Field Marshal General Fritz Erich von Mannstein. The fact that Hitler, Goering, and Admiral Doenitz all gave emphatic warnings to the armed services to beware of false orders suggests that the disaffection is widespread. It may well be that Mr. Churchill was justified when recently he said to the troops in Normandy: "Opposite you is an enemy whose central power is crumbling."

The recent removal from their posts of Marshal von Rundstedt and General von Falkenhausen, two of the old-line officers, and the bitter criticism of Hitler by General Hoffmeister after his capture on the eastern front indicate a deepening split between the German army and the Nazis. Yet these two elements are the twin pillars of German aggression. The army could not have organized the nation for war without the Nazis; the Nazis could not have gained power without the backing of the army. But now that defeat is approaching each seeks to make the other responsible. Hitler, convinced that the Allies will not come to terms with him, wants to fight on, waiting in his mystic way for a miracle. The Junker chiefs know they can't win. They hope that by jettisoning Hitler they can save themselves and their caste and preserve Germany from that total defeat that would make a "next time" impossible. That means they believe that the Allies can be persuaded to negotiate; otherwise, as Walter Mehring points out on page 128, they themselves would have to accept the burden of "unconditional surrender," for there are no other shoulders on which it can be loaded. We think they are fooling themselves; the Allied leaders certainly will not consent to any terms that leave German militarism a chance to recover. The signs of German disintegration are not an opportunity to make deals; they are, rather, an inspiration to complete the process by unrelenting pressure.

The Fall of Tojo

THE overthrow of Premier Tojo will undoubtedly have a profound influence on the course of the Pacific war. In a somewhat less dramatic way it is fully as significant as the generals' plot against Hitler. For although Tojo never succeeded in establishing as complete a one-man rule over Japan as Hitler exercises in Germany, he came closer to it than any other man in modern Japanese history. Japan's efficiency as a military power was in large part due to the centralization of control which he succeeded in establishing. And beyond the power which he wielded as Premier, War Minister, and Chief of Staff, Tojo was of great value to the militarists as a symbol of Japan's expansionist dreams. He had tremendous prestige as the conqueror of Guam, the Philippines, Singapore, the Dutch East Indies, and Burma. He had initiated the thousand-year war which was to lead to world conquest with eternal glory for the Emperor.

Tojo's enforced resignation is especially welcome news, therefore, because it indicates that the recent defeats in India, the South Pacific, and Saipan, have sufficiently overshadowed his earlier victories in the Japanese mind to make him a liability rather than an asset to morale. This suggests that the Japanese military situation looks even worse from Tokyo than it does from this country. Specifically, it implies the failure of the Japanese offensive in China. For if there were any immediate probability that that drive could be brought to successful fruition, Tojo could almost certainly have held on for a time at least.

But the most significant sign of Japanese weakness is to be found in the choice of such contrasting personalities as General Koiso and Admiral Yonai to form a new government. Koiso is an extremist, generally believed to be personally responsible for the border incidents involving the Soviet Union several months ago. The drubbing given to his forces on that occasion probably accounts for his temporary withdrawal from public life. He has presumably led the extremist critics of Tojo. Admiral Yonai, who was premier in 1940, has never been associated with the militarist clique and formerly had the reputation of being a moderate.

The new government can in no sense be regarded as a "peace movement." A government headed by General Koiso is not likely to give up the vast empire that Japan has conquered in the past thirteen years, still less accede to unconditional surrender. The new government will undoubtedly attempt to intensify the Japanese war effort in the hope of staving off complete defeat. A coalition government, it lacks the monolithic strength of the Tojo regime. It is difficult to see how it can long survive—except through a military miracle. And the landings on Guam, with the imminent prospect of more intensive bombings of Japan itself, make it evident that any miracle that is performed will be under direction of Admiral Nimitz.

In normal times Japanese governments rarely last more than a year. Under present circumstances it would be rash to assume that the Koiso Cabinet would last half that long. Quite possibly there will be a succession of cabinets, all of a more or less stop-gap nature, until a genuine people's government is set up which will recognize the fact of defeat and be prepared to surrender. Meanwhile, we must press home the military advantage that is ours by virtue of Japanese internal dissension. The overthrow of Tojo is an immense accomplishment, but the military clique is still in the saddle and will only be deposed by the armed might of the United Nations.

"Backward Area"

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 21

I HAVE been browsing through press releases by the United States Chamber of Commerce and the Committee for Economic Development, Federal Reserve Bulletins, monthly bank letters from New York, League of Nations reports, and an exciting "not for publication" speech by a Swedish economist. I suggest that in the post-war period the world's most troublesome "backward area" will not be China or India, Africa or Latin America or the Balkans, but the United States.

The industrial backwardness of the colonial areas is a less serious world problem than the intellectual backwardness of the American business community. The former represents an opportunity; the latter a threat. It will be regrettable if the development of the colonial countries is not accelerated, for they could add enormously to the world volume of trade. It will be disastrous if the American economy is badly managed after the war, for world stability and prosperity will depend to a greater extent than ever on stability and prosperity in the United States.

Unwise lending by American private bankers, the absorption of capital from abroad by the American stock-market boom, the effects of the Hawley-Smoot tariff, and the inability of the Hoover Administration to stem deflation at home played major roles in the great depression, but the United States of the '20's had only about 45 per cent of the world's productive capacity (outside the U. S. R. R.). The United States of the '40's will emerge from the war with close to three-fourths of the world's productive capacity. While our own power to produce has been increased by about 50 per cent, the war has brought about a corresponding reduction in the capacity of the other industrial nations. The United States will be the center of world economic gravity after the war.

There is little indication that American business has any conception of the stark magnitude of its problem. One set of figures may help illuminate it. In the May issue of Federal Reserve Bulletin there is an important article on jobs after the war by E. A. Goldenweiser and Everett E. Hagen. They set themselves the task of estimating in concrete terms the volume of production and consumption required after the war to maintain a national income of $170 billion a year, a level they consider necessary to keep unemployment down to two million.

They figure that if federal, state, and local government spending falls no lower than $30 billion a year, and if new plant and equipment in industry absorb $15 billion, and if residential construction can be raised to the unprecedented level of $7 billion, and if inventories increase by $3 billion, and if exports exceed imports by $2 billion, consumer purchases will have to reach $113 billion to reach that goal of but two million unemployed. Let us see what that means in terms of consumer durables. The sale of consumer durables reached the highest peak in our history in 1941, when we turned out 3,700,000 automobiles, 13,700,000 radio sets, 3,500,000 household refrigerators, and almost 2,000,000 electric washing machines. Sales of consumer durables would have to be 50 per cent higher than that to achieve a national income of $170 billion.

The obstacle to the achievement of that goal lies in the realm of ideas and habits, in older ways of thinking and doing business, rather than in material capacity. Under the stimulus of war, national income is running over $200 billion a year, $30 billion more than that post-war goal. The experience of the war period has shown that business can increase profits despite high wages and high taxes when the volume of demand is great enough to bring about full utilization of facilities. The resultant decline in unit overhead costs is so great as to counterbalance or even outweigh the rise in the wage and tax bill. Full employment under peace-time conditions would require a steep increase in wages to support consuming power, but there seems little reason to doubt that it would also maintain profits at a high level.

All this is difficult of achievement in a capitalist system where every entrepeneur operates independently and pretty much by rule of thumb. A workable solution would be some means of combining freedom of enterprise—as a dynamic force in creating new industries—with sufficient central planning and coordination to insure joint action for maximum employment of facilities and manpower. In other fields of human activity it has not been impossible to combine liberty and order, and it is not impossible in the economic sphere. But in the typical expressions of supposedly considered business opinion one catches no glimpse of these horizons. The post-war "program" released here this week by the United States Chamber of Commerce is as evasive, as windy as anything in the Republican or Democratic platform. And the Committee for Economic Development isn't much better.

These so-called business programs—they aren't really programs at all but public-relations campaigns to build up private enterprise by ballyhoo—beg the question at every major point and nowhere get down to a serious discussion of actual problems. About the only thing clear in them is that business men want lower taxes. Here is what the United States Chamber of Commerce offers under "expansion of domestic economy": "Encourage the opening up of new frontiers of opportunity for the investment of capital and the expansion of business activity, small and large, with special attention to agricultural and urban development, to transportation and communication, and to management-labor relations. Support social-security measures which have been approved by business." This is a grab-bag of clichés and hedges, and this comes from an organization headed by a so-called "progressive" business man, Eric Johnston!

I'm afraid it will take a terrific jolt to wake these people up, and I'm not sure they have the capacity to adjust themselves. Gunnar Myrdal, a Swedish economist who knows this country more intimately than most Americans do, told the National Economic Society of Sweden in March that the dirtiest trick the Japanese could play on us would be to surrender when Hitler does. Considering our lack of preparation to carry on at anywhere near an adequate level without war orders, Myrdal thinks the effect would be "an economic catastrophe for America." That would also be an economic catastrophe for the world. The thing that most impresses one at a conference like Bretton Woods is how much better prepared the most conservative European business men are than our own to adjust themselves to the social and economic realities of the post-war period. Perhaps while we get ready to export capital to Europe, Europe had better get ready to export a few ideas to America.

The Battle of Chicago

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

Chicago, July 21

YOU can't help liking Democrats even when they let their bosses tell them how to vote. You like them because they are noisy, good-humored, common; because they enjoy themselves; because some of the fervor of their orators sounds real and most of the response of the crowd is spontaneous. You like them because they voice their differences with such abandon and then make up with such hearty good-will. You like them because they are not Republicans.

Leaving the convention tonight after eight unbroken hours of windy speeches and tedious balloting, of yelling and marching, of hot dogs and cokes and hard seats, the delegates I talked to were bent on one thing: to get cleaned up and go out for some "real" food and drink. All factions united on this immediate program—and those I saw an hour later had accomplished the last item at least.

Before sitting down to put these impressions on paper I reread I. F. Stone's story of the Republican convention three weeks ago. He reported the "bovine apathy" of the delegates as they moved into the Dewey camp; the genteel country-club atmosphere of the whole assembly. "Human hamburger," Mr. Stone called it, "served up as Salisbury steak with a sprig of parsley." In Chicago this week the hamburger was plain chopped meat on the rare side and it was flavored with onions rather than parsley. Even at the end when the delegates stampeded into the Truman camp they did it amid cheers, jeers, and general uproar. There was no apathy visible in the Stadium tonight, nor at previous sessions. Nothing was cut and dried; deals made in upstairs rooms at the Stevens and Sherman had to be fought out on the floor. The party bosses worked for their triumph.

But they won. The job for the rest of us is to examine their victory, try to figure out how decisive it was, assess the strength of the progressive forces, analyze the strategy used—and then lay plans for future action. The story isn't a simple one, and some of the facts needed to make it clear are still known only to a few inside workers. But in sum the convention showed that the Democratic Old Guard is now in a position to gain control of the party; it showed that the liberal elements in the organization are sadly demoralized; and it showed that only labor, acting through the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, has had enough strength and political acumen to put up an effective if losing fight. Let's look at those assertions one by one.

First, the Old Guard. I use that tag to cover both the leaders of the Southern conservatives and those of the Northern city machines. They disagree on a lot of issues —but they worked together at Chicago. The Southern revolt against the Fourth Term fizzled out in the fight to defeat Wallace; only the Texas "regulars" were left stubborn and resentful, but their threats were louder than their acts: I still feel sure they will fall into line behind Roosevelt and Truman, for they must know that the present direction of the party offers new opportunities for the Texas brand of reaction.

Next, the liberal elements in the party. Their demoralization was clearly demonstrated by the President's letters and by various events at Chicago. The Old Guard was able to force the President to abandon Wallace. If he had come out clearly and directly for Wallace, without "dictation," the Vice-President would have been renominated. Even Mr. Roosevelt's first letter, with the sentence about "pros and cons" omitted, might have saved the day. But the second letter, tacitly assuming the Vice-President's defeat and expressing approval of either Truman or Douglas, was a death blow and many of the Wallace forces knew it. In that letter the President offered his unconditional surrender to Hannegan and Hague, Kelly and Flynn. The machine men had convinced him that Wallace's nomination would injure the party's chances by alienating still further the dissident Southern leaders. It was a typical "insider's" argument; it ignored the evidence of polls and popular demonstrations; it rested entirely on the necessity of keeping the state and local leaders in line and the party organization intact.

This position was strengthened rather than countered by the role of the Wallace forces in the various delegations. The best one can say for them is that they were decent and restrained. A few, like Senator Guffey, worked night and day for their candidate. But as a whole they were unprepared, unorganized, dispersed, ineffective. Some wanted Wallace to come out to Chicago and lead his own fight. Others opposed his coming as undignified and dangerous. Wallace headquarters were at the Sherman; the chief work of the convention was carried on at the Stevens where the Democratic National Committee was located and most of the important delegations were lodged. From the point of view of public effect this was disastrous. It is true that the Missouri delegation was also at the Sherman, but this did Truman little harm since his fate hung on the manipulations of the bosses, not on popular enthusiasm. Wallace had to show that he was, in fact, the "people's choice." But the warm and spontaneous demonstration that greeted him on his arrival at the Sherman was hardly known to the delegates as a whole; had it taken place at the Stevens it would have made a big impression. Nor were later activities better handled by his own crowd. His first press conference was jammed, badly arranged, and not very successful. On the day the convention formally opened the Wallace forces had not even turned out a piece of literature; there wasn't a Wallace button or ribbon or placard or banner. Undoubtedly his supporters were busy talking to delegates and political leaders. But in the situation that developed at Chicago, such efforts, while indispensable, were not enough. What was needed was overpowering public demonstration that the Wallace cohorts were strong, that they were fighting, that they intended to win. Not a hint of that mood could be detected. On the contrary, some of Wallace's chief advisers in the party insisted that he could not afford the ballyhoo of political propaganda; it would be incompatible with his position as Vice-President. With this counsel of dignity and reserve I strongly disagree. A bitter fight was fought at Chicago. No holds were barred by the other crowd. Either the Wallace backers had to take off their coats and wade in or they might better have given up in advance. As it was they did neither and lost.

From this criticism I want specifically to exempt Senator Guffey. He was the dynamic center of the pro-Wallace elements and he did all one man could to bring the Pennsylvania delegation behind the Vice-President and to line up key people from other states. But Guffey wasn't equipped to run a headquarters or a campaign; he had not even the facilities at hand to put out a press release. Those jobs belonged to the people at Wallace's headquarters in the Sherman. They fell down on them badly.

Undoubtedly the President's letters played a part in the moral rout of the liberal elements in the convention. They had to pretend that the first letter was a full, generous endorsement instead of a polite brush-off. They had to pretend that the second, fatal letter was merely a formal acknowledgement that Mr. Roosevelt would accept the will of the convention even if it chose someone other than the man he wanted. Neither pretense could possibly be made to ring true. The pro-Wallace liberals were forced to hold a position their leader had abandoned. This fact accounts for part of their ineffectiveness; but only part. Without regard to the President's action, they were not prepared to put up a strong fight for their candidate. Their failure has implications that reach far beyond the defeat of Henry A. Wallace at the Stadium this evening.

Now for the C. I. O. It is not without reason that the opponents of Wallace have charged Sidney Hillman and Philip Murray and the other leaders of the Political Action Committee with running the Wallace campaign. The twist the Old Guard and their newspaper backers give the facts is, of course, designed to alarm and mislead; but the truth is, the C. I. O. group here has done a remarkable job of tough political fighting. They have refused to be demoralized by the President's letters or tricked by the maneuvers of the party bosses. They stuck by Wallace to the end, knowing well the elements ganged up to bring about his defeat. They have used pressure where pressure was needed—for example, to force the withdrawal of Byrnes. They have talked votes to key party leaders from all over the country. Through C. I. O. members who are delegates they have worked hard to win the delegations from doubtful states. They have issued releases, arranged press conferences. It is owing to the Political Action Committee that on Thursday and Friday Wallace badges appeared on delegates' coat lapels and Wallace placards blossomed all over the floor and galleries of the Stadium. The P. A. C. did what Wallace's own backers in the party failed to do and they did it with a degree of zeal and honest conviction that was refreshing. That they did the job effectively, not as amateurs but as experienced political campaigners, is attested to by their enemies. The C. I. O. was nowhere discounted; as Mark Sullivan said yesterday, "It has been the frequent observation of newsmen and politicians that the C. I. O. committee and its leader, Mr. Sidney Hillman, has been the most powerful single factor in the convention."

Now this kind of talk was not, as you may imagine, intended to improve the fortunes of either the Democratic Party or of Mr. Wallace. Word spread around the Stadium that the P. A. C. was trying to control the convention and the party, and that only the nomination of Truman could save them from a C. I. O. dictatorship. This fear was deliberately stimulated by the anti-Wallace crowd. I heard people say, as if with sincere regret, that they were afraid that those C. I. O.'s had spoiled the Vice-President's chances. But if the efforts of the labor people partly boomeranged it is merely further proof of the feeble character of the other pro-Wallace activity. No doubt it would have been strategically preferable to have Wallace ribbons and placards issued from Wallace headquarters. No doubt the arguments of Iowa delegates would have been less subject to political distortion than those of the C. I. O. leaders. The answer is simple. Without the activity of the C. I. O. there would have been no Wallace campaign whatsoever.

The P. A. C. fought well and lost. On Thursday night it came within an inch of winning. With so much work to do, the Wallace forces had been stalling for time, while Hannegan wanted to rush through the Vice-Presidential nomination immediately after the President's acceptance speech. But suddenly the tactics shifted on both sides. Wallace's speech seconding the nomination of Roosevelt set off a spontaneous outburst of Wallace enthusiasm. It kept on in spite of the gavel of the chairman and the Wallace backers promptly decided that his moment had come. They let it be known that they favored Hannegan's plan to hold the Vice-Presidential nomination on Thursday evening. But Hannegan knew how to change his mind too. When he saw the galleries and floor white with Wallace placards and felt the pull toward Wallace among the delegates he lost interest in a quick nomination. The session was adjourned and all hands got to work.

The Hannegan-Flynn-Kelly-Hague cohorts are good in a clinch. They shoved the President's second letter under doubtful noses. They said the President had expressed his preference for Truman in personal long-distance conversations. They pointed out that in 1940 when he really wished to have Mr. Wallace nominated the President hadn't hesitated to say so. Throughout Thursday night the anti-Wallace men worked on the delegates and the party leaders. And finally they accumulated the promises that came to roost today.

The strength of the pro-Wallace labor forces may be measured by this incident. In the final engagement the bosses won. But to do so they had to throw in their heaviest armored divisions. And they had to compromise. The nomination of Truman was a negative victory for which the Political Action Committee can take full credit. If labor had not made itself felt as an organized political force, to be appeased since it could not be bought, the Old Guard would have nominated a Byrnes or Byrd. As it was, they had to find a man with a persuasive liberal record to defeat Wallace, a man whose nomination would insure the ticket the support of the Wallace forces themselves.

But let us not fool ourselves with the idea that the choice of Truman almost compensates for the defeat of Wallace. In spite of this forced concession, the convention ended with the combined reactionary forces in the Democratic Party, North and South, more firmly in control than at any time since 1932. Their drive for power was challenged but not stopped by the rise of a vigorous political labor organization. The battle is over for the moment. But as the tumult and shouting dies out in a hundred bars and special club cars, as the precinct captains and party bosses depart for home, it is evident that the struggle of the last few days has cleared the political air of many ambiguities. Lines have been drawn more sharply; an open division has been made between reactionaries and progressives—a division which even the President's letters failed to blur. The campaign that lies ahead will temporarily hold the opposing factions together in an alliance of necessity, since the immediate job is to defeat Dewey and prevent the return of the Republicans to power. It will not serve to disarm the forces that rallied to the vigorous leadership of the P. A. C. The Battle of Chicago has opened a new phase of an old war.

With the Red Army in Minsk

BY ANNA LOUISE STRONG

[Anna Louise Strong, a sympathetic observer of developments in Russia for more than two decades, has recently returned via Siberia to Moscow. This is the first of a series of exclusive cables which Miss Strong will send to The Nation as the Red Army pushes on toward Germany.]

Moscow, July 16, by Cable

EVERY night since my arrival in Moscow ten days ago fireworks have exploded colorfully over the city in salutes to victory, celebrating the freeing of cities which for three years have been under German rule. The crowds watch the bright bursts of fire against the pale summer night without applause but with deep satisfaction .They always believed this day would come.

Three capitals of Soviet republics, Petrozavodsk, Minsk, and Wilno, freed in the past fortnight, nineteen German generals captured in nineteen days, one a day—these achievements indicate the immensity of the Red Army's success.

The present operations are chiefly notable for the tremendous depth of the battlefield and the smashing speed of the advance across the swamps, rivers, and woods of White Russia. The entire front has moved 150 miles in six days from the Vitebsk-Mogilev line to the Polotsk-Baranovichi line. General Krilov's army entering Wilno advanced 240 miles in twelve days. As at Vitebsk, Bobruisk, and Minsk the Russians have used the classic tactics of encirclement. Now, while part of the Red Army mops up pockets of Germans who have been surrounded, other forces are plunging ahead to make new encirclements.

When I flew to Minsk in the special correspondents' plane on July 6, mopping-up battles were going on all around us; thousands of Germans were being dug out of the woods, some confusedly fighting, others surrendering to the first passer-by. Three surrendered to American correspondents.

Long talks with the prisoners showed me they had a depressed awareness of ultimate German defeat but not the slightest sense of German blame. Ten slightly wounded Germans groused because they were unfed and untreated two hours after their capture—in the city where the Germans had themselves destroyed all hospitals and food stocks. They seemed to expect the Red Army to find supplies for prisoners in the ruins. As a matter of fact, the Red Army was apparently equal even to this, for next morning I saw long lines of prisoners neatly bandaged en route to the rear.

The very different treatment given by the Germans to Red Army prisoners was described to me by various Minsk citizens, among them Hassia Prusolina, a former teacher of Russian history in the medical university. Hassia is a Jewess who escaped from the Minsk ghetto established by the Germans and stayed on in the city as a charwoman, with forged papers, for nearly a year. During this time she was in contact with White Russian partisans, helping them to get medical supplies. Her previous connections with medical students enabled her to smuggle out stuff even from German hospitals, if Russian doctors were working in them. Finally the Germans grew suspicious and Hassia had to flee. She lived in the woods as a partisan fighter from the autumn of 1942 until the Red Army took Minsk. "It is hard to get used to being under a roof again," she said, as we sat in the dining-room of a villa formerly occupied by the enemy staff and now temporarily serving as quarters for the American correspondents.

Hassia told me that in January, 1942, the Germans put thousands of Russian prisoners into unheated box cars and left them for seven days without food, then drove them into the Minsk streets. Those who couldn't walk were shot where they fell. From the freight yard to the Academy of Science the streets were filled with dead. Passers-by wept, but any man or woman who approached the prisoners to offer them water or food was shot. This story was confirmed by several other persons in Minsk.

The most gruesome tales were told by twelve Jews who believed themselves to be the only survivors of 120,000 Jews from many other localities who passed through the Minsk ghetto. Minsk, they said, was an extermination station for Viennese and Czech Jews. Nehemiah Zimmermann, whose cousin works in Brooklyn, and Ethillel Yabroz, who claims three brothers in New York, were first rounded up in Baranovichi, where the Germans established a ghetto of 12,000 persons. They said that the first pogrom in March, 1942, killed

BERLIN
J. STALIN
J.S

"And he's sent his luggage in advance."—by Neb.

Courtesy London Daily Mail

6,000 women, children, and old people unable to work. Workers got green tickets—"tickets to life." Later pogroms killed all except the more skilled specialists needed by the Germans. Twelve of these specialists were brought to Minsk. "Perhaps we look like people, but we are no longer really people," said one of them. "I had to stand with a green card in my hand and watch my wife put in a gas truck and driven away to death. After that one is not a man any more."

The Minsk ghetto was similarly decimated. From September, 1942, to October, 1943, thirty-nine trains averaging a thousand Jews each arrived from Vienna, Hamburg, and Czechoslovakian towns. Out of every train a handful of skilled workers were saved; the others were killed.

A hundred Jews were working in an automobile repair shop when the Germans began to evacuate the city at the approach of the Red Army. Knowing the Germans would kill them before they left, several of them managed to escape, hiding under ruined buildings for two days without water or food. The rest were shut up in the cellar of the Gestapo building, the former Soviet Medical Institute, and burned alive when the building was drenched with gasoline and set on fire. The surviving Jewish mechanics have given to Soviet investigators the names of the Germans who ordered the atrocities. One was a German sadist who exulted, "That's my ten-thousandth Jew," after shooting a group of helpless people. He made the remark tauntingly as he offered a cigarette to a Jew whose life was saved so that he could repair machines.

The hollow, charred walls of Minsk looked as if they could never be rebuilt. One of the American correspondents, after driving through blocks on blocks of ruins, remarked, "Here's where I would quit." However, the Mayor of Minsk and the City Soviet have already returned from partisan hideouts in the woods and set the inhabitants to work.

"The first task was to get rid of mines," the city official showing me around said. The partisan troops helped in this. The next task was to list abandoned German stores and put them under guard for public use. These things were mostly done during the first two days. Transport workers are repairing railway and street cars. The waterworks will deliver water in a few days. Minsk looks bad, but actually its condition is more hopeful than that of many other cities. The Red Army came swiftly, and the Germans left in a panic without time to make the destruction complete. There were many good patriots in Minsk who at the risk of their lives managed that night to disconnect the wires that were to blow up factories and other buildings. "How long will it take to rebuild?" I asked my guide. A shadow fell on his face as he admitted, "Many, many years."

The crowds in the Moscow streets watching the victory salutes are deeply content, but they are not lighthearted. They are preparing to restore the land that is freed.

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

YIELDING TO RANK-AND-FILE pressure, William Green has grudgingly consented to the formation of a United Automobile Workers' National Council—a first step toward forming "one big union" of automotive workers. —July 4, 1934.

BOSTON HAD ANOTHER TEA PARTY a few weeks ago, to welcome the Nazi propaganda ship Karlsruhe. To be precise, there were two tea parties. At the first one, Governor Ely and Mayor Mansfield received the Hitlerite "good-will" gesture very cordially. The second meeting was sponsored by the Boston Committee to Aid Victims of German Fascism, supported by a number of other anti-fascist organizations, including the Marine Workers' Union and the Irish Workers' Club, and was attended by several hundred Harvard, Radcliffe, and Massachusetts Institute of Technology students. According to the report of an official investigating committee, signed by Professors Arthur N. Holcombe, Ralph Barton Perry, and William Ernest Hocking, the police drove the demonstrators off the lot where they had assembled, and kicked, cuffed, and clubbed with indiscriminate fury. Twenty-one persons were arrested, and three of them were slugged after they had reached the station house, one of them, at least, into unconsciousness.—July 4, 1934.

IF UPTON SINCLAIR WINS the Democratic nomination, there will be a battle for fair with all the big-business Democrats flocking together with the Republicans to try to keep him out of the governorship. . . . "End Poverty in California" is Sinclair's slogan, which abbreviated gives the word EPIC, and this his campaign may well turn out to be.—OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, July 11, 1934.

AS THE SMOKE FROM NAZI RIFLES begins to lift from the scene of tragedy, it becomes possible to obtain a clearer view of the background and significance of the recent sanguinary events in the Reich. . . . Ernst Röhm, founder of the Storm Troops, has always possessed a totally different conception of the use of that body from that held by his close personal friend and chief, Adolf Hitler. . . . Meanwhile the Storm Troopers, composed almost entirely of young men without other means of support, had become openly discontented over the delay in putting the socialist half of the Nazi program into effect.—July 18, 1934.

THE FRENZY OF THE FILM CENSORS has grown to cyclonic proportions. A great white cloud of purity hangs over Hollywood. Cardinal Hayes and Dr. Tippy (for the Protestants) have spoken, Will Hays has answered meekly, and Mae West is revising her latest picture. . . . We are convinced that Mae West, like love, will find a way.—July 25, 1934.

Gandhi's New Strategy

BY LOUIS FISCHER

IT IS clear now that Mahatma Gandhi was released from jail not only for reasons of health. Gandhi was arrested on August 9, 1942. In January, 1944, he received, for the first time, a notice from the British government setting forth its reasons for his detention and granting him the right to make representations against further incarceration. There then ensued a fascinating exchange of letters between Gandhi and Viceroy Wavell, which I have read.

This correspondence was the preliminary to Gandhi's liberation and to his recent attempt at an understanding with the Moslems of India and the British. Seventy-five years old, bone and skin, brain and will, that man Gandhi is still, as Lord Linlithgow, Wavell's predecessor, said to me, "the biggest thing in India."

When one reconstructs India's recent history it develops that Britain quelled a near-rebellion during the last five months of 1942. Arson, murder, and serious property damage in strategic war areas were met with harsh repressive measures, including machine-gunning by military planes. The British won a victory. But it is indisputable that the battle could have been avoided. Even Gandhi, and certainly many of his close advisers, did not want the civil-disobedience movement which began on August 9, 1942. In fact, they never launched it. The resolution favoring it was adopted, but Gandhi hesitated and did not act to carry out the decision. He still hoped for a compromise with the British. Twice he asked for an interview with Linlithgow, and twice Linlithgow refused. It was the arrest of Gandhi and of thousands of his followers which precipitated the disturbances before the Indian National Congress Party had issued any orders defying the government.

There is reason to believe that the British government did not recoil from a test of strength with the nationalist movement of India; indeed, Churchill, the fighting imperialist, probably relished it. In 1935 Winston Churchill said, "Gandhism and all it stands for will sooner or later have to be grappled with and finally crushed." . . . Since 1935, of course, Churchill has not become less anti-Gandhi. He has become the King's First Minister, though not in order to liquidate the British Empire. As Prime Minister he can grapple with Gandhism and all it stands for. The events of 1942, after the failure of the Cripps mission, offered him an opportunity to do so.

That wasteful, bloody struggle between the British raj and the Indian champions of independence ended in Gandhi's defeat. The defeat taught Gandhi a profound lesson which he is now applying; it induced him to compromise on a basic tenet of his political faith—the unity of India. The vivisection of India into a Hindustan and a Moslem "Pakistan" has always been regarded by Gandhi as a sin against God, as "blasphemy." In my talks with him in 1942 his mind was closed against it. Gandhi is a queer mixture of stubbornness and pliability. He is unyielding because he is fanatically conscious of his life's mission to free India. On the other hand, he is a natural compromiser because, as he said to me, "I can never be sure I am right."

The 1942 disturbance also taught Wavell a valuable lesson: the suppression of riots does not solve the problem of governing India. The Indian population today is sullen and non-cooperative, and the whole country faces economic distress if not famine. India is living through a terrible crisis born of the loss of hope. This is what confronts Wavell in the next four years of his viceregal term. Wavell is no Linlithgow. He is a political philosopher, a man of culture, a beautiful writer, shy, thoughtful, and often very frank.

Sobered by their experiences since 1942, Gandhi and Wavell are both ready to make another attempt at an adjustment of rival British and Indian interests. This appears from their astonishing correspondence, which began with a letter Gandhi sent to Wavell, his jailer, on February 17, 1944. Gandhi addresses Wavell as "Dear Friend" and explains that "since I regard myself as a friend and servant of humanity, including the British, in token of my good-will I call you, foremost representative of the British in India, my 'friend.' " That is the way it begins, but then the Mahatma passes to the attack and warns against British self-satisfaction with the situation in India. He urges "a searching of hearts in British high places."

Wavell replied on February 25, 1944, with a short note, formal but not stiff, in which he takes "this opportunity to express to you deep sympathy from my wife and myself at the death of Mrs. Gandhi. We understand what this loss must mean to you after so many years of companionship."

Gandhi's response is dated "Detention Camp, March 9, 1944," and fills six and a half typewritten pages, double-space. After some strangely unconventional personal references to his relations with his wife, he deals with the Indian attitude toward the war, Japan, and India's future, and reiterates the view that the government provoked the 1942 difficulties. Gandhi advises

Wavell to meet India's leaders and "discuss the pros and cons of their policy with them." He even invites the Viceroy to fly down and talk with him in prison. "We are all friends of the British, however much we may criticize the British government and system in India. If you can but trust, you will find us to be the greatest helpers in the fight against Nazism, Fascism, Japanism, and the like."

Wavell sent a three-page answer on March 28 of this year. He stands by the Cripps offer and defends British policy. He criticizes the Congress Party and condemns its present attitude as "hindering and not forwarding Indian progress to self-government and development." ". . . I do not accuse you or the Congress Party of any wish deliberately to aid the Japanese," writes Wavell, but he expresses the opinion that Congress action did impede the war effort. Then, "to sum up, I believe that with general cooperation we can in the immediate future do much to solve India's economic problems and can make steady and substantial progress toward Indian self-government. I believe that the greatest contribution that the Congress Party can make toward India's welfare is to abandon the policy of non-cooperation and join whole-heartedly with the other Indian parties and with the British in helping India forward in economic and political progress—not by any dramatic or spectacular stroke but by hard and steady work toward the end ahead."

This is the little official olive branch.

Gandhi did not mince words in his last letter, dated April 9, 1944. "As I visualize India today," he declares, "it is one vast prison containing 400,000,000 souls. You are its sole custodian. Government prisons are prisons within this prison. . . . Is it not high time that you cooperated with the people of India through their elected representatives instead of expecting cooperation from them?"

Within a month—on May 5, 1944—Wavell freed Gandhi. As soon as Gandhi had recuperated from his almost fatal illness he asked to see Wavell and to confer with Nehru and the other executive members of the Congress Party who are still in jail. Failing that, he intimated to friends in Bombay, he might just as well go back to the detention camp, for his release would have served no useful purpose. Both requests were rejected.

At this crucial point Chakravarthi Rajagopalachari enters the picture. There is no keener mind in India than that of "C. R." as he is mercifully called. Sixty-five years old, intimate friend of Gandhi, father of the wife of Gandhi's son Devadas, leading nationalist and anti-imperialist, former prime minister of the Congress government of Madras, and a high-caste Brahmin, C. R. is the third outstanding figure in the Indian independence movement. Gandhi is its prophet, Nehru its poet, thinker, and crusader, Rajagopalachari its statesman. C. R. spent ten days with Gandhi near Bombay between June 30 and July 8. On July 9, 1944, Gandhi published his now-famous proposal for a settlement of the Indian political problem. The hand of C. R. is discernible throughout the text.

In the proposal Gandhi offers to form an Indian nationalist government with the Moslem League. That government would support the war, but military affairs are reserved as the exclusive province of the British. In relation to the new government the British Viceroy would play the same role as King George does toward the British Cabinet, that is, he could not veto its decisions.

Assuming Hindu-Moslem collaboration within such a government during the war, the Moslem population of India can, if it so expresses itself in a plebiscite after the war, establish its own Moslem state. This partition of India, however, Gandhi makes contingent on British withdrawal from India, not now, but when peace comes. C. R. has presented the plan to Jinnah, head of the Moslem League.

I spent many hours in exciting conversation with Rajagopalachari in Bombay in June, 1942. My diary entries, which are practically verbatim accounts of those talks, show how C. R.'s ideas helped shape the present Gandhi proposals. "If we arrive at an understanding with the British about complete independence after the war," he said to me, "and about Pakistan if the Moslems want it after the war when elections and boundary rectifications become possible, there will be no difficulty about Jinnah's participation in a responsible Indian Cabinet government." He even envisaged the possibility of Jinnah as Prime Minister of the first free Indian government. (So did Gandhi.)

C. R.'s fundamental approach is one of trust in the Moslems and the British. Off and on for the last two years he has been in touch with Jinnah with a view to bridging the Moslem-Hindu gulf. He secretly hopes that if the Moslems and Hindus join in a war-time government of India they will learn to know each other better and then the Moslems will abandon their project of a separate Pakistan.

Jinnah's strategy, before and today, is not difficult to understand. As long as the British deny India independence, Jinnah's uncompromising attitude toward the Congress Party and his fervent advocacy of Pakistan bring him popularity among Moslems, new members for his League, and excellent propaganda material. But the moment the British agree to a responsible Indian government Jinnah would have to join it, because intransigence would rob him of office, power to influence policy, patronage, and other advantages. By granting India a national government Britain, in other words, could unite Hindus and Moslems and win both for the war effort.

Hitherto, Pakistan has been a stumbling-block on the road to Hindu-Moslem unity. Jinnah insists on it; the British accepted it in the Cripps offer; Gandhi would not have it. Now Gandhi accepts it. Thus the way seems open to a Hindu-Moslem political agreement. Yet Jinnah may frustrate it. For he has thrived on his opposition to Congress and on the British government's opposition to Congress. The Congress is his target, his foil, and his reason for courting popular Moslem support. Jinnah will only bury the hatchet with Congress if he thinks that he will enjoy the countervailing benefits of participation in an Indian government. He could argue with cogency, moreover, that Gandhi's acceptance of Pakistan has no practical value unless the British grant India independence, for there could be no independent Pakistan unless all of India were independent.

An alternative possibility, Congress-Moslem League unity in the fight for independence, might not appear so alluring to Jinnah because if both pursued the same aim many Moslems would probably believe that Congress, which is the only political party in India, had the advantage of experience and tried leadership.

The key to the Indian situation remains, therefore, where it has always been, in the hands of the British government. Wavell and Churchill can heal the breach between the factions in India; they can mobilize India's millions behind the war. They can do these things by giving India what India needs and wants—a national Cabinet government. Nothing less will be regarded by Indians as a guaranty that Britain expects to quit India when Japan is defeated. Verbal promises are no longer believed in Asia.

Television Comes of Age

BY ALAN BARTH

TELEVISION entered the war an adolescent. It will emerge an adult. Like our young men who have been similarly catapulted into maturity, it may come home to a family anxious to impose upon it old habits and a planned career, which it has outgrown. Parents are slow to acknowledge their offspring have grown up.

The simple fact is that there has been compressed into the past two or three years a whole decade's normal development in electronics. This has made possible tremendous new communications achievements based on utilization of the ultra-high frequencies of the radio spectrum. The war blasted the lid off radio, shoved it up into the stratosphere, and put it to use in such mysterious forms as radar. There is every reason to believe that comparable miracles will be performed in the commercial field as soon as the veil of military secrecy can be lifted. Radio engineers agree that in the sphere of television this will mean pictures appreciably better than anything we have had.

Television has been talked about as a new art for some fifteen years. It was not brought down to a business basis, however, until five months before Pearl Harbor. In July, 1941, the Federal Communications Commission approved certain standards for the television industry and assigned a portion of the radio spectrum to it. Eight stations started operations of a limited and experimental nature. Manufacturers sold seven to eight thousand receiving instruments to the public—a high percentage of them in and around New York—at prices from $150 up. Since our entry into the war promptly ended the manufacture of new sets and consequently put a quietus on the expansion and perfection of broadcasting, these pioneers have been in possession of handsome pieces of furniture which for the past two and a half years must have seemed to partake of the nature of white elephants. NBC, CBS, General Electric, Dumont, Philco, Paramount, and Don Lee have each given them a few hours of broadcasting a week—canned stuff largely, with some live programs—but research into audience reaction reveals a low level of interest.

Once you have accepted the miracle of "video" broadcasting, you are bound to feel dissatisfaction with its quality today. The picture presented is only seven and a half by ten inches. This means that you must be very close to the screen to see it at all; and you quickly come to realize that "three's a crowd." The picture must be larger if the television set is to provide entertainment for a whole family or for friends.

It is possible, although it has not yet been done commercially, to blow the television image up to larger dimensions, say, eighteen by twenty-four inches, which is generally considered the best size for home use. But the picture will be somewhat coarse-grained, inferior in clarity and definition to sixteen-millimeter home motion-picture films. This is because telecasting is now limited to a band of six megacycles, which will permit transmission of a picture of no more than 525 lines, the standard set by the FCC before the war. Increasing the size of the picture merely spaces the lines farther apart. Pre-war conditions, while they give you a fairly clear, flickerless image, do not permit you to see the refinements of form or texture—let alone the excitement of color. High-quality color requires a very much greater number of picture elements than can be transmitted within the six-megacycle band now standard.

Because of its lack of definition, television must rely heavily upon close-ups. It can show you a figure but not much of the background. In a group the individual becomes nearly indistinguishable. The limitation has an unhappy effect upon television's entertainment value. It hampers transmission of athletic events, particularly games like football involving many players. And it vitiates dramatic programs. Instead of showing the relationship between persons, the television director must shift his camera from one player to another. He cannot even attempt complex forms of dramatic action.

Television's inability to transmit detail is a serious drawback from the advertiser's point of view. If a dress designer wishes to use the medium for a fashion show, he will be disconsolate to discover that it cannot reveal the subtleties of cut, cloth, and color he has put into his creations. To compare it with other media, the best that television can do today with its seven-and-a-half-by-ten image is to offer the equivalent of a forty-five-to-forty-eight-line halftone cut; when the image is enlarged to eighteen by twenty-four, it is no better than a twenty-four-line halftone. Any newspaper can print halftones of sixty-five to eighty-five lines. As for color, television's current rudimentary color processes permit a picture of no more than about thirty-five lines. A slick-paper magazine is capable of reproducing color photographs of 125 lines. Under such limitations, television is in grave danger of losing both the audience response and the financial support which, in our economic system, are indispensable to its success.

The Columbia Broadcasting System has looked this situation squarely in the face and has proposed a radical remedy. Since the narrow six-megacycle band now available to television is at the root of its difficulties, CBS urges that television be moved up into the ultra-high frequencies which the war has taught it how to use and which would place greater space at its disposal. CBS wants television to operate in bands of fourteen to sixteen megacycles. With these it could transmit pictures with twice the clarity, detail, and richness. Television now has 18 channels of 6 megacycles each, assigned to it in the spectrum between 50 and 300 megacycles. Of these only the first 5, between 50 and 90 megacycles, are now in operation or within the dial range of present receiving sets. (See chart below.) It is useless to talk of broadening television's channels in this region. The spectrum is already overcrowded. And when the war ends, greater space will undoubtedly have to be reserved for radio services to aviation and navigation. These transmissions belong, logically, in the area now occupied by television.

But the upper reaches of the spectrum are as yet untenanted. CBS proposes the allocation to television of some 30-odd channels, each 16 megacycles wide, in the space between 500 and 1,000 megacycles; in other words, not only wider bands for better pictures but also more bands for greater competition. The suitability of these ultra-high frequencies for television's needs still awaits practical demonstration and commercial adaptation. But CBS has stated its position with admirable restraint: "This much seems true—a single year of concentrated effort in a dozen engineering laboratories should prove the case for better television pictures or else disprove it. Hundreds of American engineers have done ten times as much, in two taut years of war, as remains to be done in one full year of peace."

The CBS proposal has stirred up a hot controversy in the radio trade. Two objections to it have been raised, apart from the fact that it has not yet been incontrovertibly proved feasible. One is that the entire pre-war investment in television—the transmitters of pioneer broadcasters as well as the seven thousand receiving sets in the hands of the public—would have to be scrapped. The other is that the change-over would retard production and employment in the industry in the immediate post-war period.

These objections have been voiced most volubly by Niles Trammell, president of the National Broadcasting Company, a subsidiary of the Radio Corporation of America. While CBS is interested exclusively in broadcasting, not in manufacturing, postponement of production would work a real hardship upon RCA, which possesses the facilities, the dies, and the know-how to turn out pre-war television transmitters and receivers as soon as the materials become available. Philco, Dumont, and Emerson, all makers of equipment, feel much the same way. Zenith and Westinghouse, though manufacturers, are squarely on the side of CBS. General Electric and Farnsworth have taken no part in the controversy. General Electric, indeed, has accepted an order to turn out the first post-war ultra-high-frequency transmitter for Columbia.

There is a real danger that the exploitation of lower-frequency television may rule out or indefinitely delay the introduction of higher-frequency television, since there is a lock-and-key relationship between transmitters and receivers. It is impractical and uneconomic to build television sets capable of receiving broadcasts both at the present level and in the upper reaches of the spectrum. If transmission should shift to the ultra-high channels, receivers of the type now in the hands of the public would be of interest only to museums. It is one thing to talk of shifting television's place in the spectrum when only a few thousand sets would be rendered obsolete by the change. It would be something quite different to talk of doing this after a few million sets had been sold. This is what Chairman James L. Fly of the Federal Communications Commission had in mind when he inveighed recently against "freezing television at the old pre-war standards."

TELEVISION ALLOCATIONS

Commissioner E. K. Jett of the FCC also opposes such freezing but favors utilization of the lower frequencies until in time the higher frequencies supplant them. He envisages a dual system of transmission during a transitional period, to service both old and new types of receiver. The television panel of the Radio Technical Planning Board, a group of outstanding government and industry radio engineers, has also advocated continuance of the FCC's pre-war standards and, at the same time, allocation of a broad space to television in the ultra-high frequencies for experimental purposes, without establishment of any standards for its present use. Two kinds of television, however, could not long be maintained: no broadcaster could long afford to service both, and the limitations of the lower frequency would impair programs for the higher. The present standards might reasonably be continued for a year or so until higher standards are proved practicable.

Four measures seem necessary to safeguard the public interest: (1) the FCC, while permitting television broadcasts at present standards, should insist upon intensive experimentation in use of the ultra-high frequencies; (2) the FCC should make clear to broadcasters and public alike that the present standards are provisional and will be reviewed when large-scale manufacture can be resumed; (3) the FCC should set aside space for television now at the top of the spectrum; (4) the broadcasters should restrain their panegyrics about the present type of television and inform the public that better television may soon be achieved.

With these precautions, the issue may well resolve itself. Just how soon the government will release its electronic secrets is anybody's guess—probably not until the Japanese have no further use for them. Nor is the War Production Board likely to allocate materials for large-scale manufacture of television equipment any earlier. Manufacturers, moreover, will have plenty to do for a while meeting the post-war demand for audio sets. Most important of all, television broadcasting on a nation-wide basis cannot be created quickly.

Television is peculiarly a network job. It is enormously expensive, and those who engage in it will have to build gradually and be prepared for a long period of deficit financing. In all likelihood a decade will elapse before the hundred largest cities in the United States have television transmitters in operation and anything resembling a national network can exist. The feasibility of ultra-high-frequency telecasting should be definitely proved or disproved long before the public is ready to invest in any great number of receiving sets.

When television comes of age, we shall have a new art form.

Niles Trammell indulged in no hyperbole when he said, "It is not just a better form of product or a better way of doing a thing that has been done before. It is something totally new and unique and original." It will not displace or replace anything else. It will grow on new soil where nothing ever grew before."

In the Wind

ALICE ROOSEVELT LONGWORTH, of the Republican Roosevelts, is given as the source of this remark about Dewey: "Who wants to vote for a man who looks like a bridegroom on a wedding cake?"

ALTHOUGH THE OWI'S RESEARCH DIVISION was scrapped by Congress, there will still be research—of a kind. Tide, an advertising trade magazine, reports that private industry is financing a new bureau to carry on the work. It will operate as an adjunct of the War Advertising Council.

AMID SUCH GOINGS ON, more and more people are turning to the consolation of philosophy. Both the Modern Library and the publishers of the Everyman series report steadily increasing sales of such authors as Plato, Aristotle, Tacitus, Epictetus, Marcus Aurelius, William James, Henri Bergson, Sir Thomas Browne, Spinoza, Thomas à Kempis, and Saint Augustine.

A NAVAL LIEUTENANT, born in Florida, has been relieved of his command for addressing a group of Negro sailors to whom he was lecturing as "you niggers."

THE POLICEMEN OF LONG BEACH, California, having been assured by the city attorney that it is legal for them to join a union, have organized and elected officers (A. F. of L.).

FESTUNG EUROPA: Belgian government bonds of 1936 and 1937, which were quoted at 32 per cent of face value on the London market in June, 1940, are now quoted at 98 per cent. . . . The Nazi-sponsored company union of the Michelin automobile plant in France recently held a meeting to elect twenty-six delegates. But when the votes were counted it appeared that only four delegates had been elected: Roosevelt, Churchill, Stalin, and De Gaulle.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Last of the Scapegoats

BY WALTER MEHRING

THE alleged attempt on the life of Hitler suggests that the crisis in Germany is coming to a head. Was there really a bomb or was the incident manufactured to justify another purge akin to that of June 30, 1934, when the Führer liquidated the chiefs of the S. A.? Then he made a speech justifying his action on the ground that these men were plotting against him—a speech in which he claimed, as he did again on this occasion, that "providence" had saved him "to carry on his work." In 1934 Hitler, to placate the General Staff, destroyed the Nazi radicals; today he must destroy the General Staff and attempt to pin on it responsibility for defeat. The army, in turn, seeks to transfer the blame to him. Neither will succeed, and both will go down together, for there is no other group left in Germany which can be used as a scapegoat.

In all the 123 years since it was first organized by Gneisenau, the German General Staff has never suffered such losses under any of its leaders as it has under the present ones. Before the war its ranks were thinned by executions and fatal accidents; during the war the thinning process has been continued by surrender to the enemy, by the suicidal "hero's death" in battle, and by dismissal and subsequent house arrest.

Those who survive are members of the military camarilla that chose the corporal Adolf Hitler to be the front man for its intrigues. When Herr Brüning suggested to the monarchist Hindenburg that he restore the monarchy, the "acting Kaiser" roughly refused. Why? The Prussian generals, in preparing their assault on the world, preferred to have in office a servile "orderly" who would never oppose any of their plans.

And so they set up a dummy leader, crowned like any monarch with the halo of Hegel's deified state. But alas, in order to maintain his dictatorship the orderly had to have more and more authority—and he had an insatiable appetite for victory over his enemies, first in Germany and then throughout the world. Within Germany, for every defect, every abuse, every bad condition, he found internal enemies on whom to saddle the guilt—Socialists, pacifists, Jews, Catholics, and when necessary his own companions.

Total political power carries with it total military authority, and the result can only be total victory or total defeat. And as the generals have used up most of the military reserves, Hitler has used up his political reserves—all those who might have been able to negotiate an "honorable" peace involving something less than unconditional surrender and later serve as scapegoats. He has already liquidated all the scapegoats.

Most German generals today look back with longing to the good old days of 1918, to the sham revolution they engineered, to the conveniently "disgraceful" Treaty of Versailles, to the abundance of scapegoats. It was child's play for them to get rid of the Kaiser, for all the kings of Prussia since Friedrich Wilhelm I, the "Soldier King," had been ruled by the Junker officers. After the defeat, the General Staff arranged to have Germany represented at the armistice conference by members of the civil groups it hated most—"reds," Jews, and Catholics. These, while the generals were silent, shouldered the whole burden of national humiliation.

The national thirst for revenge was slaked from time to time by the blood of the one of these unfortunate men. The Catholic Matthias Erzberger, who had signed the armistice terms, was murdered in 1921; the Jew Walther Rathenau, who had kept Germany supplied with raw materials during the war, who in 1918 had called for a mass resurgence in support of the war, who had presented Germany's side at Versailles, who by means of an understanding with the Russians had won important concessions for Germany at Genoa, was killed in 1922. The responsibility for these murders was denied by the Junker officers; but a paid spy of the "Black Reichswehr" named Adolf Hitler openly praised the murderers as heroes.

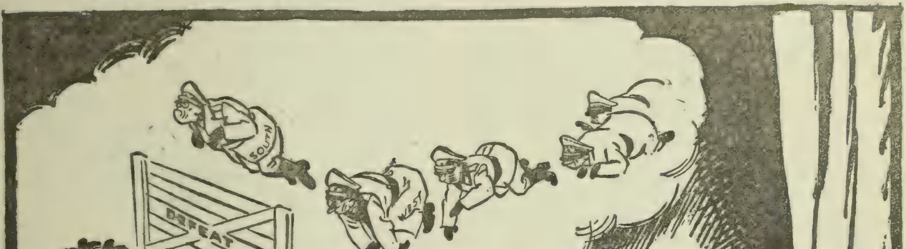
At first the Allies demanded not only reparations but the handing over of those who had instigated the war. A patriotic German scholar of world-wide reputation, the sociologist Max Weber, went to Ludendorff with the request that he give himself up for the sake of the nation. The patriot Ludendorff answered, "The nation? The nation can polish my boots."

A true Prussian officer is always innocent. As early as May, 1918, Field Marshal von Hindenburg wrote to his wife at Hanover, "I shall not be to blame if the war does not end advantageously for us." And at the end of September the General Staff came out with its explanation of the situation. "The game is lost this time," Ludendorff told a meeting of the War Cabinet on September 28. "War has its ups and downs. Perhaps another time Germany will have better luck."

The first two offensives against the Weimar Republic, the Kapp putsch in Berlin and the Hitler putsch in Munich, failed; General Ludendorff had been one of the instigators of both of them. For these failures, as for the defeat in the First World War, he blamed (1) the Jews, whose help in war and hospitality in peace he had received; (2) the Socialists, who had saved his life; (3) the Freemasons, and (4) the Catholic church. In a pamphlet entitled "The Gravediggers of Germany" he even accused his former comrade, Adolf Hitler, of being "a hireling of the Vatican."

The German General Staff had only one aim—to reestablish the "Prussian soldier state" at any price. To that end it allowed its representative in office, President Hindenburg, to drop the monarchist Brüning; to that end it sacrificed its comrade von Schleicher; to that end it raised to power one whom it openly despised, the corporal Hitler. (The corporal, true to the finest traditions of the Prussian officer class, saddled the guilt on others by burning the Reichstag.) The General Staff silently consented to all Hitler's subsequent excesses on the understanding that it would not participate in them; it was silent when many of its comrades who spoke out against the dictatorship were murdered. Its instrument this time was not a complaisant King of Prussia but a bohemian adventurer, a usurper, an underworld Caesar, who has implicated them in all his crimes.

The present strategy of the General Staff is dictated by the fear of death. It is fighting on four fronts: abroad, against Bolshevism on one side and democracy on the other; at home, against the dictatorship on one side and the people on the other. To which of the two external enemies shall it surrender, the Americans and the English or the Russians? If it raises the white flag, whom shall it blame? It must fight for its life against the dictatorship. Any general who mentions the word "surrender" risks his head; anyone who speaks of it even to his intimate friends runs the risk of being betrayed. The individual seeking a way out has a rather limited choice: he can let himself be captured, trusting to the magnanimity of the enemy—the Russians have taken a good crop of generals lately—or he can seek a "hero's death" in battle. The General Staff, collectively, has another choice: it can stab its accomplice, the National Socialist Party, in the back. But then, alas, it will have killed the last of the scapegoats.



SLEEPLESS NIGHTS (Copyright in All Countries.)

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

A SHUDDER ran through the world when it read of the threats shouted over the German radio on July 10 about what would happen if "the war spills over on to our holy German soil." "We will turn this continent," a voice said, "into a maelstrom of destruction where only one cry is heard—the cry for blood." But although there will be destruction and blood enough in the last act as there was in the first, this crazy threat has less practical significance than at first appeared. It was not exploded in a political but in a lyrical program. No minister or general, not even a political commentator, presented mankind with the ultimatum. It was a bel esprit, a man of letters, who gave himself up to the ecstasy of prophecy. And in literature such prophecies are an old story. Long before the Nazis had reason to despair, their poets indulged in similar wild visions. As much as two years ago a poem was quoted here which has since been included in all German schoolbooks. "The earth shall tremble to its core," it threatened, "when its noblest race falls." And it ended: "As Attila's hall crashed and burned when he conquered the Nibelungs, so shall Europe burst into flame when the Germans perish." We should not forget that German poets and artists, especially the bad poets and artists, have always had a morbid craving to wallow in ideas of death and to unroll pictures of cosmic destruction.

A not less characteristic reminder of this literature is found in the name of the fortified line which the war in Italy is now approaching. It was christened Gothenlinie, which should be translated, not Gothic Line, but Line of the Goths. To German ears the words are ominously symbolic. The Goths were a Germanic people who in the sixth century ruled in Italy for some eighty years. Finally they were overcome and annihilated—in a long, bitter campaign which also began with an invasion from Africa by way of Sicily. The few that survived, bearing with them the embalmed body of the last king, were driven into the Alps and probably perished there. This Germanic tragedy of death and annihilation was made the subject of a novel that several decades ago became by far the most popular ever published in Germany. Two generations of Germans, among them Marshal Kesselring, read and were fascinated by Felix Dahn's "Ein Kampf um Rom." Millions declaimed the closing poem glorifying the Goths' last march: "Gebt Raum, Ihr Völker, unserem Schritt, wir sind die letzten Gothen!" To German ears there is a sharp suggestion of disaster in the name "Line of the Goths."

The basic hopelessness of the situation has, in the words of one reporter, "become obvious to four-fifths of the Germans." The government, which wants to continue the struggle, must therefore be seeking arguments to prove that in spite of all appearances the people should keep up hope. If one examines the latest Goebbels propaganda, however, one notes that it is almost devoid of statements that would give rise to expectations of a change for the better. After the collapse of faith in the "V-I" it spoke of still more powerful future weapons. It said that if the enemy is stronger in numbers and arms, the Germans are superior in moral force and resolution. But that sort of thing is no longer impressive. Nor is the sudden discovery that the Reich still possesses immense untapped reserves which can now be thrown into the scales. The Goebbels repertoire consists in the main of references to these reserves. The current slogan is: "Now the war must be totalized." An editorial in the Völkische Beobachter proclaimed on July 9:

> The nation is in danger. In this situation it can no longer be tolerated that German citizens should continue a way of life that does not correspond to the demands of the times. Germany's technical superiority must be restored by a new War Totalization Campaign.

The Svenska Dagbladet of July 10 declared:

> Germany is now flooded with so-called defense appeals designed to elicit a fresh national effort. . . . The catastrophe at Stalingrad was the signal for the first big campaign for a so-called "totalization" of the war effort. Now a second has begun. Goebbels opened it with a speech in eastern Germany, and in coming weeks his demands on the German people will be repeated and intensified. Press and radio will shriek: "Mobilize everything that is still left of mental and material reserves! This is our last chance to win the war."

But the campaign is only the repetition of an undertaking which was feverishly overdone and overpublicized before, and the first measures taken reveal how much less can be squeezed out now. It has been decreed, for example, that the street railways shall no longer simply carry people but shall be used in part to move goods within the cities. And shops selling bread may no longer order it where they like; to save transportation they must get it from the nearest baker. Who can expect such trifles to have a decisive effect on the war?

Even less confidence is aroused by the fierce drive to press boys of the class of 1928—those between fifteen and sixteen years old—into the army as volunteers. This drive was started in all provinces at the beginning of July. In the Rhineland the overture was a proclamation by the Gauleiter. From time immemorial, that official declared, it has been the right and privilege of German youth to fight for the fatherland. "Every Hitler youth in our province is a good fellow, and every good fellow in an hour like this will be eager to share in the honor of defending his homeland." This call for fifteen-year-old boys is the clearest possible revelation that there can be no further talk of untapped reserves.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Notes by the Way

JOHN DOS PASSOS has taken another look at U. S. A., and his findings are set down in "State of the Nation" (Houghton Mifflin, $3). For the duration at least the United States is once more the land of opportunity, and "Produce!" is its slogan. The depression of a decade ago has left its mark—more than once Mr. Dos Passos was told that men were afraid of working themselves out of a job. The post-war problems which will soon be upon us crop up occasionally. But, in general, managers and men on the farms as well as in the factories are enjoying the excitement of producing to the limit of their capacities. This excitement about production for production's sake, which Mr. Dos Passos communicates because he was himself caught up in it, seems to be a more potent motivation than simple patriotism and not less important than high wages.

One of the liveliest places in the United States, by Dos Passos's account, is the Northwest, the land of Grand Coulee, where the great dam and the cheap and seemingly endless power it generates have given the American dream a new lease of life. "Public power plus private initiative, that's our story." "I get that Klondike feeling," said Dos Passos's friend. "We're on the great circle route to China and the Orient. There's no reason why there shouldn't be an immense demand for our manufactured products. . . ." But only if there's a plan, and freedom from interference from "the big boys back East."

As one reads one almost forgets that the rationale of this vast manifestation of energy, initiative, and skill, of this new surge of the frontier spirit, is the most destructive war in history. Almost but not quite, for Mr. Dos Passos is aware of it, and it haunts his book. It becomes explicit in his chapters on Washington, where everyone agrees that the New Deal, which sponsored Grand Coulee and the TVA, has run its course, where the "big boys" and their representatives are all too powerful, where frustration is an occupational hazard. "Christ, it's the tar baby. . . . You try to give it a kick and your foot gets stuck and you try to give it a punch and your fist gets stuck and you try to back off and butt it with your head and your head gets stuck." Some people feel differently of course—it all depends on the agency you work for. In spite of inefficiency, waste, and obstruction, the miracle of American war production has been accomplished—and everyone agrees that it has been free of corruption. Money corruption that is. Today it's power that talks. But to quote another witness, "everything's done with the higherups. War belongs to the higherups. . . . Our productive potential was so great we found we could do without the people."

Mr. Dos Passos has done primarily a reporting job—and it is good reading in spite of those funny words of his and the slight monotony of his sensory style after its first freshness wears off. His own conclusions are contained in a brief Letter to a Friend in the Theaters which prefaces the book. It is mainly a statement of faith—a rather tired and negative faith which does not include specifications. Since we've held on to our liberties this long—and "what holds us together as a nation is our system of liberties"—we may continue to hold on to them, though admittedly "we haven't the leadership, the education, the theoretical background, or the political formula we need" to meet the test that will come with the end of the war.

It is easy enough to say that the formula we need is implicit in the "socialist planning"—public ownership plus private initiative of the creative not the predatory brand—which has been so successful in human as well as economic terms at Grand Coulee and TVA. That way, certainly, lies the possibility of a peace-time rationale which would allow for full production—of medical care as well as automobiles—and give scope to "that Klondike feeling." But only a romantic would condescend to Mr. Dos Passos's feeling that the odds are against it except as a long-term, "back-door" prospect. Private monopoly can still do, and do a great deal, without the people. The people are only on the edge of discovering that they can do without private monopoly.

MARGARET MARSHALL

Too Bad to Be True

VIA DIPLOMATIC POUCH. By Douglas Miller. With a Foreword by William L. Shirer. Didier. $3.

DOUGLAS MILLER, for fifteen years our commercial attaché in Berlin and author of the best-seller "You Can't Do Business with Hitler," which was published six months before Hitler's declaration of war against the United States, has assembled in this volume a number of his frequent reports to the State Department during the fateful years from 1931 to 1937. In spite of Shirer's effective foreword and the author's convincing preface—"ideas and impressions set down at the time are a better record than second guesses made long after the event"—I was afraid of finding nothing new in these reports. By their nature they were bound to have not only the advantages but also the disadvantages of an eyewitness account. But having once started to read the volume I was unable to put it down.

To read Mr. Miller's factual observations today is to learn about much more than the sad auspices under which American trade with Germany was carried on after Hitler became Chancellor, or the role of business in a totalitarian state of whatever color. The special value of these reports almost a decade after they were written consists in the accurate inside story they tell of Hitler's methods of establishing his power over the German people and the minds and properties of many foreigners both inside and outside Germany. Mr. Miller is not one of those professional ideologists who always want the common people to make sacrifices for their lofty conceptions while they themselves prefer the permanent position of commentators with quickly shifting views.

He writes as a shrewd and trained observer of business conditions. From day to day he records the measures which the Nazi leaders took to establish and perpetuate their power, part of which they had received as a present from above against the will of the majority of the German people. His reports, though written with a different purpose in mind, show the mechanics of the camouflaged trap in which the German people were caught. They are to be recommended especially to those who showed little interest in what happened in Germany during the thirties but who have today strong opinions about how the German people should have behaved at the time—opinions based on a complete underestimation of the physical and psychological terror the modern state can wield.

Mr. Miller makes in his reports many prophecies which were ignored at the time but have all come true. In his preface he states that he underestimated the Nazi capacity for evil. He says, "Hitler seemed too bad to be true." No honest man can say today that he did not hold the same mistaken view at least for a time. The German people as a whole had that opinion until it was too late; the other European peoples continued to hold it for years, and so did the American people. It is good to be reminded of this fundamental fact in these days of Hitler's imminent fall, when the threat looms that the coming peace may be based on an emotional misconception of the German people—a misconception which is in many ways related to the earlier underestimation of Hitler, and would prove equally disastrous.

FRANZ HOELLERING

The Liberal Party
ANNOUNCES A DINNER-FORUM
ON
Liberals and Labor in Postwar America
SPEAKERS
MRS. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT
LEON HENDERSON • DAVID DUBINSKY
DR. JOHN L. CHILDS
CHAIRMAN
DR. GEORGE S. COUNTS
Wednesday, August Second • Seven O'Clock
GRAND BALLROOM HOTEL COMMODORE
Lexington Avenue and Forty-second Street
INFORMAL • TICKETS $4.00 PER PERSON
Send Reservations and Check to:
MR. HARRY UVILLER, Treasurer
THE LIBERAL PARTY
[illegible] West 44th Street, New York 18 • Tel. LOngacre 5-0500

History, Psychology, and Culture

THE CONDITION OF MAN. By Lewis Mumford. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

IT IS an old saw that every age has to rewrite history. And the history written today, to be convincing, must bear the imprint of current values and include points of view drawn from other disciplines.

All the significant attempts of our time to recapitulate and evaluate the past employ the culture concept: they view history, that is, as a series of cultures and recognize that the manifestations of a given epoch are not discrete and disconnected but integrally related. All of them make more or less use of the new methodological tools which have been developed since the turn of the century. These have been drawn largely from biology, especially the theory of evolution; from social theory, especially Marxism; from anthropology, which invented the culture concept and taught Western man that there are successful patterns of living other than his own; and last but not least from modern psychodynamics, which has completely revised our conception of personality and character and their social relevancy.

Spengler, Pareto, and Toynbee, to mention only a few modern scholars, have used the culture concept and, in varying degree, the new methodological tools. Where they differ is in the selection of data, the interpretation of the correlations established, and the theoretical basis of these correlations. None has escaped the temptation to become a pleader for some special cause or, more crassly, to make history an instrument of propaganda—though this is much less true of Toynbee than of the others. All of them, working without benefit of psychodynamics, have taken wide privileges with the data. Spengler harnessed the culture concept to a vitalistic view of nations and saw in the rise and fall of cultures a replica of the life cycle of the individual; and his book became the basis for a "devil take the hindmost" conception of human relations. Pareto's extravagances are of another kind, which need not be discussed. He did see a significant relation between "residues" and "derivations." But this important correlation is lost through the failure to develop a technique for handling it, and mountains of obscurantist blather are the result.

Mr. Mumford's book belongs in the category of significant attempts to examine the history of Western society. He has had much experience in evaluating the role of technics in civilization and the culture of cities. He is skilled in demonstrating the links between the various phenomena of a given movement or epoch, but he is not convincing in describing transitions and cultural changes because he has no frame of reference, no operating principles, not even a plan. He does have strong emotional attitudes; and in place of empirically verifiable deductions we have a long series of very personal appraisals and value judgments. At the end of the book he is quite winded, with little to offer in the way of constructive suggestions except a few feeble exhortations for a change in "values," for stronger personality formation, and the like. He knows that psychodynamics has a contribution to make to the understanding of the cultural process, but all we find of this discipline is the uncritical use of a few psychoanalytic shibboleths.

The work really begins with the discussion of Christianity. And here the author's lack of a method shows itself most clearly. There is no definition of the role of fantasy and religion in human adaptation and no effort to track down the sources of religious ideology. There is no definition of the effective ideas in Christianity, and the author makes no systematic effort to reconcile these ideas with the life situations then prevailing. The result is a purely literary account of Christianity. We are not told why the doctrine originated or why it "took"—presumably, according to Mumford, it caught on because it had intrinsically beautiful or moral ideas.

Having missed many of the essentials concerning the origin of Christianity, Mr. Mumford fares no better with the church. We are told that somehow suffering was stressed by the church. This was a kind of doctrinal error, according to Mumford, since Christianity was strong and beautiful. Or this emphasis on suffering was due to the fact that "those who had no health in them" indorsed this aspect of the new religion. It is no more enlightening to be told that Christianity "gave to suffering a noble role in life." This exaltation of the role of suffering was no arbitrary fiat of the church, no incidental epiphenomenon; it was intimately related to the renunciation of pleasure pursuits. In terms of psychodynamics the equation can be stated thus: "You suffer because you have sinned, but you can be reinstated in the good graces of God if you renounce all pleasure pursuits. This causes more suffering, but by this suffering you can move God to reinstate you." These ideas were all contained in the basic disciplines of the ancient Hebrews and have ever been a daily experience to the growing child. But Mr. Mumford does not tell us why the church was inimical to the pleasure drives; much later he does speak of the upsurges of the "libido," which have a way of recurring again and again.

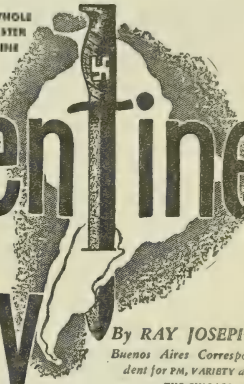
Mr. Mumford's treatment of Christianity and the church is typical. He makes significant correlations but also omits pertinent data. Christian doctrine, its emergence from Judaism, the new values it legitimized, the reason for its widespread appeal, its internal structure—these are all consistent and simple. But neither this development nor any of the succeeding and more complicated cultural changes can be explained without a more systematic knowledge of the human being, the creature and creator of culture. Value judgments, in lieu of this knowledge, are confusing.

In his appraisal of the medieval synthesis Mr. Mumford recognizes that a serious incompatibility was created by the fact that "one aspect of the conceptual world remained fixed, whereas the expanding practical world challenged the integrity of the old synthesis, which could no longer provide a rational basis for action." Had he expanded this thesis, he would have been on safe ground. But Mumford has to bring in the motif of "love breaking its bounds." We are told that "the people of the Middle Ages overcame the tendency toward metaphysical dualism even in sexual relations, and their practice was more ideal than their idealization." To the reviewer this sounds like pretentious nonsense. We gather that he owes this conclusion to an uncritical indorsement of a psychoanalytic survey of medieval society which concludes that "parents were able to live their lives on a genital level." (The reader is not told the implications of

JUST PUBLISHED

An uncensored report on the Fascist invasion of the Americas

THE ONLY BOOK TO TELL THE WHOLE FANTASTIC STORY OF THE SINISTER HAPPENINGS IN THE ARGENTINE



Argentine Diary

By RAY JOSEPHS
Buenos Aires Correspondent for PM, VARIETY and THE CHICAGO SUN

WALTER WINCHELL: "It's a corker!"

CHICAGO SUN: "A highly provocative report on the mess in Argentina . . . It is one hell of a powerful book, and history will prove that Josephs was right. It will also prove that this is one of the most important books written by an American since Pearl Harbor."—ALLAN CHASE, author of Falange.

N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE BOOK REVIEW: "The piled-up and packed down record of the Ramirez regime . . . by an astute reporter who knows his Argentina. By all odds the most significant document to come out of that beset land."

404 PAGES, INDEXED. $3.00

The voice of liberated Italy passes judgment on its oppressors

GERMANY & EUROPE

A Spiritual Dissension By BENEDETTO CROCE
Translated and with an Introduction by VINCENT SHEEAN

One of the greatest thinkers of modern times speaks his mind, without malice or prejudice, on the most controversial topic in the world today—the causes of the barriers that throughout history have separated Germany from the rest of Europe.

VINCENT SHEEAN: "This book is small but not slight; there are mighty things in it." $1.25

RANDOM HOUSE, NEW YORK

this statement—that it is an evaluation of culture by the criteria of Freud's libido theory; and that "genital" represents the most advanced stage of the growth process.) This uncritical indorsement gets the author into serious inconsistencies. He tells us that "Aquinas chose authority for purely pragmatic reasons; it simplified his task and guaranteed his orthodoxy"—that is, his security. He does not see that this attitude of submission to authority is incompatible with the idea of "genitality." Yet it is in the medieval epoch that Mr. Mumford sees the greatest synthesis, and he seems rather nostalgic about it.

In the breakdown of the medieval synthesis after the Black Death Mumford finds the church lined up with capitalism, and he considers Protestantism a fight against capitalists. Mr. Mumford's position here is unique, and it is one which he would never have taken but for the fateful analogy of the church as a bank in which virtue credits were stored and drawn upon.

In the Heart of
The Adirondacks
SCAROON MANOR
HOTEL on SCHROON LAKE, N.Y.
9 HOLE GOLF COURSE
ON PREMISES
9 Clay Tennis Courts
8 Handball
Courts

COMMON SENSE
August Issue

OUR LAST CHANCE IN CHINA
By Pearl S. Buck
A bold and searching presentation of a situation we must face if we are to avoid a THIRD WORLD WAR!

GANDHI-WAVELL Correspondence
Spring, 1944
Letters between Gandhi and his jailer (full text). Hitherto unpublished in this country. Introduction by Louis Fischer.

Also articles by H. N. Brailsford, Fritz Sternberg, Maurice Goldbloom, Louis Fischer. Departments by Milton Mayer and Stuart Chase. Book Reviews and editorial departments.

Common Sense
10 East 49th St., New York 17
For the enclosed $1 send six monthly issues of Common Sense beginning with the August issue.
Name ....
Street ....
City............... Zone.... State........
INTRODUCTORY SIX MONTH OFFER $1
N-8

Most of Mr. Mumford's difficulties arise from the fact that he has no working conception of the human personality. He does not think systematically about the two orders of mental phenomena—those found in religious systems and those in empirically derived rational systems; the two have different origins and functions in the personality and produce different social phenomena. He can formulate no accurate picture of how the personality is affected by basic cultural factors or of how man organizes his mental resources in the face of cultural change.

When he comes to our time, Mr. Mumford can do no more than bemoan the fact that the machine has conquered man instead of the reverse. Darwin, he tells us, merely "read back into nature the current struggle for economic success." He "sanctified the brutality of industrialism and gave fresh impulse to the imperialism that succeeded it." The final disintegration came with fascism.

What to do about all this? Mr. Mumford's recommendation that we change our values and organize our personalities to a better balance does not move us. How are we to do this? For the values he wants changed are the products of the entire life pattern and not the reverse. He merely offers us an invitation to lift ourselves by our psychological bootstraps.

And so Mr. Mumford's attempt remains a highly personal one, filled with inconsistencies and devoid of usable directives. But it is an earnest effort and instructive within its limits. It is disappointing only because it appears at a time when we demand of a study of culture that it increase our understanding of the present. For this end Mr. Mumford's technique is antiquated because it relies on authoritative pronouncements and not on empirically verifiable demonstration. Empiricism in the social sciences is the only protection society has against the vagaries of personal bias. But perhaps Mr. Mumford is not one of those who believe that the study of culture can be reduced to a science.

ABRAM KARDINER

Severn's Posthumous Life

AGAINST OBLIVION: THE LIFE OF JOSEPH SEVERN. By Sheila Birkenhead. The Macmillan Company. $3.

JOSEPH SEVERN established his claim to the interest of posterity when he went aboard the bark Maria Crowther in September of 1820, as a traveling companion and devoted attendant to John Keats, who died in Rome in February of '21. Severn survived him fifty-eight years, staying on in Italy till 1841, returning to England for another twenty years, and thereafter serving the British government as consul in Rome, where he retired in 1872 and died in 1879. Our homage to his memory has not been concerned with his, so to speak, posthumous life, those last fifty-eight years; given an opportunity to acquaint ourselves with it, we should be ungracious to refuse.

This opportunity is vouchsafed us in the present biography by Sheila Birkenhead, entitled after a phrase in Shelley's preface to "Adonais": "May the unextinguished Spirit of his illustrious friend animate the creations of his pencil and plead against oblivion for his name!" The gods may not have loved Severn, but for his goodness to Keats they rewarded him with a long life and a decently happy one. He enjoyed, in his youth, the patronage of the nobility; married a devoted and charming wife; was blessed with half a dozen children, who enjoyed music and each other's company, and inherited enough of Severn's talent so that one of them, his daughter Maria, was able to take up the economic slack when Severn's own work had ceased to be the vogue. He was fortunate, when commissions for his painting were no longer in demand, in securing a consular appointment in the Italy he loved, and he discharged the duties of his difficult position with dignity and charm. Beyond his modest talent for painting he had a great gift of courtesy. All the great and the near-great were his visitors: he knew Ruskin, Gladstone, Landseer, Liszt. He was no fool: he knew how much he was indebted to the unextinguished Spirit of his illustrious friend, not only for the outward visible show, but the inward spiritual grace. He occupied his years of retirement with the creative work of painting.

Lady Birkenhead writes of her grandfather-in-law in detail, and with affection. Her chapter on Lady Westmoreland testifies that she has a lively sense of character. She quotes liberally from the letters of Severn and from those of his daughter Maria, both of whom were better writers than Lady Birkenhead, who cultivates a literary medium in which clichés tend to teem. Her method, fictionized biography, or biographical fiction, whatever it is called, putting speeches directly in the mouth of the characters, telling how they felt, what they were looking at, and so on, is a little irritating to begin with, especially before the Maria Crowther voyage; after that, either one begins to take it for granted and not be bothered or her manner sobers and improves. Lady Birkenhead does not say what ever became of all Joseph Severn's pictures.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

The Smaller Wars

WINTER QUARTERS. By Pamela Hansford Johnson. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

THIS book has got off to a bad start. Even its publishers seem none too convinced of its worth. The tasteless dust jacket suggests a war-time suburban romance, with the emphasis on romance rather than on literature. But "Winter Quarters" is anything but romantic. The best that has been said of it in the reviews that I have read is that it is "neatly written." Another reviewer (a woman) says it "represents a victory for ancient tradition"—the tradition that "women have no conception of how men behave when they are being manly together."

I'm not sure exactly what "being manly" means; but as a man I maintain that Mrs. Johnson has not only attempted a task which most women novelists would fight shy of, but that she has succeeded remarkably well just where one would expect a woman writer to fail: she has portrayed the relationships between a group of Englishmen who never, under any circumstances but that of war, could have found themselves under the same roof. At the same time she points out how war reveals the importance of and the need for just such relationships.

In the AUGUST ISSUE of

THE PROTESTANT

Edited by KENNETH LESLIE

PATTERN FOR PROGRESS: TEHERAN

THE EDITOR

•

IT HAD TO COME THIS WAY!

By PIERRE VAN PAASSEN

HICKEY OVER CAMBRIDGE

The Story of a Town Dominated by the Christian Front

By BEN RICHARDSON

DE GAULLE AND BIG BUSINESS

By TABITHA PETRAN

Fifteen Articles on Cultural, Political, Economic and Religious Topics—Book Reviews

•

Subscribe to

THE PROTESTANT

The Magazine — which recognizes the truth as its only censor

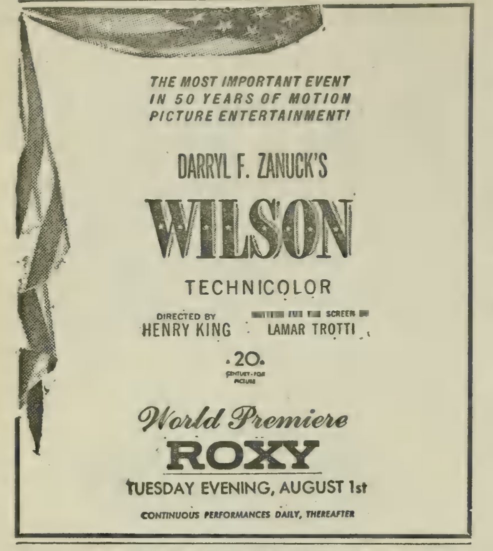
THE PROTESTANT
521 Fifth Avenue, New York 17, N. Y.

Enclosed is $3.00. Please send me the next 12 issues of THE PROTESTANT.

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

MOTION PICTURE



THE MOST IMPORTANT EVENT IN 50 YEARS OF MOTION PICTURE ENTERTAINMENT!

DARRYL F. ZANUCK'S

WILSON

TECHNICOLOR

DIRECTED BY HENRY KING · WRITTEN FOR THE SCREEN BY LAMAR TROTTI

20 CENTURY-FOX PICTURE

World Premiere

ROXY

TUESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 1st

CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES DAILY, THEREAFTER

STAGE PLAYS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (In association with Jack H. Skirball)

JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL

The FRANZ WERFEL - S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN

LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS

J. EDWARD BROMBERG

MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED Evenings at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30.

MICHAEL TODD presents

BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT

SONGS BY COLE PORTER

WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

AIR CONDITIONED

BLOOD DONORS NEEDED!

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

In time the novel lasts less than a week—one of the many weeks in which the Russians, defending Stalingrad, scream for a second front. With little to do but listen to these screams on the radio, a British artillery battery awaits orders in a village somewhere in England. From this village Mrs. Johnson has chosen so many civilians, from the battery so many officers and men, that for identification she has had to resort to a list of characters. This list is vital for the first fifty or sixty pages; from there on the names acquire faces, the faces voices, and the voices characters, some two dozen of whom have lost the identity of their civilian dress to the common khaki. From the boredom of waiting, most of them take refuge in the Golden Fleece, a local pub. Here life is seen in miniature. The Second World War is but an invisible background to the smaller but equally sordid wars that are waged wherever men and women are closeted together against their wills, to lead lives that are against their natures.

The Fleece is run by Sam Eagles and his attractive, ambivalent wife, Gillie, around whom the whole novel revolves, and to whom both officers and men, from mental inactivity and sexual loneliness, find themselves irresistibly drawn. It is on account of Gillie that one lieutenant assaults another, is threatened with court martial, and attempts suicide. It is through her that one hears what the men think of their officers, that one sees both as they really are, stripped of all pretensions. And it is she who offers the soldiers—some as remote from one another as foreigners separated by language—a common ground on which to bridge the ancient, deep-hewn gulfs of class and rank. Time and again the offer is accepted, but eventually each effort is doomed to failure. Rank, indeed, is shown by Mrs. Johnson as playing in war time just that part played by class in time of peace. As one officer says to himself of a gunner, "In civvy street we'd be friends. . . . Down here I can't have a drink with him without a Sir standing between us like a sword in the bed." As the wife of an officer, Mrs. Johnson might be expected to reveal her husband's world from an officer's point of view; but it is rare to find anyone, least of all a woman, writing objectively of all ranks of a regiment and making of each a recognizable human being.

What Mrs. Johnson seems to find most difficult is what most novelists find too easy: she has supplied none of her male characters with quite enough of the Old Adam. As a result, some hover on the brink of gentility, while others, who do show occasional glimpses of passionate feelings, even credible baseness and brutality, are hastily whipped back into behaving like the proverbial but not too credible English gentleman. It is highly commendable—and extremely difficult—to make men known by their virtues; but a large number of virtuous people in one English village does not sound like life—least of all army life.

JAMES STERN

In Early Issues of The Nation
"Speaking of Jane Austen"
By Sheila Kaye-Smith and G. B. Stern
Reviewed by Louis Kronenberger
"Germany and Europe," by Benedetto Croce
Reviewed by Franz Hoellering

FILMS

DAVID O. SELZNICK'S "Since You Went Away" is a movie about an American home in war time. It is clear that Mr. Selznick thinks of it as the American home and that the Hiltons, who live in it, are supposed to be the American family. I even suspect that Selznick, who is nothing if not ambitious, hoped to make a contemporary native equivalent to the home-front sections of "War and Peace." What he has managed, instead, is an immense improvement on a Ladies' Home Journal story so sticky I couldn't get through it, which has, as he finishes it, something of the charm of an updated and cellophaned "Little Women." "Since You Went Away" is not a good film, by any standards I care for, and I would not dare to recommend it to anyone who cares exclusively for good films. But I enjoyed it a good deal, even when I was most dissatisfied with it, and I was very much interested by it.

I always enjoy and am interested in Mr. Selznick's particular blend of serious talent with smart, safe showmanship; I am the more interested—if not more joyful—now that I suspect that his style will dominate Hollywood for the next ten years or so. What I might best do here is discuss this lively but aesthetically self-defeating, peculiar yet imitable style, which gives all but identical tone and character to such disparate films as "King Kong," "David Copperfield," "Gone with the Wind," and this new, relatively realistic film. But I am still more interested in its perfect if often fortuitous appropriateness to the subject of "Since You Went Away."

Somebody, some day, must do a "Tobacco Road" about the Hiltons, their habits and their home; they need it perhaps more than any other Americans. But until that or a still better day comes, I shall have as much respect as disrespect for Mr. Selznick's conception of them. He is not what I would call perceptive, for he is obviously, and I think disarmingly, in love with his subject. Since his subject is also in love with itself, this creative attitude has its points. So far as conscious intention and perception last, it means a fidelity to detail—of properties, costumes, voices, gestures—which the most detached of artists could not hope to improve on. When consciousness blurs into love, it means a fidelity to dream, easy enough to scorn unless you realize that the Hiltons and their kind live as much in a dream of themselves as in anything one would venture to call "reality."

Without irony, then, I accept as creatures partaking of the inevitability and superior realism of a dream Neil Hamilton as the all-American husband, Claudette Colbert as his all-American wife, Jennifer Jones as the all-American seventeen-year-old, "the new Shirley Temple"—strapped in like a child prodigy with broken ribs—as her thirteen-year-old sister, Hattie McDaniel as the ultimate colored cook, and so forth and so on, taking care not to omit the best piece of casting of all: Joseph Cotten as the forever rejected bachelor suitor who, clouding the screen with discreetly alarming threats of adulterous desire, forever comes back to Miss Colbert for more. It is thus too, in their wonderful blend of acute authenticity with authentic self-delusion, that I accept most of the things the Hiltons and their friends do, not to mention Mr. Selznick's masterpiece, the Hilton home—one of those pitiful suburban brick things which is indeed the American home if you agree with me that seven out of ten Americans would sell their souls for it.

It is hard to separate the conscious Hiltoniana from the semi-conscious and the unconscious. The handwritings of Mr. and Mrs. Hilton—as candid, efficient, soulless, and definitely proper to their class and country as the very best waterclosets—seem a typical and laudable piece of Selznick vigilance. The Hilton furniture, quite as properly, looks as little used and unlovable as it is, presumably, much used and loved, for such homes are incurably virginal; but I wonder whether Mr. Selznick intended this. Now and then, in the effort fully to cover the home front, Selznick does the sort of pelvis-cracking split you can only get away with in a dream—or in life so actual you can hardly make fiction of it. The Hilton cook, satisfying all that anyone could possibly desire of a Negro in these restive times, not only keeps strict union hours on the job she takes when Mrs. Hilton can no longer afford her; when she is done she hustles back to the Hiltons to get in her day's measure of malapropisms, comic relief, mother wit, and free labor. I also wonder how many Mrs. Hiltons really become welders.

Mr. Selznick's attitude toward the Hiltons deprives him—like them—of any very clear psychological understanding, beyond fairly rudimentary and gracefully glossed-over stuff; yet now and then this innocence achieves remarkable things on its own. Mrs. Hilton's "Don't ever grow up," a request tenderly made of the bachelor who has spent his best years enslaved to her, is worthy of "Sentimental Education"; but I have no feeling that it was recognized as piercing and sinister, or that any irony or pity was intended when, with equal authenticity, Nazimova identified Miss Colbert with the America which she, an old, poor, working-class immigrant, had always dreamed of. I thought it just as brilliantly correct, and as clear of conscious malice, that both Hilton children were girls.

Since it seems possible that wives and children in England, and in Russia, and in China, and even, conceivably, in Germany and in Japan, are missing their men and cherishing their homes very much as we are, I don't like to see these phenomena presented as the peculiar glory of one particular country and its one true cause and justification and aim of war. But that, like much of "Since You Went Away," is a law of dream life for which, I am afraid, neither Mr. Selznick nor anyone else can be blamed, and is so broad and deep that one's sense of reality can, at best, only hope to stay afloat in it.

JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

THE book to read on modern music is Constant Lambert's "Music Ho!" It is the only one in which we will find any relation to our experience—in which, that is, the music that is discussed will be recognizable as the music we have heard. And after Rosenfeld, Copland, and the others, Lambert's book will come as an enormous relief—the relief of knowing, after we had been all but persuaded otherwise, that two and two do make four, the sun does rise in the east, and modern music is as sterile and warped and stunted and horrid as it seems. Lambert describes the impasse at which music arrived, the ways in which composers attempted to escape it, the reasons why they failed; and while his entire train of thought cannot be recapitulated here I should like to give some of his individual observations.

We must bear in mind, he says, that the revolutionary music of our century was written before the last war, and that after the war there was a turning back not just to simplicity but to simplicities of the past, and to simplicities in different styles which were mingled in pastiche. "In music . . . melody, rhythm, harmony, and counterpoint . . . can

RESORTS

What you really want is Everything

—and "everything" that makes a dream vacation at Chesters' includes: FAST CLAY TENNIS COURTS • LARGE FILTERED POOL • PRIVATE LAKE • and many exciting etcetera's . . . Swell adult fun. Open-hearth Fires. Music Treasures. Dancing Instruction. Arts and Crafts. Entertainment Staff that really ENTERTAINS! . . . Food? Mmmmmmmm.

Accommodations from regular to DeLuxe. Attractive rates throughout the Summer. Easy to reach by train, bus, or door-to-door taxi service.

WOODBOURNE, N.Y. Tel. WOODBOURNE 1150

CHESTERS

A DELIGHTFUL HIDEAWAY IN THE MOUNTAINS

★ STAR LAKE CAMP ★

In the Glorious Adirondacks

Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Canoeing, Swimming, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals. Dietary Laws. Rates: $35.00 a week and $37.50 per person for couples.

Send for Booklet — New York Office

320 BROADWAY Room 1301 CO 7-2667

Sundays, Evenings, Holidays — FR 4-1390

45 Miles from New York City

Zindorest

★ Park Monroe N. Y.

Telephone 4421

A Resort for Adults Only

Exclusive location, 150 acres of unusual beauty. ALL SPORTS. Recorded concert music and many other activities for your pleasure. Last word in accommodations and hospitality.

DIXIE TERMINAL BUSES STOP AT OUR ENTRANCE ★

MAMANASCO LAKE LODGE

RIDGEFIELD, CONN. Phone 820

Summer beckons again to the most wonderful little resort for your vacation or for a week-end. Ultra modern accommodations. All outdoor activities; our own 1½ mile long lake. Varied indoor recreations. Informal, congenial surroundings. Famous cuisine. Only 50 miles from city via excellent transportation facilities. Moderate rates.

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N. Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.

OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

SHADYBROOK

MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 963

50 miles from N. Y. C. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Tennis, handball, etc.; golf, swimming, riding. Free MOVIES.

JULY and AUGUST — $40 Weekly; $7 per day

Write for Booklet N POPPER & SIMON

be so dissected from each other, that a composer with no sense of style and no creative urge can take medieval words, set them in the style of Bellini, add twentieth-century harmony, develop them in the sequential and formal manner of the eighteenth century, and finally score the whole thing for jazz band." And, just as the post-war room had Negro masks on Adam mantelpieces, and Victorian wool-pictures hanging next to Cubists; and just as Diaghilev's post-war ballets showed the same "amusing" scrambling of periods and styles in decor, music, and choreography; so Stravinsky, who before the war had written the score of "Sacre du printemps," after the war not only wrote music "like Bach" and "like Handel" but gave Diaghilev a score for "Pulcinella" that introduced jazz glissandos into the music of Pergolesi.

Stravinsky's series of reactions from one style to another Lambert attributes to his lack of any gift for melody; and he points to Tchaikovsky as illustration of his contention that for a great melodist there is no possibility of complete and arbitrary change of style, and indeed no problem of style at all, since his "melody is a living thing, a part of himself," and "carries with it the implications of its harmonic, rhythmic, and contrapuntal treatment." For his neo-classical music Stravinsky attempts to create melody synthetically—which cannot be done. He uses the sequences and cadences of classical melodies which "are the facade, not the whole building. . . . The turns of phrase that occur at the end of a melody with much the same conventional beauty and constructional logic as a Corinthian capitol occurring at the top of a column are taken by Stravinsky, isolated from their surroundings, and plastered over the facade with a complete disregard of their true function." Then there are the figures which, in an eighteenth-century Allegro, are merely the harmonies broken up and spaced out into texture: "to use them as Stravinsky does (in his Piano Concerto) as melodic material over a totally different harmonic base is a complete misunderstanding of their value and function." And "to the melodic formulas drawn from Bach . . . are added, in later works, fragments from Beethoven, Bellini, Chopin, Tchaikovsky, and even Johann Strauss—who enters with ludicrous effect into Jocasta's air at the beginning of the second act of 'Oedipus Rex'—while to synthetic calm succeeds synthetic drama, and to synthetic austerity synthetic charm."

Stravinsky, with his absorption in purely sonorous schemes, is one of the people Lambert must have in mind who, he says, consider the greatest music "an abstract succession of tastefully arranged notes" and find such abstraction in the classicism of Mozart and other eighteenth-century music. The examples of it that Mozart provides, says Lambert, are not "romantic and subjective masterpieces like [the] G minor Quintet and G. minor Symphony," but "the many divertimenti that he cynically turned out in order to pay for the rent and a little champagne. . . . The only classical music that is abstract is bad classical music."

He deals as effectively with Hindemith, who, as the advocate of Gebrauchsmusik or utility music written not for the composer's satisfaction but for the consumer's demand, sets up, in opposition to art for art's sake, the doctrine of craft for craft's sake. A man without what it takes to write literature can write advertising copy; there can, then, be utility writing. But "music is only useful if it is good music, whether light or serious"—if, that is, "it provides one with some vital experience." Furthermore, "Hindemith appears to imagine that by ceasing to write for his own satisfaction he is necessarily writing for the satisfaction of others"; but "if a composer is not interested in his own music he can hardly expect others to be." And "by resolutely turning his back on 'art' Hindemith has lessened our interest even in his craft." For we are interested in counterpoint when it is expressive, not when it is purely arbitrary; nor are we interested in form that is an equally arbitrary formalism. "A musical idea of any vitality determines . . . its own formal treatment. . . . But a composer like Hindemith appears, on his own admission, to have nothing personal to say. . . . His musical ideas are consequently lacking in generative power"; but "to give them an air of logic he casts them into some pre-established and externally imposed form."

Lambert's book includes a modest portion of nonsense—mostly about Sibelius. But we must remember that it was written at a time when Sibelius was causing even good critics to lose their heads in an astounding way. And we can understand now how after a diet of Stravinsky neo-classicism and Hindemith Gebrauchsmusik something as fluent and colorful and agreeable to the ear and moderately enjoyable to the mind as Sibelius might go to their heads.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

The Time Is Ripe

Dear Sirs: Have just finished reading Sergeant William J. Caldwell's letter in The Nation of July 8 to Mrs. Clairvoyant Luce. It was nicely expressed, and I congratulate you for printing it.

It appears the time is rotten ripe for the discontinuance of exploitation of war dead by venal politicians, regardless of party affiliations. For years these same politicians shed crocodile tears for widows and children, but that has become threadbare. If Sergeant Caldwell is a Republican, obviously he belongs to the more human type, who regrettably sank into oblivion years ago, giving place to the now dastardly type of individual who is punch proud to call himself or herself a Republican or conservative.

The Nation has been coming to my home for fourteen years, and has given great pleasure and education. I am not a yearly subscriber mainly because when I started to read The Nation my order was placed through the American news agency and delivered to the nearest news shop.

I did intend mailing you a check after reading the first few copies, then discovered others were becoming interested, reading my copy before I picked it up.

Time passed. I changed news shops hoping the same thing would happen. It did. I notice now other news shops carry The Nation. P. D. ROBINSON

Hamilton, Ont., July 16

Frozen

Dear Sirs: Ever since the United States entered the war, the newspapers and army and navy officials have been clamoring for a labor draft. A few days ago, after Paul V. McNutt issued his directive freezing workers in certain industries doubly hard, it was my experience to be laid off for lack of work in the electronic industry. McNutt had expressly stated that no workers were to leave their jobs in the electronic industry, and yet because my former employer refuses to take work, I am unemployed, freeze or no freeze.

This manufacturer of electronic equipment has the machinery and the skilled employees to do electronic work, but he refuses to take any further contracts. His machinery stands idle. The worker is frozen to his job, and the manufacturer, ironically enough, doesn't have to face the same penalties and compulsions that the workingman faces since, for some strange reason, "property rights" give him a magic immunity to the law.

I have made extensive inquiries as to whether an essential worker can be laid off when he's frozen, and much to my disgust I find I have no legal protection against "property rights."

ALEXANDER MAN

Hollis, N. Y., June 9

Queer Notion

Dear Sirs: You may be interested at this particular time in this comment which I ran across the other day in a letter from James Russell Lowell to Godkin—written in 1871: "Say something on the queer notion of the Republican Party that they can get along without their brains. 'Time was that when the brains were out, the man would die,' but nous avons changé tout cela."

Certainly the Republican platform was brainless, or dishonest, or both. You are doing a swell job in this pre-election summer; in fact, you are doing it all the time. JANET B. FINE

Woodstock, Vermont, July 16

Soldiers and Votes

Dear Sirs: Although it is true that what happened to Pvt. Joe Polachek and his vote is not rare—I am referring to the account in your letter columns of June 10—it would be unfortunate if the impression were given that the same conditions prevail in all outfits.

In our company a lieutenant was assigned the task of helping us with all details, giving us the broader picture in an hour's lecture, after which our C. O. talked to us, urging all those privileged to vote to do so. PRIVATE

Somewhere in Indiana, June 17

Great Job

Dear Sirs: This is just a word of congratulation on the great job you are doing in presenting the issues involved in the Presidential campaign.

Your clear-cut analyses and discussions give new hope to those of us who had become discouraged by the caliber of political intelligence shown recently in Chicago.

The Nation is the one bright spot in the week's reading, and I carefully clip most of the articles to send on to my husband overseas, where they get a wide reading.

Wishing you every success in your task of putting out a forceful and intelligent journal. ELEANOR C. CRARY

Pittsford, N. Y., July 12

Correction

Dear Sirs: A correction is in order for your cross-word puzzle No. 71 in the issue of July 8. The quotation in 8 down is from "Christabel," lines 179-180 (also by Coleridge), and not from "The Ancient Mariner."

JOHN GILLIS, R. C. A. F.

Bowden, Alberta, July 13

CONTRIBUTORS

ANNA LOUISE STRONG, after a career of social work and journalism in America, went to Russia in 1921, and since then has spent most of her time in that country. In 1930 she organized the Moscow Daily News, the first English-language newspaper in Russia.

LOUIS FISCHER, a close student of India's problems, lived in Gandhi's house as a guest for a week in 1942. Among his books are "A Week with Gandhi" and "Empire."

ALAN BARTH is an editorial writer for the Washington Post who has made an intensive study of television.

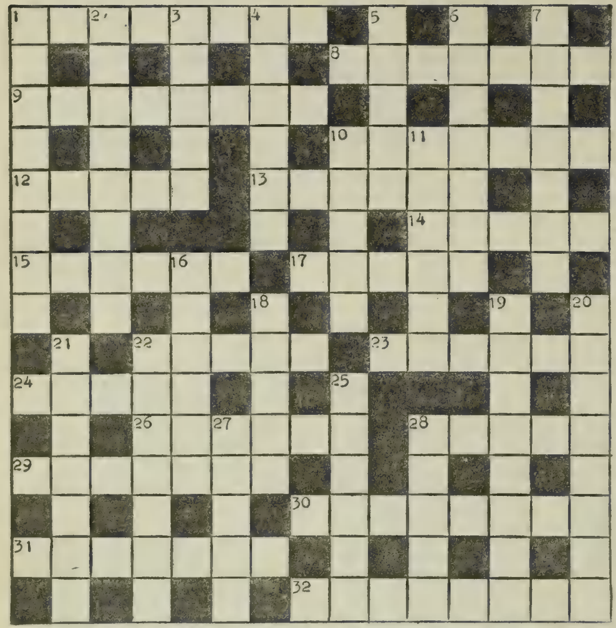
WALTER MEHRING, German poet and novelist, was for many years on the staff of Die Weltbuehne, a liberal magazine published by the Nobel peace-prize winner Carl von Ossietzky.

ABRAM KARDINER is the author of "The Individual and His Society."

FRANZ HOELLERING, a native of Vienna, was for many years editor of the Berliner Zeitung and the Arbeiter Illustrierte Zeitung. His novel, "The Defenders," deal with the collapse of democracy in Austria. A second novel, "Furlough," will be published shortly.

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 74

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 His discovery of vulcanized rubber didn't put him on his feet, but it put his product on the feet of millions of others
8 Lochiel is the title of the head of this clan
9 One of several, in a Mark Twain book, who saw Europe without any illusions
10 Lay
12 Met me in disorder
13 See it and die, runs the tag
14 This animal comes in later
15 He interposed to save Susannah, in the biblical story
17 Cook, with or without the R
22 What you should drink with curry
23 Italian city "throned on a hundred isles"
24 Reserved for ladies in the East
26 Charge
28 A dealer in magic and spells (The Sorcerer)
29 Europe's longest railroad tunnel
30 He can make a lad ride, this former French premier 31 Every gardener would like to grow this 32 Angered

DOWN

1 The patient one—immortalized by Chaucer, Boccaccio and Petrarch
2 Adorn with a name in the center
3 Its sheets have not come apart when it requires tacking
4 Sort of sunshade, usually striped
5 Desert ship
6 Reading of the New World, Sarah?
7 Just the hair preparations for Pa's dome!
10 Slice up fruit and give quarter, or else do without
11 The color that makes the little engineer get up
16 An eel has swallowed a man the wrong way round!
18 Just another nut
19 Wodehouse said that those in mystery stories might be divided into three classes—all silly
20 Made sure as to size
21 Used to swear by mine
22 "Let not women's -------, waterdrops, Stain my man's cheeks!" (King Lear)
25 Elderly French marshal in a pet
27 Juliet's lover
28 It isn't an ape or a cow or a camel, but the name of a certain cetaceous mammal

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 73

ACROSS:—1 BREAK THE ICE; 9 GONG; 10 SERVE; 11 EWES; 12 PLATEAU; 13 SHALLOW; 15 IMPORTANT; 16 TRIVET; 18 CASSIO; 21 NEW YEAR'S; 24 AMENDED; 26 STRASSE; 28 ANON; 29 ARENA; 30 DAIS; 31 UNDERTAKERS.

DOWN:—2 RIGHTEOUS; 3 ASSUAGE; 4 TORN; 5 EYESHOT; 6 CREEL; 7 MOSLEM; 8 BEGONE; 14 STING; 17 ICELANDER; 19 AIMING; 20 OVERAGE; 22 WET PACK; 23 RUSSIA; 25 NINON; 27 BELT.

RESORTS

"Fore" the Golfer
Newly Conditioned Course
A Grand "Pro"
New Clubhouse
. . . await your pleasure

. . . 28 miles of beautiful private trails. . . . Also—excellent tennis, boating and fishing on our private 7½ mile lake, golf; game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food . . . congenial atmosphere. Only 51 Miles from New York

The Glenmere

CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RE. 2-5047

400 Acres—2,500 ft. elevation
MOUNTAIN LAKE FARMS
UNION GROVE, DELAWARE CO., N. Y.

Unusually beautiful location with two large lakes on the premises for swimming and boating. Off the beaten path. Miles of wooded mountain trails.

All sports: fast clay tennis courts, regulation ping pong tables, handball, hunting and fishing. Old-fashioned country square dances.

Grand meals—not strictly Kosher. No social staff.

Rates $35.00 and up

Wire or phone Livingston Manor 182-J-2
Write Jack Keiser, Union Grove, N. Y.
Take train or bus to
Livingston Manor, New York

STEP into the SUN at FOREST HOUSE
Short Journey
Long Memories
All the Elements
for complete vacationing. Inspiring location (2 lakes), cordial hospitality, finest food and accommodations. All sports of the Season.
Mahopac 686
50 MILES from N.Y.C.
FOREST HOUSE
Lake Mahopac, New York

Intimate Different
Delightful
OAKWOOD
NEW WINDSOR, NEW YORK
Tel.: Newburgh 4477. Only [illegible] miles from N.Y.C.
Enjoy the charm of this Colonial Estate. Spacious grounds. Private Lake. Boating. Swimming. All sports. Unexcelled food. Limited accommodations.

ROMAINE VILLA, Monsey, N. Y. Meals for better health. Ideal for rest and convalescing. Limited accommodations. Spring Valley 525.

GRANITE LAKE CABINS—With private baths; Simmons beds. Water sports, excellent home cooking. Adults only, $60 a week double. Box 77, Munsonville, New Hampshire.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 5, 1944 NUMBER 6

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 141

EDITORIALS

The Polish Rivals 144
Parties in Flux by Freda Kirchwey 145

ARTICLES

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 146
What Bretton Woods Did by I. F. Stone 147
Argentine Showdown? by Ray Josephs 148
75 Years Ago in The Nation 150
Stalingrad Tomorrow by Anna Louise Strong 151
The Putsch That Failed by Alfred Vagts 152
In the Wind 154

POLITICAL WAR

Bulgaria on the Spot by Bogdan Raditsa 155
Behind the Enemy Line, by Argus 156

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Lytton Strachey by Louis Kronenberger 158
India Is Still There by T. A. Bisson 159
Invitation to Learning by Eric F. Goldman 160
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 161
The Pagan State by Mildred Adams 162
History As It Should Be by Maxwell Stewart 164
Films by James Agee 165
Records by B. H. Haggin 165
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 167
CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 75 by Jack Barrett 168

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Editor Political War Section J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON · MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON
Director of Nation Associates LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

GOEBBELS CELEBRATED HIS APPOINTMENT as Reich Plenipotentiary for Total War Effort by treating the German people to a blasphemous, one-man soap opera built around the theme of Hitler's "miraculous" escape from death. That escape, he told them, could only be ascribed to the special intervention of Providence, which "had taken the Führer under its gracious protection." It was, he assured them, a sign from Heaven that, after passing through its present Hell, Germany would emerge victorious. In presenting his version of the "plot," Goebbels made full use of his histrionic talents. Having awed his audience with an apocalyptic vision of the unspeakable consequences had the conspiracy succeeded, he sketched with vivid strokes the story of the bomb explosion, the attempted seizure of the Berlin headquarters building, foiled by a faithful Guard Battalion, and the arrest, drum-head court-martial, and execution of the plotters. The proportion of fact to fiction in this radio drama is not immediately important. What is relevant is the extent to which its narrator was able to steel his listeners for the new tasks he set before them. He proclaimed total mobilization—although that has been proclaimed before in Germany—indicated that the remaining young men in the factories would be drafted into the army, and announced a new program of economic slimming.

*

WILL THIS HARANGUE MOVE THE GERMANS to the kind of last-ditch effort with which the people of Leningrad beat off their besiegers? That is extremely doubtful. On the other hand, there is no evidence of popular support for the conspiring generals and their program for ending the war. The revolt—in so far as there was a revolt—seems to have been confined to the higher ranks of the military hierarchy and to have had little or no support among the junior officers and men. Its failure has made possible a still greater Nazification of the army, indicated by Himmler's appointment to the supreme command of the Home Forces, the introduction of the Nazi salute, and the promotion of leading SS officers. But while the purge of the army has probably been extensive, the Nazis can hardly afford to root out all the "blue-bloods" likely to become infected with defeatism. And Himmler, who at first seemed destined for total power, has emerged from the turmoil merely as one of a triumvirate of which the other members are Göring and Goebbels. As these three are notoriously uncongenial comrades, it is questionable how far this move will promote unity. More likely than not, a good deal of their energies will be devoted to intrigues against each other. What is even more questionable is the ability of the reorganized command to stop the rot on the Eastern front.

*

THE RUSSIAN COMMAND HAS BRILLIANTLY exploited gross errors in German strategy—errors which stem directly from Hitler's determination never to retire voluntarily from any conquered territory. The military folly of this essentially political policy is perfectly illustrated in the case of the Baltic states. Had General Lindemann's army of some 300,000 men been withdrawn promptly from Esthonia and Latvia when the Russians first broke through in the center, the Germans might have been able to organize a defense line masking Warsaw and East Prussia. But Hitler's orders were to hold the Baltic states at all costs with the apparent objective of keeping Finland in the war and preventing a peace stampede by the other satellites. The result has been the smashing of the thinly spread German lines in Poland while Lindemann is about to be trapped against the Baltic coast. German commentators now talk about straightening the line but the opportunity has vanished.

*

SECRETARY HULL'S REBUKE TO ARGENTINA for continued pro-Axis activities was an admirably timed and devastating indictment of the Farrell regime. If documentation and logic could be relied upon to swerve the mad policies of the present Argentine government, Mr. Hull might be said to have done his complete duty. But as Ray Josephs points out in an article appearing elsewhere in this issue, this is not the first time that the State Department has delivered a stinging rebuke to Argentina. The Farrell government, like the Axis regimes in Germany, Italy, Japan, and Spain, has shown itself to be contemptuous of moral or legal considerations. Like the others, it was born in violence and is susceptible only to force. The totalitarian mentality of its leaders was underscored by the obviously staged character of the "mass" demonstration held to acclaim Foreign Minister Peluffo and President Farrell for their stand in defense of Argentine "sovereignty." News reports indicate that the demonstrators consisted largely of municipal and government employees, school children accompanied by their teachers, and members of government-controlled labor unions. The great majority of the Argentine people are understandably silent, but reports from Montevideo tell of a secret manifesto prepared by the university students attacking the Farrell regime. The chief support of the regime, apart from the army, appears to be among the businessmen and plantation owners who have profited from Argentina's immense wartime trade with the United Nations. Suspension of that trade would in all probability eliminate this support and bring a quick end to a regime that has disgraced Argentina in the eyes of the world.

*

CANADA HOLDS TWO IMPORTANT ELECTIONS on August 8. In Quebec, Premier Godbout's Liberal administration faces the mixed opposition of the nationalistic and reactionary Union Nationale led by Maurice Duplessis, the Bloc Populaire with its strong anti-war emphasis, and the C. C. F., a comparative newcomer to Quebec provincial politics. Godbout's record has been fairly good; his government has improved educational standards, extended the franchise to women, and socialized electric power by establishing the Quebec Hydro. His hope of survival in a province where nationalistic and reactionary currents are running high lies in the likelihood that his opponents on the right will kill each other off. The C. C. F.'s progress has so far been slow in Quebec and it has a fighting chance to win in only a few industrial seats. A defeat for Godbout would be a serious blow to Mr. King's Liberal government, since Quebec is the last remaining provincial stronghold of his party. In Alberta the Social Credit government comes up for its third-term test. Its strength has waned, particularly since Premier Aberhart's death, but its record for honest administration—apart from its failure to fulfil its utopian monetary promises—has been good. Opposing it are two main groups: a coalition of Liberals and Progressive-Conservatives and the C. C. F. It is the latter group, under the leadership of Elmer Roper, present member for Edmonton, which is calculated to provide the real challenge. The sweeping victory of the C. C. F. in Saskatchewan, where it now constitutes the government, has undoubtedly added to its power in the neighboring prairie province, which faces similar economic and social problems. A decisive gain for the C. C. F. in Alberta would increase its steadily rising national prestige and raise its hopes for the federal election, which cannot be long delayed.

*

CHUNGKING HAS REVEALED THAT AS EARLY as last May a preliminary agreement between the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communists was signed at Sian. Negotiations for a final agreement have apparently been held up by differences over twelve specific proposals submitted by the Communists as a minimum basis for promoting military and political cooperation. But the Chinese Minister of Information, Liang Han-chao, has predicted at least a "partial solution" of these problems in the not too distant future. Responsible observers who have recently come from China stress the difficulties the Chinese face in seeking a long-range political settlement in the absence of concrete post-war policies on the part of the United States and Great Britain. As allies in the common struggle against Japan, the two Anglo-Saxon powers are naturally anxious to see unity restored in China. Presumably they have said as much to Chungking. But there is no indication that they have fortified their advocacy of unity by offering a practical program of economic assistance which would aid China in breaking the archaic bonds of landlordism. Weakened by seven years of almost single-handed resistance, tortured by a spiraling inflation, and torn by internal political struggles, China stands in desperate need of military, financial, and political help from this country.

* * *

DISREGARDING MR. WILLKIE'S WARNINGS and its Federalist traditions, the Republican Party built a quantity of dead states' rights timber into its Chicago platform. No less recklessly Mr. Dewey, anxious to marshal in his campaign the forces of the twenty-six states with G. O. P. administrations, is planning to place a heavy political weight on these same dubious planks. At the Republican Governors' conference which opens at St. Louis on August 2, the conflict between federal, state, and local governments is to be dramatized. This, says Governor Dewey, "has been a constant source of friction for twelve years in this country." (How conveniently short Republican memories are!) But he promises us that perfect harmony will reign once more after January 20, 1945, if the Governors' conference is successful in reaching an agreement on this problem. A glance at the fifteen-point agenda announced by Mr. Dewey is enough to show how big an "if" this is. It includes labor, employment services and unemployment insurance, public works and highways, water and flood control, and agriculture. These are all matters on which policies must be laid down centrally rather than locally if we are to avoid Balkanization of the country. And we do not believe that, even in the interest of Republican unity, the governors will be able to agree on clear lines of demarcation between state and federal jurisdictions. Take the question of aviation, omitted in the agenda. This seems a natural for federal regulation but a number of states are agitating strongly at this moment against proposals which would make all planes serving as common carriers subject to the rules of the Civil Aeronautics Board. An even more serious omission is the absence of any reference to the growing tendency of states to erect "tariff barriers" against each other and to encroach on the federal government's clear jurisdiction over inter-state commerce.

* * *

WE RETURN TO THE SOLDIERS' VOTE ISSUE not because we are fanatics on the subject but because we feel it is a basic issue of democracy that now probably will have to be settled at the polls. Americans do not like to be disfranchised, particularly if the reason for their disfranchisement is being overseas in the service of their country. New Yorkers, suffering under a clumsy state law that will prevent most of the armed services from voting and absolutely debar all of the merchant seamen and Red Cross and civilian war agency workers who are overseas, feel particualrly strongly on this subject. But the issue is national, since the chief obstacle in the way of liberalizing the New York act is Governor Dewey, candidate for President. A recent meeting of the New York War Ballot Commission decided by a split vote against making federal ballots available to those servicemen who failed to secure state ballots and allowing merchant seamen to come under the state voting law. Ironically, this action took place on the very day an advertising firm with Mr. Dewey's permission attempted to distribute to New York radio stations a "canned" message from the Governor explaining how simple it was for New York soldiers to vote. So far only one station has accepted. The most outrageous effect of the law is the complete disfranchisement of those New York merchant seamen who on November 6 happen to be busy carrying supplies to one of our battle fronts. They are banned from receiving federal ballots available to seamen in many other states and they don't qualify to receive state ballots.

* * *

TO THE CONSTERNATION OF ANTI-NEW DEAL forces, the Deep South continues to evidence signs of political regeneration. Following the lead of Florida and Alabama, the voters of Texas, South Carolina, and Arkansas last week cast aside several of their most reactionary or inept representatives. While Texas returned most of its present Congressional delegation—with the exception of the self-removed Martin Dies—it distinguished itself by defeating Representative Kleberg, a wealthy rancher, who was a leader in the campaign to scuttle the Administration's anti-inflation program. In South Carolina, "Cotton Ed" Smith, notable as a champion of "white supremacy" and as an opponent of the President's policies, was decisively beaten by Governor Olin D. Johnston. Although Governor Johnston tried to give the impression that he was as strong for "white supremacy" as his opponent, he campaigned as a supporter of President Roosevelt, and his victory should end the Old Guard's effort to steal South Carolina's electoral vote from the Roosevelt column in November. Equally encouraging was Representative Fulbright's success in running first in a field of five in the Arkansas Senatorial contest. Although Fulbright faces a run-off election against Governor Adkins, his margin over the other four candidates was so large as to make his election practically certain. On foreign policy the 39-year-old Fulbright's record is extraordinarily good. His record on domestic policy is much less impressive, but he should prove a valuable member of the Senate.

NATION READERS HAVE A RIGHT TO EXPECT complete coverage of week-by-week developments in the political campaign. The Nation has made a special arrangement with the Bureau of Applied Social Research, Columbia University, to provide a weekly column of political and propaganda analysis from now until the November elections. The column will analyze the significance of public opinion polls—national, regional, and local. It will study propaganda methods used by both the major parties and by such groups as the CIO–PAC. It will appraise the trend of election sentiment in important sections of the electorate—the Negro community, national and cultural minorities, women voters. The series will begin next week with a discussion of "How to Read a Poll."

The Polish Rivals

SWEEPING across the Polish plains toward Warsaw, the Red Army is freeing Poland from the Nazi yoke. But its successes have raised in an acute form the problem of the political future of Poland, which, if not solved, may well add to the tribulations of that unhappy country the horrors of civil war. Soon after it crossed the Curzon Line, the Soviet government gave recognition to the Polish Committee of National Liberation and, professing unwillingness to set up a Russian military government, placed in its hands the civil administration of the freed territories. The Committee is an off-shoot of the pro-Soviet Polish National Council, an underground group which does not adhere to the government-in-exile seated in London.

The formation of what is in effect a rival government has, not surprisingly, been hotly denounced by the London regime. Actually, neither the government-in-exile nor the new committee has a clear title to represent the Polish people. The former bases its claim on the 1935 constitution—a dubious instrument foisted on Poland by Pilsudski and never properly ratified. Before the war this constitution was regarded as illegal by all the democratic parties and was attacked by Premier Mikolajczyk, whose authority is now derived from it. A more practical buttress for the government's pretensions, perhaps, is the fact that ever since the fall of Poland its legitimacy has been recognized by Britain and America, and this recognition was confirmed last week by Mr. Eden and Mr. Hull. Against this must be set the support of its rival by the Russians, on whom the burden of liberating Poland is falling. The Committee, moreover, thanks to this support, is "the man in possession"—always a strategic position legally. In addition, it is backed by a Polish army which is actually taking part in the freeing of Poland. The presence of such a force, marching under the Polish flag, must inevitably attract popular support.

In the long run, only a free choice by the people of Poland can decide the future form and personnel of a truly legitimate Polish government. Both present claimants assert that they have the people behind them, but that question can only be settled when a free election is possible. Any attempt to hold such an election while Russian troops are in the country would be suspect by the rest of the world, for, in the past, popular plebiscites under Soviet auspices have not followed acceptable democratic methods. Nor, for that matter, were Polish elections prior to the war free from the taint of dictatorship. Hence, when the time comes for the Poles to take a vote, impartial supervision will be essential to ensure not merely a genuinely free choice but a choice which world opinion accepts as free. Such a choice, we believe, need not be feared by the Soviet government. Russian prestige will stand high in Poland after the liberation and the Polish masses will not find it hard to understand the advantages of a permanent close Polish-Russian alliance. Nor are they likely to return to power those anti-Soviet cliques whom they have known in the past as exploiters and oppressors.

This, however, is looking toward the future; the immediate need is for an understanding between the democratic elements in the London government and the group recognized by Russia. Premier Mikolajczyk has just gone to Moscow, following urgent representations to Marshal Stalin by Mr. Churchill. Is there any hope of effecting a compromise such as has recently been achieved between Marshal Tito and the Royal Yugoslav government-in-exile? That should not be impossible if Premier Mikolajczyk is courageous enough to cut away the anti-democratic and anti-Soviet dead wood that clutters up his London government. Ideologically, there seems to be very little difference between the two parties. The National Committee has adopted a program which is definitely non-communist. It bases its economic policy on private property, the redistribution of large estates, and the encouragement of individual small holders. The program drawn up by underground leaders loyal to the London government follows exactly the same lines.

The Eastern frontier no longer appears to be a major point of disagreement, while both sides are pressing very large territorial claims in the West. The National Committee talks of incorporating into Poland Silesia, East Prussia, and part of Pomerania, and hints at a boundary along the River Oder. If it is true that this claim has received the endorsement of the Soviet government, that does give Washington and London solid grounds for complaint. For there is an understanding among the three great allies against any unilateral action in regard to peace terms. Whatever arguments may be put forward for amputating part of eastern Germany, so momentous a decision ought to be reserved for joint consultation and agreement.

Parties in Flux

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE course of events at the Democratic convention in Chicago seemed to be directed by men and forces easy to spot even when they were operating behind closed doors or from a distance. The President, the party bosses, the dissident Southern leaders, the C. I. O., the various candidates for nomination. They all represented power and their maneuvers, subtle or crude, produced a result that coincides roughly with the present balance of power in the party—which is not the same thing, obviously, as the popular will of the Democratic voters.

But the political strategists were themselves the instruments of much more powerful forces—forces which control events with a mastery that Boss Kelly and the Texas "Regulars," and even the President himself cannot match. Perhaps they are not even aware of it, for they too are being swept along toward destinies they can neither choose nor avoid.

The end of the war will bring revolution to Europe. Never mind whether the revolution is successful or abortive, whether it is peaceable or violent. It will come in one form or another to every country from the Balkans to Britain. Not even American arms and American food can prevent it, nor the anxious maneuvers of the American State Department. Europe will be a different continent when the political earthquakes have passed. So will Asia. So will Latin America, where the subterranean forces of change have already begun to break through in premonitory warnings.

To most people in the United States these facts are accepted like the ugly facts of the war itself. Revolution on other lesser continents is looked upon as endemic, like poverty and fleas. The idea that the forces that produce it might have an effect in this country is seldom entertained even by a generation that has lived through a depression and been plunged into total war. And our belief in American immunity seems justified by the fact that we did live through the depression with enough leeway in resources and enough political flexibility to prevent fascism. It is not likely, I think, that the full weight of the world revolution will hit the United States.

But that does not mean that the forces moving under the earth of the other continents are not at work under American earth too. It only means that the surface of this country is harder and shows fewer faults. When the war ends and the energies geared to the war are loosed; when the relationships created by the war face the more equivocal demands of peace; when the fiber of the people, hardened to an effort made necessary by war, goes suddenly slack—when this happens something akin to revolution will hit America too. For America like Europe has found no real cure for the profound dislocation that produced fascism and war.

Without fully realizing the probable impact of these shocks, every political faction in America is preparing to meet them. Contending groups are busy concocting strategy to be sure that the forces of change will be harnessed to their particular interests. Each group is trying to maneuver itself and its allies into positions of control. On the surface it looks like the old political finagling; underneath it represents a major struggle for power at a time of imminent political change.

One of these days, the divisions in the two big parties will cleave them wide open. The Southern reactionaries in the Democratic Party will join with their Republican counterparts; already they work together as allies on a dozen fronts. The New Dealers, weakened by endless concessions, now all but homeless, will welcome the liberal Republicans who have followed Willkie into voluntary political exile. And the galvanizing force of a new progressive major party will be provided by the disciplined energies of the Political Action Committee, already spreading beyond its original C. I. O. confines into a broader movement symbolized by the honorary leadership of that great progressive, George W. Norris.

I cannot put much stock in the prospects for a radical "third party" to grow out of the Political Action Committee and the various progressive groups, such as the Farmers' Union, that have gathered around it. A new farmer-labor party to be successful would have to draw upon greater reserves of political consciousness and experience than American workers and farmers have accumulated. Nor can I imagine the P. A. C. and its allies "capturing" the Democratic Party as a whole and turning it to progressive ends, as some of our newspaper prophets have predicted. The Democratic Party is in process of disintegration from within. The apparent strength of the right-wing leaders is countered by strong opposition among the rank and file—as witness the overwhelming popular support of Wallace, the defeat of "Cotton Ed" Smith and a flock of other reactionary office holders. The role of the P. A. C. is to hasten this process and ally itself everywhere with the forces of progress. It is to serve as the vanguard of a new alignment rather than the conqueror of an old party.

The Old Guard is in power today in both parties. But its strength is insignificant compared with the forces of change that are gathering throughout the world. As in all countries, the Old Guard will fight to hold its power. It will make new alliances. It will use every weapon at its disposal—weapons far more deadly than those brought into play at Chicago. But if the progressives realize their strength in time they can shape a successful counteroffensive. For numbers are on their side, and the hopes of ordinary men and women, and the deepest requirements of our struggling industrial civilization.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

The "G" in Gap

WAVELL used to talk about the fundamental tactical problem of "finding the 'G' in Gap"—that is, exploiting a break in a strong defensive front by getting your mobile forces through it before the enemy can reform and close the gap. It is not enough to "find the gap"; you must find the "G" in the gap: the very first opening, and then drive through with all your strength, roll back the enemy's lines on either side to widen the break-through, and thus make it broad enough for your mobile forces to get to the enemy's rear, sever his immediate lateral communications, split up his forces into isolated local groups, and push ahead as far and as rapidly as possible. It is more of a problem in time than in space; any defensive line can be broken, but exploiting the break-through takes dash, mobility, and a daring disregard for the exposed flanks of your mobile force.

Hanson Baldwin reported in The New York Times last week that the widely differing speeds of the Russian and Anglo-American advances had "become a sort of grim jest [in Normandy]; it is said that we shall soon have to adjust our artillery fire to avoid laying down a barrage on the Russians advancing from the East." (The fact that it was a jest is the best possible indication of the good morale prevailing in the 21st Army Group.) Indeed, a comparison of what happened on the two fronts last Thursday, for instance, is superficially odious: the Red Army took Rezekne, Dvinsk, Bialystok, Lvov, and Stanislavov, and isolated General Lindemann's army group in the Baltic States by cutting the Riga-Koenigsberg railway, while the 21st Army Group captured Périers and Lessay, broke through west of St. Lo, and was actually repulsed south of Caen.

But I think the comparison is only superficially odious, and that July 27 may be regarded as one of the great days of the war against Germany, marred for the Allies only by the costly and tragic death of General McNair, who contributed so much to the foundations of American success in Normandy. The fact is that the Allies found the "G" in Gap for the first time in Western Europe when General Bradley's troops burst through the enemy's thick crust of defenses west of St. Lo and swung sharply toward Coutances and the sea, forcing a general enemy withdrawal.

This success, which was extended over the weekend by a further drive to Avranches and the British push in the middle of the line, followed a series of disappointments. These were well analyzed in three remarkably frank dispatches from London last week that caused doleful head-shaking in both Britain and America. The head-shaking was halted (temporarily) by the break-through, but the dispatches are valid, and should be remembered.

First, Drew Middleton of the New York Times expressed reasonable doubt as to the agility of the British attack southeast of Caen, asking pungently "whether audacity in certain circumstances was any more costly than that sort of caution that committed forces to a long period of attrition." Second, Richard L. Tobin of the New York Herald Tribune used the failure of air power to open the way for that drive as a springboard for the first complete and honest dispatch I have read on "What Air Power Cannot Do." Third, Hanson Baldwin, that old critic of the generals, surveyed the strong and weak points of the entire Normandy situation, and concluded that "more vigor and drive and boldness are needed, and less caution about our flanks, if the war in Europe is to be ended quickly, and particularly if the Allies in the West are to match the Russian gains in the East."

These dispatches, which did the American press and the Allied censorship honor, exposed our weaknesses—and our difficulties—constructively, so that even the generals might profit by them. Certainly we at home might profit by them: the accounts of the terrible hedgerow country, the problem of getting many divisions into action on a narrow front, and the limitation of air support by the weather show us good reasons for the slow going of those weeks. The accounts of caution remind us of other reasons, repeatedly demonstrated in this war, why spectacular advances of the Western Allies are infrequent and a long time in coming: too many of our commanders, remembering the textbooks they read after 1918, have not yet learned to trust swift armored columns with the protection of their own flanks while the infantry follows up more slowly, and make the mistake of thinking that the price of victory—which is casualties—is cheapened by fighting a war of attrition rather than a war of movement. (Actually I would guess that proportional Russian losses have been lower in the past month than British and American losses.) And, finally, the brilliant account of what air power cannot do reminds us again that war is a combined operation, not to be won by a single arm no matter how glamorous it is made by fugitive advertising men.

As this is written, it is too early to assess the scope of the American success in Normandy. The "G" in Gap was found, and given an excellent initial exploitation, suggesting that General Bradley at least is not among the timid. But many miles of the wicked bocage country lie ahead, and the Germans are strongly echeloned against the British, who face better country for fast going. Anyway, the gate is swinging on Caen; when it is unhinged, there should be a pursuit, rapid and perhaps decisive.

What Bretton Woods Did

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, July 27

BRETTON WOODS did not provide a universal economic panacea. Neither the International Monetary Fund nor the Bank for Reconstruction and Development can prevent another great depression. The hostile criticism of the banking community has usefully stressed the fact that neither agency can operate successfully for any length of time without a diminution of trade barriers and a more enlightened tariff policy. Had Bretton Woods been supplemented by a confab on Mount Washington between God and Einstein, it couldn't have produced a mechanism that would enable each nation to go on happily restricting its imports and expanding its exports; you cannot multiply by subtraction.

The success of the Fund and the Bank, if they squeeze through Congress, will depend upon our willingness to act on this fairly obvious proposition. Unfortunately it is not a matter of intellectual grasp. Not vox populi but vox Grundy is at fault. Our business men pretty generally understand that you cannot sell unless you buy, but their advocacy of freer trade usually stops short at their own factory gates. The average Congressman is not so economically illiterate as he appears to be, but it takes extraordinary courage to spit in the eye of a wealthy industrial constituent who wants protection against foreign goods, and can muster his workers and their labor union as additional pressure on a legislator who threatens to lapse into statesmanship.

If we revert to Hawley-Smoot monkeyshines, so, in self-defense, will the rest of the world. In that case neither the Fund nor the Bank can save us. They can only facilitate the exchange of goods; they cannot substitute for it. Their solvency and their effectiveness depend upon a willingness to buy as well as sell. As the world's principal creditor and largest market, we must either take goods in large quantities or see the gold and dollars of the Fund turn into wobbly pesos, francs, or kroner, and kiss our investment in the Bank good-bye.

Thus far do the New York Times and the Wall Street Journal, the seers of the monthly bank letters, and the house-broken sages of the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy, make a constructive contribution to discussion. Beyond that they lapse into the senile regurgitation of ideas that bore a semblance to reality when John Stuart Mill was a boy, and then only from the longitude of Manchester. If the fate of the Fund and the Bank depended on the revival of free trade, Nineteenth Century style, Bretton Woods could be written off as a junket for Washington brain trusters and European bankers-in-exile.

What makes Bretton Woods historic is that its starting point was not the stimulation of exports but the stimulation of imports. A few sentences from a recent League of Nations report (the ghost still talks) may make this clearer. Its criticism of the monetary stabilization programs of the 20's is that "the need for coordinated policies for the maintenance of national incomes and good conditions of employment in all countries was never fully appreciated." The gold standard was restored with "the limited objective" of exchange stability. The "new objective" is the maintenance of "economic activity and employment." The starting point of those who met at Bretton Woods was at the opposite pole from the Kemmerers who speak for the protectionists. The League's experts express it well: "When productive resources are being employed to the full, exports can no longer be viewed as a means to provide employment; they become the necessary means of paying for what is really required and consumed, namely, imports." The Fund and the Bank were constructed to work in a world in which each government takes steps to maintain its domestic economic activity and employment at a high level. Where there is full employment, large imports do not become a matter of enlightened argument; they become economically necessary and inevitable. A fully employed United States, for example, would require huge quantities of foreign raw materials and buy considerable quantities of foreign luxury and consumer goods. Where there is full employment, the pressure for tariffs is weakened, their effect lessened.

In this perspective, the Fund and the Bank appear not as revolutionary financial mechanisms but as timid compromises with the past. The virtue of the Fund is that it would permit governments engaged in providing jobs by public expenditure to prevent the flight of capital; its weakness is that it still links currencies to the deflationary drag of gold, places narrow limits on the management of money for domestic purposes, and allows any one of the three great Powers, the United States, Britain, or the Soviet Union, to veto a uniform alteration of exchange rates. In conservative banking hands, these limitations could put severe brakes on "Keynesian" programs in the poorer countries. Since the rest are all in that category, the danger here is from the United States. At Bretton Woods our country played an enlightened role, of which we may all be proud. But a new Administration guided by conventional banking ideas could turn the Fund into little else than a somewhat more flexible gold standard.

The Bank likewise is about as ultra-conservative as it is possible to be within the limits of the more progressive attitude which war, devastation, and poverty have forced on the other capitalist nations. Here the fault does not lie with the American delegation; as representatives of a nation with most of the world's gold and not enough of the world's dental cavities, they had to link the Fund to gold to maintain the value of our squirrel hoard at Fort Knox. When the Bank came up, the American delegation was for an institution of far greater powers than those finally agreed upon. It was the undertow from European central and private bankers, especially the smug Dutch, that limited the Bank's power to lend and to guarantee loans to 100 per cent of its capital. This $1-to-$1 ratio would make it the most conservative bank the world has ever seen, and as the Wall Street Journal was quick to note, correspondingly reduce its power to compete with the private bankers and provide a check on their interest rates.

This conservatism is rather encouraging than otherwise, for it provides the best hope of conciliating enough of the banker opposition to get the Fund and the Bank through Congress. Much of this banker opposition is just instinctive hostility to anything new, like Wall Street's opposition to the Federal Reserve System when it was first proposed. Much of it is a kind of dog-in-the-manger attitude on the part of those who have no program for the revival of international lending but hate to see the government do it.

The old gold standard is a dead duck. For the banker, the Fund represents a means to preserve some link to gold and the Bank the only basis on which international lending can be revived on any adequate scale. For the people Bretton Woods offers the one hope of restoring multilateral international trade, which has a lot to do with international peace, and doing so on a domestic "full employment" basis. Bretton Woods compromised with the past but looked toward the future. Once established, the Fund and the Bank can become as powerful instruments for world stability and prosperity as the people, especially the American people, are disposed to make them.

Argentine Showdown?

BY RAY JOSEPHS

CRITICS of the State Department's equivocal policy in regard to Argentina—there are more of them to the square kilometer in Buenos Aires than in Washington—gave a sigh of anticipation when Secretary Hull, in the strongest terms, served notice that we consider Argentina to be openly "deserting" its sister republics, and dealing with and aiding Axis powers.

The State Department summed up our position vis-à-vis the Farrell regime in detail and warned that the majority of the other American republics were in accord on the diplomatic isolation of a country actively working against the United Nations. The action could not have been a surprise to anyone, with the possible exception of the Casa Rosada. It came as a climax to Washington's recall of Ambassador Norman Armour and Argentina's come-home-quick signal to Dr. Adrian C. Escobar.

The big question, both here and on the River Plate, is what we now intend to do about it. Front-page dispatches, editorials, and columnists talk blithely of economic sanctions. But the word from Buenos Aires via underground friends in Montevideo is that the pro-democratic elements there are highly skeptical. They think this is going to develop into merely another sharp word-and-wind exchange in the tradition of the famed correspondence between Secretary Hull and Foreign Minister Storni last September.

On that occasion, Storni wrote a letter to Mr. Hull explaining that he was writing with the full approval of President Ramirez. (That meant the approval of the colonels' G.O.U., since from the beginning Ramirez was their front man and hardly much more.) Storni pointed out that the San Martin Palace policy of "prudent neutrality" actually represented an "invaluable contribution to hemisphere solidarity and cooperative continental defense." For this reason it would be very nice if President Roosevelt would "make a gesture of genuine friendship toward our people" in the form of providing such little trinkets as airplanes, spare parts, armaments, and machinery which would "restore Argentina to a position of equilibrium" in relation to the other South American countries. Storni claimed that the Argentine people were strongly for the Allies. The army, he had to admit, did not share this enthusiasm. However, a symbolic gesture such as he had indicated would probably do much to change their minds.

Mr. Hull's twenty-four-hundred-word reply sounded as good in Spanish as in the Tennessee drawl in which it must have been dictated. First, he listed the commitments made by Argentina at the Rio Conference of Foreign Ministers not long after Pearl Harbor. Then, he showed how Argentina had ignored, flouted, or forgotten almost every one of them. He knocked over each point that Storni had raised, with fairness and incontestable logic. A number of us waiting around the U.P. office in Buenos Aires as the texts were coming in wondered what the government would do. The colonels were debating whether to release the story to the public. Finally, they decided that popular sentiment was sure to be on their side and not only stamped an okay on the correspondence but told the papers they might comment freely. The response was terrific—but hardly what the military expected. For the press followed Hull right down the line, and the public, incensed at the colonels for making fools of themselves, applauded the press and Mr. Hull instead of damning the Yanquis for insulting their national pride. Even the Axis sheets could do no more than demand Storni's head.

Storni was thrown to the wolves and other resignations followed. Even so, public feeling mounted. The colonels, fearing a counter-move they could not stand up against, ordered out every soldier and every piece of equipment in Buenos Aires. New York was pressing us for news, and the censors, not content with warning newsmen against making any predictions, were locking up anybody who spoke in the future tense. The most conservative observers felt that if the pro-democratic forces had been organized or if some missing spark had been applied the military regime would have fallen then and there. As it was the colonels sat tight and rode out the storm.

Meanwhile, Washington, as far as we could tell from Buenos Aires, sat and twiddled its thumbs. The Axis forces were so frightened that many agents ducked for cover. But once the excitement died down Berlin intensified its activity. Espionage, sabotage, and fifth column work continued with the increasingly open aid of the Argentine military and the behind-the-scenes boys in the Foreign Ministry. We could see this happening, knowing what it was costing the United Nations' war effort. We followed the pro-Axis dailies because they always gave the tip-off on what was coming. We saw the pro-democratic organizations closed up one by one, the political parties dissolved, freedom of religion abolished. This rise of native totalitarianism appeared not to worry Washington or London. It was the increasing aid to the Axis that finally in January 1944 caused them to issue the still unrevealed demand that diplomatic ties with Berlin and Tokyo be cut. This time there was hardly a crisis. The colonels, in true Goebbels style, built up the break with the Axis. The Argentine people looked on apathetically: they had seen it all before and they would see it again. As Mr. Hull tells the story in the current memorandum, what happened thereafter was merely a flurry of anti-Axis activity to catch the headlines —nothing more.

The colonels believed that Ramirez was ready to actualize the diplomatic break by integrating Argentina into the continental defense system. (This Ramirez denied when some of us interviewed him on the subject.) The colonels, therefore, led by the war minister Juan Domingo Peron, moved in on him and forced him out, installing Farrell in his place. The Farrell regime, as might be expected, has continued the pro-Axis policy. Pro-Nazis are not only tolerated but have been given some of the most important ministries and agencies. These have "rapidly and energetically," to use Mr. Hull's words, "implanted a domestic totalitarian system that fully complements and supports their pro-Axis foreign policy through control of the press, the courts, the schools, and other key institutions." The Argentine government has turned over to blacklisted Axis firms important United States materials shipped to Allied concerns under carefully checked export licenses. It has exercised economic sanctions against smaller and weaker Latin American countries that have been supporting the United States policy of non-recognition. Furthermore, although this is not stressed by Mr. Hull, through its domestic policy and its ties with the Axis, the Argentine government has established a firm pro-Axis beachhead in this hemisphere which may have important consequences after the war.

It is doubtful if the Argentine people or the Argentine government will regard the present State Department attack seriously unless it is followed up. In the official Argentine denial—given out before the Argentine people had a chance to read even a much-cut version of Mr. Hull's statement—Foreign Minister Orlando L. Peluffo denied that the Argentine was working against continental solidarity. He emphasized that no change in policy was contemplated. The well-worn argument was produced that sovereignty of Argentina would be impaired if it seemed that its policy was dictated from abroad. He harped on another favorite theme: Argentine neutrality was helping the war effort by supplying vital food and war supplies, and concluded his radio talk by showing just how closely Argentina was tying up with her Good Neighbors with the sole purpose of strengthening continental solidarity.

More important than Peluffo's speech were the expressions of the Nacionalistas, the only real supporters of the government, and the actions of the army. The nationalists demonstrated while Peluffo was talking. The military clique seethed and kept quiet. Cabildo and Federal, the pro-Axis dailies which speak for the government, started screaming against the United States, charging openly and violently that we were falsifying Argentina's position, planning to attack her and seeking to dictate what she should do.

Hot-headed elements in the army have been meeting in the suburban Campo Mayo barracks—where the June 4 coup was planned—and discussing mobilization to meet any emergency, "external" rather than internal. Reports are already circulating that the United States has a fleet ready off Punta del Este, the outermost point of the wide bay of the Rio de la Plata. Recent classes of Argentina's conscript army have been called up. Arms production has been put on a 24-hour-day basis, and all leaves have been cancelled. All of this suggests that the military leaders believe that some time the good-neighborly patience of Mr. Hull and the Roosevelt Administration would come to an end. They don't think that the present memorandum suggests more drastic action; we are annoyed and possibly indignant but that is all. However, some day there will be more than the stiff reprimand and Argentina's leaders are preparing public opinion against the day when they can point the shocked finger at the aggressive imperialism of the United States.

This propaganda and the military preparations are having their effect, even if eighty per cent of the Argentine people are definitely in favor of democracy. The pro-democratic leaders explain that bitter feeling against the United States is being stirred up by the propaganda of the military and the government without the pro-democratic cause being furthered. Nobody wants us to send down the Marines. Nobody wants United States' interference in Argentine affairs. But pro-democratic leaders feel that drastic economic action—cutting off our purchases of Argentine meat and refusing to sell Argentina our products—would have a wholesome effect. Although they fully realize that outside pressure is not the sole answer, they see our present policy as tantamount to Franco appeasement and Darlan and Badoglio compromise. And they are convinced that the colonels are of the same opinion.

We were always being told in Buenos Aires that the Allied high command was opposed to cutting off meat purchases. The meat had to come from somewhere and the American people would be resentful if they were more seriously rationed so that the English could eat better. The State Department's release of Peron's warlike speech and the Hull memorandum itself suggests that perhaps the Department wants to know if it will have popular backing at home for the next more drastic step. Americans in Argentina have placed some of the blame on London for our holding back on economic sanctions. But in my opinion Downing Street as well as the British businessmen in Argentina would be willing to go along with us if the war food supply was assured.

There would of course be popular opposition to this course both in Argentina and in other smaller South American countries where there is some secret admiration of Argentina for "standing up" to the United States. But the majority of the Argentine people would be for it, particularly those democratic leaders who have themselves experienced the ruthless suppression, the jailings, the tortures carried out by the military regime.

Secretary Hull has ruled out any bargaining or negotiation over a course of action to which Argentina has long since been committed. "The principles for which the free nations of the world are today contributing the full measure of their human and material resources cannot be the subject of a bargain." The case of Argentina is transparently not merely a matter of internal policy; it involves the Allied war effort. It is difficult to discover, therefore, the reasons which would deter us from insisting by whatever means necessary that Argentina abandon her role of aiding those against whom the United Nations are pitting their total strength.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THERE IS TALK of an American [Atlantic] cable—that is, of a cable owned in America, and, we suppose, paid out from this side; but we fear no cable can, in the present state of American industry, be made here cheap enough to compete with those of English manufacture.—August 5, 1869.

THE WANT of comic talent is certainly not the reason why we have to answer in the negative the often-asked question, "why we have no comic paper in America?" . . . Mr. Nasby, the San Francisco "Town Crier," Mr. Mark Twain, Mr. Josh Billings, some of the men on the World, Mr. Leland, the jester of the Boston Post, the balladist of "Truthful James," some of the story-tellers of the "Editor's Drawer" of Harper's, to say nothing of the jokers who scintillate more or less feebly in the journals of the Union generally, would, if they could be got together in one corps, make a comic journal which it would be very hard to beat.—August 5, 1869.

THINGS ARE NOT going well in Austria. . . . Nobody is satisfied with the present state of things except the Hungarians. Their success in getting all they want has stimulated the exertions of the Bohemians and Croats, who demand the concession of autonomy also; and, unfortunately for the Austrian Ministry, there is not a single reason for refusing their demands which would not also apply to the demands of the Hungarians.—August 12, 1869.

"THE SCIENCE OF RIGHT," by J. G. Fichte. Translated by A. E. Kroeger. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.). . . . Americans should accept with some reserve the representations now made that Fichte and Hegel illustrate the best thought which Germany has produced.—August 12, 1869.

Stalingrad Tomorrow

BY ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Moscow, July 22, by Cable

RUSSIANS, like Americans, are discussing post-war plans, but with a different accent. While the Americans plan what to do with Europe, Asia, South America, and the Pacific, the Russians are planning how to rebuild their war-destroyed cities. So far I have not heard a single Russian planning the future of any country but his own.

Architects from all the length and breadth of the Soviet Union have just completed a session on standards of house construction and town planning. A hundred elected delegates of architects' organizations from all parts of the country as well as several hundred Moscow architects and engineers crowded into the Architects' Hall on Granatny Street, which old American residents of Moscow remember as the residence of American relief workers twenty years ago. Now tripled in size by new wings, it contains permanent exhibitions and serves as the publication center of the Architecture Academy.

Much attention was devoted to plans for small houses for two or four families, each family having a separate entrance and a small yard. The explanation was given that these are quicker to build in standard prefabricated form. Those recalling the discussion a decade ago regarding the "socialist" nature of apartment houses as opposed to individual dwellings will realize that Russian families, like Americans, have decided that they prefer more individual home life whenever conditions permit. Large cities, naturally, still plan apartment houses, but a typical factory settlement now features smaller houses with individual yards and trees.

The architects wisely decided not to adopt any single scheme of city planning but to respect each city's special characteristics. For instance, Novgorod, the most ancient cradle of Russian history, with its massive architectural monuments and medieval art, should take advantage of these monuments, constructing parks and squares for their display. Cities possessing lakes and rivers should develop their possibilities.

All projects for city rebuilding propose a marked increase in parks and greenery. They also plan for a large central square, not as a thoroughfare but slightly aside from central thoroughfares and adapted to public gatherings. Years ago I noted this typical new feature of Soviet town planning. Whereas medieval cities centered around the cathedral and the market, and modern capitalist cities center around banks and stores, Soviet cities scatter stores and branch banks through residential areas, using the city center for cultural buildings and great public plazas for public gatherings. This has now been consciously adopted in all future city plans.

Americans will be especially interested in the project for the future Stalingrad. Five architects competed for this, including Academician Iofan, known in America as the designer of the Soviet Pavilion at the New York World's Fair in 1939 but better known here as the designer of the monumental Palace of the Soviets, which is still unfinished because of the war. Iofan's Stalingrad project proved unacceptable. It is interesting to know why. He made the entire city center around a monumental square approached from the Volga by successive concrete terraces leading up to a gigantic memorial figure several stories high. The first impression your correspondent got was how tired Stalingrad people would be by climbing all that cement and how completely the city's past would dominate all daily life.

I was glad to note that my criticism coincided with the official judgment which rejected Iofan's project as "too monumental and unhuman." This trend toward humanizing architecture makes your correspondent foresee possible changes in the future structure of the Moscow Palace of the Soviets, which—as you recall—was planned as the world's tallest structure. It is of colossal dimensions, and many consider it out of proportion to the Moscow scene.

The plan accepted for Stalingrad was drafted by a younger architect, Karo Alabian, an Armenian who is now president of the Architects' Union and vice-president of the Acadamy of Architecture. Alabian personally conducted your correspondent through the exhibit and explained his project for "correlating Stalingrad's proud past with the future of an efficient industrial metropolis and a pleasant living place."

Stalingrad presents a peculiar problem. The city is very long and narrow, running nearly forty miles along the Volga. Actually it is a chain of factory towns with tenuous connections. The project provides four long parkways paralleling the river, each flanked by swift electric trains, similar to our inter-urbans, running the full length of the city and connected by crosstown busses. The first parkway will replace the steam railway which formerly occupied the river bank, shutting off the city from the Volga, and which will now enter the city farther inland by tunnels similar to those of New York. This parkway will connect the city with the river and provide recreation grounds along the shore. All ravines running to the river will become parks branching from the parkway.

Stalingrad's great factories will form a broad belt along the river, on the heights above the parkway. Beyond the factories will come a second parkway from 500 to 1,500 feet wide, a green belt separating the factories from the residential districts. The third parkway will be entirely in the residential area, while the fourth will be an autostrad beyond the city limits, suitable for through traffic.

Neither factories nor residences will be erected in the central district, where the heaviest battles raged. Here a great central park will extend a mile inland, enclosing Mamaief Kurgan, the highest point in the city, where the final terrific struggle took place. This hilltop will contain a great battle panorama, including the actual trenches. The mile-deep park will have a sports stadium also, and a memorial square for public demonstrations. This park will be the central gathering place for the entire city. Just opposite it, on the sandy island in the river, a decorative lighthouse will connect the bathing beach resorts with the general city recreation area.

Soviet architects have worked throughout the war on many interesting tasks. The present exhibit shows fascinating models of many fake factories and airfields designed to attract German bombs to false objectives while the real factories, carefully camouflaged, escaped. The architects also designed a traveling theater, which visits the fronts in a single three-ton truck with room for actors, costumes, and scenery. On reaching its destination, the truck opens out, forming an 18-by-22-foot stage with wings, backdrop, and scenery.

"From the beginning of 1942 onward," said Alabian, "we began work on post-war plans for rebuilding. We knew that the Germans would be beaten and that we must plan to build better than before."

This conception of Soviet future building was confirmed by Pierre Cot, the famous French statesman, who has just returned from four months investigating reconstruction in the devastated areas for the Free French government in Algiers. The French hope to profit by Soviet experience in the reconstruction of France. M. Cot said to your correspondent: "The Soviets will compel even this terrible destruction to serve their future uses. Twenty years hence they will have finer cities than if there had been no war."

The Putsch that Failed

BY ALFRED VAGTS

THE political shooting season inside Germany reopened on July 20. There had been a closed season for ten years, since the summer of the Great Purge; and since then those who did the shooting and those for whom they shot had been after other prey in the game preserve of Europe.

To those who are eager to establish a Black Record for Germany since Luther or an even earlier figure, it might not occur that political murder in that country had never had the status of a quasi-institution, as it had in so many other countries. The year 1919 really marked its hideous beginning in Germany, with the murder of the Bavarian Socialist Prime Minister Eisner by Count Arco, scion of a Bavarian noble family. The revolutionaries of the Left fired back under such provocation, but they never equalled the professionals in the handling of arms, the army officers and the bravos employed by them, who cut down Erzberger, Rathenau, and a host of lesser leaders. The Nazis were the party of political murder from the beginning.

The firing squads of June, 1934, were provided by the SS, known abroad as the Elite Guard. Thereafter they replaced the SA as the party's armed force, controlling what their leader Himmler is fond of calling Kriegsschauplatz Innerdeutschland—the internal German theater of war. Himmler promised the army to keep this theater quiet so that they could safely concentrate on their foreign campaigns.

Inciters to political murder run the risk of perishing at the hands of political murderers. Now the noblemen within the army have failed in their final putsch—a putsch for peace against the assassins they themselves have raised to power; they are being eliminated by their pupils. For this putsch was the bloody clash of two élites, the hereditary nobility and Hitler's aristocrats, and of the two the latter was bolder—the old noblemen feared to lose estates and position, whereas the SS have nothing to lose but the war.

What Himmler, onetime chicken breeder, has tried to breed in the SS is essentially a new aristocracy, with the old police duties but a new allegiance. They are imbued with absolute obedience to Hitler; by order of Hitler himself, every SS meeting closes with the song,

> If all the world forsake Thee,
> We shall be faithful still,

a Christian hymn written by the romantic poet Novalis (Baron von Hardenberg). Such blasphemy did not repel the German nobility, so long forsaken by God, Geist, and all graces. Like so many representatives of big business and finance, the footloose younger sons of the nobility joined the SS—provided they could pass the chicken breeder's "blood" tests, which barred many with traces of Jewish blood in their pedigrees. By early 1943 there were 20 men with the particle von and indices of even higher nobility among the 240 highest SS leaders down to brigade leader, a rank corresponding to that of major general in the army. The new aristocracy and the old seemed to blend peacefully, dividing among themselves the labors of government, rearmament, and diplomacy, and sharing the joys of possession. There were occasional revolutionary threats from some Nazi elements, but the danger was not real; landed property and industrial holdings, of which titled men had a larger share than is generally realized abroad, remained secure. Instead of agrarian reform, Germans with "land hunger" were promised holdings in territories to be conquered East and West. Himmler's elaborate organization included a settlement office to arrange such fiefs for loyal sons of the SS. This made possible that harmony between the two élites which was necessary for the preparation and waging of war.

The role of foreign conservatives in creating this state of affairs should not be forgotten or forgiven. After the last war they insisted on maintaining the status quo in German property holdings, thereby protecting the position of the landed aristocracy and the big industrialists, and at the same time fostered measures which would ruin the German middle class. The result was Nazism. And almost up to the outbreak of the present war they encouraged Nazism. Their class interests led them to overlook its nationalist character and its determined revisionism. Indeed, their views are essentially the same even now. Up to July 20, 1944, the conservatives in power in Washington and London might have looked forward to finding among the upper-class Germans the Badoglios and Pétains they would like—but the Nazis are now exterminating the would-be renegades.

Unchecked by British conservatives when it was still possible, the old and the new German élite went on with war preparations through the 30s. But there was some friction even then. Hitler's promise to the contrary notwithstanding, the military monopoly of the Reichswehr was broken by the SS. Ever since the Polish campaign of 1939, the so-called Waffen-SS, or SS-in-arms, has sent its own formations into battle independently of the regular army. They grew from regiments to divisions and corps, until they were on a par with the army, the navy, and the air force. This alone was enough to arouse army jealousy—and in addition they got favored treatment. During the last year and a half a number of army divisions have been dissolved, often after being badly mauled; but the number of SS divisions has been constantly increased, despite the fact that some of them have been practically annihilated. Moreover, their methods of competing for recruits struck the army as unfair. Regular army men and seventeen-year-old civilians were enticed into the SS, leaving the army the more passive and war-weary soldiers and recruits. Thanks to this favoritism, the reward of fanaticism, the number of SS divisions is now seventeen. Membership in the Nazi party seems to be no longer required for membership in the SS, but the SS troops are the most fanatical exponents of Nazi doctrine, both on the battlefield and behind the lines.

No SS general has been captured, except one at Stalingrad, but the Russians report increasing willingness of Reichswehr divisional and corps commanders to surrender and join the Moscow Committee of Free Germans. This committee is headed by a Von Seydlitz, scion of an old Junker family. Some illumination of German social trends may be obtained by studying the occurrence of the particle von before names. It reveals something of the competition between the only two élites left in the Reich, the army and the SS. It is significant that every one of the SS division commanders is a commoner—men with names like Meyer, Dietrich, and Lehmann. In the army the top leaders were largely noblemen as late as 1936—80 per cent of the colonel generals in that year were vons, 33 per cent of the generals, 30 per cent of the lieutenant generals, 24 per cent of the major generals, and 22 per cent of the colonels. But the tremendous expansion of the army into the Reichswehr and the Luftwaffe called for more leader personnel than the thousand or so noble families could provide; besides, their sons were mostly strangers to the new weapons—airplanes and tanks—which required new brains and technical talent. But the old Junker type was still the die that stamped most military commanders.

Two things are noteworthy in considering these changes and the unavoidable increase of the commoner-officer: (1) On July 20, 1944, a high percentage of the top commanders were still vons; in the Great General Staff, the peak association of all German army chiefs, there were 115 vons among the 438 members holding ranks from colonel to captain in 1943. (2) There is no similar strain of nobility in the officer corps of the navy and the Luftwaffe. And that, as we might say in our murder-story-as-social-analysis, is the clue to the fact that the navy and the Luftwaffe came out with effusive congratulations after Hitler escaped the bomb, and the army did not.

Victories cement partners in a military coalition, and defeats draw them apart. The enforced harmony between the army and the SS became strained when German defeats took on a serial character. The landings in Normandy set off developments in Germany similar to those set off in Italy by the landings on Sicily. A considerable group of old officers, their names indicative of noble birth, "lost courage," as General Guderian, a tank expert, declared in a broadcast. They realized that their chances of survival as the governing and possessing class were threatened. In the cold morning after the orgy of blood this type of German officer suddenly became "conservative" once more, knowing that only prompt action could save his possessions. These neo-conservatives, with affiliations in big business and big agriculture, made a salvage attempt. It was one of their own, a Graf von Stauffenberg, who agreed to throw the bomb for them.

BURLING

The situation was so desperate, and action was so difficult under Himmler's spy system, that no bravo could be hired. A titled officer had to risk his own life for his caste. They were so obviously guilty that a high S. S. official, Dr. Ley, openly accused the whole "idiotic nobility" not only of having plotted against Hitler but of having caused the Wehrmacht to lose ground in the East, West, and South. The German worker was told by his leader that the stab in the back came from his old enemy, the nobleman. The scene may be set for a St. Bartholomew's Night, a "night of the long knives," for the hitherto untouchable German nobility, the last "unscathed" nobility in the world.

The July bombing expressed the conviction of those who have traditionally run the German army and nation as experts that Germany cannot win the war, and that its conduct and termination must be taken out of the hands of the Nazi upstarts and their bohemian corporal. To the German people this explosive declaration can only mean that the experts have pronounced the war hopeless and the Nazis unfit even to wind it up.

Temporarily, the failure of the Adelsputsch has only strengthened Nazi control over the Wehrmacht. Himmler, a civilian but Minister of the Interior, is now commander of all forces within the Reich proper. And for the first time an SS general, Hausser by name, has been given the command of a German Army, the Seventh. This army faces the Allies in Normandy, and is an indication to us that a Nazi Party man holds the key position and will bar peace trafficking.

Faced by the Allies' demand for unconditional surrender, the desperadoes who have conquered Germany will fight to the end. Rather than stop the war they will go on inflicting casualties on Germans and Allies alike. The stage seems set not for an early peace but for a Wagnerian Götterdämmerung. Even if the nerves of the Führers should fail, there remains the danger that those of their troops such as the SS will not fail. There is again an army of fanatics in the world, fanatics who have at their command the technology which the last armies of fanatics, the Mahdi and the Chinese Boxers, did not possess. And who would say that we, their enemies, have yet used our best and most persuasive arguments against them?

In the Wind

WITH A FINE non-partisan spirit, the United Republican Finance Committee for Metropolitan New York is soliciting funds from members of the American Labor Party. Several members, who repeatedly and in vain urged Governor Dewey to approve the federal ballot in order to facilitate voting by soldiers from New York State, have received a form letter asking their support because "We must 'Back the Fight' of the boys at the front who may not be able to vote in November."

APPARENTLY THE FIGHT is to spare the boys the horrors of full employment when they come home. James S. Kemper, chairman of the National Republican Finance Committee, said this in a recent address: "We cannot have both full employment and freedom. The only period in the history of our country when full employment was assured was during the time of slavery."

OMEN: The Labor Institute of America has prepared a large three-color chart showing how members of Congress have voted during the past two years on issues vital to labor. At $2 each, the charts are selling like hotcakes.

JOE LOUIS has been measured for a figure by Tussaud's Wax Museum in London.

NOW IT MUST BE TOLD: That air-conditioned, noiseless, dustless, two-way-stretch, pre-cooked, house-broken, konvertible, kollapsible, kumfortized, slo-baked, dubbl-seald house of the future turns out to be just an advertising man's occupational disease. The National Association of Home Builders has employed Steve Hannagan, one of the best and highest-priced men in the publicity business, to un-sell the public on the dream houses it has been reading about in the slick-paper magazines. The reason for this move was a survey by the Association, which showed that the average man expects to pay $52 a month after the war to finance a six-room house with two baths and all the mechanical marvels he has been reading about in the ads. Of the people interviewed, 54 per cent said they would not build or buy a home at all unless they could get air conditioning, and 62 per cent said they must have electronic devices to do the housework. Such things, says Mr. Hannagan, are only for "a minority of home buyers in the high income brackets."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A three-year-old placard of the Nasjonal Samling, Vidkun Quisling's party, has suddenly begun to reappear all over Oslo. It reads, "Germany winning on all fronts! Join Germany's victorious forward march! Join the NS Party!" Quisling's police are kept busy tearing them down. . . . A Nazi paper in Prague complains that there is no applause for speakers at anti-Bolshevist meetings.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Bulgaria on the Spot

BY BOGDAN RADITSA

BULGARIA'S rulers, having invested in a loser, are now anxiously waiting for something to turn up; but whatever turns up is likely to be unpleasant. They gave their country over to Germany. Their people now look to Russia for salvation.

This uncomfortable situation could have been avoided. In November, 1940, Soviet Russia sent an emissary to the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs in Sofia to conclude a Russo-Bulgarian mutual-assistance pact. Despite Regent Philov's despotic rule and the Gestapo occupation, which had just been installed, a million of Bulgaria's six million inhabitants signed a petition favoring the proposal, and 140 deputies out of a total of 150 informed the government that they wanted the pact. The government said no. Four months later, in March, 1941, Bulgaria signed the Tri-Partite Pact with the Axis; at the same time it announced that its relations with Russia were "improving," and that with Russia's consent it would allow German troops to enter Bulgaria to keep peace in the Balkans.

The People's Commissariat for Foreign Policy promptly sent an explicit note to the Bulgarian government, stating that "the Soviet government cannot uphold the opinion of the Bulgarian government regarding the correctness of the latter's position in the given question, since this position, irrespective of the desire of the Bulgarian government, leads not to the strengthening of peace but to the widening of the sphere of war and to Bulgaria's involvement in it." The Soviet denial was never made public in Bulgaria.

Since Germany and Russia have been at war, Russia has appealed to Bulgaria several times. On January 23 of this year, as the New York Times reported, the representatives of the All-Slav Committee transmitted a message to Bulgaria stressing the fact that "the union with Germany cannot save Bulgaria from war" and that Russia had always supported the Bulgarian patriots and had helped them win independence. A Moscow broadcast on May 30, 1944, quoting from War and the Working Class, charged Bulgaria with maintaining a clearly hostile attitude toward Russia, by allowing the Nazis to use air fields, and harbors on the Black Sea and the Danube.

The present Bulgarian government, headed by Ivan Bagrianov, one of King Boris's former aides, does not seem to have the slightest inclination to free itself from Nazi influence. It continues its professions of neutrality, but German troops occupy all key military positions in the country and use it as a base of operations against Greece and Yugoslavia. In fact, the five German divisions in Bulgaria are the mainstay of Regent Philov's government. It has no support among the broad masses of the population.

The conflict in Bulgaria is between the nationalistic, imperialistic impulses of the ruling class and the federalistic, democratic aspirations of the resistance movement, which is based on a deep-rooted Slavic sympathy for Russia. The character of the resistance is not [illegible] dynamic as the Yugoslav, chiefly because the Bulgarian peasant is different from the Yugoslav peasant—more passive, more industrious, less inclined to political or social visions. The active resistance against the Germans and the government was initiated by the Workers' Union, which includes the Communists, the left-wing Peasant Party, the Agrarian Party, the progressive elements of the old Socialist and Democratic parties, as well as the officers of the Republican League. The coalition is known as the Fatherland Front. Active in the movement are former Prime Minister Mushanov, a member of the Democratic Party, Nicholas Petkoff, former deputy of the Agrarian Party, and Professor Petko Stainov, of the National Conservative Party. The influence of Colonel Damian Velchev is very great, though this patriot is in prison as the result of an unsuccessful attempt to set up a Bulgarian republic in 1934.

The Partisans started their activities in the summer of 1941 by attacking the concentration camp of Gonda Voda. Since then innumerable acts of sabotage and attacks upon enemy installations have taken place all over the country. In September, 1943, the Minister of the Interior, Docho Hristov, asserted that the Partisan movement had only 2,000 members. But in November the government announced that the Partisans had sustained over 1,000 casualties. The Moscow All-Slav Committee put the number of Bulgarian Partisans at 30,000. Other sources in Bulgaria speak of a force of from 12,000 to 20,000 which is in direct contact with Tito's Yugoslav Army of Liberation. Among Tito's Partisans there is one Bulgarian detachment. The Bulgarian army has refused to fight the Bulgarian Partisans, and the government has had to create a "fighting police unit" dedicated "to crushing the revolts, fighting the enemies of the state, suppressing all Partisan and terrorist bands, and restoring order." At the end of 1943 the Bulgarian Minister of the Interior declared: "I will not refrain from mentioning the fact . . . that in certain mountainous regions . . . there are wandering groups . . . bandits who are trying to disrupt internal order. In order that their liquidation may be speedy, the government will require the assistance of the entire organized force."

The Germans have started taking hostages in Bulgaria, and the prisons are full. Lately, certain generals, including General Lukas, who was Minister of War in the Bojilov government, have been taken into custody. Once entirely loyal to fascism, they can no longer be trusted by the Gestapo or the clique surrounding the court, for they see German defeat approaching. Several generals and high officers have escaped to Russia or Turkey, and they have all declared that they want to serve in the Red Army. This situation is similar to the one which arose in the second half of 1918, when the Bulgarian army split and disbanded even before its Austro-German partners had collapsed on the western front. There is a decided possibility of an army coup d'état, but it will probably not be carried out before the Red Army has crossed the Bulgarian frontiers. Meanwhile, the Germans are policing the country and the army.

The Bulgarian ruling class has accepted collaboration with Hitler because of its dream of a Greater Bulgaria which would include the northern Greek provinces and Yugoslav Macedonia—in other words, which would unite the whole of Macedonia under the Bulgarian flag. Unfortunately for the Bulgarian rulers, Greece and Yugoslavia will never accept such a territorial settlement. Certainly Tito will not. Yugoslav Macedonia has been recognized as a sovereign entity by the National Liberation Charter, equal in status to the other components of the Yugoslav nation. Bulgaria will have to accept this solution, for if it continues in its present course it will find Yugoslavia and Greece a united opposition. Nor will Russia be inclined to show any great tenderness toward a country which should have been an ally but which preferred the dubious benefits of collaboration with the enemy.

Back in 1941 Bogdan Philov, then Prime Minister of Bulgaria, explained his country's vacillating foreign policy to a Western diplomat by telling him an old Turkish story. "One of the Sultan's governors," he said, "had been condemned to death. As his last wish, he asked to see the Sultan, for he had some very important information to impart to him. When the guilty governor was brought before the Sultan, he told him that he had discovered the secret of how to teach a donkey to talk. If he were granted a year's leave, he would prove it. The Sultan was astounded. He granted the governor his reprieve. Later, the condemned man's friends asked him how he expected to keep his promise. 'In a year's time,' he answered, 'the donkey or the Sultan or I myself may die a natural death; in a year's time many things can happen to save me from the hangman's noose.' "

That is the position of Bulgaria's ruling classes today. But they may not have as much time as the guilty governor.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

Goebbels's Biggest Lie

EVEN before the purge of July 20 there were many signs that a considerable number of high officers in the German army had turned against Hitler. Since the beginning of July the Nazi regime had considered the symptoms of disaffection serious enough to require mention in its propaganda broadcasts, both foreign and domestic. In his funeral oration at the grave of General Dietl, killed in the retreat from Russia, Hitler gave special emphasis to this statement: "May his example inspire many German officers and generals. May they learn to banish any idea that a struggle in which the entire fanaticism of a nation is engaged might end otherwise than in victory." In Switzerland, whose press is as accurate and as well-informed as our own, the statement caused great surprise. The Basel Nationalzeitung wrote on July 6:

> Hitler's mysterious allusions indicate that, contrary to his own assurances, frictions and crises of confidence have in fact arisen between the generals as a group and the Supreme Command. A first rift, denoting crisis, divides the highest military authorities.

Immediately afterwards came the dismissal of Marshal von Rundstedt. And although many marshals and generals have been dismissed at one time and another, there was an unusual circumstance this time.The Berlin correspondent of the great Swiss newspaper Neuen Zuercher Zeitung wrote on July 8:

> The fact must be stressed that the change in the High Command in the Western theater of war was officially announced. Usually, the man in the street (and the soldier in the ranks!) does not learn about such changes until the new incumbents suddenly appear in photographs and are mentioned in communiqués. . . . Rundstedt's replacement was a complete surprise, even to > usually well-informed circles in Berlin. It is unanimously understood that Rundstedt's replacement is an event of major importance.

And the correspondent of the Stockholm Aftonbladet, who is known to have the best connections among Nazi officials and to be sympathetic to the regime, was able to send to his paper, with the approval of the Nazi censors, the following observations:

> The German army has recently lost an unusually large number of generals. Although some were killed or captured, the majority did obviously surrender to the Russians of their own accord. Earlier in this war, German generals often showed great skill and daring in evading capture, but now their ingenuity seems to be on the decline. Instead, the colony of anti-Nazi German officers in Moscow is growing larger. What is happening now, in fact, could be the subject of an interesting debate. Do German generals, for instance, find a certain satisfaction in falling into enemy hands? And is there a tendency in favor of capitulation among German generals? . . . If German generals have come to the conclusion that the Third Reich no longer has a chance militarily, it is likely that the idea of capitulation will gain ground among them. Some observers consider that this has already happened.

Not only was general disaffection among the officers noticeable; the Nazis themselves drew public attention to it, obviously as psychological preparation for what was to happen. What happened was the throwing of the bomb—a metaphorical bomb, since it is still uncertain that there was a real one. As this is written, all signs indicate that there was not—that the colossal bomb whose explosion was so remarkably ineffective was one of Dr. Goebbels's inventions.

Even less worthy of belief is the official representation that a so-called "clique" of generals and officers had attempted to "usurp" authority in an open coup d'état. Every authentic detail that has come to light has indicated more clearly that the Nazis, as is the way with dictatorships, made a preventive move against a possible menace that had not yet taken any definite form. The fact that the alleged bomb-thrower, Graf von Stauffenberg, was executed immediately, instead of being questioned for days and weeks as to his backers and accomplices, indicates that there was nothing to ask questions about. The fact that the "usurpers" did not take possession of any of the dozens of civilian radio stations in Germany, or any of the hundreds of transmitters in the army, indicates that there cannot have been an attempt to seize power. The lightning speed with which the list of "traitors" was published, the smooth precision with which Elite Guard formations entered army staff headquarters all over Europe at exactly the same time and arrested generals in the presence of their men, indicate that it was the Nazis who did all the plotting.

It is fairly simple to reconstruct what actually took place. Among the higher officers the conviction has been growing for weeks that the war is hopelessly lost and must be liquidated at any price, even at that of capitulation. But those who held this view were not united on a course of action. Some favored an "Anglo-American solution;" others, apparently a greater number, favored a "Russian solution." The former wanted to open the gates in the West in order to keep the Red Army and Bolshevism out of Germany; the latter were more inclined to put their hope in Stalin's declaration of November, 1942, that only the "Hitlerite" army, not the German army, would be destroyed, and in the endless stream of propaganda to that effect that has come from General von Seydlitz's committee in Moscow. But regardless of this lack of unity, the spread of defeatism among the higher officers was known to the Nazis, who of course know everything, and they decided to eliminate both schools of thought.

The list of "traitors" was drawn up, the preparations made. But it is not easy to arrest large numbers of angry officers in the midst of their own troops. Such a thing can lead to fighting, and the outcome is uncertain. Therefore it was necessary to invent a story which would, at least for a time, so stupefy, bewilder, and paralyze the troops that they would not readily obey or help their officers. Hence the "bomb," the "plot," the "coup." Of course, in the long run, the story would hurt the morale of the whole country, including the army, but that long-term disadvantage must be accepted in view of overwhelming present necessity.

We must reckon with the fact that hundreds of high officers who wanted to surrender have been massacred or at the very least imprisoned, and with them, indiscriminately, all civilians who could possibly be suspected. We can now give up any thought of a "revolution from above." It is probable that from now on every officer with any extensive authority will have at his side a "political commissar," who will read all his mail, both incoming and outgoing, and hear all his conversations.

Hitler and Himmler now more than ever are certain that there will be no "active" revolution. There never was any likelihood of such a revolution from below; infiltrated by the Gestapo and surrounded by Elite Guards, the people have never been able to do anything. And now a revolution from above is equally unthinkable; all those in high places who may have been willing and able to do something have been eliminated. It is of course possible that others will appear as time goes on. However, there is in principle only one means by which Germans can shorten the war: a "passive" revolution, a revolution that consists in doing nothing, a revolution of fighters who don't fight well enough and workers who don't work well enough. And "the night of the long knives" has made even that more difficult.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Lytton Strachey

BY LOUIS KRONENBERGER

IT IS very understandable that, for last year's Rede Lecture at Cambridge, Max Beerbohm should have chosen to speak about Lytton Strachey.* The two men are far from unlike in temperament; the epigram that Wilde coined for one of them—"The gods have bestowed on Max the gift of eternal old age"—might have been better applied to the other. And the two men are very much alike in their approach to literature as, above everything else, an art. Max's lecture, indeed, is the most graceful of tributes from one very literary man to another. What Max appreciates most in Strachey is his manner, his artistry, his prose; they are the things we should most expect him to appreciate; very likely they are the things that are most to be appreciated. But, like many other graceful tributes, Max's lecture is not very searching criticism; and like much else in Max's writing, it tells more about the author than the subject. But it comes at a good moment, since Strachey was never more neglected; and even its too genial desire to praise serves a good purpose. For the reaction against Strachey—though it was clearly inevitable and in large part sound—has gone too far. I think he will be honorably remembered again, though he will be remembered on other, and smaller, grounds than those on which he was first acclaimed.

Strachey's work already dates, for it embodied an attitude more congenial to its own moment than convincing in ours; an attitude, moreover, that became almost tawdrily fashionable. Yet to call Strachey a debunker is—as Max remarks—not only vulgar but silly: Strachey looked for much more than the feet of clay. Indeed, it was rather less the feet of clay than the Achilles tendon that absorbed him; less what was ignoble in people than what was petty or provincial or absurd; and he often—as with those last words on Manning's hat or Creighton's black bag—forced the note. He was a little too eager to show that a great deal of history's size and brawn was only excess fat.This, I think, arose less from any positive desire to debunk than from a temperamental necessity to question. Strachey was a natural skeptic; but he became much more of one, and a shallower one, because at bottom he was also a romantic. He was half afraid not to be skeptical, for when he forgot to be, he too often soared off into hyperbole and now and then even sank into gush.

Though Strachey won his real recognition as a biographer, he was essentially a man of letters who could almost be said to have seen life in terms of literature. It is one of his fascinations that he treated biography as less a branch of history than an outer province of fiction. His subjects, shaped with a novelist's art, cry out to be imaginary: if only he could take a few real liberties with them, how incomparably glittering or delightful or unbearable they would be! Had Albert not been real, Strachey might have portrayed him as the greatest of all prigs; had Bacon never existed, he might have become the most brilliantly devious of all self-seekers. Even as it was, Strachey went so far as to forget that Dr. Arnold had been real; and when the true Elizabeth eluded him, he trumped up something that might pass for her. Victoria, to be sure, with her royal manner and schoolgirl's mind, offered a contrast too piquant to need much tampering with, which may be why she emerges as Strachey's masterpiece. Many of his other characters suffer from more than a sense of the fictional. For Strachey did not handle them fictionally in the one way that might have vindicated his method—that of penetrating to unsuspected depths. On the contrary, while pretending to make people more complex than they seemed, he often made them simpler. The most notorious example of this is Queen Elizabeth. Her shilly-shallying, instead of being probed to its origins, is made the equivalent of the woman herself, and she winds up, as I have said before, much like Indecision in a morality play. I think there was an excessive taste for melodrama in Strachey—it is fairly common to over-civilized minds; at any rate, he too often saw people in a theatrical light and wrote about them in a rhetorical manner.

Strachey's claims as a biographer must rest on "Eminent Victorians" and "Queen Victoria," for "Elizabeth and Essex" is pretty clearly an ornate failure. For its own time "Eminent Victorians"—and not merely because it came first—was more valuable than "Queen Victoria"; in our time it seems rather less successful. Its indictment of Victorian values—values, most of them, that did not perish with Victoria; values, some of them, that will only perish with the race—is still a powerful one. Everything narrow, stupid, rigid, muddled, snobbish, scheming, brutal in the official British character was somehow brought to light; in the moral rather than strictly documentary sense, "Eminent Victorians" ranks among the most telling of modern exposés. But like too many exposés, the moral tone is superior to the factual evidence. After all, if you plan to submerge a whole society by means of four human beings, you have to put weights on all four to make them drag so much else down with them. Toward Dr. Arnold, Strachey lacked a sense of justice; toward Florence Nightingale, a sense of proportion. Perhaps none of the four, except Manning, counts greatly for himself; it is what stands behind and around and above them that Strachey is really firing at. And as a weapon of combat, "Eminent Victorians" was admirable. It hit hard, and afterwards things were not quite the same. Certainly biographies were not. A school of genuine debunkers arose who confused Strachey's faults—not least, his impulse toward malice—with his virtues, and hastened his decline.

"Queen Victoria," created in a more relaxed and temperate mood, has certainly less bite than "Eminent Victorians," and very probably less seriousness. It has the tone of comedy rather than of cold irony. Its exasperating but hardly dangerous heroine can more safely be rendered justice, and justice demanded a certain liking and admiration.

---

* "Lytton Strachey." By Max Beerbohm. Alfred A. Knopf. 60 cents.

The meaning of the events of Victoria's reign is seldom probed; but it could not be if Victoria was to dominate, for it was only society Victoria dominated, not affairs. Yet within limits—and perhaps because there are limits—"Queen Victoria" is a well-nigh perfect biography. Its morality is held in suspension, which makes in the long run for better art. There is a touch of brassiness about "Eminent Victorians." "Queen Victoria" is less weighty, but the metal is purer.

Leaning far more, as a biographer, toward the man of letters than toward the historian, Strachey provides no feeling of mass or scope. In "Eminent Victorians," it is true, much is successfully implied in little. But the great forces and conflicts of history he did not respond to, and perhaps did not fully understand. Too much of history dwindles, with him, into melodrama, tableau, vanitas, or a mere joke. His selective method could be deadly; his command of irony accomplished more, at times, than any accumulation of facts could have done, or perhaps any power of analysis. But there remains, for all that, an imperfect insight into large events and really eminent men; and a certain want of positive values. Strachey disliked the reactionary, yet he never truly emerges as a liberal. He makes fun of the old-fashioned, yet he is certainly no modern. He judges the nineteenth century rather by the standards of the eighteenth than of his own. Furthermore, his skeptical nature rejected any real idea of progress. He was "enlightened" in the frosty, urbane eighteenth-century sense of the word, which meant rather to deprecate the weaknesses and evils of mankind than suppose they could be cured. All reformers, to Strachey, were apt to be a little funny; all revolutionaries a little mad; and prigs, whatever their virtues, more unendurable than knaves. The point of view has its artistic advantages, but for understanding and interpreting life it is over-civilized—too fastidious and quirky, and not sufficiently humane. Strachey's was a highly cultivated attitude of ne quid nimis and nil admirari, with a smile at life that hinted a shrug. That is one reason why he appealed so greatly to a post-war generation; another is that, for all his destructiveness, he never attacked the generation's own defenses.

Strachey's happy hunting ground was, of course, the eighteenth century: the Augustan way of life, the classical virtues, are what he most admired, and in a sense most romanticized. He recognized, as who would not, the personal faults of the Augustans. He understood, too, the price —in breadth of experience—that a Walpole or Madame du Deffand paid for what he got. But he did not think the price too high. The eighteenth century delights the artist in almost all of us, but repels the human being; Strachey, however, saw the period almost entirely artistically, and so became romantic about it. He even copied its tendency to snigger. What he could not acquire was its prose style; as the child of the nineteenth century, or at most of the Gibbonian eighteenth, Strachey liked rhetoric and high language far too well. He could be insufferably highflown in a way that would have made Gray or Walpole wince. On the other hand, the best of his short pieces—which rank with the best of his work—spring from his intense feeling for the eighteenth-century way of life; and his strong classical sense led him to write, long before the reaction against romanticism, his tonic essays on Racine and Stendhal.

I do not think that Strachey was a notably good critic. He could appreciate genuinely, and a little more eclectically than we might imagine; he could demolish stupidity, pedantry, incompetence; he could raise some very interesting points. But the critic in him lay too close to the bookworm and too far away from the psychologist and real man of the world. He is too literary to be a first-rate judge of literature.

It would not be easy to maintain that Strachey will be a figure of any lasting importance. Yet there is a different view to be taken of him, the view that Beerbohm—without formulating it—takes in his lecture. Uncritical as the lecture is—doubtless tact made it ignore what taste would have made it condemn—it yet reminds us, as we need to be reminded, of the sheer pleasure that Strachey provides. For all its faults, the style is both a commanding and a brilliant one. The narrative gift is remarkably fine; the architectural sense remarkably sure. A little like Macaulay before him, Strachey made, as it were, a good story of everything he wrote; he might be vulgar, or shallow, or high-pitched, or misleading; but he was never dull. The lively, cultivated, often distinguished pleasure he knew how to provide need only be assessed it its true value; it certainly need not be spurned.

India Is Still There

THE PEOPLE OF INDIA. By Kumar Goshal. Sheridan House. $3.

REVOLUTION IN INDIA. By Frances Gunther. Island Press. Cloth, $2; Paper, $1.

PEOPLES OF INDIA. By William H. Gilbert, Jr. Smithsonian Institution. 25 cents.

WITH the attention of the United Nations concentrated on the offensives in Europe and the Pacific, the problem of India has been left in the backwash of current world developments. In true perspective, however, the political status of India remains one of the inescapable issues of the war that is now being fought around the world. It is also an immediately practical issue in terms of war operations, since full enlistment of Indian national energies would lead to a much more rapid crumbling of the Japanese military position in Burma and Southeast Asia generally.

The Indian problem of today, despite its greater complexities, is as simple in its broad outlines as was that of the American colonies at the end of the eighteenth century. Too often its salient features are overlaid with irrelevant or subsidiary matter, or bogged down in technicalities and legal niceties. Kumar Goshal has so used the wealth of detail in his comprehensive analysis that it clarifies both the historical background and the contemporary issues. A straightforward and unpretentious style and a careful apportionment of space, which leaves roughly half the book to pre-modern developments, contribute to the same end. Mainly for these reasons, he has written one of the most cogent and powerful statements of the case for Indian freedom that have appeared in English.

Introductory chapters, which sketch the main aspects of India's early society and culture, provide an insight into the evolution of the Indian people. They also serve to re-create the situation which existed when the first Portuguese, Dutch, British, and French traders arrived in the sixteenth century. British penetration, developing slowly, passed through several distinct phases—Goshal's account in each case is documented from British sources. The wealth of the Indies was not a rhetorical phrase in the pre-industrial era. It existed in the form of well-developed artisan manufactures as much as in gold. Familiar speeches by Burke and Sheridan publicized the excesses of the early "plunder" phase, which became starker as the East India Company engaged in internal trade and monopolized the civil revenues. Less familiar are the two great economic turning-points, and their significance, in the history of the British connection with India. The sudden influx of Indian treasure after the Battle of Plassey in 1757 provided the capital needed to set in motion the combination of factors in England—demand for standardized goods, surplus labor power, and new inventions—which produced the Industrial Revolution. New economic requirements were thereby created. The rising industrialists sought to transform India into a market for British exports and a source of raw materials. It was their attack which exposed the East India Company, and finally broke the trade monopoly. Their victory, and the second turning-point, came in 1813. Thereafter, heavy tariffs discouraged British imports of Indian manufactures, the exports of British factory goods to India multiplied, and millions of Indian artisans were forced back on the land to grow indigo, tea, raw cotton, wool, jute, and food grains. This change set the pattern of the Indian economy. Industrialization was prevented for nearly a century, and is still retarded in basic respects.

The rise of Indian nationalism forms the dominant theme of the second half of Goshal's study. Beginning with the intelligentsia in the late eighties, the tide broadens and deepens until it sweeps in the great peasant and worker masses of India. The peasant Kisan Sabha and the trade unions give the Congress Party of today its roots in the people, which are its real strength and make it truly representative. Careful analysis is devoted to the great popular Indian struggles of this century, beginning with the successful fight against the partition of Bengal. The reader can come to but one conclusion: transfer of power, if British policy favored it, could be peacefully accomplished with a minimum of disturbance. Repression of the Congress and manipulation of the divisive forces—the Princes, the Moslems, and such devices as communal electorates—make it likely that the transition, when it comes, will create widespread upheaval and bloodshed. Unless real change in policy occurs, a chapter in early American history will be repeated in India.

This conclusion, inherent in Goshal's analysis, is openly expressed by Frances Gunther. "Revolution in India" is bitterly challenging, a denunciation not only of Britain but of the United Nations for failing to take more positive measures in behalf of India. It is also an arsenal of facts dealing with virtually every controversial issue affecting Britain's relation to India. Within its brief limits here is a mine of exact information primed with heavy charges of TNT. As a debater's handbook on India it is unexcelled, although to many it will not be as convincing as Goshal's more temperate argument. The author would favor a challenge to Britain's policy on India by the other United Nations, but evidently believes that the final sanction of Indian independence will have to be the strength and determination of the Indian people.

"Peoples of India" is an extraordinary document to appear in the Smithsonian's War Series. In its catalogue of languages, races, and castes, as well as its social and political comments on the side, it follows the typical line of propaganda on India which has been so overworked. In this respect it surpasses even the Simon report. When, in addition, one learns that Indian poverty is due to overcrowding and Indian malnutrition to ignorance, while poverty and famine are in turn cited as evidence for overcrowding, both the logic and the propaganda seem equally amazing. No reader should miss the list of Indian "temperamental characteristics," evidently designed to illustrate the hopeless backwardness of such "peoples." On the political side, so the author states, the United Nations must find a solution to "the decision of the Congress Party to refrain from cooperation in winning the war." This booklet will not help Americans to understand either the Indian people or the vital issues at stake in India.

T. A. BISSON

Invitation to Learning

FRONTIERS OF AMERICAN CULTURE: A STUDY OF ADULT EDUCATION IN A DEMOCRACY. By James Truslow Adams. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

ADULT education is, as Mr. Adams says, a jungle. It is, as he is too polite to say, a jungle with an additional undergrowth of pedantry and pedagoguese. When the American Association for Adult Education asked him to write a volume on the subject, he wisely bypassed as much of the jungle as possible, to follow a path marked out by his customary historian's sense and his customary command of pungent English. The result is a highly readable work of broad social meaning.

In this book, as in his earlier "Epic of America" and "The American," Mr. Adams lays down the thesis that Americans have been distinguished by their individual striving to get ahead and their collective faith in the "American Dream" of opportunity for all. As an explanation of a whole people's experience the thesis can be and has been sharply criticized, but few other theses would explain as well the continuing American quest for education beyond formal schooling. Perceptively, with humor but never with condescension, Mr. Adams traces that quest from the colonial period, when most adults could learn only by living, on through the era of organized self-improvement in such agencies as the Grange and the Rotary, correspondence schools, and radio institutes. His chapters on specific agencies are uneven in value—the sections on workers' schools and university extension courses dissolve into a succession of pleasant generalizations. But when the chapters are good they are strikingly good. His treatment of men's and women's clubs cuts through to the dilemma of the women's-emancipation movement, which for too many women resulted merely in winning the right to stand up in the bus and to be bored by Browning. Mr. Adams is optimistic about the newer trends of the movement, but his implied recommendations are a good deal less convincing than his analysis.

It is always in its normative phases that this book is least satisfying. Mr. Adams is far from uncritical of the way adult education has functioned, but too often the fangs of his criticism are pulled by a graceful "on the other hand." If adult education is as important as Mr. Adams says it is—and in that he is certainly right—it is important enough to be favored by unrelenting criticism. His tendency to substitute urbanity for cogency in looking toward the future has most serious consequences in the discussion of post-war adult education. How far such a program should be controlled by the federal government is a serious question of immediate importance, to be shaken down to its fundamentals as quickly as possible. Mr. Adams indicates that he wants as little federal control as possible, but he glides around the mine traps of the discussion by a jocular disavowal of "political" interests, by setting in opposition a vague something called "planning by a few" and a vague something called "the individualism of the many," by a persistent casualness. It is a pity that a book which does so much to make the past of adult education inviting should do so little to rescue its future from irrelevant clichés and inadequate dichotomies.

ERIC F. GOLDMAN

Fiction in Review

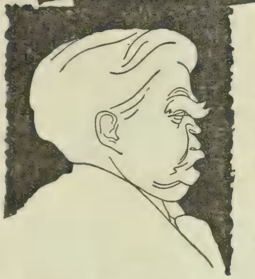
IT IS surely one of the significant aspects of our current fiction, especially of our current patriotic fiction, that its writing tends to be either so affectedly modest or so elaborate and pretentious. On the one hand, we have the prose of John Hersey's "A Bell for Adano": "Major Victor Joppolo, U. S. A., was a good man. You will see that . . . Major Joppolo was Amgot officer of Adano, and he was good," and on the other, the torrential stream of self-consciousness of a book like Joseph Stanley Pennell's "The History of Rome Hanks" (Scribner, $2.75). Here is a sample of Mr. Pennell's prose, which has been described as Joycean, John Dos Passosian, Proustian, and everything except fustian:

> Is it then so simple as this, Lee thought, staring beyond the desk-drawer with rapt eyes and a soft frown, that he had not been apprised of certain truisms of life with a capital L? Or was it perhaps that he had, at nineteen, been too subtly (or too subtly to mark his unique convolutions) apprised? Nor yet would that seem to have been true, for, later, through the vertical-cum-horizontal arc of his life, he was apprised—and that rudely—many times over of these truisms, but he could not, did not, or would not grant them a roosting place.

On first glance, the two styles seem to have little connection, but actually they have a close spiritual kinship. For these are not two literary manners designed to express two different ways of thought. Rather, they are two different expressions of immaturity and non-thought. Mr. Hersey tells us simple and obvious things so simply as to make us believe he is being profound. Mr. Pennell tells us simple and obvious things so elaborately as to make us believe he is being profound.

And of the two methods, I must say I prefer Mr. Hersey's,

MAX LERNER: "Wechsler has stalked and studied his subject for a decade. He has now, with a passionate detachment, imprisoned between the covers of this book the most elusive personality and the most heartbreaking career of our time in America. Read these brilliant pages and weep for a lost leader."



The Loneliest Man in America

ALOOF, ruthless, trusting no one, rising from eclipse again and again to dominate the political and labor scene—what does this man want? Where is he heading? What is the strange force that drives him to power? Whether you damn John L. Lewis or swear by him, you must know. A brilliant labor reporter and Washington correspondent gives the answers.

LABOR BARON

A Portrait of
JOHN L. LEWIS
By JAMES A. WECHSLER

- The strange case of William Rhodes Davis, Mexican oil, and the endorsement of Mr. Willkie
- How Lewis lost out with Roosevelt
- Lewis and his ex-friends, the Communists
- Democracy(?) in the UMWU
- The $3,000,000 flop of District 50
- The McCormick-"United Mine Workers Journal" Axis
- What Lewis wants in the post-war world

Just published, 278 pages, index, $3.00

WM. MORROW & CO., INC.
425 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 16

if only because it is easier to read. But in addition, "A Bell for Adano" serves some objective, if primitive, political end, whereas "The History of Rome Hanks" seems to me to be nothing, either in writing or conception, but self-indulgence. It often turns out that patriotism is a very self-regarding sentiment and that love of one's land is merely a manifestation of self-love. It is certainly the case that in Mr. Pennell's novel the assertion of the glory that is America shows itself to be basically only an assertion of the glory that is the author himself.

"The History of Rome Hanks" is a very chaotic affair and when I say that it has a central character named Lee Harrington I do not mean central in the sense of giving the book a center; I mean merely that Lee Harrington is the alter ego of Mr. Pennell. Lee Harrington has been taunted by the sneers of a Vassar girl—"I am sure your grandfather must have been a fine old Southern gentleman!"—into investigating his ancestors. Lee's ancestors fought in the Civil War and large portions of the novel deal with Civil War reminiscences. (There is perhaps an inordinate emphasis upon amputated legs.) For the rest, Harrington's excursion into the past uncovers the usual amount of fortitude and accident and life-energy which it takes to continue the generations. But what is interesting, and especially so in view of the confusion of Mr. Pennell's time sequences, is the fact that although Lee Harrington has frequently appeared in the narrative as a grown person (usually prowling a street of brothels), the last chapter of the novel is devoted to his birth. We are led to conclude, that is, that the whole point of "The History of Rome Hanks" was to discover just how much suffering and courage combined to produce Pennell-Harrington. And since the answer is, "A great deal," we are irreverently inclined to ask, "Was it worth it?"

"If it were quite certain that whoever writes the peace treaty—whether Mr. Roosevelt or another—would be hanged the instant the treaty was ratified, any reasonable agreement would be ratified like a shot. Unfortunately, though, the writer of a good treaty will not be hanged but will be praised and admired, and this a certain number of Senators cannot endure. Therefore, they will certainly try to kill any treaty that may be made, and with the two-thirds rule to assist them they have a good chance of doing so. You think not? Then read this book* and see what happened before."—GERALD W. JOHNSON,
N. Y. Herald Tribune Books

 THE LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE By Ruhl J. Bartlett, $2.50.
The University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, No. Carolina

Although no doubt one could find something touching in the youthful hankering of certain of our present-day novelists after an American past or an American spirit, I think I would be a great deal more sympathetic to these researches if they were less clearly inspired by and informed with the easy emotions of present-day journalism. For while it is true that journalism, the most widely traveled of all aspects of our culture, has been aptest to speak of a peculiarly American responsibility in the world, it is also true that it was journalism that created the concept of the American century, with its overtones of imperialism. Also we must remember that it is journalism, of all aspects of our literary life, which is least committed to a cultural tradition and consequently most impelled to seek or create a quick substitute for tradition. But the sad thing is, of course, that no cultural heritage can be established overnight; it can only be whooped up overnight. Our journalists are therefore in a fair way to making a nation with a rich if not always conscious culture into a nation of cultural arrivistes.

DIANA TRILLING

The Pagan State

PLEA FOR LIBERTY. By Georges Bernanos. Pantheon Books. $3.

GEORGES BERNANOS, French Catholic and friend of Maritain and Péguy, earned the esteem of many liberals in this country with his magnificent and terrible book "Diary of My Times," which described the Spanish war as he saw it. A devout churchman, he was one of a small but stalwart band who dared to speak out against the crimes that were committed by Franco's followers behind the skirts of the church and in her name. Thereby he earned the right to have his plea for liberty read by all who are troubled about what may follow the fighting which is still going on.

That plea is couched in the Biblical form of epistles—to the Brazilians, with whom he took refuge after Munich, to the English, whom he hails as brothers mutually responsible with the French for the future of Europe, to the Americans, whom he knows very little, to the Europeans, of whom he himself is one.

In these epistles he shows himself master of a style of writing which has almost disappeared from English literature. These are exhortations in the grand manner—witty, brilliant, powerful in their analysis and their warning, persuasive in their appeal, reminiscent of the great sermons with which our grandfathers scourged their consciences. In the subtle and glowing translation by Harry Binsse their language provides an exhilaration too seldom met with in this journalistic age.

But the purpose of exhortation is not so much to please as to admonish and convert. Cut away the wit, the skill with hortatory dialectic, the passionate and stimulating anger, the wealth of quotable phrase, and what have you?

What kind of liberty is this French mystic pleading for? What kind of tyranny does he fear?

He finds that France fell because it was betrayed by its middle class, which was more interested in security than in honor. This middle class—not the Marxian bourgeois, but the great timid lump of mediocre dim-wits—is a potential danger in any country, even in England or the United States. The dry rot of materialism which reduced them to a cowering shell in France is already spreading to their brothers in other countries.

The real menace of our age is not Nazism or communism but this materialism beloved of the middle class, which feeds the pagan state, the Moloch state. Rome first raised this god-state to greatness; then Christianity with its emphasis on the spiritual value of the individual undermined and destroyed it. Now it threatens us again. Germans through Nazism, Russians through communism, perhaps—though he is not specific—Americans through advocacy of a strong central government, are all trying to raise it up on a new pedestal.

"The pagan state," Bernanos says, "is not only reincarnate in institutions: it has stamped itself upon minds and consciences. Communists or totalitarians, workers or bourgeois —each conceives the god in a different image and prays to him after his own fashion. . . . Today, just as it was twenty centuries ago, they base their hopes on a colossal bureaucracy. Henceforward too slothful freely to assume duties, and none the less rent with fear at the thought of the probable result of their vices, they will gladly hand over to the government the task of saving them from themselves, of forcing them to do what is necessary, provided only that their vanity may be spared, provided that they may always call themselves voters and be deemed in control of that vast machinery."

The pagan state "already regulates our toil and our lives." So what shall we do? Electing republicans won't save us, for at the rate things are going "a change of deputies or senators will matter no more than a change of umbrellas." What is needed is, first, a renewal of Christian virtue. The free man's bulwark against the menace of the pagan state is the church. Of it he expects "what God himself expects: that she shape men truly free, a breed of free men peculiarly effective because freedom is for them not only a right but an obligation, a duty, for which they must render God an accounting."

The second step toward salvation is even more provocative. With a renewal of Christian virtue may come, says M. Bernanos, a new chivalry which shall divorce power from wealth. In the eleventh century, which was singularly like our own, the kings had power, prestige, divine right. The Jews had money, but little else—not respect, nor power, nor even security. When the rulers needed money they took it. And there was more honor in being a poor but chivalrous knight than in being a rich man with a craven soul.

M. Bernanos is prepared for jeers, and it should be said in his defense that he is disarmingly frank about the difference between his ideal church and the recent practice in Spain. Readers familiar with medieval political and economic conditions may shudder at an attempt to abolish the slaveries of this period by returning to those of that older age. But mystics can always escape practical objections by a counterattack with their own variety of double-talk. It is as difficult to debate with them as to fence with quicksilver.

What is more important than trying to refute M. Bernanos's argument is to recognize that he is making himself the eloquent spokesman for three ideas which are appearing with increasing frequency in European writing. One is the assumption that communism has shown itself to have no more to offer men seeking liberty than has fascism or democratic capitalism. One is the plea for a rebirth of Christian virtue. One is an opposition to the power of money.

These ideas have appeared in speeches by De Gaulle, in the writings of Yugoslav Partisans, among certain Italian radicals. Singly or in combination, they will probably form

FARRAR & RINEHART, N.Y.

Turkey: The World's Enigma

THE RISING CRESCENT

TURKEY, YESTERDAY, TODAY AND TOMORROW

By ERNEST JACKH

TURKEY is today the bridge to three continents, guardian of the Dardanelles, direct path to the Middle East, India and the oil of the Caucasus. THE RISING CRESCENT is the first full and complete picture of the strongly revitalized nation that is Turkey today. For Ernest Jackh saw the evolution of that country at first hand. Here are documents hitherto kept secret. Here are 16 vivid photographs and 3 maps to illuminate a thorough text. Here is a revealing close-up of the country which has kept the Allies and the Axis guessing through five years of war. $3.50

THE BLACK RECORD OF CONGRESS

SEE AT A GLANCE the voting record of your Congressman and Senator on the most important issues affecting the interests of the people.

★ The complete grim tale of the 78th Congress graphically portrayed on a 26" x 40" chart illustrated in three colors — black, red and blue.

The facts SPEAK FOR THEMSELVES

Published by

LABOR INSTITUTE OF AMERICA

11 West 42nd St., N. Y. 18, N. Y.

Individual charts priced at $2.00 — special rates for bulk orders.

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRA

MOTION PICTURE

THE MOST IMPORTANT EVENT
IN 50 YEARS OF MOTION PICTURE ENTERTAINMENT!

DARRYL F. ZANUCK'S

WILSON

TECHNICOLOR

DIRECTED BY HENRY KING
WRITTEN FOR THE SCREEN BY LAMAR TROTTI

A 20th CENTURY-FOX PICTURE

on the Roxy stage...

FRED WARING
AND HIS PENNSYLVANIANS
With augmented company of 100
in a Stirring Musical Salute

ROXY CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES

STAGE PLAYS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (in association with Jack H. Skirball)

JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL

The FRANZ WERFEL—S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY—Staged by ELIA KAZAN

LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS

J. EDWARD BROMBERG

MARTIN BECK THEATRE—West 45th—AIR CONDITIONED
Evenings at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30.

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS ▪ Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.
AIR CONDITIONED

BLOOD DONORS NEEDED!

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

part of the new radicalism which is being born in the cloudy depths of European suffering. What shape that new radicalism will take, where it will come from, is not yet clear. Its eventual appearance is inevitable as fascism disappears, democratic capitalism moves toward the right, and communism takes the center position. For a Protestant American it is very difficult to see a Catholic mystic as the Messiah of the new dogma that will surely come to fill the vacuum on the left. But M. Bernanos might be its John the Baptist crying in the present wilderness.

MILDRED ADAMS

History as It Should Be Told

THE MAKING OF MODERN CHINA: A SHORT HISTORY. By Owen and Eleanor Lattimore. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.50.

IF THE purpose of history is to provide an understanding of the peoples who now live in this world and of their problems, this brief volume is a brilliant example of competent history writing. Most Americans know practically nothing of Chinese history. This is in part a reflection on the curriculum makers of our schools and colleges, who have taken an extraordinarily narrow view of human history. But it has also been due to the technical difficulties of writing histories of ancient countries like China or India, which have so much history to be covered.

Mr. and Mrs. Lattimore bypass most of these difficulties by concentrating on the development of the Chinese people, their ways of making a living, their ways of thinking, and their contacts with the outside world. Political developments are not neglected, but they are viewed in relation to the more basic social and economic changes. Fully half of the book, moreover, deals with modern China, the relatively brief period in which China has been influenced by contacts with the Western world. The result of this approach is to reduce the number of difficult, unfamiliar Chinese names to a surprisingly small number. Yet the great characters of Chinese history are all here, and they are treated in such a way as to impress the reader with their distinctive contributions.

Surprisingly enough, it is in the treatment of contemporary China that the book comes nearest to falling short of its objective. This is obviously not due to any lack of knowledge on the part of the authors. The historical sections provide an excellent background for the understanding of the problems of the present. Yet many of these crucial problems are glossed over by sweeping statements such as the following dealing with the totalitarian tendencies in the Kuomintang. "China is a democratic country," the authors declare, "in the sense that the party and the government represent what the vast majority of the people want." To buttress this statement, they give an extraordinary amount of space to a description of the functions and activities of the People's Political Council, an institution that could more accurately be cited as an example of the frustration of democratic aspirations in China than of their attainment. It is easy to understand why Mr. Lattimore should hesitate to criticize China in time of war. But is unfortunate that this extremely valuable book should be marred by short-range political considerations.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

FILMS

LATE as it seems, and little use as it is likely to be, and bad as in most respects it is, I am glad to see a moving picture which may help to remind a few millions of us of the people who—along with their attackers—have been involved in this war longest, most exhaustingly, and with the least help from their nominal allies. There are other things about "Dragon Seed" which I am more than glad to see in a movie. It is good to hear a man have the simplicity to tell his war-eroded wife, when she asks him whether he would have married her if she had been as she now is during their courtship, that he probably wouldn't have. It is good to hear it explained of a collaborationist that he was motivated entirely by devotion to his family. It is good to be shown, even sketchily, the mutually enriching sources of the reverence and contentment and fortitude of an old and upright man—his land, his wife, his sons, his grandchild. It is good to see this natural piety of his, and his sense of the sovereignty of the family, yield so slowly and with such pain to the imperious force of mere generalized community; and to see for the first time in a film even a little of the enormity and anguish it is for a family to destroy and to abandon its home and its farm.

It is good, too, to match a man who feels that killing, under no matter what circumstances, is a fearful act, as thorough in its consequences in the killer as in the killed. Or to hear a young man—an ally and a patriot—who has developed a vengeful obsession for cruel killing, spoken of by his father as "the sort of man I hate and fear most." Or to see a man wonder—and doubt—whether a people which has spent years at war can ever hope, as he says, to "get back to ourselves," except possibly through the memories of peace which the old transmit to those who are too young to have endured the guilt.

Such matters aside, however, "Dragon Seed" is an almost unimaginably bad movie. Mrs. Buck persists in a questionable habit of making her Chinese peasants talk like a Bible revised by Butcher-Leaf-Lang-and-Myers. This Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer film is a limp-leather-bound, goosefleshy Golden Treasury of such talk—"the wind has brought the rain" instead of "it's raining" or just watching it fall; "you place the book where my hand cannot reach it" instead of "put that back, damn it." I wouldn't like it any better, I must grant, if the same characters talked like vaudeville laundrymen, or internationalized themselves with phrases like "by heck" or "tarnation strike me"; in fact I think that finding a diction proper to so-called simple folk is one of the most embarrassing, not to say hopeless, literary problems we have set ourselves.

M.-G.-M. was up against still other problems. The California countryside they chose for location shots, Mrs. Buck is reported to have said, was a deadringer for parts of China before they got busy terracing it, reterracing it, and finally painting the terraces to make sure they would show. The film's backgrounds are full of the evidence of this immense, earnest, rather pathetic labor: they look about as real and as habitable as a miniature golf course, and very likely cost as much as it would have to transfer the whole company to China.

Against these unearthly, sepia-tinted landscapes, speaking their inhuman language, move such distinguished Chinese as Katharine Hepburn and Walter Huston and Aline MacMahon and Akim Tamiroff and Henry Travers and Agnes Moorhead and Turhan Bey; indeed, I've never seen another picture so full of wrong slants. Since there are plenty of genuine and good Chinese actors around Hollywood, some of whom appear as the Japanese in this film, it was entirely unnecessary for these principals to undertake their hopeless assignments, and I shan't even try to say how awful and silly they looked—Miss Hepburn especially, in her shrewdly tailored, Peck-&-Peckish pajamas—with the occasional exception of Miss MacMahon and the rather frequent exception of Mr. Huston. Both of them obviously realized that it was much more important to convey the emotions of human beings than the charade mannerisms of Little Theater Chinese. In fact I cannot think of any other non-Chinese actor simple and sincere enough to manage so finely, under such difficult circumstances, as Walter Huston has done. To mention only two more of the main things wrong with this picture, "quaint" psuedo-Chinese back-ground-music was never more insultingly out of place. And I have never so intensely deplored the more and more stylish device of transitional narration, which here cosily, rather patronizingly, as if it were prodding those whom it talks of with its pipe-stem, comments upon the courage and endurance of a people—in the wheel-chair voice, if I'm not mistaken, of Dr. Gillespie.

JAMES AGEE

RECORDS

OF THE last recordings of Mozart symphonies that Beecham made with the London Philharmonic, Columbia has issued the one of K.338 (Set 548; $3.50), which replaces the old Beecham-Royal Philharmonic recording in the Columbia catalogue. That leaves—if I am correctly informed—one more still to be issued here: a recording of K.201.

The three movements of K.338 are like those of K.297 ("Paris"): an exquisite and affecting slow movement, preceded and followed by a brilliant Allegro. But the first movement of K.338 has more than just the rush of brilliance of the first movement of K.297; it has also majesty, power, and

First POPULAR PRICED EDITION
UNDER COVER
by John Roy Carlson
The startling exposé of the sinister Nazi network in America.
681,000 COPIES WERE SOLD AT $3.50
Now only $1.49
wherever books are sold
The WORLD Publishing Company
CLEVELAND, O. • NEW YORK CITY

"HEAVEN AND HELL"
The most definite teaching on the certainty of immortality and on the life hereafter is to be found in the Writings of
EMANUEL SWEDENBORG
famed scientist, philosopher, theologian and statesman. His book on HEAVEN AND HELL, FROM THINGS HEARD AND SEEN, may be obtained by new readers at the introductory price of five cents.
SWEDENBORG FOUNDATION, INC.
Room 1636, 51 East 42nd St., New York 17

44th Street Book Fair Gallery
To September 5
EXHIBITION OF NEW WORK
10 New York Artists
Oils . Water Colors . Drawings $5-$125
Open until 9 p.m. daily except Sunday
133 W. 44th St., near Broadway

BURLINGAME

RESORTS

"Fore" the Golfer
Newly Conditioned Course
A Grand "Pro"
New Clubhouse
. . . await your pleasure

. . . 28 miles of beautiful private trails. . . . Also—excellent tennis, boating and fishing on our private 7½ mile lake, golf; game rooms, cocktail lounge, dancing, really fine food...congenial atmosphere. Only 51 Miles from New York

The Glenmere
CHESTER, N. Y. Chester 200 (N. Y.) RE. 2-5047

HILLTOP LODGE
On beautiful Sylvan Lake
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
Tel.: Hopewell Junction 2761
R. R. Station: Pawling, N. Y.
Only 65 miles from New York City
EVERY CONCEIVABLE SPORT and RECREATION
Tennis • Night Tennis • Handball
Swimming • Boating • Horseback
Baseball • Cycling, Etc.
OUR FOOD IS TOPS
Under direction of:
PAUL WOLFSON &
SOL ROTHAUSER
New York Office:
277 BROADWAY
COrtlandt 7-3958

The Oaks
ELBERON, N. J.
Enjoy all outdoor sports, excellent tennis, ocean bathing, large, delicious cuisine, in this American plan country estate. On Highway 4N, only 50 miles from N.Y.C. (Jersey Central or Pennsylvania R.R. direct to Elberon.)
Phone Long Branch 2433
Mgt. of Joseph Horowitz

HATHAWAY LODGE
Formerly the palatial 592 acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, most of which have open fireplaces and private porches. Tennis, Handball, Swimming Pool, Horseback Riding, also Golf nearby. Marvelous food. Open all year. Attractive Summer rates.
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Tel. Tannersville 299

Twin Pines
on Trout Lake
An ADIRONDACK Adult Camp; Complete — Modern 4 doubles tennis courts; cement handball courts; swimming, boating, etc. Hotel comforts — camp informality. All rooms for 2.
TWIN PINES
J. Saidel, Manager
P. O. Lake George, N. Y.
Mid-August Reservations Only

SHADYBROOK
MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 963
50 miles from N. Y. C. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Tennis, handball, etc.; swimming. Free MOVIES.
AUGUST—$40 Weekly; $7 per day
Write for Booklet N POPPER & SIMON

quietly poignant interludes like those of the first movement of K.385 ("Haffner"). The rush of high spirits in the finale also is interrupted by moments of wistful reflection, by powerful outbursts. In short, the content, stature, weight, and impact are those of one of the great symphonies.

Most readers will want to know only that the new performance is superb and is recorded as beautifully as most other Beecham-London Philharmonic performances; and that the surfaces of my copy produce a little grit and crackling and sputtering. Some will be interested, as I was, in the differences between the old and new performances (to compare them I had to reduce the speed of my motor for the old recording to get the performance down from C sharp to C major). In the old performance the first movement is slower, and slows down for the quiet interludes; this increases the majesty and power and poignancy, whereas the faster and unslackening pace of the new performance gives the music urgency which is heightened by the sharper inflection. The second movement, on the other hand, moves a little faster and more easily in the old performance. In the finale the only difference is the sharper inflection of the new performance.

Columbia also has issued Schubert's Piano Sonata Opus 120 played by Casadesus (Set X-236; $2.50). This is the one that is most played by students and amateurs—which may be why the public has the idea that all of Schubert's sonatas are minor works with only the pretty melodies and the archnesses of this one. And if the public thinks of them as insipid and trivial it has got that impression from performances like Casadesus's of this one. A performer's inflection of a melody—his differentiation of its sounds and lifting of some into higher relief than others by gradations of force and pace—is his way of making the meaning he hears in it apparent to the listener. And Casadesus conveys to the listener how little meaning Schubert's melodies have for him with the pallid murmur that comes from his fingers, and that is in addition made dull and muffled by recording. The surfaces in this set are much noisier than the ones in the Mozart set.

For one of its two July record classics Columbia has chosen from its catalogue another superb Beecham-London Philharmonic performance and recording—the Suite from Bizet's "Carmen" (Set X-144; $2.50). One can accept this choice even though one can think of better ones; but it is downright perversion of the idea to feature as a record classic the set (440; $2.75) of Patter Songs from Gilbert and Sullivan sung by Nelson Eddy. His voice, when he sings, is fine; but his style, whether he sings or uses parlando, is poor; and the orchestra sounds terrible. The surfaces in these sets also are poor.

A reader writes to ask: "Why are many recordings so unspeakably bad in the sheer mechanics of catching the sound of a musical performance? I refer to gritty sounds, harsh passages, and scratching. Has the war made things worse because certain materials are not to be had? Or don't the recording companies give a damn? They certainly passed off some inferior stuff before the war." My correspondent has correctly answered his questions. The war did make things worse by creating a shortage of materials, the most important of which was shellac; but the companies have been getting all the shellac they can use since last March or April; and they did produce records with the defects my correspondent describes even before the war. The buying public, in effect, didn't give a damn about those defects; so the companies didn't have to. If it should ever become necessary for phonographs and records to be without defects in order to sell, the manufacturers will give a damn about producing them without defects.

Mr. Jay Leida of 6227¼ DeLongpre Avenue, Hollywood 28, California, writes that he is preparing a translation of Mussorgsky's letters and would welcome information about the existence of Mussorgsky manuscripts and documents in American collections.

If anyone else has written me recently and not received an answer will he please write again, since my letterbox was broken open while I was away.

To brighten things up after this painful item I will quote part of a publicity release from the Philadelphia Orchestra about Ormandy's visit to Australia. Ormandy spent an hour with General MacArthur discussing music; and the release quotes from his letter to Harl McDonald, the orchestra's manager, as follows:

> When I referred to your "Bataan" which you dedicated to him, his face suddenly became very serious, and he said: "Bataan was not a happy day in my life—and there will not be any happy days until we take back Bataan and everything that goes with it." Then he looked me straight in the face and said: "Ormandy," (here the censor deleted the two lines of the General's statement).

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

Tributes to Wallace

Dear Sirs: I wonder if Henry A. Wallace, despite being a "good loser," thinks of Aristides, whom the Athenians ostracised because they were tired of hearing him called "the just"? Wasn't the outstanding "liberal" in the Democratic Party, President Roosevelt himself not excluded, too frank and straight-forward to please the machine politicians who constituted most of the personnel of the Chicago convention?

Who else "called a spade a spade" and dared to denounce race discrimination on the convention floor? Didn't machine politicians feel that renomination of Mr. Wallace would alienate the Solid South and even result in a "white supremacy" party being organized there? What did they care for Gallup and other polls of public opinion which showed that Wallace was the overwhelming favorite of their party's rank and file?

That machine politicians assume a "public be damned" attitude is no more obvious than the fact that a new political alignment in this country of ours is long overdue. H. M. MERRILL

Laconia, N. H., July 22

Dear Sirs: Mr. Stone's prophesy "Wallace it will be" in the current edition of The Nation makes melancholic reading today.

What shall the liberals of America do now? We must take advantage of the fact that Mr. Wallace, in all probability, will be free of official restraints in January, 1945, and we must keep in mind that it has been the weakness of American progressives that they have lacked unity and leadership of character and vision for a long time.

May I suggest that you should give serious thought to how we can use Mr. Wallace's great abilities and popularity for the further advancement of American liberalism. HANS LAMM

New York, July 22

Dear Sirs: It is unfortunate that a great American like Henry A. Wallace lost the nomination for Vice-President because of "bossism." He lost it also because he lacked stronger support by the President. The Vice-President is definitely the man of the people. He is a great liberal. He is the voice of the masses in this troublesome era. He fought against racial persecution and oppression; he fought for labor; he fought for the farmer; he fought for the "little man."

It is unfortunate that the electoral system of this country does not permit the people to reelect Wallace together with Roosevelt even though he lost the nomination of his party. Such an event would be a slap at "bossism."

ALEXIS J. MORTOLA

New York, July 24

The Real Health Problem

Dear Sirs: Your editorial "The Health Scandal" draws attention to a situation that needs attention, but—like many current discussions—it misses the real center of this problem. Medical care, as practiced traditionally, becomes operative only when something has gone wrong. The patient, then, gets treatment which in quantity and quality varies with his financial position; but it is doubtful that this means that the indigent gets the poorest care and the richest gets the best. (See the many excellent free clinics and hospitals.)

The main difference between medical care in civilian life and that in the armed forces is not the financial availability, but the fact that in private life the patient goes to the doctor while in military life the physician searches for disease in the apparently healthy person.

To make present-type medical care available to all by proper financial arrangements will unquestionably prevent some premature deaths and some chronic, disabling conditions. It is unlikely that it will create a generation of men better fit mentally and physically.

In private practice the patient pays, according to a silent contract, for the particular service he desires. And, under this contract, the physician's responsibility ceases when that specific service has been rendered. It would come under the heading of questionable professional ethics, if a physician insisted on examining your heart and lungs when you go to him to have a foreign body removed from your eye.

A fitter population — statistically speaking—can hardly be expected by a more equitable distribution of therapeutic medicine—as much as the latter is to be wished for—but only by the fullest application of preventive medicine.

The present-day fight between individual practice and socialized medicine goes deeper than the much discussed financial implications for doctor and patient. In a much more fundamental sense, it is a fight for a different orientation of the physician's responsibility. The real question is whether the physician shall be responsible to his patient for the particular job for which he is paid or whether he shall be responsible to the community for the best possible health of all.

Any health insurance scheme per se will only give the poor the choice that the rich now have: to protect or neglect their health. A real advance in health matters must establish both the physician's and the client's responsibility to cooperate in the creation of optimum health.

MAX PINNER, M.D.

Bedford Hills, N. Y., July 24

Mr. Agee's Blood Pressure

Dear Sirs: It seems to me that Mr. Agee should immediately forego attendance at all movies. Surely he must be constantly on the verge of apoplexy.

MARTIN L. LAMER

West Haven, Conn., July 21

CONTRIBUTORS

RAY JOSEPHS has recently returned from Argentina, where he was correspondent for PM and Variety. His book, "Argentine Diary," is a best-seller.

ANNA LOUISE STRONG has spent most of her time since 1921 in Russia. She is the author of "I Change Worlds."

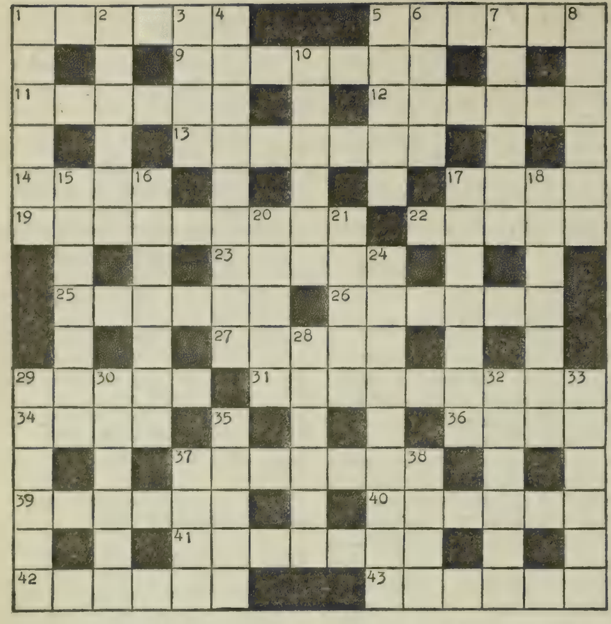
ALFRED VAGTS, author of "A History of Militarism" and "Hitler's Second Army," is a recognized authority in the field of military science.

BOGDAN RADITSA was formerly press chief of the Yugoslav government in exile.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER, theater critic of PM, is the author of "Kings and Desperate Men," a study of the eighteenth century.

MILDRED ADAMS was in Spain when its constitution was adopted in 1931. She has translated a number of Spanish political works into English.

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 75 by JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 He stood up to Sitting Bull at Little Big Horn
5 A psalm (anag.)
[redacted] Half-a-score fit, so capable of being defended
11 Put off—by the man in red, no doubt
12 Artists' stands, but not their pitches
13 A man with ruffled hair? The Prince of Darkness, surely 14 Give [redacted] girl "the eye"
17 An operatic Prince
19 A poor state, except in the case of crops grown to sow again
22 What bakers do to make dough
23 The graceful creature is put off by being given tea
25 Relationship of Necessity to Invention
26 "How happy is the blameless ------'s lot!
The world forgetting, by the world forgot" (Pope)
27 Takes the plunge
29 "Liberty and -----, now and forever, one and inseparable"
31 A man of the world
34 One cannot truthfully call Broadway the Great White Way today, thanks to this
36 Sort of advice we get through the ages
37 Mien of the man who has just collected a relief payment?
39 Home of bees—not apes
40 Seventh President of the French Republic
41 A serial over the radio
42 Cathedral city where more than one Frenchman has been crowned
43 Barmy

DOWN

1 Bric-a-brac
2 Not hard to detect an M.P. in distorted stories
[redacted] Ante up
4 How Red-gauntlet was caught?
5 Attorneys do, in simple addresses
[redacted] I have an inclination for such [redacted] part of the joint
7 Similar to a sled, but longer
[redacted] Bard, us? Ridiculous!
10 Kempis told Sam I'd start tomorrow (hidden)
15 Relevant, which is more than [redacted] Teuton is 16 Numerically progressive, the author hopes
17 Drops into
18 A tree with heather attached makes it appear younger
20 Ever poetically, that is
21 Here a verse is cut
24 Ulster fly (anag.)
28 Varies from a community in Italy
29 Henna dye won't cure you of being this
30 Courtois discovered this universal antiseptic in 1811
32 "I'm a bus!" (anag.)
33 They rank below the nobility
35 This English poet [redacted] to be contradictory
37 A short snort
38 No man can ---- what he never had, Izaak Walton decided

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. [redacted]

ACROSS:—1 GOODYEAR; [redacted] CAMERON; 9 INNOCENT; 10 SECULAR; 12 EMMET; 13 NAPLES; 14 RATEL; 15 DANIEL; 17 BROIL; 22 WATER; 23 VENICE; 24 HAREM; 26 AERATE; 28 WELLS; 29 SIMPLON; 30 DALADIER; 31 YOUNGER; 32 INCENSED.
DOWN:—1 GRISELDA; 2 ORNAMENT; 3 YACHT; 4 AWNING; 5 CAMEL; [redacted] PERUSAL; 7 POMADES; 10 SPARE; 11 CERISE; 16 ENAMEL; 18 PECAN; 19 VILLAINS; 20 MEASURED; 21 HALIDOM; 22 WEAPONS; 25 PETAIN; 27 ROMEO; [redacted] WHALE.

RESORTS

STEP into the SUN at FOREST HOUSE
Short Journey
L[redacted]ng Memories
All the Elements
for complete vacationing. Inspiring location (2 lakes), cordial hospitality, finest food and accommodations. All sports of the Season.
Mahopac 688
50 MILES from N.Y.C.
FOREST HOUSE
Lake Mahopac, New York

RELAX, REJOICE WITH [redacted] AT
Lakecrest
[redacted] Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.
90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N.Y.C. R.R. to Amenia, N.Y. Open all year.
WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATION
EVA BERG, Director Stanfordville 4108

Birdland
CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.
Formerly Lewisohn's Estate—Open All Year
One hour from N. Y. 225 acres of fascinating hiking country. SPORTS: Fast tennis courts, handball, golf, swimming, ping-pong, games and dancing. Excellent cuisine. Modern accommodations. Congenial surroundings.
Moderate Rates — Make Early Reservations
Tel. Highland Mills 7895 N. Y. Office, CI 6-8286

WALTELL HOUSE
On FRANKEL FARM
MT. BETHEL • PENNSYLVANIA
The Only Modern Farm Hotel Combined with [redacted] Children's Day Camp
Meats, Poultry, Eggs [redacted] Produce Right from [redacted] own farm. All Rooms with Private Bath. 75 miles from New York. All Sports. ELLA FRANKEL, Phone Bangor 6-2273 [redacted] N. Y. LEx. 2-5864.

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.
35 [redacted] FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

MERRIEWOODE
A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes. Interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails. Fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping-pong, square dancing. Intelligent, [redacted] companionship.
$38 and $42 weekly Olive H. G. Baron, Dir.

Timberland
[illegible] N. Y.
AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100
ALL SPORTS • PRIVATE LAKE
MUSIC • LECTURES • CONCERTS
N. Y. OFFICE: [redacted] W. [redacted] St. LOngacre 5-8674
The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

GRANITE LAKE CABINS—With private baths; Simmons beds. Water sports, excellent home cooking. Adults only, $60 [redacted] week double. Box 77, Munsonville, New Hampshire.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 · NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 12, 1944 · NUMBER 7

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 169

EDITORIALS

Candidate in Search of an Issue 171
The Philadelphia Strike 172
Hitler Underground by Freda Kirchwey 173

ARTICLES

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 174
On Reconversion by I. F. Stone 175
It's Hard to Seduce a Turk by Michael Carter 177
Fifty Years Ago in The Nation 178
The Supreme Court Today by Walton Hamilton 179
Polls, Propaganda, and Politics 181
In the Wind 182

POLITICAL WAR

The Poles Take Over by Anna Louise Strong 183
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 184

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The World of Welles and Lippmann by P. E. Corbett 186
Janeites Differ by Louis Kronenberger 187
Fascism—American Style by Ralph Bates 188
New Writing in Wartime by Delmore Schwartz 190
Surrealist Painting by Clement Greenberg 192
Drama—Furtherest West by Joseph Wood Krutch 194
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 195
CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 76 by Jack Barrett 196

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL · JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER · REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

IN JUST FOUR DAYS AMERICAN ARMORED columns swept like lightning across Brittany, cutting off the great ports of St. Malo, Brest, Lorient, St. Nazaire, and Nantes, and are now pointing toward Paris. The Russian army newspaper, Red Star, commented that the Americans "had carried the tactics of maneuver to their highest pitch." The Russians are fairly good judges in such matters. The British and Canadians, in taking Vire, have broken through the strong Nazi positions southwest of Caen and opened the way for them to meet the Americans advancing from the South. The western war appears now to have assumed a highly mobile character in that triangle whose broad sea-base is the French coastline from near Caen to St. Nazaire, whose sides are the Seine and the Loire, and whose peak is Paris. It is, however, foolish to predict that in the next weeks' fighting these particular topographical bounds will have much significance. We may well see a rapid German withdrawal from most of western France. It is a sign of the changed fortunes of the war that mention of Brest, Lorient, and St Nazaire as the once inviolable bases of the Nazi submarine fleet comes as a footnote. For the wolf-packs of the sea lanes have long since been whipped into submission.

*

INSIDE WARSAW TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND Partisans are reported to be savagely driving Germans out of fortified positions, seizing key buildings in the Old City, and standing firm against attacks by planes and tanks. As we write, General Bor, partisan commander, is fighting to maintain the initiative until the advancing Red Armies, whose guns can be plainly heard, effect a junction with his forces. It is testimony to the fortitude of a brave people that, after five years of unspeakable suffering and torture, the Poles of Warsaw should strike the first blow for the deliverance of their city. Such people have bought their freedom dearly and will properly insist on their right freely to choose their government. Elsewhere in this issue, Anna Louise Strong's story cabled from Moscow tells how the Poles from many sections of the underground in Poland set up their own Committee of National Liberation, which has been recognized by Moscow. There seems reason to hope that Premier Mikolajczyk, now in Moscow, may be able to bring about some understanding between the Polish National Committee and at least the more liberal elements in the London government-in-exile, which claim some support from underground Poland. Mikolajczyk is himself an agrarian leader and appears acceptable to the National Committee. A stable central Europe in the post-war period clearly depends on a Polish government genuinely representative of the Polish people and friendly to Czechoslovakia and Russia. Among the Poles in exile, the anti-Soviet die-hards who rest their claims on the dubious Pilsudski constitution of 1935 may be stubborn; the rest will welcome the democratic rebirth of the Polish people. It is to be hoped that London and Washington will not persist in backing the horse that looked like a winner in 1935 but is not even entered in 1944.

*

MARSHAL MANNERHEIM'S SUCCESSION TO the Presidency of Finland is generally expected to pave the way for a renewal of peace negotiations with Russia. At first sight it seems odd that Mannerheim, a dominant figure on the extreme right in Finnish politics, should be considered a suitable person to push negotiations with the Soviets. Yet stranger things have happened. Mannerheim's reputation as commander in the successful fight for independence against Russia at the close of World War I gives him a position enjoyed by no other Finnish leader. At the same time, unlike Ryti and Linkomies, the retiring President and Premier, he has made no commitments to Germany. Indeed, the old Marshal, brought up in pre-revolutionary Russia, has always been anti-German—as well as anti-Communist. Mannerheim may be the one man in Finland with sufficient prestige to accept stiff terms from Russia and strong enough to see that they are carried out against probable German resistance. Twice in recent months Finland has rejected terms that seemed extraordinarily lenient in view of the Soviet Union's favorable military position. Both times Finland's action seems to have been based on the hope that Germany would somehow be able to hold out in the Baltic and render some aid to the Finns. The trapping of the German forces in Esthonia and Latvia must have convinced the Finnish generals, headed by Mannerheim, that their position is now hopeless. It still remains to be seen, however, whether they are prepared to accept terms that will undoubtedly be a good deal harsher than those of June.

*

TURKEY'S LONG-AWAITED BREAK WITH Hitler's Reich has come. All Von Papen's bribes, threats, and devious methods of persuasion have failed, and his large staff of diplomats and propagandists have been sent packing. A full account of the methods employed in this prolonged attempt at seduction is contained in Michael Carter's piece elsewhere in this issue. To many in this country it has appeared that the move of the Turkish government amounts merely to a determination to be in at the kill and enjoy, unearned, the fruits of victory. But in justice to Turkey we must view its role in comparison to that of Hitler's Balkan satellites and Franco's Spain. If we have been exasperated by Turkey's refusal to come in on our side until the eleventh hour, Germany has been even more chagrined by Turkey's red-light neutrality that prevented the Reich from making use of the Middle-Eastern bridge leading to the Caucasus, the Suez, and North Africa. Had Turkey yielded to German pressure at the moment when Alexander's forces were backed up on the El Alamein line, or when the spearhead of the German forces was touching the Grozny oil fields, the Allies might have suffered a major disaster. Turkey's bets were probably on the side of the United Nations from the start and its action now will have an immediate effect on the crumbling loyalties of Hitler's Balkan allies—Bulgaria, Rumania, and Hungary.

*

LEOPOLD S. AMERY, SECRETARY OF STATE for India, has now officially rejected Mahatma Gandhi's compromise proposals which Louis Fischer outlined in The Nation of July 29. Mr. Amery admitted that Wavell had asked Gandhi to make an offer but insisted that the Indian's answer was not "constructive." Since Gandhi agreed to support the war effort and acquiesced in the Moslem demand for a separate Pakistan, his conciliatory gesture might at least have been examined by the British in the hope that the present ugly deadlock could be broken. But Wavell refused to talk with Gandhi, the Indian nationalist leaders, including Nehru, continue to languish in jail, and the situation is back where it was before Gandhi was released, only that bitterness and disillusionment have become more complete. Lord Munster, speaking for the British government in the House of Lords on July 25, made it clear that the stumbling block was India's wish for a responsible government. This demand, he said, "wrecked Sir Stafford Cripps's mission" in March and April, 1942. Munster is undoubtedly correct in surmising that England's refusal to accede to this demand is the key to the present Indian impasse. Gandhi has asked whether "the Four Freedoms include the right to be free." Apparently, the answer is no. Meanwhile, in the midst of this war for freedom, thousands of champions of freedom, thousands of anti-fascist Indians are completing two years of imprisonment without trial.

*

THE ANTI-NEW DEAL PRESS HAS BEEN USING up an enormous amount of precious newsprint to account for the latest series of reverses suffered by their favorites in the primaries. The ultra-isolationist Bennett Champ Clark lost out in Missouri, according to the New York Daily News, because he neglected "to keep in touch with the home folks." The unfortunate Representative Lambertson of Kansas, a self-appointed commentator on the Roosevelt family, was rubbed out because of "a matter of personality." Ham Fish had the closest call in his political life because his district had been shifted and because "Democrats, hired by the CIO, carried Republicans to the polls in their cars." The sinister influence of the CIO-PAC accounted for the three-party victory of Vito Marcantonio and Clayton Powell and the smashing victory against Tammany opposition of Donald L. O'Toole in Brooklyn. One simple common factor in all these contests—and in most of the reactionary upsets this summer—was largely overlooked: in every case where the domestic and foreign policies of the Roosevelt Administration have been a central issue, the pro-Roosevelt candidate has won or else made a surprisingly strong showing in a traditionally anti-Roosevelt district.

*

LOOKING OUT ACROSS LAKE GENEVA toward the massif of Mont Blanc there is a marble tablet that bears the inscription: "A la memoire de Woodrow Wilson, Président des Etats-Unis, Fondateur de la Société des Nations." Today, the League he founded is a ghost and Woodrow Wilson himself little more than a memory. In the magnificent motion picture "Wilson," that memory is clothed with the flesh and blood of a living man, an American President who belongs beside Washington and Lincoln because out of a daring vision and a high moral purpose he conceived a structure of world peace. Alexander Knox's presentation is distinguished and convincing. The mass spectacle, which has cheapened lesser plays, in this picture serves to set and people a great stage—broad as the world itself—on which, for a brief but decisive moment, Woodrow Wilson moved as the central figure. Had the ending been something other than the betrayal, the heartrending collapse of a mighty vision, we might not today be numbering in millions the deaths of fighting men and innocent civilians of all nations. Now we are back in a second Wilsonian era. Now we have arrived at a new moment of choice. It is a good thing that Woodrow Wilson has been allowed to speak once more.

*

THE ARRIVAL OF 984 REFUGEES FROM HITLER'S Europe links us with war's tragedy as pages of printed words, whole books of grim pictures, mountains of statistics fail to do. The human tragedy of any war is almost impossible for one to comprehend if one has not seen it at first hand. The calculated and pitiless cruelty of Hitler's sadists is so far outside of our experience that we tend to reject it as incredible. Yet here they are, lodged in a little town with the American name of Oswego, N. Y., and they are real—old men and women and little children—not so different from us. And in Hungary today there are 600,000 just like them, temporarily saved from death in the extermination centers of Poland by the protest of Americans and the American government. Some of these may be got out into Palestine—if we demand it insistently enough. Some into Turkey, which formerly refused even transit visas, now that Turkey has moved toward our side. And it is just possible that America could afford to receive a few more than the one thousand to whom the President promised refuge—America the war-rich land, the fat land, the land untouched by bombs, America, the deliverer.

Candidate in Search of an Issue

GOVERNOR DEWEY'S trip to the specially convened St. Louis conference of Republican Governors was part of his search for a campaign issue. At the moment it is questionable that what can't be found in Albany was turned up in St. Louis. Apparently there are two wings among the Dewey advisers. There are those who feel that saying little and praying is the safest method. The other group feels that firm statements on undebatable subjects are better.

But the problem still remains. Frank Kent of the Baltimore Sun, which this week came out for Dewey, reflects the Republican dilemma when he writes: "One of the difficulties the Republicans experience in this campaign is to find a line of attack upon Mr. Roosevelt to which the people generally will respond."

At St. Louis, the Governors issued fifteen theses which they will seek to nail on the door of the White House. As Dewey expressed it at a press conference in Albany, they are intended to resolve "areas of conflict" among federal, state, and local governments on "domestic" issues—labor, taxation, government expenditures, roads, insurance, and others. As for post-war employment, the surest guaranty is free enterprise, or, in the words of the Governors' manifesto, "private enterprise under a business system."

But if free enterprise and states' rights are to be the issue, it is a hesitant beginning to which it is doubtful that "the people generally will respond." The war cannot be an issue. It goes well; victory is too near. If, as some Republican leaders believe, victory over Hitler this summer might help their candidate, it would also serve to heighten the bitter inner conflict which today rages between "internationalist" Republicans and the "nationalists." For that will be the time to ask Dewey just where he stands on post-war collaboration among the United Nations. What Dewey can shunt aside now as "iffy" will have to be faced when Germany falls.

It is for this reason that Dewey now seeks to separate "domestic" issues from "international" issues, speaking of the latter in meatless generalities, but talking with great vigor and anger about "bureaucracy" and "New Deal inefficiency." Unfortunately, there are no "domestic" questions which are separable from international or foreign-policy questions. The administration of unemployment insurance and employment services involves durable economic planning not only at home but with other nations. International monopolies, cartels, high tariffs, and other trade barriers have a direct bearing on unemployment. Dewey's running mate, Governor John W. Bricker, has evinced little interest in the desirability of international trade free of major economic restrictions. He has been even more passive on the subject of post-war international cooperation. He is a "we-got-to-keep-our-own-sovereignty" orator, who may repel more votes than he attracts.

Dewey's attempts thus far to evolve safe-and-sane issues in other fields have been unsuccessful. His attack on the President's constitutional authority as Commander-in-Chief was swiftly stepped on by the saner elements within the G. O. P. Little has been heard on the subject since it was trotted out three weeks ago.

No less than the Democratic Party, the Republican Party is "a strange parade of incompatibles." What can be stranger than a party which is big enough—at the moment—to hold a McCormick and a Willkie? McCormick sits like a watchdog beside the citadel of isolation. Willkie, with his known hold on the mugwump, independent Republicans, has Dewey buffaloed by his silence. Dewey and his advisers know that until they take Willkie into camp they must step gingerly.

The Republican Party's tragedy is that it is not an opposition minority party. It is merely the right wing of the Democratic Party, a wing which must go along on New Deal legislation like the Wagner Act, Social Security, and the Fair Employment Practices Committee, but, in order to keep its franchise, must bleat about "curbing bureaucracy." Its attacks on F. D. R.'s foreign policy will not be on issues like Franco or De Gaulle but will consist of magic formulas like "secret diplomacy" and "selling out American interests."

The Republicans, of course, intend to raise all the hell possible about Sidney Hillman and the Political Action Committee. But even this plan is of dubious value. For Dewey and his political advisers know, from every poll and every other test of public sentiment, that the American people long for nothing so much as a clear and concrete program indicating the way to a future without war, in which working men and women can find security in their jobs and a chance of actually catching up with happiness. You cannot fight something with nothing. The PAC program offers hope of that sort of future to millions of Americans. To counter it Mr. Dewey will have to think up something better than mere accusations and warnings. He will have to find an issue.

The Philadelphia Strike

WE SEE two lessons in the Philadelphia transit strike. The first is that there is no point in wasting time on racial bigots. Neither patriotic appeal nor polite request by the military could get white Philadelphia transit workers to call off their ugly stay-out against an FEPC order giving eight Negroes a chance to work as motormen and bus drivers. The strikers began to go back to work only after the government showed that it meant business. We approve the steps the government took, and we hope they will be applied again, and more quickly, the next time there is an outbreak of this kind. The threat to cancel draft deferments of strikers, to bar them from other work under WMC orders, and to deny them unemployment compensation proved effective. The arrest of four strike leaders under the Smith-Connally act should prove a deterrent to similar demagogy in the future. It is time that backward elements in the ranks of labor as well as capital learned that racial discrimination in employment is contrary to the public policy and the ideals of this country, and that the government is prepared to punish those responsible for it.

The second lesson of the Philadelphia strike is that the sooner we take the FEPC out of the shadowy realm of existence under executive order and give it full statutory recognition, with power to enforce its decisions, the less trouble we shall have. The FEPC's present weakness invites disobedience and stimulates defiance. These Philadelphia transit workers have been working side by side with Negroes for years; the only difference is that Negroes will now be given a chance to qualify for some of the better paying jobs. We are not dealing in Philadelphia, as we might in the South, with ingrown attitudes and deep-rooted living patterns. We are dealing with the naked, greedy, and unashamed unwillingness of white workers to give Negro workers a break. That attitude requires no special understanding; it is racialism in its crassest form. Congress now has before it the Scantan bill to give the FEPC statutory authority and powers of enforcement and we hope Negroes and progressives will press for its enactment now, before the election, when they still have some bargaining power.

Finally The Nation urges Attorney General Biddle and U. S. Attorney Gleeson in Philadelphia to give the country a thoroughgoing grand jury investigation into all the circumstances of this peculiar strike. We call it peculiar because a majority of the employees of the Philadelphia Transportation Company had shown their own opposition to racialism by voting for the Transport Workers Union, CIO, several months ago in a union election. The TWU had compaigned on an anti-discrimination platform, in contradistinction to the "independent" union whose old contract with the company barred Negroes from the better jobs. The fact that the strike was led by old "independent" union officials and the readiness of the company's personnel director to give in to the strikers' anti-Negro demands provide grounds for suspecting that the racial issue was deliberately exploited to split the workers and hurt the CIO union. This strike delayed war production and hurt morale, and it disgraced the United States in the eyes of the world. We want to see it probed to the very bottom and we want to see those responsible in jail.

Hitler Underground

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

TODAY, when Hitler's power is threatened inside Germany as well as by the armies pressing toward its borders, we hear a lot of talk about the probable future plans of his followers. People are freely prophesying that the Nazis will "go underground" and pursue their aims by devious and conspiratorial means. I have before me, for example, a most convincing set of predictions by Walter Lippmann, published the other day in the New York Herald Tribune. Mr. Lippmann believes that the conduct of the Nazi leaders in the face of growing unrest and inevitable military disaster is that of men who "feel they still have something to live for and believe that they can still accomplish it." Their swift retaliation against the plotting generals not only prevented those gentlemen from repeating their masterly maneuver of 1918 and making the civilian authorities bear the onus of defeat. The Nazis, reversing the trick, have attempted to fasten upon the officers' corps responsibility for the defeat that is to come. Then when the Nazi movement goes underground and sets out to "exploit to its own advantage the inevitable suffering and frustration of the German nation," it will have an alibi to offer for the defeat.

I think this analysis is sensible. And it is not contradicted by the obvious determination of the Nazi chieftains to charge a high price for their defeat. If they are to lose, let someone else take the blame; and meanwhile kill as many of the enemy as possible, wipe out his towns, kill all the Jews and hostages and political opponents within reach—and begin again amid Europe's wreckage.

It is the meaning of these ugly probabilities that seems to escape Walter Lippmann; and I suspect it has equally escaped our official policy-makers. Mr. Lippmann is uneasy about the capacity of the Allies to cope with the problem. "Old conspirators like Hitler," he says, "know all the tricks of conducting an underground movement and one of the greatest difficulties the British and American leaders face in occupying Germany is that none among them has experience and few much knowledge of underground politics and of how to detect it and how to deal with it." But Mr. Lippmann has little to suggest. He realizes that the Nazis have doubtless worked out schemes of escape, that they have money and connections planted abroad, and that they will carry on their post-war conspiracies through a network of international communications. And so he insists that the occupying powers, after Hitler's defeat, must manage somehow to isolate the Nazi underground in Germany from its connections in other countries.

But nowhere does Mr. Lippmann reveal an understanding of the revolutionary character of the problem. The Allied armies can defeat Hitler's armies. Allied political power, even backed by force, can never defeat fascism. Nothing can end the threat of fascist conspiracy except a revolutionary change in Europe. If Mr. Lippmann shrinks from the thought, he is simply allowing the conventional, accepted attitude of a secure capitalist society to weaken his grasp of reality.

There are people in Europe who have both experience and knowledge of underground politics. Some of them are still alive in Germany. Perhaps they will have something to say about how to "detect" and "deal with" the Nazi underground. But if they are too few, after Hitler's execution squads have finished their work, men and women can be found in every European country who know the technique. They have been using it effectively for almost five years and are using it today in courageous support of the Allied armies. I suggest to Mr. Lippmann and to the inexperienced Allied leaders that the forces of resistance in occupied Europe be invited to share the responsibility of wiping out the Nazi underground. It is a job for underground fighters, not for the boys in the AMG. Indeed, I doubt if the School of Military Government at Charlottesville has even an elementary course in revolutionary strategy and the technique of underground conspiracy.

But that is only the start. A fighting force cannot reconstruct a continent; it can only create the possibility of reconstruction. In Germany as in the rest of Europe, Hitler's creed and his political influence will be ended only when a decent economic order is established. The destruction of the great industrial combinations in Europe, the end of the political power of big finance, the spread of social controls to insure employment and a better standard of living—these will do more to "isolate" Hitler's underground and ultimately scotch it altogether than any policing of communications that the occupation forces may put into effect. When the Allied leaders worry about the threat of a Nazi movement after this war, let them reflect for a moment on the conditions that gave rise to the Nazi movement after the last one. Let them recall the attitude their predecessors of the twenties took toward every attempt to unseat the big industrialists and the army men in Germany. Let them face the fact that now, as then, they must choose between social change and fascism.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES C. BOLTE

How to Read the News

ADMIRAL KING is credited with the wonderfully Bourbon remark, "During war, we should issue two communiqués: (1) We have been attacked; (2) The enemy has surrendered unconditionally." Doubtless apocryphal, but illustrative of the way many generals and admirals—especially admirals—fell about public information in wartime.

This feeling has given way to a more sensible information policy. Indeed, the pendulum has now swung to the other extreme, and we are so voluminously informed as to the progress of the war that Ernie Pyle threatened to stop reading Dog Life unless the magazine sent a reporter to cover the invasion from the dog's angle.

Volume doesn't necessarily mean clarity or accuracy, however; and though the American press and radio have given us millions of words of reporting, interpretation, and dream-analysis from and about the fighting fronts, I don't think they have done a good job.

The blame for this lies mostly with the editors in the home offices, and most particularly with the headline writers and the radio-bulletin writers. The full-page headline in the New York Post, "Yanks Invade Europe," is already famous in newspaper history: it appeared in the summer of 1942, and referred to the landing of a dozen Ranger observers with the Canadian force which raided Dieppe. The Post had another gem last winter: "We Land on Truk," which on close inspection was revealed to have been founded on an ambiguous Radio Tokyo report of the first U. S. carrier-based plane attack on that island group—where we still haven't landed.

More recently, we were kept on pins and needles for five days while Cherbourg's fall was variously described as "Imminent," " . . . 48 Hours," "Expected Momentarily," etc. Then there is the case of that Russian Army which for two weeks has been "Nearing East Prussia Border," while "Nazis Flee East Prussia in Panic," until we found last week that "the Reds" were now only eight miles away, having been four miles away a week earlier.

The editors have abetted the headline-writers by featuring the sensational dispatches. Morning dispatches have been rewritten in New York in the afternoon, with the sentences rearranged and an extra portion of scare-phrases added: "rolled forward on a broad front," "smashed through faltering enemy resistance," "tidal wave . . .," and the inevitable conclusion: "threatened to—" cut off, or by-pass, or encircle, or annihilate.

Nor are the correspondents blameless, though their record is far better. Many of them, more particularly the press-association writers, have an admirably consistent record of keeping ahead of the armies and capturing more thousands of troops than the enemy ever leaves behind. There are, of course, notable exceptions—actually too many to single out.

In many cases the military themselves have led the reporters up the primrose path. At Cassino and Caen we had official announcements of air power delivering a great smash and the ground forces breaking through, with nothing coming of it but letdown at home and comfort for the enemy. The air-power boys have sinned most grievously in this respect, and hurt their weapon by claiming feats for it too extravagantly. But all is better now, with victories galore, and the current malicious gag in Washington is that the war has finally caught up with General Arnold.

There is a lesson concealed in this ill-tempered essay, however: To find out how the real war is going, instead of the paper war, skip the headlines, read the first paragraphs with one eye closed, and jump inside to the communiqué-texts, following them on a map—a relief map, if possible, looking for rivers, hills, woods, and road-junctions. Then relax and read the color stories, always remembering Ilya Ehrenburg: "In communiqués a city is only a word. But actually a city means machine-gun nests, houses turned into forts, well-masked mortars, tommy gunners on rooftops, mines concealed in cellars, just hell in fact."

In this way every newspaper-reader can be his own military expert, understanding the soldiers' difficulties, and taking with a grain of salt the reports of the enemy's imminent collapse. When he reads, as he might have last week, "Canadian troops of the British Second Army, bursting forth in a new attack pointed toward Paris . . ." he will reflect that the Canadians have been bursting towards Paris ever since the first attack on Caen, and have thus far only burst about six miles. When he reads that the Americans are driving across the Brest peninsula against scattered opposition, he will reflect that this may be a planned withdrawal, not necessarily a complete disintegration of German resistance; and a withdrawal that may carry all the way back to the Seine or even beyond, where new and tougher resistance will be encountered, as Dr. Goebbels has promised.

Especially will he take his morning military expert with a double grain of salt, and realize that this poor mortal is far from the scene, either second-guessing or shooting in the dark about dim and future events. To illustrate the point, we will close today's sermon with an apt quotation, which appeared in print the day the Americans thrust to Rennes and the British were stalled at Caen:

> But many miles of the wicked bocage country lie ahead [of the Americans], and the Germans are strongly echeloned against the British, who face better country for fast going. (Charles G. Bolte, The Nation, August 5.)

On Reconversion

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, August 4

1. At short range, the outlook is poor. There is little chance that we will succeed in reconverting to civilian production on the basis of full employment.

2. From the longer-range point of view, much progress has been made. This is apparent if we glance back at the comparable period in the closing months of the last war. "Near the end of World War I," the Murray-Truman report points out, "many committees of Congress were working on post-war legislation. But the public was not particularly interested and Congressional action was dilatory. When the armistice came, the post-war legislation that had been worked on for months died in committee." There was no reconversion controversy last time, with the exception of the great debate over the return of the railroads to private ownership. There is general agreement today that it is the responsibility of government to provide an orderly transition to a peacetime economy.

3. There is also agreement on the necessity for achieving full employment after the war. The most conservative of the Congressional committees dealing with post-war problems, that headed by Senator George, is as fully committed to the principle as are the progressives. "This country," the George report said in June, "never has had and never will have real prosperity without full employment. A man vainly seeking a job is not a potential customer for the products of American farms and factories. Multiply that man many times and the combined loss of purchasing power starts a downward spiral of production, which in turn causes more unemployment and more loss of potential purchasing power. Government war expenditures of nearly $100,000,000,000 a year clearly demonstrate what mass purchasing power can do for American business." These are truisms. The point to remember is that they were not truisms twenty-five years ago. We have here a great historical change in the thinking of the American people.

4. This change will not make itself felt immediately, for there is as yet no general agreement on how to achieve full employment. Those who think that private enterprise can do the job alone have the upper hand, and their ideas will rule the reconversion period. But if the attempt to achieve full employment by private enterprise alone fails, as it almost certainly will after a few years of somewhat spotty prosperity, the importance of this change in public thinking will have immediate effect. It will provide a framework of economic understanding and expectation that should make necessary governmental measures to produce full employment possible. Whether a conservative or a progressive Administration is in power when the slump comes, it will be able, and it will be compelled, to take steps far beyond the timid pump-priming of the New Deal period. It is important to keep in mind that basically this timidity was the fault neither of Mr. Roosevelt nor of his advisers. The timidity reflected the prevailing state of public opinion. That will be different in the next slump. The key sentence in the quotation above from the George report is the last, "Government war expenditures of nearly $100,000,000,000 a year clearly demonstrate what mass purchasing power can do for American business." The question only a few raised before will be raised by many in the next depression. "If for war, why not for peace?"

5. These long-range perspectives are not advanced as cause for complacency but as a corrective to undue pessimism. Profound historical changes sometimes seem to take place suddenly but they are always germinated slowly. A people as individualistic and proudly independent as the American, living in a country which has made great progress under private capitalism, cannot be expected overnight to accept large-scale measures of state initiative and direction in the economic sphere. I am inclined to think that our chances of achieving a successful "mixed economy" with a minimum of social disorder are pretty good, perhaps all the more so because private enterprise will have a last opportunity to prove or discredit its claim to be able to provide full employment without state direction. The fact that almost everywhere else in the capitalist world, and notably in Britain, there will be "mixed economies" with large admixtures of socialism in operation may help to reduce the kind of stubborn intransigence in our own capitalist class that leads business men to support fascist movements.

6. Another passage from the George report may help us to get at the fallacy that will keep us from reconversion on a full-employment basis. "One school of thought," the George report says, "approaches the problem with the proposition that if business is profitable, the jobs, and consequently the purchasing power, will be provided. Another school of thought approaches it from the standpoint that if there is full employment at adequate wages business is bound to be profitable." These two approaches, the George report asserts, "are merely different ways of stating the same thing and accent the interdependence of full production and full employment." This is untrue. Large sectors of business can be fairly profitable while the economy is carrying a large load of what might be called stabilized unemployment, as in the New Deal period, when the number of jobless seems to have been "stabilized" at about eight million. Time does not stand still, and the danger is that after the war business will seek to satisfy the country with the New Deal palliatives it once fought. Business will seek to supplement private employment with WPA-ism as a means of blocking the kind of governmental planning that can alone give us full employment.

7. Everyone is talking full employment but few have any conception of the enormous increase in the American standard of living necessary to achieve it. Gunnar Myrdal's comprehensive analysis of "Economic Developments and Prospects in America," to which I referred several weeks ago in The Nation, provides a glimpse of the dimensions of the problem. Even "if the production of motor cars," Myrdal says, "should be expanded to eight millions a year, compared with six millions at the pre-war peak in 1937, the motor car industry would nevertheless be forced to dismiss several hundred thousand men." There must be a sharp rise in consumption of all kinds of goods and services and this requires a sharp rise in wages.

8. But the fight in the Senate over the amount of unemployment compensation to be paid during the reconversion period not only indicates that this is not understood but that many business and big farming elements hope to use the distress of the reconversion period to lower wages. This is the meaning of the effort to keep unemployment compensation in the hands of the states and to reduce its amount, for unemployment compensation will put a floor under wages. When Senator Revercomb in a minority report from the Senate Military Affairs subcommittee pointed out that the Kilgore-Murray-Truman bill would give some workers more in unemployment compensation than they had previously earned in wages, the argument had an immediate effect. The idea of putting "a premium on idleness" was so abhorrent that a compromise was at once offered by the sponsors of the Kilgore bill, reducing the amount of compensation. But in the light of the concrete situation facing us, the argument is economically false, however appealing it may be to those who think in terms of the past. Unemployment compensation is the best weapon we have to raise wages, and the higher wages are raised, the less governmental direction and initiative will be required for full employment. The response of the Senate, the press, and the business community to Revercomb's argument indicates how little progress has been made in thinking through the implications and necessities of a full-employment policy.

9. Another indication of the inability of the business community to think in terms of abundance instead of scarcity may be seen in the Johnson bill for the disposal of surplus property. The supporters of the Kilgore bill, in an effort to obtain its passage, have dropped the surplus-property provisions of their bill. Byrnes and the conservatives are backing the Johnson measure. It would take durable surplus war supplies, from jeeps and machinery to wool and cotton, off the market for five years. During that time much of these goods would deteriorate or become obsolete. This is only a round-about way of destroying wealth, and another example of how closely wedded profitability is in our society to waste and destruction, first on the battlefield, then in the warehouse.

10. There is a considerable gap between the acceptance of a principle and a readiness really to put it into effect. In principle, the George-Murray bill and the Kilgore bill are both for full employment but the latter spells out more fully measures to achieve it. That is why there is such opposition to the Kilgore bill, for business wants to be "let alone" to do the job itself. But no business man can venture the unprecedented expansion of civilian production necessary for full employment without assurance of enough government aid to save him from bankruptcy. Unless the government takes steps to bring about a similar expansion by his competitors and by other business men, not enough purchasing power will be generated to enable him to sell his goods.

11. The weakness of the Kilgore bill is that it gives no indication that even its sponsors have thought this problem through in concrete terms. Its strength is that it sets up agencies, with full representation of business, labor, and agriculture, which could take those steps when the public wakes up to their necessity. The Kilgore bill is far too largely a statement of generalities, and the setting up of a National Production-Employment Board, as provided in the bill, does not necessarily move in the direction of full employment. It may as easily become an instrumentality for a new NRA-ism.

12. The Kilgore bill is menaced from two directions. In Congress it is being whittled away in favor of separate legislation on separate problems such as unemployment compensation, surplus-property disposal, etc. Even if remnants of it pass, there arises the problem of administration. The men at the controls will determine their use. And the White House by the Clayton and Hines appointments has already handed over the key post-war planning positions to men totally unsuited to the task of achieving full employment.

CORRECTION: A copy reader, exhausted by the effort to understand the intricacies of monetary theory, inadvertently added a misleading phrase to a sentence in our Washington letter last week on Bretton Woods. "The starting point of those who met at Bretton Woods," said the original, "was at the opposite pole from the Kemmerers." The phrase added was "who speak for the protectionists." Kemmerer does not speak for the protectionists; his gold standard views imply freer trade.

It's Hard to Seduce a Turk

BY MICHAEL CARTER

IT CAN be talked about now. At one time it was too uncomfortably effective to bring out into the open. For the Turkish government's decision to break off diplomatic and economic relations with Germany ends a brilliant psychological war fought by the Nazis inside Turkey's borders. Every German was in it, from Von Papen, the Ambassador, down to the humblest grocery clerk. They were all on the propaganda team; if they lost, it was not by reason of any amateur performance.

Naturally, the most effective tactics were directed at increasing Turkey's economic dependence on Germany. Immediately, the need was a two-way stream of war supplies, and at one stage in the war Turkey had to do business with Hitler because there was no one else within hailing distance. But Germany was looking beyond the temporary emergency and talked big in terms of permanent post-war markets. Prominent Turks were given posts of importance in German corporations. Krupp's representatives in Turkey were the former Turkish diplomat, Nureddine, and the former banker, Jahim. Junkers and other German aircraft firms were represented by Galip Ceilany, member of a good Turkish family. German insurance companies were tied up with Turkish insurance companies and with Turkey's biggest industrialist, Kazim, who directs the Turkish sugar industry and owns a bank.

The professional and upper-class society people required more subtle treatment. For them, it was German culture: Walter Gieseking was brought all the way out to Istanbul and Ankara to play to packed houses and be paraded through a gala round of receptions. General Rohde, military attaché, and Admiral Marvitz, naval attaché, were cultured Germans of the old school. They liked nothing better than to spend a long social evening with a group of German-trained Turkish officers who, after all, had been their comrades-in-arms during the last war. Weekly parties by DNB at the Ankara Palace Hotel, parties at the Embassy—there was not a dull moment for anyone who wanted to take advantage of Nazi hospitality. The whisky never ran out at the German Embassy, oddly enough; the British Embassy, on the other hand, was constantly threatened with drought, and the American Embassy was bone dry.

The Germans were thoughtful in little things. During last winter's typhus scare, one pro-British journalist appealed to the British Embassy for serum. There was none to be had. Herr Seiler, the German press attaché, heard about it. Promptly, thousands of units were rushed out from Berlin, more than enough to save the journalist, his family, and his friends—for Hitler. The Germans would solemnly point out to the two hundred German-speaking Turkish officials in Ankara how really fortunate they were to have such good relations with Germany and how unhappy they would be if these relations were terminated. It might even cost them their jobs. German-subsidized schools, hospitals, and churches interpreted in very broad terms their charitable and educational mission to the Turkish people.

When direct action was indicated a battery of no less than six German agencies were ready in place: Deutsche Nachrichten Dienst (DNB), Transcontinent Presse (TP), Europa Presse Dienst (EP), Dienst Aus Deutschland (DAD), Transozean Presse Dienst (TO), and Nachrichten Presse Dienst (NP). Equipped with the latest radio-teletype machines and staffed with first-rate newsmen, they had unlimited funds for entertainment and all other purposes. They operated chiefly through the Embassy. Their directing mind was Ambassador von Papen, whose devious wit and unflagging energy turned many a near-defeat into a propaganda victory.

There was the matter of getting the right stories placed. But since a German monopoly controlled the newsprint supply, ways could be found. The supply, of course, was strictly rationed through the Turkish newsprint controller. But extra paper shipments at low prices would mysteriously appear on the doorstep of a paper whose Axis sympathies had shown signs of cooling. On the other hand, a pro-Allied editor would discover that unavoidable delays had interfered with the delivery of badly needed supplies. When, after protest, the paper did arrive, it would turn out to have been damaged in transit.

Sometimes less subtle tactics were applied. A subeditor who was finding it difficult to make both ends meet on $85 a month would be visited by a fairy godmother with a slight German accent and shown easy ways of relieving himself of all household worries. A chief editor would be given a lump-sum recompense for placing a lead article. One editor of a pro-Axis paper had a regular retainer of $125 a month, simply for slanting his news and comments. Sometimes bulk subscriptions and heavy advertising provided an irresistible appeal to struggling papers that had been finding the competition heavy.

German bookstores attracted Turkish officers, engineers, doctors, and scientists with their technical and scientific books in German or in Turkish, printed in Germany. These bookstores also drew less scholarly customers, who on occasion would find funds and instructions inserted in the books they carried away with them. The well-edited German propaganda magazine Signal—somewhat comparable to Life in format—was filled with excellent photographs and drawings by cameramen and artists from the Wehrmacht and the German navy. The magazine appeared bi-weekly in German, English, French, and sometimes Serbian. In recent months it has deteriorated in make-up and quality of paper and its sales have fallen off. But it gets wide distribution and copies are occasionally picked up in distant outposts on the Turkish-Russian border. Only two Turkish magazines appear to be wholly subsidized by the Germans. Both are published by Nuri Pasha, who owns a large munitions factory near Istanbul and up to a short time ago depended on Germany for all his raw material.

BURLIN

Radio programs from Germany and from Axis satellite stations are listened to for the music; not so much for the news. Since the military reverses began the news has become more and more unreliable and has largely been displaced by comment. The Turks have not been impressed. German movies have been shown in theaters that would take them, theaters which have come in for the largesse of Von Papen's friends. Throughout the earlier and more successful stages of the war, the Embassy held private showings of military movies calculated to overcome even the most die-hard skeptic.

Somebody has estimated that the Germans have been spending at the rate of $1,200,000 a year in Turkey just for propaganda purposes. Much of it was in gold from Germany and from stores seized in the occupied countries. In their readiness to pay to get the job done, the Germans were second only to the Japanese. (A story went the rounds in Istanbul that an Armenian tipster worked well and contentedly for the Germans at $130 a month until the Japs upped the offer to $400.)

German propaganda did half the work of keeping Turkey out of the war. It failed utterly to influence Turkey to come in on the German side and so repeat the experience of the last war. But it is doubtful if the propaganda would have succeeded even as well as it did had it not been for the course of military events. As long as the Nazis were advancing down into the Balkans and moving toward Turkey's back door in North Africa, Turkey was in a position that made a break with Germany seem impossible. The situation was made even worse when the Nazi forces drove past Stalingrad into the Caucasus. It was at that time that Von Papen was particularly active in attempting to awaken Turkey's traditional fear and hatred of the Russians. As recently as last week, Germany threatened the utter destruction of Turkey's cities by planes based on fields across the Hellespont if the diplomatic break was made.

In an awkward spot, no matter how you look at it, the Turks were negatively, by military threat, rather than positively, by subtle propaganda, persuaded to lie quiet. Seeing certain immediate advantages in preserving friendly relations with Germany, the Turks were never convinced that their route to future happiness and security required a visa stamped in Berlin. As Allied victories mounted and the military threat on three sides receded, and as our own propaganda improved, the Turks moved toward the break with Germany that was probably inevitable from the beginning.

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE SMALL VOTE CAST for judges of the Supreme Court in Tennessee last week shows the deterrent effect of a poll-tax. . . . The intention was to diminish the Negro vote, but it is found that a large proportion of the whites will not pay the tax. Then there is always a chance that some political manager may suddenly turn up just before election day with a pile of money and pay poll-taxes by the thousands, on the agreement that the voters thus favored will support his side. . . . The theory that a man should pay at least as much as a poll-tax towards the support of the Government as a prerequisite to having his say in deciding its character sounds all right, but in practice it generally works to the advantage of the corruptionists.—August 9, 1894.

THE SENATE COMMITTEE on Territories has reported favorably the House bills for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as states, and apparently only a pressure of other matters will prevent the passage of the measures. New Mexico is still a half-foreign community, and Arizona has only about 63,000 people all told, but each is to be given as much power in the Senate as New York or Pennsylvania. Their admission will be a gross outrage upon the country, but each party thinks that it stands a chance of getting the two Senators from each of the new commonwealths, and nobody seems ready to make an effective protest.—August 9, 1894.

WE HAVE REFERRED to the way the socialists in Roubaix and Saint-Denis have had a free course and been glorified and got those municipalities deeply into debt. Reports from other French cities where the socialists are in control show a similar state of affairs, and make it clear that, for taxpayers, it is not only the first step in practical socialism which costs, but every succeeding step as well. . . . They give point to the growing conviction of the world that socialism may be very fine, but that it comes high.—August 23, 1894.

WE FREQUENTLY see startling figures as to the increasing number of the insane presented in the newspapers, giving rise to melancholy predictions. There is probably not the slightest reason for disquiet upon the subject. The definition of insanity, as everyone knows, is a fluctuating one, and it is not only true that many persons are now classed as insane who would not formerly have been so classed, but also more cases are returned than of old.—August 30, 1894.

The Supreme Court Today

BY WALTON HAMILTON

I. Nine Independent Men

AFTER an absence of some years from the front page, the Supreme Court is again news. It is, however, the antics of human beings, rather than the wisdom of judges, which has captured public attention. The antics move on the surface of legal process; the wisdom probes toward the depths of insistent problems—and each, useful in its own way, has been on parade. A reminder that men, even when they sit in high places, are not immune to the ordinary frailties is always wholesome. A demonstration that the feet of the Court are firmly, if somewhat fumblingly, set on the path marked "forward" is just now a welcome assurance. Upon casual displays of behavior columns of print have been lavished which might better be given to a recitation of what the Court has done.

Antics there have been; "decision day" has not been the dullest of Washington spectacles. The querulous voice, the soft tone that appeals to Posterity, the stubborn I-refuse-to-go-along, the mutual exchange of the word "gratuitous," the defiant I'll-not-let-him-get-by-with-that has been somewhat in evidence. Phrases which reflect on the omniscience of colleagues have been hurled even if they have not survived oral utterance to find lodgement in print. The concurring opinion has been employed to slap down a protesting brother. The dissent has often reflected more of unyielding opposition than of reasonable challenge. More than one opinion, written as a concurrence, has eventually emerged as a dissent.

To one whose study is the Court such antics are more amusing than disturbing. They have appeared before; their like will appear again. When Saint Paul said it was good that brethren should dwell together in unity, the evidence is not conclusive that he had our Supreme Court in mind. And, if among the members charity is in order, the command is not that they shall all think alike. If eight of them are appointees of Mr. Roosevelt, the nine—instead of freely choosing each other—have been conscripted to work together. Although in concert they have the power to say, "We are the law," among them as individuals differences are bound to arise; and when a colleague honestly cannot accept the judgment, candor commands that he give his reasons. As currently we pass into a new social order, a cleavage in views is everywhere visible among the most reasonable of men. It would be startling if the brothers on the bench were free from the perplexities of mind and belief by which all thinking men are beset. The drive of the work, the zest of inquiry, the pride in the craft all make for heat. The clash in attitude, idea, value is inevitable where decisions can emerge only from a conjunction of separate wills. If here it seems notorious it is only because the Court—unlike a corporation, an editorial board, a college faculty, an agency of state—has the wholesome habit of making its doings a matter of public record.

It would, I grant you, be more seemly for the gentlemen of the Court always to air their legal differences with courtesy. But the proprieties have always been powerful to corrode intellectual honesty; and as an outward sign of an integrity which refuses to be compromised, antics are to be accepted with tolerance. I can think of nothing more alarming than that the Justices should come to be of a single mind. For unanimity among able and wide-awake men can be had only on the assumption that ancient wisdom should not be disturbed or through the practice of suppressing the views of those who cannot go along. Against the dry rot of mutual agreement the whole tradition of the Court is set. A powerful prod to excellence is that "the opinion of the Court" must take the fire of its members; that arguments pro and contra shall have equal access to the reports. Our courts have decreed that justice-in-the-making shall be subject to critical analysis by the bench, the profession, the public.

The work of its last term measures up to the high standard of the Court. Actions at law reflect the times; and the record is such as a group of able, virile, uncloistered men might be expected to write. Never in its history have divisions occurred so often; never have its members so freely expressed their own views. Votes of eight to one and six to three are common; and, in spite of the overwhelming New Deal majority, five to four and four to three are still noticeable. A common division has come to be seven to two or seven to one; the unanimous judgment is now exception rather than rule. Votes, however, are but a faint index to views; concurring opinions, far more abundant than ever before, attest dissimilar roads to a like result. On the last day of the term the Court actually divided five to four as to argument when there was no difference as to judgment. More important, the division must be interpreted in terms of the issue before the Court. In question after question the current bench is in accord, where the old one—dominated by the Four Horsemen, Van Devanter, McReynolds, Sutherland, and Butler, plus Hughes and/or Roberts—was divided. The cleavage in opinion is now far more often than not over an issue which a decade ago would never have been raised. The frontier of the law has been advanced; the craft is practiced in a manner more precise, intricate, and exacting. Often, perhaps far too often, simple arithmetic has been abandoned for the higher mathematics. The idiom of decision, as well as the plane of inquiry, has changed.

The chief reason for the shift has, of course, been personnel. The newcomers are not men of a like sense and reason with those who have departed. Stone, C. J., once with the left, stands now to the right of center. As his views, once voiced in dissent, have come to prevail, liberalism is to be preserved rather than won. The faith which a judge must keep with his conscience has been qualified by the anxiety of the Chief Justice for his institution. He captains a far more agile, if less stubborn, crew than the one over which Hughes used to preside. And whereas "the Old Fox" was able to get the jump on the brethren by his quickness in selecting the issue, Stone has a number of colleagues quite able to tell him that there is another way to put the question. Roberts has shifted—or rather been pushed over—from center to far right. A man of many minds, a vagrant in his intellectual positions, he has been prone of late to upbraid his colleagues for a lack of respect for judgments now outworn. He has become conservative without a departure from his former views.

The others, touched not at all or only slightly by judicial experience, are fresh from life itself. Black, with an uncommon "feel for the jugular," has won the place of primacy. He rarely misses what the case—as against the legal form in which it is cast—is all about. Although he professes more faith in "leaving it to Congress" than one with his experience in the Senate ought to exhibit, he has taken the lead in adapting "the enduring principles of the law" to the rapidly changing circumstances of life. Reed, it is true, is not comfortable when established landmarks are left behind. But, in spite of his meticulous craftsmanship, he is no legalist. His "conservative" utterances would startle the shades of some of the departed brethren. Recently he replied to a charge of Roberts that a decision had come to be like "a railroad ticket good for this day and train only" by citing from a Brandeis dissent a list of cases in which the Court had retracted outworn judgments. Then, speaking for the majority, he brought the list up to date. He can, in dissent, vote to tolerate Negro peonage disguised in circumspect legal form; he can, for an all but unanimous Court, announce that the Constitution assures the Negro the right to vote in the Democratic primary. Frankfurter, who has mounted the bench without discarding the professor's craft, is the current storm center. The greatest of Holmes's admirers, he is among the least Holmesian of men. He reverently occupies positions taken by Holmes, Brandeis, or Cardozo in dissent, and seems to regard it as sacrilege to advance the law beyond the outposts toward which they drove. He is sometimes right against the majority of his brethren; he argues, for example, that the idea that a state of the Union cannot be sued without its consent is a vestige of the dogma that the King can do no wrong. But he is likely to transmute a real into a verbal question and to lose the main issue in a frantic quest of some nice point of law. His standpattism is dictated far less by an urge to stand on the precedents than by a "felt need" at this time of peril to secure national unity by appeasing big business. In general he tends to convert the older liberalism into a dogmatic orthodoxy.

Douglas is a natural executive. On the bench his excess of energy is spent in doing more work and getting it done more promptly than any of his colleagues. As the cases come along, his feel is for reality. He is quite aware that the art of judging has its occupational hazards; he knows the stories of great judges who have lost touch with the times and become ossified. The youngest among the judges, he is most in fear of becoming dated. Murphy's dominant drive is toward justice. With him as with Brandeis, whose spiritual heir he is, the real search—for which he has been reproved by Roberts—is where righteousness lies. Neat crochet patterns of legalism, which get some of his colleagues all excited, leave him cold. But watch his limpid and driving prose when he proclaims freedom of speech, recites the dangers of the miner's trip from portal to face, or reproves the government for invoking the white slave act when the accused, by going on a vacation, had for a moment "lapsed into decency."

Jackson remains something of an adolescent who loves to try all the stops on the organ. At one moment he displays a picayune legalism—as when he catches up a rule of law contriving to save some poor wretch from going to jail for bigamy and uses it to allow the state most favorable to the employer to fix compensation for industrial accidents. At another he probes to the very vitals of public policy—as when he insists that the Federal Power Commission, far from being bound by the rigidities of a fair-return-upon-value formula, should shape the schedule of rates to secure from a public utility the largest service to the community. And Rutledge, last to take his seat, has already exhibited his independence. For him, as a dean accustomed to handle a law school faculty, mere judicial colleagues can have no terrors. He has the law teacher's critical attitude toward the rules, concepts, and moves which are the tricks of the jurist's trade. He is not often to be diverted from the path of justice in pursuit of some esoteric will-o'-the-wisp. In a recent tilt with Frankfurter over where the power lay to determine fair labor standards, Iowa talked right back to Harvard.

You cannot resolve such a bench, as you could that of old, into three parts. There is no longer a right wing of four, a left wing of three, and a center group of two to chant "We are the Court." The path of the law is now as likely to be blazed for the Court as in dissent. And when the cry is "forward," it is Black, J., more often than Stone, C. J., who directs the march. Black's leadership, always personal, is often executive; for when Stone dissents, Roberts, the next in authority, is likely to be with him, and to Black falls the task of naming the man to write the opinion. With him, especially when issues of public policy are dominant, Douglas and Murphy are likely to be found. And, as he gets his judicial bearings, Rutledge moves in that direction. But the accord is not a solid phalanx; and not even in a common dissent are the brethren of a single mind. At the right there is nothing even so loosely coherent. Roberts often proclaims that he is orthodox, that it is his eight colleagues who have gone astray; Frankfurter has exhibited a growing fondness for his companionship; Jackson has on occasion converted the duet into a trio. Stone and Reed are not above taking a stand with brother Roberts; and Murphy and Rutledge have been known to forsake the majority for his fellowship. But allegiance is fluid; positions have not yet been stabilized; any permutation is likely to turn up.

[The second part of Professor Hamilton's article, discussing the current record of the Supreme Court, and analyzing its decisions in a number of important cases, will appear next week.]

Polls, Propaganda, and Politics

During the months from now until election, interest in public-opinion polls promises to boom. Each week the latest poll results will be summarized in this column, along with some pertinent comment on propaganda in politics. The series begins this week with some suggestions for discriminating interpretation of public opinion polls. Next week's analysis will cover the trend of opinion between 1940 and 1944.

"HOW reliable are the public-opinion polls?" many people ask. There is no easy answer. None of the large, publicized polls is crooked or rigged, and only occasionally is bias a serious influence. But it is easy to be misled by poll figures. Here are a few pointers on allowances to make.

1. Size versus representativeness. People are sometimes troubled because poll samples are small, because "no interviewer has ever asked me or anyone I know a question." If a nation-wide poll is based on a sample of three thousand cases, as many are (at election time this usual sample is blown up to much larger figures), it would take more than five hundred years at the rate of one poll a week to reach all the adults in the United States. The reliability of a poll is more apt to be affected by selection than by size. The Literary Digest went wrong in spite of polling immense numbers because it selected homes listed in telephone directories and neglected to sample the low-income population. What gives poll statisticians gray hair is how to make sure that every income level, political party, race, region, occupation, religious group, age group, educational level, etc., is proportionately represented in the miniature population that is polled. A well-selected sample of one thousand cases may give a better basis for prediction than random polling of ten thousand. In forecasting Dewey's election as Governor of New York in 1942, the Office of Public Opinion Research at Princeton University with only two hundred cases in a carefully selected sample predicted that he would win 58 per cent of the votes cast; the Gallup Poll with two thousand five hundred cases gave him 53 per cent; the New York Daily News with forty-eight thousand interviews predicted 57 per cent. The election results showed 53 per cent for Dewey. The smallest poll was nearly as accurate as one 240 times as large. Nevertheless, size of sample remains a factor. Chance must also be taken into account. If one hundred polls were made, each covering two thousand voters selected in the same way, they might differ so that most of them would show 52 per cent for Roosevelt, with a few reporting 49 per cent and a few 55 per cent.

2. Polls report the opinions of a cross-section of potential voters, but not all those eligible turn out to vote on Election Day. A million votes, properly distributed, could have elected Willkie in 1940, but in New York State alone two million qualified voters didn't cast ballots. About one registered voter in five doesn't arrive to make his choices known. Fewer women vote. Fewer young people (21-40) vote. Fewer men and women from manual labor occupations ordinarily vote, and industrial migration will accent this factor in 1944. Smaller cities have more non-voters.

3. The "Don't know," "No opinion," and "Haven't yet decided" vote is not evenly or proportionately divided between parties. Studies show that these people have fewer opportunities for contact with politics, less interest in the election, less education, but come from social strata which vote mainly Democratic. Hence, if "No opinion" answers are disregarded, the results tend to over-estimate Republican strength. The proportion undecided decreases as the campaign goes on, but in 1940 there were still 7 per cent of potential voters apparently sitting on the fence as late as October.

4. The Electoral College system means that a popular majority may not bring a majority of electors. Cleveland won with 50.1 per cent of all major party votes in 1884, but lost in 1888 despite his 50.5 per cent of the major party vote. Democrats "waste" a lot of votes in the South, where they do not add more electors. Whether a party has a bare majority or 90 per cent of the popular votes in a state, it gets the same number of electoral votes.

5. No one is allowed to poll the soldier vote. No one knows how many soldiers will vote, or how they will vote, or how many of their votes will be counted. We do know that in June of 1944, when about 52 per cent of voters were for Roosevelt, civilian young people, 21-29 years of age, were 62 per cent for Roosevelt. No one can be sure that army experience may not increase or decrease this difference.

6. There is always need to watch the specific form of question being used. Most people are against sin and will approve ideals in general. It is only when proposals show teeth that respondents take fright. Three out of four Americans are "for labor unions," but something like half of these can be counted on to object to any specific measure for which labor unions are fighting at the moment. More people will express approval of daylight saving time than will favor a Presidential order establishing it. When someone is asked what he would think "if" something happened, he doesn't always estimate his own intentions properly. As a rule, differences in wording are less apt to affect responses on questions about which people have strong feelings.

7. Most interviewers are middle-class. A large proportion are college graduates. Respondents usually sense differences in speech, manner, dress, background, etc., and workers may be as suspicious and reserved when confronted by a typical poll-taker as would be milady of the manor if a strange man of rough appearance and crude vocabulary rang her doorbell and began asking political questions. Interviewers may tend to avoid the poorest districts and the most remote rural areas.

8. Finally, the balance is now so close that unforeseen events between now and November are likely to swing the election. No conceivable analysis of opinion today will satisfactorily forecast what would happen to it if New York were bombed by robots, if Hitler surrendered, or if a Roosevelt son died in action.

BUREAU OF APPLIED SOCIAL RESEARCH
Columbia University, New York

In the Wind

ONE OF THE THINGS that may have contributed to Wallace's defeat was a book. Its title is "Statesmanship and Religion"; its author, Henry J. Wallace. It consists of three lectures Mr. Wallace delivered at the Chicago Theological Seminary and another he delivered before the Federal Council of Churches, and was published in 1934 by the Roundtable Press. It was circulated by reactionary Democrats Thursday night and Friday of convention week, among a few important Wallace leaders. A dozen or more passages were marked. These passages were taken out of context to prove that Wallace was (a) anti-Catholic, (b) anti-Protestant, (c) atheistic, (d) communistic, and (e) fascistic. Anyone who read the book in its entirety could easily see that Wallace is none of these things, but the carefully marked passages appeared damning when read alone. The Old Guard argued that the Republicans might use these passages if Wallace were nominated.

THE PHOTOGRAPH DESK of a national news syndicate reports that Dewey insists on "serious, non-smiling" pictures, because, he says, the campaign is serious.

THE POST LIBRARY at Camp Perry, Ohio, with more than seven thousand volumes, has been closed for lack of funds to pay the librarian. At the same camp a private with a master's degree in librarianship is guarding war prisoners.

A RED CROSS CAR carrying a soldier with a heavily bandaged hand and another with crutches drew alongside a Fifth Avenue bus. "Isn't that a shame!" said a lady bus passenger. "Yes, those poor fellows," replied her male companion. "Oh, no, that isn't what I mean," said the lady. "Look at that sign: 'Donated by Local 32B, Building Service Employees International Union, A. F. L.' Isn't that a shame for the Red Cross!"

AMERICAN BUSINESS MEN may not trust the Soviet government, but they certainly intend to do business with it. Printers' Ink, an advertising journal, reports a 300 per cent increase in advertising by American industrial and engineering firms in "American Engineering and Industry," a Russian-language technical monthly published by Amtorg. "Catalog of American Engineering and Industry, 1944-46 Edition," another Amtorg publication, will have 1,350 pages of advertising placed by more than seven hundred American firms. The last edition, in 1942, carried about 250 pages of advertising.

FESTUNG EUROPA: The Nazis are melting down the bronze statues of Paris, but one of Lafayette has escaped them. A crew of workmen removed the 1½-ton statue from its pedestal and hauled it away in broad daylight—and it didn't occur to passing Nazis that the workmen were guerrilla fighters from the maquis.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

The Poles Take Over

BY ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Moscow, July 31, by Cable

IN THE past week Moscow celebrated an unprecedented series of victories. Thursday night five successive "salutes" hailed with guns and fireworks the liberation of six important cities in a single day. Along the entire front, from the Gulf of Finland to the Carpathians, the Red Army drove forward, freeing the last areas of Soviet territory in German hands, plunging deep into the Baltic states, and crossing the Polish border in a mighty sweep from North to South, liberating many large Polish cities.

These military victories led directly to an event whose political significance for the future of Europe almost transcends the military victory itself. This is the establishment of the Emergency Polish National Council as the civil authority, with a large Polish army which expects "to set banners in Berlin;" also the appearance of the new Polish Liberation Committee as the temporary executive power forming the local administration in liberated Poland. This was accompanied by a Soviet statement that the Red Army sets up no administrative organs but regards itself as cooperating with the Polish army in the territory of a sovereign, friendly, allied state.

These events aroused world-wide comment, ranging from attacks on the "puppet government" to milder hopes by liberals to combine the Polish National Council with the Polish government-in-exile recognized by London and Washington. Something like this may eventually be accomplished, but most comment misses the important facts and implications which Nation readers deserve to know.

Name-calling is futile. Any present Polish government must rely on the armed power of the Red Army as Badoglio and De Gaulle relied on the armed power of the Anglo-Americans. Every exiled government in London expects to take power with the aid of foreign armies. Thus the impolite term "puppet" strictly applies to all future European governments until they hold elections and create armies adequate to defend their soil.

The most important questions for the future of Europe are the following: How can groups claiming governmental power arouse and unite their people and quickly create independent, democratic states? What policies can such states propose for unscrambling Hitler's Europe and making a peaceful, democratic Europe? Behind these lies a third question which everyone has been asking: What kind of independent states will the Red Army help to install and defend?

To all these vital questions the Polish National Council suggests the first and clearest answer.

Note that the first Polish National Council was not formed in Moscow. The Moscow organization, the Union of Polish Patriots, persistently refuses to consider itself a source of government. It has repeatedly stated officially that Poles in exile could not create a government, but only Poles in Poland. Its official position was that agreement with the London Poles for the creation of government was impossible since the latter considered the participation of the Polish underground "pernicious." The best government, they held, would be one created by all democratic centers of Poles everywhere, but if this were impossible then the underground in Poland might legitimately create a government, but not the Poles in emigration, whether in London or in Moscow.

This theory of government may seem superfluous, but it is important to understand that it is punctiliously observed here. This essentially democratic theory contrasts with the assumption of the Anglo-Americans that governments are legitimately created by their recognition, followed by elections and constitutional forms satisfactory to them. The Soviets assume that a government legitimately arises only inside a country, which creates its own forms.

How did this work in practice? The Polish National Council, the "RADA," was formed last New Year's Eve at a secret meeting in Warsaw, attended by thirty delegates from more than a score of underground Polish organizations, all engaged in active warfare against the Nazis. Some delegates were killed in attempting to reach the meeting. The list of participating organizations was fairly impressive, including the Peasant Workers' Party, the Socialist Party, the cooperatives, underground trade unions and organizations of democratic intellectuals, and various armed partisan forces.

The session supported the 1921 constitution, based on French democracy, and denounced the 1935 constitution, which so conservative an authority as the "Encyclopedia of World History" states was railroaded through by authoritarian groups. The session decided to unite the democratic partisan bands into "a people's army." It also formed a national council and decided to promote local councils to direct the fight for liberation.

Within four months this RADA gained enough popular strength to send a delegation to Moscow late in May "to contact all Allied governments." It traveled a great distance with an armed guard in Polish uniforms through regions supposedly controlled by the Germans.

What success RADA had in approaching Moscow, Washington, and London was not reported, but six weeks later the Red Army reached Poland. Then RADA took over the Polish Army of more than 100,000 men, organized and equipped in the Soviet Union. It combined these with the poorly-armed "people's army" already operating on Polish soil. It called for the mobilization of Polish manhood into a bigger army to liberate the country and enter Berlin. It set up the "Liberation Committee" as the temporary executive organizing local administration.

If all this originated in Moscow—as some claim—then Moscow is to be congratulated on scrupulously observing the forms of democracy in Poland—more than that, on stimulating democratic action and Polish nationalism to take over an army equipped by the Soviets.

Two examples show how punctiliously the theory of a government originating inside a country was observed. The commander-in-chief of the new Polish Army is not General Berling, who commands the well-equipped Polish Army from Russia, but General Rilia, who rose through service in the partisan groups and who has now taken precedence over Berling. Similarly the chairman of the new Liberation Committee is not Wanda Wasiliewska, who inspired the Poles in Moscow, but Moravsky, a Polish Socialist Party leader with sixteen years' prewar political standing, who organized Polish workers for defense in 1939 and later organized the Partisans.

In calling the Poles to fight for freedom the new committee made the frankest statement of policy. It operates on the basis of the 1921 constitution, repudiates the 1935 constitution, and has declared a speedy election of delegates to frame a new constitution.

In foreign policy the committee announced its participation in a strong bloc with the Soviets and the Czechs. It proposes to settle the boundary with the Soviets on the principle that land inhabited by Poles belongs to Poland while land inhabited by Ukrainians belongs to the Ukraine.

In internal policy the Polish committee encourages private property in farms and medium-sized enterprises. All large enterprises throughout Europe have been seized by the Germans. Those in Poland are to be administered by a temporary state body pending "regulations on economic relations," after which they will be returned "to their owners." This is a clear invitation to American capital to develop large Polish enterprises, since only America has the means. In the absence of American capital, the only practicable alternative would probably be some form of socialism. With American capital there will be a system of private initiative, regulated by a Polish "New Deal."

The Poles propose to annex considerable German territory. This may upset some Americans. The Poles won't settle the peace terms, but their demands will worry the Germans and encourage their own people to fight hard. It is clear at least that the Soviet Union proposes to support progressive capitalist democracies in Europe. It is also clear that the Soviet leaders are fully cognizant of an ancient democratic principle which we Americans tend to forget, namely, that no nation can be liberated by another but must fight for its own liberation, that after long suppression people need the pride that comes of actively creating a government and mobilizing for freedom. This is what the Polish Liberation Committee offers the Poles.

Will the present Polish RADA combine with the London government-in-exile? Certainly not with all its members. Certainly not with certain followers in Poland who have killed Polish Partisans and betrayed them to the Gestapo. But some among the London Poles might strengthen a democratic Poland. For these the RADA organization has already provided a place.

While the RADA generally is now elected on a definite basis from various districts of Poland, a special provision admits 20 per cent of members to be "selected by RADA itself from distinguished persons." This would seem to anticipate some such proposal as additions from the Polish emigration. Clearly it is now for the Poles in London to make the approach.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

ABOUT the middle of July the following decree by the Gauleiter of Brunswick was published in newspapers and on placards throughout the city:

> All civilian party members and all compatriots who are not members of a party organization and who are able-bodied and capable of marching are ordered to attend a defense rally on July 16. All participants in the march, whether in mufti or in uniform, are to carry whatever weapons they possess, no matter what kind. No one must be absent.

Such "defense rallies" have been held in every German city and town during the past few weeks. The newspaper stories and photographs show that they all have the same pattern: the participants are always masses of civilians, and in the middle, like a backbone, there is always a detachment of soldiers, together with uniformed groups of Storm Troops, Elite Guards, policemen, firemen, etc. There are a few short speeches, a march of several kilometers, and some rudimentary military exercises.

What does it mean? The speakers say that the enemy is coming closer, the soil of the Fatherland itself is threatened, and all civilians—workers, old men, and children alike—must take arms to defend it. They pretend to be particularly worried about parachutists. Of a defense rally in Essen, for example, the Kölnische Zeitung of July 17 reports:

> For the first time a Storm Troop battalion for special tasks participated. This is a highly mobile force with special training for fighting British terrorism in the homeland.

And at a rally in Hanover on July 9 the Gauleiter said:

> Possible enemy attempts to land terror units among us to carry the war into our country will be opposed, at any hour, at any place, by our radical solidarity, which will thwart every attempt against our security, our work, and our transport.

But then the Gauleiter enlarged the circle of enemies. The purpose of the rally, he said, was "to prepare for any possibility whatsoever. . . . All measures have been taken to see to it that veterans of the last war and National Socialist youth take immediate action should there be any commotion anywhere." He described the purposes of such rallies throughout Germany as follows:

> First, to enable the government to estimate the number of men available at home. Second, to give every individual ready for defense the certainty that thousands upon thousands of comrades are at his side and are ready to take up arms whenever the moment demands it. And third, to demonstrate to potential disturbers of the peace and instigators of unrest that the National Socialist community is more closely united than ever, and is prepared by all means to preserve the fruits of our struggle. Increased watchfulness is necessary during the coming weeks and months. Any suspicious fact must be reported, and immediate intervention must be organized.

And, in case these hints were not clear enough, a commentator in the Essen Nationalzeitung clarified them fully on July 17. Thus:

> Parades have been rare of late, because urgent everyday tasks have left little time for them. But today it is advisable to demonstrate in a visible manner our united will. It will be useful not only for ourselves but more particularly for the numerous foreigners now living in our city, who do not share in our national and spiritual community. Some of them easily become the prey of enemy propaganda, since they have not the same political faith we have. The spectacle of a united phalanx of Germans under the swastika may discourage those foreigners who may feel inclined to work against our interests.

That, obviously, is the real purpose of this melancholy mobilization of children and old men, armed with "whatever weapons they possess." It is hardly likely that such "phalanxes" could stop "terror units" of parachutists. The mobilization is directed, rather, against the "numerous foreigners" in the country—the twelve to fifteen million enslaved workers. Evidently the time has come for Germany to fear them.

WARNING!

In the summer of 1940, when most people believed that the battle against Hitler was lost, we proclaimed our faith in the final defeat of the Nazis. In the summer of 1944, when most people consider the Nazis already beaten and expect the war in Europe to end momentarily—even Mr. Churchill's speeches breathe optimism.—we warn our readers that the enemy still has strength to resist. This is not paradoxical. It simply means that this war is not only a military but a political war. Military results may be influenced by political acts, and the power of the German army may be temporarily increased by the purge of half-hearted, anti-Nazi generals and the total Nazification of the internal as well as the military structure. The fight between democracy and fascism is literally a fight to the death. It is too early to assume that the force of Nazi fanaticism is wholly spent.

An epidemic which worries the government, but which is quite understandable, has broken out in the German public. The news of it comes from Danzig—that barometer of a city which six years ago was so enthusiastic about going "home to the Reich." The enthusiasm seems to have disappeared. An outspoken editorial in the Danziger Neuesten Nachrichten bears the title "Map Psychosis," and describes the disease as follows:

> Military maps are again laid out on the tables of the cafés. They are an infallible indication that the war has entered a phase charged with high tension. Now, the study of maps is a very good thing in itself. But if it degenerates into a mileage-mania, the basic value disappears in several respects. The all-around orientation reverses itself only too easily into sensations of geographical heart spasm. Then the miserable pseudo-knights of modern times emerge, whose thinking is even swifter than the achievements of instruments of modern technique. Bending over the maps, they draw what they call unbreakable circles with their right hands, while their left hands anxiously press their hearts. It is particularly in the Eastern corner of the Reich that these superclever map students are becoming visible and audible.

The paper finds especially dangerous a thought which the map-readers "occasionally" express—"the thought that the mission which history has laid upon us might better be passed on to coming generations for the sake of the convenience of our own generation." Never has the "occasional" thought that it is time to quit been more delicately expressed.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The World of Welles and Lippmann

U. S. WAR AIMS. By Walter Lippmann. An Atlantic Monthly Press Book. Little, Brown and Company. $1.50.

THE TIME FOR DECISION. By Sumner Welles. Harper and Brothers. $3.

IN "Foreign Policy—Shield of the Republic," Mr. Lippmann hammered home a truth long accepted by students of international affairs, namely that any durable peace must depend on a nuclear alliance of the United States, Russia, and Britain. The hammering was so necessary and so effectively done that readers other than the professional historians were disposed to overlook some poetic license with the past. The difficult question as to how this tripartite responsibility and leadership were to be made acceptable to the world of lesser states was left dangling in an atmosphere of hope, and only the vaguest suggestion was vouchsafed us of that larger association in which the alliance was to be "nuclear."

"U. S. War Aims" has the same theme, some of the same virtues, and more of the same defects. The writing is columnistic, setting out many debatable propositions without supporting argument, and (notably on the subject of China and the whole Far East) ironing smoothly over the surface of profound uncertainties.

The nuclear alliance has congealed in this book into a perpetual harmony between a Russian orbit and an Atlantic community which includes at its eastern extremity Greece and at its western Australia and New Zealand. China figures as the great-power core of another community, and the future will probably see similar Moslem and Hindu associations. The author asserts that the most essential condition of peace between the Atlantic and Russian groupings is that neither should seek allies within the other's bailiwick or try to bring Germany or Japan into its own strategical system. He does not touch directly upon the disturbances which may grow out of conflicting commercial policies or out of rivalries between two regional communities for advantages in a third. Such risks may be present in his mind when he declares that "the wartime association . . . will break up into unfriendly blocks unless the regional groups cohere into a world order . . ."

The pages where we hoped to find this world order are given over to an attack on "Wilsonianism" of such virulence that it makes of the Fourteen Points a veritable devil's litany. The effect, though startling, is negative, and the general organization which emerges is so anaemic that one wonders how the author can expect it to perform any harmonizing function between regional blocs. He is right when he admits the danger that his great communities may degenerate into competing concentrations of power. But a world order capable of preventing this would have to be one exercising at least the authority to scrutinize all regional agreements to determine their conformity with general security. Mr. Lippmann's general organization, contrary to the Moscow Declaration, is to have nothing whatever to say on the whole subject of security. One result is that the lesser states are left with the sorry comfort of becoming clients of their great neighbors, their destinies dependent on unpredictable wills.

Doubtless the author's purpose was to bring out in strong relief the stubborn realities which make it folly to expect that, once this war is over, nations can be speedily fused into one democratically organized security system. Certainly the reader is left in no doubt about these realities. But even here Mr. Lippmann overshoots the mark when he presents the existing obstacles as eternal verities.

Some passages will stand to his lasting credit. He demonstrates, simply but unanswerably, the dependence of American security on the freedom of the opposite Atlantic and Pacific coasts from the grasp of conquering empires; he shows the vast disparity between the hopes that have been awakened by the promises of international organization and the actual trend of decisions; he is everywhere conscious of the dependence of political integration on devotion to common values; and he makes it clear how cooperation between the great powers will be conditioned by the recognition and enforcement of basic human liberties.

But, though I could hardly qualify as one of those Wilsonians against whom the author fulminates, his book as a whole leaves me rejecting its historical analysis, its moral premises, and its political conclusions.

Mr. Welles is a Wilsonian, and his thesis is diametrically opposed to that of Mr. Lippmann. In this instructive contrast, the long-experienced diplomat presents us with a plan which, by the journalist's standards of realism, is hopelessly utopian. Yet if Mr. Welles has gone far beyond any nearby prospect of world organization, Mr. Lippmann, it may be hoped, has fallen no less short of the actual purposes of our governments.

Carrying on a crusade which he launched in 1942, Mr. Welles urges the United Nations to create now organs which can design the permanent organization and at the same time act as interim world authority. Chief of these organs should be a Provisional Executive Council of eleven members—one each appointed by the four major powers; two elected by the group of European states; two by the group of American states; one by the Far Eastern states; one by the states of the Near and Middle East and Africa; and one by the British Dominions. Action would be taken by two-thirds majority including the affirmative vote of all four major powers.

Upon the world authority, whether in its interim or final form (and the process of transition from one to the other is by no means clear), Mr. Welles imposes exacting functions of immediate pacification and long-term administration. He divides Germany into three distinct nations, and these are to be occupied for an indefinite period under the "supreme authority of the future world organization" which here, as in Japan, is to enforce disarmament and control economic activity. But the author's devotion to self-determination will not permit him permanently to impose any regime on an unwilling people. So, if a new generation of Germans firmly establishes a democratic system, the world organization must allow them to decide their own political destiny.

For security, Mr. Welles relies heavily upon regional organization. But where this is inadequate, the world authority calls into action not an international police force, but contingents promised by the major powers. In these arrangements, the author treats tenderly the sovereignty of the Big Four. Each of these has a veto. Lesser states are not so favored, and their protests may well wreck this plan, which clearly disregards the basic principle of sovereign equality announced at Moscow. Outside the immediate domain of security, opposition may be expected from the colonial powers; for the author's vigorously enforced trusteeship gives far greater control over states administering dependent areas than anything contemplated in current British proposals.

If the nations want permanent peace, they will have to accept organization quite as powerful as that proposed in this book. But the great states also will have to be brought under the world authority, not set on top of it. There is little prospect that this can happen in the near future, or even that Mr. Welles's plan can soon be realized in anything like its entirety.

But—whatever happens in world organization—"The Time for Decision" has other claims to permanent value. Some of it is first-hand and first-rate diplomatic history. The high point is the narrative of the mission to Europe in 1940, a hopeless yet imperative enterprise carried through with courage and with dignity. Surprisingly enough, in view of the author's reputation for cold correctness, the book is rich in human sympathy. One defect is an excessive tendency to loyal tribute, which at some points unnecessarily expands the text and weakens the impression of impartial judgment.

P. E. CORBETT

Janeites Differ

SPEAKING OF JANE AUSTEN. By Sheila Kaye-Smith and G. B. Stern. Harper and Brothers. $2.75.

ALL true lovers of Jane Austen do more than read and re-read her; they would talk and write about her too; write essays and econiums and books; or, if worst comes to worst, write book reviews. Being a nearly perfect artist who kept to a very limited field, she offers her admirers few abstruse matters for speculation and no vast regions of inquiry; it may be that the harshest controversy she ever stirs up concerns the relative merits of her own six novels. But, for some, the temptation is also great to take up a kind of residence inside her world, to think of her as part of the family rather than part of literature, to be chatty and personal about her characters and scenes; in fine, to go on in a fashion at once too intense and too trivial to produce either a critical analysis of a writer or a psychological study of a woman. It was in this spirit that Sheila Kaye-Smith and G. B. Stern sat down and wrote, in alternating chapters, the present book; which, though it has its passages of criticism, has much more the solemn gaiety of initiates, the detailed gossip of lady authors and, in its worst moments, the gush of infatuated schoolgirls. I am not a true—or, at any rate, a typical—enough Janeite to be always easy in Miss Stern's and Miss Kaye-Smith's rapt company. Up to a point I can be interested in their treatment of the food and clothes in the novels, or of the characters who are mentioned but never appear; but when they take to such prose as "Dear Emma! dear snobbish, cocksure, deluded Emma!" I begin to think lovingly of the novels of Maria Edgeworth and Mrs. Humphrey Ward.

I think too—to dispose of my other complaints—that for a book about Jane Austen this one is somewhat deficient in verve; and that its authors' worries that some of their opinions may shock their fellow-Janeites possess a coyness ill-suited to a writer who was never coy. Finally, the one unforgivable sin in writing (for the illuminati) about Jane Austen is to dot her i's for her; as when, for example, Miss Stern ventures to explain what must be everybody's favorite line in the whole of "Mansfield Park." And there is the united judgment of the authors—to which I shall return later—that "Pride and Prejudice" is the poorest of the six novels. Otherwise, for any well-posted reader of Jane Austen, there is good matter here; there are many interesting small points and some useful bits of information; and the two authors are often enough at ladylike odds to keep their collaboration from being a mere duet.

They differ, for instance, over "Mansfield Park": Miss Kaye-Smith more or less accepting Fanny as a person, as well as Fanny's marriage to Edmund; Miss Stern being dissatisfied with Fanny and wishing she could have married Henry Crawford. Miss Stern, indeed, introduces a lively discussion of "the Mansfield Park quartette." Mr. Edmund Wilson, reviewing this book in the New Yorker, felt that Miss Stern's was a woman's attitude, women objecting to the prig and creep-mouse in Fanny because they tend to identify themselves with her, whereas men are willing to accept her for what she is. To wish that Fanny had married Henry is, I think, truly feminine; but with Fanny herself the nub of the matter may lie elsewhere—in Elizabeth Bowen's comment (to be sure, I am quoting another woman) that "Mansfield Park" is "the most nearly insincere novel that Jane Austen ever wrote." The real trouble is that Fanny is not seen clearly in the light of Jane Austen's own values; it is not what Fanny is that dissatisfies us, but Jane Austen's tone in delineating her. At Emma, Jane Austen is plainly always laughing a little; in Elizabeth Bennett she is living vicariously and plainly reveling; with Anne Elliot she is noticeably identifying herself. But Fanny she would seem to approve from too complaisant a regard for conventional worthiness; she seems, for once, not quite to have trusted her humor and taste. It would be different were Fanny a coldly objective study of a type; but Fanny is presented, in every approving way, as a heroine.

All this is regrettable, for in "Mansfield Park" the stage is really set for the finest comedy of contrasts in any of the novels—with the virtue in Fanny and Edmund marred by priggishness and conceit, and the vivacity in Mary and Henry marred by shallowness and indulgence. Here, if ever, Jane Austen herself should have served as a balance wheel; should have gone about her comedy of social and amatory cross-breeding with supreme detachment, and have emphasized the faults in both pairs by her own perfect discrimination. As it is, the scales seem weighted against the Crawfords, and the book gives off a faint odor of sanctimonious morality. There is superb finish to "Mansfield Park," but faulty equilibrium.

As for ranking the novels, both Miss Stern and Miss Kaye-Smith put "Emma" first, letting it just nose out "Persuasion"; a verdict with which I am slowly coming to agree. Discussing the relative unpopularity of "Emma," Edmund Wilson finds it the "Hamlet" of the novels, from its containing an unabsorbed, really an external, element which must yet be recognized; and he offers an interesting analysis of Emma herself as a woman more interested in managing other women than in fulfilling herself through men. This is probably true of Emma, considered realistically; but I wonder whether it isn't to obscure a more important point, which is that Emma is really handled satirically. Emma —endowed with all the assurance of youth, the complacence of a superior station, the arrogance of a spoiled darling—is a target for comedy; and in terms of her comic role, the point about her trying to manage young women is that she invariably mismanages them. At any rate, if "Emma" remains relatively unpopular, it is much less, I think, from an unabsorbed element than from its undeviating tone—a tone of comedy pure and unalloyed. Nothing farcical intrudes upon it, as in "Pride and Prejudice"; nothing romantic, as in several of the novels; nothing poetic, as in "Persuasion." And all these other elements are more readily apprehended and enjoyed; comedy so dry as "Emma's," a comic outlook so thorough-going, must always be caviare.

As for Miss Stern's and Miss Kaye-Smith's verdict on "Pride and Prejudice," it is the opinion of many official Janeites; perhaps one must hold that opinion to qualify as a Janeite at all; but it still seems to me dead wrong, and one of the dangers of over-cultivation. "Emma" and "Persuasion" may be caviare; but putting "Pride and Prejudice" at the very bottom of the list—after even "Northanger Abbey"—is of a piece with liking your wild duck very, very bloody and undercooked. As part of my homework, I have just re-read "Northanger Abbey," which I found extremely pleasant, but not in a class with "Pride and Prejudice." It hasn't a tenth of the virtues—of the freshness and high spirits, the bold scene-painting and brilliant character-drawing; and when it comes to the faults in which "Pride and Prejudice" abounds, "Northanger" has fault after fault to match them. If "Pride and Prejudice" has a storybook plot, so in a sense has "Northanger." If in "Pride and Prejudice" the comedy is spattered with farce, that in "Northanger" is splashed with burlesque. If Lady Catherine de Bourgh is wildly overdrawn (though, by the bye, Lord David Cecil, who should know as well as anybody nowadays can, says there were many aristocrats like her), what of General Tilney, whose behavior is as excessive without being a fraction as entertaining? And what goes for "Northanger" goes on different grounds for "Sense and Sensibility" also. Miss Stern and Miss Kaye-Smith are entitled, of course, to their preferences in the matter; but if they would pronounce a critical judgment as well, we are entitled to more formidable reasons.

LOUIS KRONENBERGER

Louis H. Pink

Former New York State Superintendent of Insurance, now President of Associated Hospital Service of New York offers an

American Beveridge Plan

in his new book

FREEDOM FROM FEAR

With an Introduction by OWEN D. YOUNG

This book underscores Uncle Sam's signature to one of the major promises of the Atlantic Charter. As no other qualified authority has made so vividly clear before, Mr. Pink shows why and how the task of ridding mankind of the fears of insecurity due to illness, idleness and old age can succeed only through the simultaneous action of all nations. Every man's stake in the fear-free world he wants is here realistically and hopefully set forth. "An informative and timely book." —N. Y. Herald Tribune.

$2.50 • HARPER

Fascism—American Style

ARGENTINE DIARY. By Ray Josephs. Random House. $3.

NOT all the high-powered trivia and soiled confetti of Mr. Joseph's style could discourage me in the reading of this book. Its bright analine colorfulness, its excessively thyroidal vigor are not more than disfigurements of an unusually interesting book.

Perhaps one has no right to expect a contemporary foreign correspondent to write as well as Nevinson, Ransome, or even Richard Harding Davis. But when it comes to facts, to both their background past and their implication for the future, Mr. Josephs is first-rate. There is here no sense of deeply outraged morality, as there was in "Berlin Diary," and Mr. Josephs knows nothing of Mr. Shirer's economy of argument. Yet in its way this is another "Berlin Diary." "Argentine Diary" covers only a brief period of time, from January 1943 to January 1944, but it gives as reliable a picture of the establishment of the present pro-fascist or semi-fascist dictatorship in the Argentine as can anywhere be found.

Comparing charges made in this book with Mr. Hull's July 26 statement on Argentine policy, one sees that Mr. Josephs has provided a mass of evidence which is, point by point, confirmatory of Mr. Hull's case. Paragraph 2 of the State Department's paper declares that the present Farrell regime has given positive aid to the Axis. Not only the Farrell regime, says Mr. Josephs, but the preceding regimes of Castillo and Ramirez. That the dictators have not merely

You made this biography of a great American

A NON-FICTION BEST SELLER

but—

YANKEE FROM OLYMPUS

is not considered suitable reading for your men overseas:

Congress recently passed an amendment to the Soldiers' Voting Act (Title Five of Public Law 277, the Hatch Act). Pursuant to the War Department's interpretation of the act, YANKEE FROM OLYMPUS, Catherine Drinker Bowen's biography of the late Supreme Court Justice, Oliver Wendell Holmes, cannot be purchased for Army education courses or for Army libraries. Further, after having been accepted for inclusion in "Armed Service Editions," which make available to the services overseas important new books at very low cost, it was, following passage of the Hatch Act, excluded. Because of shipping problems no package can be sent to Army personnel except on written request of the individual service man.

> The reason for the exclusion of YANKEE FROM OLYMPUS, according to law, is that it contains "political argument or political propaganda . . . designed or calculated to affect the result" of various Federal elections.

When YANKEE FROM OLYMPUS was published and selected by the Book-of-the-Month Club, the free American press greeted it as "a magnificent book . . . about inspiring men" (Los Angeles Times), that "ranks with the finest biographies of our time" (Boston Herald). The American public, by the democratic method of preference and choice, has made this distinguished biography of a distinguished American a national best selling non-fiction book. But an overzealous Congress, probably with entirely different objects in view, has passed a law which the Army has interpreted as forbidding the purchase of YANKEE FROM OLYMPUS and some other fine American books such as Charles Beard's The Republic. Officials of the War Department explain that it is not their place to criticize the law but to administer it. The framers of the Amendment contend it was designed to "prevent pernicious political activities." How, in the name of common sense, does YANKEE FROM OLYMPUS come into that category? Here is censorship in its most virulent form. Here is a frontal attack on Freedom of Speech and of the Press. We refuse to tolerate it in silence. We urge you to write your Senators and Congressman, demanding the repeal of that part of the Hatch Act which, in operation, makes all but inaccessible to our men overseas the free distribution of free ideas, one of the privileges for which they are fighting.

L B

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY and THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY PRESS

BOSTON

tolerated trade with Axis countries but have flagrantly supported their propaganda machines in the Argentine is a point Mr. Josephs makes repeatedly. "Within the last two weeks," declares Mr. Hull, "newsprint imported under grant of allied navicerts has been supplied" to four fascist newspapers, Axis propaganda sheets.

Well-informed as he evidently has taken pains to be, Mr. Josephs is not strong as an analyst. That the Argentine militarists are steadily moving toward a more extreme dictatorship he sees, and he describes their technique with adequacy. He has no doubts that all their talk about neutrality is chiefly a cover for their interior politics. Confirming Mr. Hull, he notes that the Farrell regime and its predecessors have deliberately emptied their few anti-Axis measures of all significance while they have used constantly increasing severity in their suppression of Argentine liberties.

But so conscientious is the author as a reporter that he gives the reader of some political sophistication ample material for thought concerning the regime's success in resisting interior and exterior opposition. That the conventional left-wing explanations are bad, Mr. Josephs's intensely interesting page 91, dated July 19, makes clear. In this he gives a fascinating review of the ten reasons offered him by "best-informed observers" in answer to the question, why does Argentina cling "so stubbornly to her neutrality policy?" (Mr. Josephs's formulation.) Reason One expresses that fear of social revolution which was a considerable element in Chamberlain circles in Britain. Of the nine others, eight explicitly confess, or logically imply, sincere belief in neutrality, at one level of belief or another. Just as Mr. Chamberlain made use of the deep-rooted and quite honorable pacifism of the British people, the Argentine dictators, the author's report compels one to believe, are consciously utilizing a genuine sentiment in their own dishonest interests. In its exterior aspect Farrell's policy is not so very different from that of Irigoyen, whom Argentine and northern democrats admire, during the first world war.

Elsewhere, Mr. Josephs says that a very great part of Argentine public opinion, perhaps a majority opinion, desires a United Nations victory. There is no doubt about it. But an equally striking thing about this report is that there is nowhere in it any mention of popular resistance to Farrell or effective demand for a change in foreign policy. The Iriburu counter-revolution of 1930 and its consequences have, of course, made organizational resistance difficult. But while Mr. Josephs mentions student protests and cautious dissent upon the part of great newspapers, what resistance he describes comes chiefly from military and naval groups whose interests are apparently as personal as those of Farrell and his predecessors. In that he confirms the report of an Argentine Socialist deputy with whom the reviewer talked some six months ago.

Mr. Josephs would probably agree that it was the personalism of the Irigoyen democracy, or sham democracy, that brought it down. It has been so with Argentine democratic movements ever since. They have rarely sought vigorously to strike roots among the masses, or to organize in a solid fashion. The observation enables one to see the weakness of Mr. Hull's policy. There is, by the way, little sign that Mr. Josephs has any better understanding than the State Department. He has not, apparently, asked himself the necessary question, how could it profit the miserable day laborer of Mendoza to go to war against the Axis? Obviously it could only profit him if intervention brought with it the firm establishment of a creative democracy or if it produced conditions likely to lead to that. There is little in United States or British foreign policy to give the Mendoza laborers ground for believing that we care about such a thing. In Brazil there is a regime not greatly different from Farrell's; in Peru there is another such. Both, being on our side, are "good governments." The explanation is that we must not interfere in the internal affairs of other nations. Obviously the irreconcilable contradictions of our policy spring from distrust of the whole contemporary revolution. All of Mr. Hull's charges are true, and he is quite right to withhold recognition from Farrell. But there is no solution in the glacial formalism that so far has guided Washington. Mr. Josephs's comment gives little sign of revolutionary understanding, but "Argentine Diary" helps one to positive belief.

RALPH BATES

New Writing in Wartime

CROSS-SECTION. Edited by Edwin Seaver. L. B. Fischer. $3.50.

THE anthology of new writing has by now become as much an important part of the literary scene as the periodical. Hence it is natural to compare Mr. Seaver's collection to the volumes of The American Caravan, New Writing, and New Directions which have appeared for the past fifteen years. And such a comparison leads to the overwhelming impression that this is the weakest of the lot and that some extreme setback may have occurred in the quality of literary consciousness.

Mr. Seaver's collection contains a good deal of competent writing of a certain kind: it is not the absence of this competence, nor is it a naive expectation of masterpieces which gives one a sense of dismay. The depressing thing is the level at which the competence is active. The authors of fiction in this volume had available as models a whole generation—Silone, Malraux, Céline, Brecht, to name only the examples from Europe—to show how the experience of prolonged crisis, which is a leading theme here, can be dealt with without descending to flat naturalism or deceiving oneself with arbitrary experiment for its own sake. And, before Silone and Malraux, such authors as Mann, Gide, Proust, and Joyce were available as literary influences. Yet, apart from the brief representation of poetry, which presents some good poets but in weak examples of their work, there is very little to suggest that these new authors have begun to write in the same literary period as the models just cited. Perhaps this summary judgment ought to be qualified, since there is a play about the death of García Lorca. But the substance of the qualification can be judged by the line "Flowers of the world, unite!"

It is hardly just a question of sensitivity to literary influence. The best piece in the collection, "My Wife the Witch," by Ira Wolfert, is an extraordinary story in which Mr. Wolfert makes use of the powerful device of the apparition of the dead, and yet without any evidence that he has studied

Henry James's profound employment of the same thing. If one is as gifted at story-telling as this story and "Tucker's People" prove Wolfert to be, then one can get along very well without a knowledge of the method and style of the great authors of one's time, although it is hard to see how such knowledge would be harmful. But, as this collection shows, it is not likely that many story-tellers will have Wolfert's particular gift of being able to apprehend life with such directness that some of his pages have the genuineness and actuality of an overheard conversation. It is not desirable that all authors should have just that kind of gift. And if most authors are not moved by a sense of what has been done by the great authors of the period, what is likely is not directness, but the imitation of inferior literary models.

Here these are chiefly proletarianism, a term which now seems to belong to some other life, and the anecdotal idiom of the New Yorker. Proletarianism still functions in the old way by dictating the subject and emphasizing the topical as the important, so that Mr. Seaver includes a good many poor pieces about the oppression of the Negro; and again, as of old, this emphasis, fixed as it is upon abstractions, makes the story evolve and then resolve itself in terms of a cause worthy in itself, hence sanctified, hence triumphant in the end, like Cinderella, and like all melodrama. Richard Wright's ambitious story fails because of melodrama of several kinds, and because of the usual failing of allegory, the over-simplified correspondence between particular detail and theme.

The influence of the New Yorker shows itself here as in its native haunts mainly in the use of insignificant patter to provide movement and characterization; and it shows itself also in the quality of observation employed to get in the detail of the background. It is most often the kind of observation likely in professional women, who come home to make dinner, and are suburban liberals in every pore of their beings; which is all very well in a magazine where stories are surrounded by the distractions of cartoons and advertisements, but which is strange in a volume committed to serious new writing. And even the New Yorker's bogus sophistication seems desirable when, in a story about two old maid sisters, one arrives at this sentence: "Albert was a gynecologist, and maybe that was why he was more at home there, even on nights when two or three lady buyers were up."

Perhaps the fault is with criticism, or the critical views most of these new authors seem to assume in their writing. So much at least is suggested by the one critical essay in the book, an essay which concerns itself, in a way bordering on fantasy, with calculations as to the time, place, character, nationality, and authorship of the new "War and Peace." The blueprints are detailed enough to make the fortune of a publisher's scout, for we are told that the new masterpiece will be written in some ten years, the author will probably be Russian, he will certainly be a Marxist, and—breathtaking insight!—"certainly a genius!" "The leading contender" at present is Sholokhov, but the critic fears that he may have enough work on hand already. These computations go forward with a terrifying literalness; they come to sound like the ticking of a time-bomb; until, at the end, the critic annihilates his essay with the bland remark: "If this essay should lead to the production of a new 'War and Peace,' it would be a miracle to rank with any in Biblical history." The one consideration not taken into account is the possibility that this war, like many others, may not become the subject of a major piece of fiction which is a masterpiece.

The quest of the new "War and Peace" reminds one of the old search for The Great American Novel, and to complete the picture, there is a play which reads as if it had just been written by Eugene O'Neill for the Provincetown Playhouse. Its title is "The Man Who Had All the Luck," and it will soon be produced on Broadway. Perhaps we are returning to 1920. DELMORE SCHWARTZ . . . and you'll say it, too . . .

"Russia's no mystery to me anymore. I've just read—

Revolutions in Russia
THEIR LESSONS FOR THE WESTERN WORLD
By G. R. TREVIRANUS

Every American who really wants to understand Russia, wants to know how everything that Russia was, is or will be can be fully explained, will find this the most thoroughly entertaining, informative and satisfying book about our ally yet published. "Soberly written, unbiased and well-founded study."—Book-of-the-Month Club News. "Solid and stimulating . . . an accurate and level-headed treatise."
—N. Y. Times Book Review

Illustrated • $3.00

HARPER & BROTHERS • 49 East 33rd St., N. Y. 16

BLOOD DONORS NEEDED!

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

BURLINGAME

Surrealist Painting

BY CLEMENT GREENBERG

I

SURREALISM is the only programmatic and more or less compact aesthetic movement aside from Pre-Raphaelitism to affect directly more than one of the arts. The number of parallels between the two movements—already glimpsed by Herbert Read and R. H. Wilenski—are surprising. Both are inspired by an ambition which looked first to change the décor and then the structure itself of industrial society. Dissatisfaction with the state of the arts grew into a more radical dissatisfaction with the very quality of life, which could vent itself only through politics.

Like the Pre-Raphaelites, the Surrealists have gone, although less consciously, in two different directions. Morris and Ruskin made their way to revivalist socialism, while the other Pre-Raphaelites, reconciling themselves to the status quo, became fashionable missionaries of aestheticism and religiosity. The orthodox Surrealists have stood firm on socialism, yet their stand has not kept Surrealism from becoming largely identified with the younger generation of smart international bohemia, to whom the movement has furnished a new principle of taste. The desire to change life on the spot, without waiting for the revolution, and to make art the affair of everybody is Surrealism's most laudable motive, yet it has led inevitably to a certain vulgarization of modern art. The attempt is made to depress it to a popular level instead of raising the level of popularity itself. The anti-institutional, anti-formal, anti-aesthetic nihilism of the Surrealists—inherited from Dada with all the artificial nonsense entailed—has in the end proved a blessing to the restless rich, the expatriates, and aesthete-flaneurs in general who were repelled by the asceticism of modern art. Surrealist subversiveness justifies their way of life, sanctioning the peace of conscience and the sense of chic with which they reject arduous disciplines. Not all the steadfastness of its leader in protesting against corruption wherever he could see it has prevented this ambivalence in the effects of Surrealism from eating back into and corrupting Surrealism itself.

The Pre-Raphaelites, for all Ruskin's insistence on going to nature "in all singleness of heart," looked mostly to the past for inspiration as to motifs, style, and décor. The Surrealists, promoting a newer renascence of the "Spirit of Wonder," have cast back to those periods after the Middle Ages which were fondest of the marvellous and which most exuberantly exercised the imagination: the Baroque, the late eighteenth century, and the Romantic and Victorian nineteenth century. Surrealism has revived all the Gothic revivals and acquires more and more of a period flavor, going in for Faustian lore, old-fashioned and flamboyant interiors, alchemistic mythology, and whatever else is held to be the excesses in taste of the past. Surrealism is "advanced," but its notion of the future is not too unlike the comic-strip fantasies about the twenty-first century.

The effects of Surrealism in art and literature have differed in much the same way as did those of Pre-Raphaelitism. In both cases literature has benefited more than painting—English poetry through the Rossettis and through Swinburne (who was at least influenced by Pre-Raphaelitism); French letters through Eluard, Aragon, Breton, and others. Both movements were essentially literary and placed all emphasis on the anecdotal, notwithstanding that the Pre-Raphaelite movement was made up largely of painters and that both Pre-Raphaelite and Surrealist poetry bears a strong pictorial impress. The pictures of the Pre-Raphaelites form a doubtful contribution, ratifying literary vices habitual to English art; while in the arts and crafts Morris and his followers practiced little more than antiquarianism. A good deal of Surrealist painting has similarly suffered from being literary and antiquarian.

II

Surrealist writing more or less fulfils the Surrealist theory of creation as an automatic procedure uncontrolled by reason or the deliberate consciousness. Inspiration is induced by surrender to immediate impulse and to accident; thus the writer—or painter—reveals his unconscious to himself and to his audience, whose own unconscious is stirred by echoes. But in the practice of painting it is much harder than in that of poetry—though equally difficult in theory—to tell where the unconscious stops and the reasoning will takes over. The poet, subjecting his invention to meter or rhyme or logic, knows that he thereby suspends the automatic process. But the Surrealist painter, beginning with the first thing that comes into his mind—with accidents met in the manipulation of his tools, or with hints from the seams and texture of Leonardo's old wall, finding in these ways suggested resemblances to actual objects, which he proceeds to improve upon—the painter is not so apt to realize that he interrupts the automatic procedure the moment he begins to enhance these resemblances by methods taught in art school. For the trained painter can exercise the consciously acquired habits of his craft while seeming to absent his mind's attention and rely solely on his hand and eye. This, however, is not the same as automatic creation. Rubens had Plutarch and Seneca read to him while he painted, but he did not withdraw his conscious attention from his work, he simply divided it, like any painter one knows who can carry on a conversation while working. There was indeed an element of automatism in Rubens's art, as there is in all successful art, but it was not the primary factor in the process by which it was created.

The difference between automatism as a primary and as a secondary factor is responsible for the two different directions in which Surrealist painting has moved. On the one side are Miró, Arp, Masson, Picasso, and Klee—the last two of whom are claimed by the Surrealists without their ever having formally attached themselves to the movement. On the other side are Ernst, Tanguy, Roy, Magritte, Oelze, Fini, and a myriad more, including Dali, who was several years ago excommunicated by the orthodoxy for political, not artistic, deviations. With the first group automatism may be relatively complete or incomplete, but in either case it is primary as a rule and intervenes decisively—even though it is impossible to determine with any satisfying exactness where in their painting the automatic stops and the conscious begins. The artist may doodle his picture from start to finish, or he may elaborate accidentally discovered representational elements, or he may begin with a definite eidetic image. But he will never use methods learned at art school, and the resemblances to actual phenomena will be schematic rather than realistic. A dog barking at the moon is indicated by certain unmistakable signs, but these are in the nature of provocations to the artist's "painterly" imagination, which seizes upon the signs as excuse for elaborating shapes and colors which do not image anything possible even as an idea off the flat picture surface. The dog and the moon become the springboard, not the subject of the work. Here the reliance upon the unconscious and the accidental serves to lift inhibitions which prevent the artist from surrendering, as he needs to, to his medium. In such surrender lies one of the particular advantages of modern art. Surrealism, under this aspect and only under this, culminates the process which has in the last seventy years restored painting to itself and enabled the modern artist to rival the achievements of the past.

The other direction of Surrealist painting can best be charted by fixing the almost invariable point at which the automatic procedure stops. Here too inspiration is sought by doodling, or in accidents of the medium, but it is found most often in images offering themselves spontaneously and irrationally to the artist's mind before he picks his brush up. Sometimes he claims to do nothing more than transcribe a dream. But even the doodling, the rubbing of pencil on paper over a rough surface, or the observation of Leonardo's old wall is a means primarily of anticipating or inducing images, not of creating the picture itself. Automatism is made a secondary factor; for this type of Surrealist painting wishes to preserve the identifiable image at all costs, and complete automatism goes too far in the direction of the abstract.

Having received his inspiration, the painter most consciously goes to work to clothe the given image in pictorial forms that will produce a strong illusion of its possible existence in the world of real appearances. The subject matter is different, but the result is the same that the nineteenth-century academic artist sought. It makes no difference that the creatures, anatomies, substances, landscapes, or juxtapositions limned by the Surrealist violate the laws of probability: they do not violate the modalities of three-dimensional vision —to which painting can now conform only by methods that have become academic. For all the problems involved in transferring faithfully the visual experience of three dimensions to a plane surface have been solved by this time, and where all the problems have been solved only academicism is possible. The Surrealist represents his more or less fantastic images in sharp and literal detail, as if they had been posed for him. Seldom does he violate any of the canons of academic technique, and he vies with and sometimes imitates color photography, even to the very quality of his paint. Dali's discontinuous planes and contradictory perspectives approximate photomontage. Ernst's volcanic landscapes look like exceptionally well manufactured scenic postal cards.

[To be concluded]

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS
Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

MOTION PICTURE

"A commanding screen biography."
. . . Crowther, Times
DARRYL F. ZANUCK'S WILSON
A 20th Century-Fox Picture
On the Roxy stage . . .
FRED WARING and his Pennsylvanians
ROXY CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES

STAGE PLAYS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (In association with Jack H. Skirball)
JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL
The FRANZ WERFEL – S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN
LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS
J. EDWARD BROMBERG
MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED
Evenings at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30.

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK in
MEXICAN HAYRIDE
by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS ▪ Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.
AIR CONDITIONED

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS
—
Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.
☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer
to New Subscribers ONLY:
☐ 10 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME..........
ADDRESS..........
.... 8-12-44

DRAMA

Furtherest West

MAE WEST—at least so I am told—is described in a recent and very high-brow book on the movies as "an impersonator of female impersonators." Now there is a phrase the full significance of which I would not guarantee to expound without a considerable period of preparatory meditation, but one of its meanings is both simple and familiar. Miss West is not, to put it bluntly, the least bit sexy, and many have noted that upon the sophisticated spectator the final effect of her desperate seductiveness is the effect of satire. To see victims actually succumbing to a display of lubricity so patently phony is very much like watching the deluded male who makes love to Charlie's aunt when we know all the time that the latter's billowy bosom is stuffed with feathers.

For a long time the only question remaining in my mind has been concerned with—to stretch a couple of terms—the attitude of this artist toward her art. Is she, I have asked, deliberately making fun of female charm in much the same way that eunuchs and homosexuals like to make fun of it, or does she, by any chance, really suppose that a twitch of the shoulder and a verbal hint as subtle as a fire siren is all that it takes to make what used to be called "a dangerous woman"? "Catherine Was Great," written by Miss West and performed by her at the Shubert Theater, seems to answer that question once and for all. There is nothing else that I can think of to say in its favor, but it does seem to remove all further doubt as to the star's intentions. Its bawdiness is as deadly serious in intention as it is deadly dull in effect. Miss West hopes that we will giggle at her daring but she hopes also that we will continue to take sex seriously and we are obviously expected to go home to wicked dreams.

A few seasons back "DuBarry Was a Lady" demonstrated how one of the great female lovers of history could be burlesqued and so made to yield a reasonable amount of not very subtle amusement. But "Catherine Was Great" is not, so at least I gather, intended to be burlesque. It is true that Miss West's interpretation of the empress differs only in costuming from her interpretation of Diamond Lil but that appears to be the result of her histrionic limitations, plus, perhaps, a conviction that all the grandes amoureuses are fundamentally alike, and not at all the consequence of any intention to burlesque. The serious portions of the play—and believe it or not, there are serious portions with a great deal of pompous bowing-about by very fancily dressed courtiers who move through some of the gaudiest scenery seen here in recent years—involve Catherine's plans "for her people," and they are written in the general style of "The Young Visiters." When, for example, the empress interrupts a discussion of the Turkish situation to say meaningfully to Potemkin, "Now let's talk about you," one is bound to conclude that such a historical drama as this has not been written since Beerbohm's "Savonarola."

As for the humor—there are, of course, supposed to be plenty of laughs—it is manufactured by the simple process of assuming that the audience may be trusted to find a double meaning in everything once it has been warned that a double meaning is intended. In the twenties, when we were easily amused, there used to be a very naughty parlor game which consisted in adding the phrase "in the middle of the bed" to the titles of books. Miss West has merely revived this game. If she tells a courtier that he has not filled her samovar this is supposed to be very dirty indeed. The game never was so very funny and it is not funny at all when solemnly played in the theater.

With a few very minor exceptions the large supporting cast is male and either very virile indeed, or quite nastily the contrary, so the star has nothing to match herself against. The best line of the evening will give some idea of what the others are like. Says Catherine when a rebel has escaped: "What do I have an army for? Don't answer that one."

I am very much afraid that we highbrows are going to have to give up the attempt to find something really significant in Mae. One of us—it may even have been I—once said that she was a vamp to end all vamps and that the evolution of Theda Bara into "Diamond Lil" showed how we were growing up. Miss West did not, I now fear, mean to end all vamps. She merely wanted to be a newer and more outspoken kind. But it is just possible that "Catherine Was Great" actually is "a Mae West Show to end all Mae West Shows" even though here again that was certainly not part of the author's intention.

Perhaps I should add that "Catherine Was Great" is not, as one would naturally assume, a musical show—except for one dirty song by the star. For once, the things too silly to be said on the stage are said anyway.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

CONTRIBUTORS

MICHAEL CARTER is the pseudonym of a journalist who has made a long study of recent developments in the Near East.

WALTON HAMILTON, professor of law at Yale Law School, has seen the Supreme Court on "decision day" many times, in his capacity as economic adviser to various government agencies. He was formerly head of the Brookings Graduate School of Economics, and is the author of "The Power to Govern: The Constitution Then and Now."

ANNA LOUISE STRONG first went to Russia in 1921, and has been a sympathetic observer of its development ever since. In 1930 she organized the Moscow Daily News, the first English-language paper in Russia. Her books include "Children of Revolution," "This Soviet World," "The Remaking of an American," and "I Change Worlds."

P. E. CORBETT, former professor of international law and jurisprudence at McGill University, was on the staff of the League of Nations from 1920 to 1924 and is now attached to the Yale Institute of International Studies. His books include "Canada and World Politics" and "Post-War Worlds."

LOUIS KRONENBERGER, drama critic of PM, is author of "Kings and Desperate Men," a study of eighteenth-century society, and editor of "An Eighteenth-Century Miscellany."

RALPH BATES is a close student of Spanish and South American politics. He helped organize the International Brigade that helped the Loyalists during the war in Spain, and fought with it for three years. Among his books are "Sirocco," "The Fields of Paradise," "Lean Men," "Rainbow Fish," "Siena," "The Olive Field," and "The Undiscoverables."

DELMORE SCHWARTZ teaches English at Harvard. He is the author of "In Dreams Begin Responsibilities," "Shenandoah," and "The Limitation of Life and Other Problems of Literary Criticism."

CLEMENT GREENBERG, who reviews painting and sculpture regularly for The Nation, was formerly an editor of the Partisan Review.

Letters to the Editors

Will the World Wait?

(We print below a comment on Alvarez del Vayo's article, No Unity with Fascists, which appeared in The Nation of June 3. Professor McMahon, well-known liberal educator, was dismissed from the staff of Notre Dame last year for refusing to allow his superiors to "edit" his speeches. He is now teaching at the University of Chicago.)

Dear Sirs: Outside of a relatively few liberals in this country, I do not detect any burning zeal upon the part of the American people to support democratic movements in the rest of the world. I should be greatly astonished to learn that Elkhart, Ind., or Independence, Kan., is waxing indignant over the political situation in Italy.

This may be regrettable and exceedingly short-sighted, but it may likewise help explain the conservative flavor of Washington's foreign policy. The urge for peace and "order" seems pretty widespread, and we can expect an intensification of the spirit with the defeat of the Axis powers.

Popular indifference proceeds in part from overlooking the character of this war, which is as much an international civil war as it is a war between nations. We have trouble recognizing the enemy when he appears in civilian dress. Ill-prepared ideologically to fight the war, we are handicapped in even worse fashion for the winning of the peace. Education of course is the answer, but will the world wait?

FRANCIS E. MCMAHON

Chicago, July 25

Challenge

Dear Sirs: Are ten million Americans to be denied an intelligent approach to the coming election? Can a global victory and lasting peace be insured by placing American servicemen in the cultural void proposed under the recent interpretation of the Federal Voting Act, in suppressing our finest liberal magazines from Army camps?

How do you propose to meet this dangerous challenge to free thought? What can I do?

PRIVATE

Somewhere in Louisiana, July 24

Climax

Dear Sirs: Victor Wolfson's review of my book, "The Hollywood Hallucination," is rather transparently a silly slander. Even the more innocent among your readers should recognize the old-fashioned trick of "quoting at random," especially falsifying in my case since my style to a large extent depends on a double-perspective irony, the specific value of climax, and the important element of context.

As to this last, ignored so cavalierly by Mr. Wolfson, it contains those "extraordinary" arguments about the movies at which he hints but which he is at pains to omit. Though obviously somewhat hot under the collar, your reviewer has no excuse for his overcalculated frivolity but the intention of being impertinent.

PARKER TYLER

New York, July 11

Anti-Climax

Dear Sirs: Anyone who wishes to unravel Mr. Tyler's double-perspective irony style which also depends upon the specific value of climax, and the important element of context, is in for a jolly if somewhat strenuous time.

I can only caution them in Mr. Tyler's own words: ". . . the energy of man as an individual organism is limited; he must exile the light and return to the night from which he came in order to refuel the engine of his body and arise in the morning refreshed. (Context and double-perspective irony.) He must sleep." (Climax—and what a climax!)

VICTOR WOLFSON

New York, July 21

Froth on Mr. Wylie's Mouth

Dear Sirs: After reading Sex and the Censor in your issue of July 8, I went back over a few of Mr. Wylie's astounding sentences, e.g., "Now there is no such thing as sex 'moral law' in any legal sense." "For the censoring of 'obscenity' is the work of the impure to whom all things are impure; illegal dirtiness cannot be detected save by a mind in which subjective dirtiness has already been installed . . ." Also took a second look at the penultimate paragraph which castigates Catholics for being "the most dogmatic group in these affairs" and ends with the prohibition amendment as an example of the resultant catastrophe. The well-known position of ninety per cent of the Catholic population on the latter issue didn't seem to Mr. Wylie worth mentioning.

If the article is to be taken for anything more than reckless fulmination it would seem to prove what I have long since suspected, namely: That the dogmatism and fanaticism of scientism make that of the older religions feeble and innocuous in comparison. The author should wipe the froth from his own mouth before ordering straight jackets for people caught going to church.

R. T. MALONE

Lincoln, Nebr., July 14

Music Critic 1944

Dear Sirs: I have been a reader of The Nation ever since I came to this country in 1939 and I am happy to say that in my opinion it is one of the best weeklies in the whole country. I therefore find it most regrettable that such a progressive and straightforward paper should have as its music editor a die-hard reactionary, such as Mr. Haggin has shown himself to be.

I read your music page with growing amazement and bewilderment. Is it true that today in 1944 there still is a music critic to whom the work of "Hindemith, Bartók, Berg, Schönberg, Stravinsky and the rest" is full of "aridities, uglinesses and horrors?"

As a member of the younger generation of pianists and one who proudly confesses to have boosted contemporary music on every possible and impossible occasion both in Europe and in this country, I simply cannot understand the attitude of Mr. Haggin about things modern and contemporary in music. He seems to be engaged in a one-man campaign against everything good written today in music. He goes even so far as to try to tell people that they should not believe their own ears and should not enjoy modern music even though they find it likeable and agreeable. A good music critic must first of all have two things: patience and understanding. Mr. Haggin has neither. I really begin to wonder sometimes: why does he write about music at all?

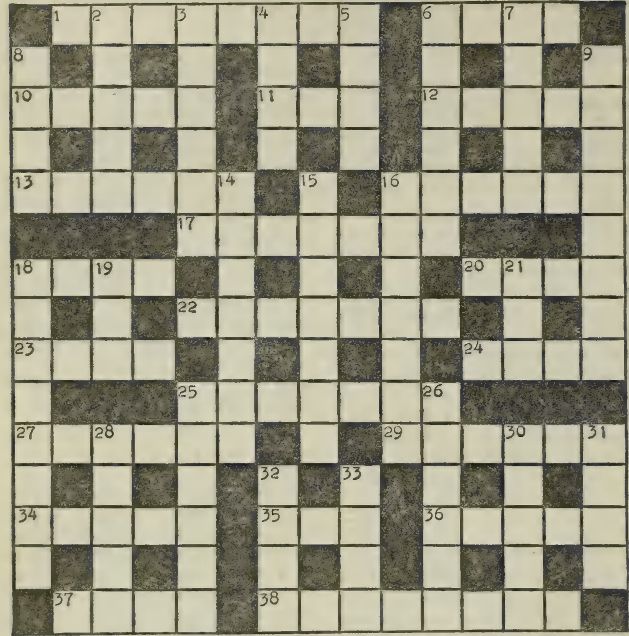
ANDOR FOLDES

New York, July 20

BURLINGAME

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 76

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 "In short, whoever you may be, To this conclusion you'll agree, When -------- is somebodee, Then no one's anybodee"
6 A tool, or a fool, may do this
10 She fell for Paris
11 Permissible perhaps, if white
12 Janus had two
13 Shot Pa? How affecting!
16 Is rare in a mountain range
17 A girl invited into the garden gets nothing in return for being sentimental
18 A pleasant-looking French Riviera resort
20 Its one object may be to give sauce
22 Hangs on to
23 Don't talk to a bad sailor about the pleasures of a sea cruise; he'll probably retort, "It's all ----!"
24 Rare product never found in the van
25 Larger edition of the weasel
27 Healing preparation for the lion after swallowing Holy Writ
29 May bring up oysters. Seems to make it a bit deeper, doesn't it?
34 An Oliver who asked for more
35 Out of shape
36 "Amens" might well come from this
37 A jar from Holland
38 Captain of the Pinafore who was never sick at sea. (Well, hardly ever)

DOWN

2 A man's man
3 When she read that a girl was being held for ------, Simple Susie wondered why ------ couldn't hold his own girl
4 They may be slow, but they have a reputation for wisdom
5 The fencing solver will guess it
6 Who'd ever want to go to Baffin Land? Well, he did
7 Horse with a heart like one
8 There's a report when it is cracked
9 Tam of a Burns' poem
14 Schoolmaster of fiction with strong biblical bias
15 Sticks to
16 Character in Arabian Nights who was in bad almost throughout
18 The only virtue, according to Juvenal
19 Study this word: it is a town in New Hampshire that has lost its way
21 Number of cartridges in a round
25 She presented herself at court
26 A part, or most, of Norway
28 This will test you
30 Ask a Scot what "I ----- ken" means, and the chances are he'll say, "I don't know"
31 What do you make a certain odd number if you behead it?
32 Portion of chicken, with dressing of course
33 Box

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 75

ACROSS:—1 CUSTER; 5 PLASMA; 9 TENABLE; 11 REMAND; 12 EASELS; 13 AHRIMAN; 14 OGLE; 17 IGOR; 19 SEEDINESS; 22 KNEAD; 23 DETER; 25 MOTHER; 26 VESTAL; 27 DIVES; 29 UNION; 31 EARTHLING; 34 NEON; 36 SAGE; 37 DOLEFUL; 39 APIARY; 40 LOUBET; 41 AERIALS; 42 RHEIMS; 43 YEASTY.

DOWN:—1 CURIOS; 2 SIMPLE; 3 ETNA; 4 REDHANDED; 5 PLEAD; 6 LEAN; 7 SLEDGE; 8 ABSURD; 10 AMIDST; 15 GERMANE; 16 EDITION; 17 INSTILS; 18 OAKLING; 20 EERIE; 21 SEVER; 24 RESTFULLY; 28 VARESI; 29 UNFAIR; 30 IODINE; 32 IAMBUS; 33 GENTRY; 35 NOYES; 37 DRAM; 38 LOSE.

CHILDREN'S CAMP

SMILING HILLS CAMP
EAST STROUDSBURG PENNSYLVANIA
A progressive camp for boys and girls, from 4 to 12 years of age. All activities. Non-sectarian. Non-regimented. Individual care. (Limited to 50 campers)
Write:
James & Nellie Dick, Modern School,
115 Cary St., Lakewood, N. J. Phone 1007

FARMS AND ACREAGE

Lovely farm estate; 35 acres; 10-room Salt Box; two baths; fireplaces; brook; 2 acre formal garden; new guest house with two baths; barns; view; elevation; near Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Lenox. Cost owner $30,000. Will sell with antique furnishings for $15,000! Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

WANTED TO PURCHASE

PHONOGRAPH LANGUAGE SETS, Language, Room 1203, 18 East 41st St., N. Y. C. 17.

HELP WANTED

Non-sectarian settlement house, N. Y. C.—girls' worker, full time, afternoon and evening; boys' worker, part time, 6 evenings. Beginning Sept. 15. Box 1480 c/o The Nation.

Your* Kind of Customers!

About 38,000 readers of The Nation will do what you are doing — read this advertisement. If you have something of interest to offer them — call The Nation Advertising Department for particulars as to space, cost and closing dates.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES:

62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 an inch

The Nation
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
BArclay 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 19, 1944 NUMBER 8

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 197
EDITORIALS
A Summer Task for Mr. Taft 199
Timid Planners of the Brave New World 200
The Ambiguous Oil Agreement 201
ARTICLES
The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 202
Don't Call Us G.I. Joe by Jerome H. Spingarn, Lieut. (j.g.) U. S. N. 203
Failure of a Mission by Anna Louise Strong 205
25 Years Ago in "The Nation" 206
Nine Minds, One Law by Walton Hamilton 207
Polls, Propaganda, and Politics 209
In the Wind 210
POLITICAL WAR
Friends, Romans, Monarchists! by Gaetano Salvemini 211
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 212
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
Approaching Ur by Louise Bogan 214
The Gentle Anti-Fascist by Franz Hoellering 215
Stage Business in Shakespeare by Joseph Wood Krutch 216
The Negro in Industry by Lloyd H. Bailer 217
Clothes-Horse History by George Willison 218
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 218
Surrealist Painting by Clement Greenberg 219
Films by James Agee 221
Music by B. H. Haggin 222
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 223
CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 77 by Jack Barrett 224

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON · MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

NOW THAT MR. BIDDLE HAS VERY PROPERLY rejected the ultimatum of Congressman Dies, it is up to the dying-duck Texan to make good his threat to start legislative action "to divorce the Government from the CIO." On the basis of records which his investigators secured with dubious authority from the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, Mr. Dies called on the Attorney General to determine whether government officials have violated the Hatch Act. According to his interpretation of this measure any government employee who speaks on the telephone to anyone connected with the CIO Political Action Committee engages ipso facto in unlawful political activity and should forfeit his job. If this interpretation were upheld it would, of course, be unsafe for any civil servant to answer a question put by any official of any political party or, indeed, by any ordinary citizen unless he inquired first whether his answer was to be used for political purposes. It is not surprising, therefore, that Mr. Biddle declined to undertake the task Mr. Dies assigned him. He has already had teams of FBI men studying the CIO-PAC records and has found no evidence that the group is engaging in illegal activities of any kind. Mr. Dies, curiously enough, has not yet sent his investigators on a similar errand and has not subpoenaed any of the CIO-PAC leaders to give evidence before his committee. Will he now do so or will he content himself with issuing publicity releases from Orange, Texas? Our own guess is that he will shrink from a contest of wits with Sidney Hillman. His farce has played its full five acts and even he must know that any epilogue would be an anti-climax.

*

DONALD NELSON IS DETERMINED THAT army stubbornness and the obstructionism of the big-business block in the WPB shall not jeopardize plans for reconversion. Mr. Nelson has pulled off the shelf a progress report of the WPB, prepared by statisticians V. L. Bassie and Irving Kaplan, which was suppressed on the order of their bureau chief, Stacey May. Mr. Nelson has refused the resignations of the statisticians and forwarded the report to the joint chiefs of staff. The report is said to show that there are vast stockpiles of war materials on hand, that there is no shortage of manpower except in a few specialized categories of workers, and that workers in curtailed fields of war production are being released at the rate of many thousands a month. Nelson has been insisting that, where possible, excess war plants should be turned back to civilian use with the express purpose of absorbing displaced workers into civilian occupations. He has met opposition from the army—particularly vocal through General Somervell and Assistant Secretary of War Patterson—from the War Manpower Commission, and, less openly but most effectively of all, from Charles E. Wilson, WPB executive vice-chairman, and the group of big-business vice-chairmen that surround him. Nelson's sole support on the Board has come from the two labor vice-chairmen, Joseph Keenan and Clinton Golden, and from Maury Maverick, chairman of the Smaller War Plants Corporation. The Wilson group's opposition is based on their determination to prevent small business getting in on the ground floor of reconversion, and to consolidate the over-all predominance of big business in the post-war period. Nelson clearly sees his major job as providing materials for the maximum prosecution of the war effort. But as that job is completed in various fields of ordnance supply, then he is clearly bound to get under way the program of cut-backs and reconversion no matter what the opposition. This is particularly true if the opposition comes from big-business government executives, who have a curiously predatory interpretation of the American way of life.

*

THE FAILURE OF THE MIKOLAJCZYK MISSION to Moscow may bring tragic consequences to the Polish people. If it were merely a matter of sloughing off a reactionary clique standing on questionable legitimist claims, the problem would be easy. We suspect, however, that the divisions go far down into the Polish population itself and that unless agreement can be reached between the liberal faction of the London government and the Polish Committee of National Liberation, Poland will be in for a prolonged period of civil strife. Elsewhere in this issue, Anna Louise Strong puts forward the Kremlin interpretation of the issue; it is interesting because we doubt if the Soviet point of view has ever before been stated so clearly. We must confess that we are not completely satisfied that it is the only valid point of view or that the choice is a clear-cut one between the Kremlin-backed National Committee and the Polish government-in-exile, standing on the reactionary 1935 constitution. The current shift in the London cabinet takes Sosnkowski out of the line of succession but leaves the conservatives largely in control. The immediate Polish settlement will undoubtedly rest with the Red Army, the Polish armies associated with it, and the Partisan groups that cooperate with them. They will constitute a steamroller to crush first the Nazi armies and then any internal dissent which may develop. Whether this combination is also capable of rebuilding Polish democracy remains to be seen. It appears to us that the building would have a stronger foundation if a compromise agreement, such as was reached in the case of Yugoslavia, could be arrived at between the liberal elements in London and the National Committee in Moscow.

*

IT IS REFRESHING TO READ THE OPEN AND informed criticism of the State Department that flows so freely these days from the able pen of Sumner Welles. To have a recent insider, now safely outside, analyze the policies of his erstwhile colleagues is a most salutary sort of public education. Whether one agrees with Mr. Welles or not, one reads his comments in order to find out what is going on as well as what he thinks about it. On the subject of American policy toward Argentina Mr. Welles is particularly sharp. He believes the State Department has exaggerated both the degree of Nazi penetration in that country and the amount of aid the Peron government has given Hitler in the war. He thinks that the Argentine dictatorship is in direct line of descent from the dictatorship of General Rosas a hundred years ago; in other words, that it is an old-fashioned nationalist-militarist affair with a few modern fascist trimmings. He insists that our break in relations will only intensify Argentina's nationalist emotions. And he does not believe the State Department has carried out the provisions in recent agreements for consultation with the other Latin-American countries. In fact, Mr. Welles suspects that we have "informed" those countries rather than consulted with them. And as a belated solution for what he considers a dangerous impasse, he proposes that a full meeting of the foreign ministers of the American republics, including Argentina, be held without delay to "consider the grave issues now raised and seek a satisfactory solution."

*

ALL THIS SOUNDS VERY CONVINCING. AND nothing could possibly sound more unconvincing than the reply of Mr. Welles's successor, Mr. Stettinius, that "we don't want fascism in this hemisphere." Nothing in our Latin-American policy suggests that we have any general objection to fascism. Like Churchill, we judge a fascist government by its acts and oppose it only if those acts directly aid the enemy. But if Mr. Stettinius's remarks sound a bit sententious and fishy, they at least represent an attitude we should adopt. Whereas the hands-off attitude of Mr. Welles is exactly what encouraged the development of fascism in many Latin-American countries. Indeed one might argue that the policy carried on under the aegis of Mr. Welles made inevitable the policy now being applied by Mr. Hull and Mr. Stettinius. It is quite possible that pressure belatedly applied will fail to cure the evil disease of Nazi-orientated dictatorship in Argentina. (We discount very heavily Mr. Welles's attempt to show that fascism is not an important factor in the Argentine setup.) But having refused to give any effective support to genuinely democratic elements in that country while they still had some opportunity to act, having rebuffed their emissaries and ignored their warnings, we may now be forced in defense of our security to take measures that will, as Mr. Welles fears, create in Latin America fear of a revival of "big-stick" diplomacy.

*

CANADA IS IN FOR STORMY WEATHER, according to the political chart. Maurice Duplessis has just replaced Adelard Godbout as premier of Quebec, breaking the Liberal Party's hold on the French province. His victory lowers Prime Minister King's hopes in the coming federal election and raises once more to power a figure long regarded by Canadian progressives as the symbol of reaction. The results are to some extent an independent French protest against the war policy of the federal government—although the extreme anti-war Bloc Populaire showed surprising weakness. Duplessis's name is chiefly associated with the Padlock Act, passed during his 1936-1939 term of office, a repressive measure giving to the police extraordinary powers of search and seizure against anyone alleged to be in possession of "communistic" literature. The act has lain dormant during the more progressive Godbout regime; Duplessis now promises to dust it off and enforce it. Maurice Duplessis's Union Nationale represents a French-Canadian nationalism that sets itself over against the claims of the Dominion Parliament to have any say in the affairs of Quebec. His government, it is feared, may seek to block any measure aimed at national planning for post-war problems, whether introduced by the present federal government or by its successor.

*

JUST NOW MR. KING'S FORTUNES APPEAR TO be at a low ebb. The loss of Quebec follows that of Ontario last year to the Progressive-Conservatives and Saskatchewan a month or two ago to the C. C. F. In Alberta, on the same day as the Quebec election, the Social Credit government regained power in a landslide victory. Apparently most of the "independent" vote—formerly Liberal and Conservative—went to Social Credit so as to block the C. C. F. In the fight the C. C. F. elected only two members but doubled its popular vote compared with last election; the independent vote was cut to one-third. Six or eight months may yet remain before the federal election is called, and the political situation is fluid. It is difficult to see where the Liberal Party can find the support necessary to return it to power; from this distance it looks as if the C. C. F. would muster the greatest strength of any Canadian party.

A Summer Task for Mr. Taft

SOMEWHERE along the line we have picked up the impression that a good many Republicans would like to dispense with the office of the Presidency from June to November of an election year. This year, particularly. Just look, they say, how the current President has carried the campaign to Pearl Harbor and Kiska, utilizing cruisers, destroyers, and a considerable number of auxiliary craft, conducting strategy conferences, visiting with troops, and inspecting bases—all mere window-dressing for partisan politics. One possible solution (Republican) to the dilemma created by a President (Democratic) who refuses to sit still and vegetate is to pass legislation similar to that designed for soldiers. No doubt Senator Taft, for one, could be persuaded to introduce a bill, henceforth to be known as the "No! No! Bill," forbidding the President substantial access to the outside world until after Election Day. An electric barbed-wire fence would be placed around the White House, telephones and radios would be removed from the mansion. Twice weekly, an impartial board consisting of Senator Taft would meet and select news items that might safely be sent along to the President. Naturally, any mention of politics, people, or things in general would be automatically excluded. Hints on (a) gardening and (b) summer recipes might occasionally get through, provided it had been conclusively demonstrated that they were not disguised to influence the President's thoughts about (a) reforestation and (b) the care and feeding of Europe. Once the items had been selected, they would be thoroughly pasteurized, homogenized, given the Shick test, wrapped in absorbent cotton, and dropped upon the White House roof.

In order to keep the President faintly amused until November, certain carefully screened phonograph records and films would be permitted entry. Among the former, Edwin Franko Goldman's On the Mall, and Frank Sinatra's rendition of All Through the Night might be considered eligible. Something like excerpts from The Barber of Seville, however, would be taboo, on the grounds that the record tended to arouse questions in the President's mind as to the future government of Italy. In the film line, it is safe to assume that some of the earlier works of Theda Bara would pass muster, but a newsreel shot of Dewey at Pawling, or, for that matter, at Manila, would be out.

At this point, we must not forget the influence of books upon mankind—man's craving for them and their possible evil effect upon his train of thought. It is a tribute to the liberality of the "No! No! Bill" that it permits the President to read any book published in America prior to the expulsion of Roger Williams from Rhode Island.

Having successfully insulated the President of the United States from the outside world, the bill provides furthermore—and this is perhaps the crux of the matter —for the insulation of the world from the President. The bill recognizes no distinction between the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President of the United States, and the Democratic candidate for President, and makes clear that any one of the above persons, or any combination of the three, shall be null and void until after election. Conferences with military advisers are to be permitted twice monthly, provided (a) that the situation clearly demands it, (b) that the Republican candidate for President is permitted a return match in the same arena and (c) that the conferences be broadcast overseas. Furthermore, digests of the conferences are to be dropped in pamphlet form to the troops of our enemies. In this way, the President, as Commander in Chief, will be prevented from slipping over a fast one on anybody, including his rival candidate, or even Hitler. Any profit our enemies might derive from a premature revelation of future military action would be more than offset by the spectacle—available to all the world—of witnessing democracy in action.

Timid Planners of the Brave New World

THE big problems of our day are being tackled by small men with ice picks. The Senate's passage of the George amendment to the Social Security Act in preference to the more liberal and realistic Kilgore-Murray bill is a case in point. It is unlikely that the House will show any more courageous imagination when it faces the same issue.

The debate on demobilization legislation is demonstrating as never before our need for new and better Congressmen. The most shocking feature has been the complete absence of discussion of the one concrete proposal for assuring full production in the post-war period—the plan offered by James G. Patton, president of the National Farmers Union.

Patton's plan, offered as debate opened in the Senate on reconversion legislation, was not a wild and undigested program. It was a well-studied proposal, in line with the thinking of such prominent economists as Dr. Alvin Hansen, of Harvard, and Robert Nathan, former head of the WPB Planning Board, to assure government action if private industry fails to provide jobs for all.

Under the Patton plan private industry could carry the load if it was able to do so. But if private industry failed, as many economists fear it will, government would step in to keep the economic machine moving and to prevent a nose-dive into depression.

The Patton plan is based upon the theory that capital investment of about $40,000,000,000 a year will be needed in the post-war period to keep everybody employed. Private industry would be encouraged to put up as much as it could. It would be helped by cheap credit from the RFC to carry the load. But the government would be authorized ahead of time to make up any gap between what private industry invested and the total needed to assure full production.

If Patton's proposal stirred the imagination of anyone in the Senate there was no sign of it. The Senate debate was on a far different level. The liberals were for the Kilgore-Murray bill, which proposed to set up machinery for the study of such plans as Patton's, but contained no assurance of the adoption of anything. The conservatives—the Republicans and the Southern Democrats—didn't even propose to study plans for full employment; they were ready to rely completely on private industry, and private industry alone, without guidance from the government.

The conservative coalition backed the George bill, drafted jointly by Senators Walter George (D-Ga) and Robert A. Taft (R-O). This bill sounded, on quick reading, much like the Kilgore-Murray measures. But it didn't provide the machinery for planning the demobilization or for programming full employment after the period of reconversion.

The philosophy of the George-Taft forces was disclosed by Senator Taft's admission that the best he expected in the post-war period was a national income of $120,000,000,000. This was a blunt rejection of the full employment goal. America is now producing better than $150,000,000,000, with 11,000,000 of its ablest men in the armed forces. A national income of $120,000,000,000 promises an economy of scarcity, with widespread unemployment and distress, rather than an economy of plenty with jobs and profits for all.

The same kind of timid, ignorant thinking, was even more obvious in the George-Taft proposals for unemployment compensation. Their bill was a states' rights bill, leaving the standards of unemployment compensation to the states. The states have established standards that are far from adequate. As Senator Robert Wagner (D-NY), one of the authors of the Social Security Act, pointed out, the most an unemployed worker can get in the majority of states is $15 or $16 a week, and this for 15 or 16 weeks at the most. Even with rapid reconversion to peace-time production, millions would exhaust their benefits before they could find new employment.

The Kilgore-Murray bill attempted to establish federal standards, not only for the protection of the workers, but for the protection of the national purchasing power. The conservatives opposed this as an invasion of states' rights, demonstrating how that bogey can be stretched to any limit to bar progress. The whole unemployment insurance system was established by the federal government, and is now supported by federal taxes. Yet Congressmen still argue that it would be a gross invasion of states' rights for the government to change the plan it established.

The Ambiguous Oil Agreement

EDITORIAL commentators on the newly signed Anglo-American oil agreement may prove, it seems to us, a little premature in their cheers. Admittedly, any step tending to allay antagonism between the United States and Britain is welcome. And the recognition of the interest of consumer countries does mark an advance on previous international commodity agreements, which unblushingly confined themselves to the protection of producer interests. But, we are bound to ask, can these protestations of non-discrimination, of equality of opportunity, and of fair prices for all be taken at face value?

The agreement, in very general terms, gives its blessing to a theory of free trade, but in the case of the international oil market we have to deal with a condition, not a theory—a condition of Anglo-American monopoly. (Dutch oil interests are so closely intermingled with British that they can be included under the same head.) British and American firms control four-fifths of the world's oil production and almost 100 per cent of the world export trade in petroleum products. And this situation is likely to continue for a long time, since Russia is certain to expand its consumption as fast as it can increase production and practically all the known potential fields elsewhere are under concession to the big American and British companies. The new agreement specifically declares that "the Governments of each country and the nationals thereof shall respect all valid concession contracts and lawfully acquired rights and shall make no effort unilaterally to interfere directly or indirectly with such contracts or rights." This underwriting of the status quo leaves "equality of opportunity" a rather shadowy right.

After the last war the British effort to secure a tight hold on Middle Eastern oil created a tense situation for a time. However, harmony was restored when the Standard Oil interests were cut in on the great Irak oilfields. Subsequently the companies participating in the Irak Petroleum Company signed the Red Line Agreement—a mutual undertaking not to acquire unilateral concessions in the Middle Eastern area. By the same instrument the Irak company agreed to limit its operations to this region. In addition an understanding appears to have been reached between the big British and American companies on the question of markets. At any rate they refrained from competing with each other on a price basis, with the result that the natives of Asia were forced to pay high prices for oil cheaply produced in their own territory.

The new oil agreement declares that "adequate supplies of petroleum shall be available in international trade to the nationals of all peaceable countries at fair prices and on a non-discriminatory basis." But who is to decide what quantity is "adequate" and what price "fair"? The practice of the Anglo-Iranian Company and its satellites, including Irak Petroleum, has been to restrict production to the amount it could sell at a price which gave it a very handsome margin of profit. The Standard Oil companies cooperating with it connived in and benefitted from this practice.

If the countries of the East are to develop industrially they must be provided with cheaper fuel and power, and the restrictive methods by which their natural resources have been exploited must be abandoned. The Anglo-American agreement may be interpreted as expressing an intention of pressing forward with a policy of expansion. But it can also be read as providing a governmental front for the Anglo-American cartel whose representatives took part in the discussion leading to its adoption. Certainly it contains no hint that the big oil producers will be compelled to give up their monopolistic practices. The International (properly Anglo-American) Petroleum Commission which is to be set up is not to be endowed with any powers which would enable it to force the opening of "reserved" fields or the reduction of profit margins. Its functions seem to be purely advisory.

We are told, however, that the agreement is preparatory to the summoning of a world petroleum conference. It is to be hoped that when this meeting takes place other countries, some of which are interested as the owners of oil resources under concession to Anglo-American companies and all of which are interested as consumers, will be allowed to make their views felt and not be asked merely to endorse this ambiguous agreement. It may be true that free competition in oil, if it were possible at this late date, would lead to the waste of a precious and limited natural resource. But if we must have monopoly in oil, then it should be subject to public international control and not left in the hands of private concerns whose primary objective is necessarily maximum profits.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

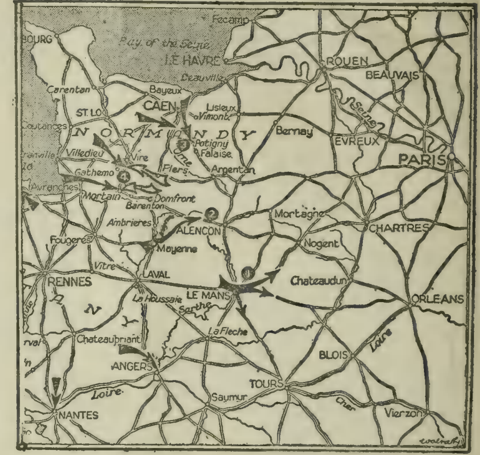
The Battle of France

WITH the brilliant sweep of the Allied right wing out of the Breton peninsula and the dogged advance of the left wing down the road from Caen, the Battle of France is on. The possibilities opened up by this successful beginning to the war of movement in Western Europe are great.

The advance of the right wing has been quite phenomenal, recalling the Red Army at its recent best, or the German Army at its past best. It took six days to go thirty-one miles from Périers to Avranches, along the narrow coastal strip of the Norman peninsula that was the choke-point of the western Normandy battle. Once through the choke-point, the right wing jumped to an average of thirty miles a day in the thrust to Brest, 150 miles away at the westernmost tip of France, and about fifteen miles a day in the advance south to the Loire, which cut off the Breton peninsula, sealed the fate of the U-boats, and established a firm flank to guard the most important thrust of all: east, towards Paris.

The Allied line-up in France in this phase of the campaign was strongly reminiscent of Sicily, where the British also held the toughest part of the front as a pivot of maneuver while the Americans under Patton wheeled swiftly around through the rest of the island, clearing out the enemy and scoring big territorial gains when the enemy's hard defenses had been broken. (Incidentally, the dash of the American advance in France suggests that the Germans were not dreaming when they reported that Patton was in command of the tank-army.) So far the most distinctive difference between the Sicilian and French situations is that in France the Germans had the strength and determination for a counter-attack.

The time and place of that particular counter-attack were obvious even from New York: against the side of the Avranches choke-point above referred to. That was the right wing's Achilles tendon: its sole supply line, running through a narrow coastal plain, with the enemy on the high ground east of Avranches. Early last week, the Allies were beginning to throw a pincers around this high ground, which spills over the boundaries of the Orne Department; the hinge of the pincers was the logical place for the Germans to strike. Unfortunately for the beauty of the plan, the Allied commander could also read the map; consequently we were strong on the ground and ready in the air. The Germans lost about 150 tanks in a single day—equivalent to nearly one and a half panzer divisions at present German strength.



Fecamp
Bay of the Seine
LE HAVRE
Deauville
ROUEN
BEAUVAIS
Carentan
Bayeux
CAEN
Lisieux
Vimont
ST. LO
Coutances
NORMANDY
Bernay
EVREUX
Seine
Potigny
Falaise
Villedieu
Vire
Orne
Flers
Argentan
PARIS
Gathemo
4
3
Avranches
Mortain
Domfront
Barenton
Ambrieres
2
ALENCON
Mortagne
CHARTRES
Fougeres
Mayenne
Nogent
Vitre
LAVAL
1
RENNES
Chateaudun
La Houssaie
LE MANS
Sarthe
ORLEANS
BRITTANY
La Fleche
Chateaubriant
BLOIS
Loire
ANGERS TOURS
Loire
Saumur
Cher
Vierzon
NANTES

Courtesy the New York Times

Even after this defeat the Germans continued to attack, for the Avranches choke-point remained their most likely scene of success. Reinforcements were rushed up from southern France to strike a hammer-blow. But the British and Canadian attacks from Caen southwards and the sudden new spurt of the American mobile force to Le Mans and beyond made potential a closing of the pincers well behind the German thrust-point. The open flank of the American advance was being secured by the penetration to Nantes, Angers, and Orleans, along the Loire—the extremely rapid and daring leaps ahead to so many points suggesting again that this force is not just a tank corps but is in fact a new American army. If it were an army, Von Kluge would not care to bring his dwindling reserves inside its orbit; so perhaps the reinforcements from the south will be re-routed behind the Seine.

That was the situation as last week ended: the German line, once a great gate, was gone, with only the hinge—from the sea to Troarn—remaining; a counter-attacking enemy force between Vire and Mortain was threatened with encirclement; a highly mobile American force with a secure flank was racing towards Paris.

This means that if the strategic possibilities of this fluid situation are exploited we can take Central and Southern France in our own time, forcing a German withdrawal to the line of the Seine, from Le Havre through Paris southeast to Dijon and the Swiss border.

If our right wing is strong enough along the Loire to force the Germans from the south to move behind the Seine, the Biscay hinterland will be opened up, and the Mediterranaen coast made vulnerable to a landing, with its inviting prospects of a drive up the Rhone through Lyon to the left flank of the enemy's last-ditch defense line across the vital area of northeastern France.

This is the area he must hold, if he is to protect the very approaches to Germany; this, whatever the course of counter-attacks, routing of reinforcements, or landings, is where he is bound. A fighting retreat over a fairly short distance will take him there in the north, from Troarn to the mouth of the Seine. The potential encirclement around the high ground of the Orne Department should not be counted in advance; we have seen too many cases of his brilliant tactical improvisation in like times of distress. The wheeling movement of our right wing offers the greatest chance of strategic gain: a thrust to Paris or the Seine southeast of it, and a consequent disruption of the enemy forces below the Loire.

Much will then depend on the speed with which we get additional troops into action against the line behind which lie the buzz-bomb bases of the Pas de Calais. If the line is broken quickly, General Eisenhower's prediction of victory in 1944 will be fulfilled; if it is not, the enemy may be able to hold on through another winter.

Don't Call Us G. I. Joe

BY JEROME H. SPINGARN, LIEUT. (jg.) U. S. N.

THERE is nothing so shocking as the civilian's abysmal ignorance of the problem of army morale. He thinks of it in terms of shows, hostesses, free drinks, and recreation—in terms of a lot of guys named Joe or G. I. Joe (the latter being his idea of what soldiers call themselves in their own patois). He will do a great deal for these Joes—he will serve on all sorts of committees and canteens and will contribute to numerous organizations which concern themselves with soldier and sailor welfare. But he will forget all about his own friends who are now in uniform, about the men who are not Joe at all but Oscar or Irwin or even Horace.

At Christmas time, perhaps, he will send them a box of food, well mashed in transit, or a card that says "Merry Christmas to a Soldier Boy" or a form V-mail that opens with, "To the Members of the Lemonwater-Wells Family in Their Country's Service." Or he will write letters that contain such informative bits as "Of course you who are witnessing the Big Show aren't interested in such trivial things as the Broadway plays we've seen this season," or "You have doubtless heard of the three weddings among our friends this week, so I won't bore you with more about that."

It is unfortunate that this is so, because there is nothing a civilian can do for the service men he doesn't know that is half so effective as the things he can do for the ones he does know. Service men overseas are very lonesome people, not just a few of them but most of them, men who are healthy and normal in every respect. In a very real sense, all of them are still living in the States. The source of the strength that enables them to carry on is still in their home communities, in their private circles of friends. They appreciate, of course, the things that are done for them because of their uniform. But they appreciate even more the things they get because of what they are, things that carry some recognition of their own pre-war individualities.

This is particularly true of the man whose contact with the humanities went beyond comic books and the Saturday Evening Post. He has many interests that his fellow-soldiers do not share. He probably likes them a lot and gets on with them well, but they do not satisfy his thirst for intelligent conversation about books or music or art or public affairs or business. The army and the Red Cross do what they can to make life interesting for service men by providing various types of entertainment, dances, and socials. But there is little that these lowest-common-denominator activities can do for the fellow who doesn't get any deep satisfaction from prize fights or apple-ducking or whose marital fidelity inhibits his seeking chance alliances with women.

And, unfortunately, his friends, being sensitive and self-conscious intellectuals, are less likely to dash off frequent notes to him than are most other people. The taxi driver has no compunctions about using an odd moment to scribble a short, sentimental, and perhaps trite note to a pal overseas, and to pass it around the garage so that the other boys can add a few words of their own. But intellectuals are subject to strange restraints. A magazine editor I know, a highly literate gentleman, has several close friends at the front. He thinks about them a great deal, talks about them often, and bleeds himself white at the blood bank for their sake. But he hasn't written to them for months because he is shy about writing "until he really has something to say." He doesn't want to insult them with foolish chatter or waste their time with banalities. He just doesn't realize that they have endless hours on their hands with nothing to do, with no place even to sit but the ends of their cots, and that the high spot of their day consists of a walk to company headquarters to pick up their mail so that they can see who, if anybody, remembers that they are alive. If the editor realized that, he'd appreciate the fact that a short note saying, "Had lunch with Bob today and we spoke of you," or "I'm reading a wonderful new book that I know you'd like, and I'll send you my copy as soon as I finish it," could make the day for his friend in service.

There is a common misconception that a soldier or sailor is always busy. As a matter of fact, after the first hectic months of boot or basic training are completed, the service man is usually the least busy man in the world. He has more free time than he ever had in his life, and, in the Pacific area, has nothing to do but read two-month-old copies of the San Francisco Examiner.

The lack of current newspapers and magazines is felt keenly. Air-mail and V-mail letters reach overseas posts in about ten days, but newspapers and other second-class matter travel by ship, and are usually from one to two months old when they arrive. They come in batches of ten to twenty copies at a time, and since some ships are faster than others, they do not always arrive in consecutive order. Current news is supplied by short-wave broadcasts from the United States and by army newspapers. Both of these sources limit themselves to brief and sketchy news summaries, antiseptically prepared by the Army News Service, which tries harder to avoid controversy than to present news. When I read the story of the government's seizure of Montgomery Ward, a two-line account in a news bulletin mimeographed on a South Pacific island, the reason for the action was not indicated. For all I knew, Montgomery Ward might have been condemned by Chicago as a fire hazard.

The first full treatment of news reaches South Pacific islands in the thin-paper overseas editions of Life, Time, and Newsweek which are printed in Honolulu and Australia and delivered by air to army officials for free distribution to troops. They arrive far in advance of the magazines to which soldiers have individual subscriptions, and thus enjoy a virtual monopoly of news dissemination in the area. All three of these magazines, of course, exhibit a strong bias in favor of the Republican Party. In contracting for them, the army was probably influenced by the fact that they were the only magazines which published special light-weight editions. Recently the New Yorker has been added to the list.

Overseas Post Exchanges usually stock only the most popular magazines and comic books. Publications like The Nation, the New Republic, Harper's, and the Atlantic, to say nothing of specialized or professional journals, are never found in their stocks. It is to be hoped that ways can be found to make liberal magazines available for distribution to the armed forces in the near future; certainly an effort should be made to give service men, as part of the electorate, a well-rounded picture of the issues in the coming election.

The scarcity of news and literate reading matter is often disheartening to the soldier whose chief inspiration during this period of trial is the thought that he is fighting to make possible a progressive and democratic America in a progressive and democratic world. He is completely dependent upon his friends for magazines and newspapers which give more than a superficial account of the news of the day or which make some attempt at fairness in presenting the point of view of labor and of the Roosevelt Administraton. A subscription to a magazine or newspaper therefore makes a handsome gift. But most soldiers like even more to receive clippings of news stories and magazine articles inclosed in air-mail letters. These arrive in about a week, before the overseas editions of magazines, and about a month sooner than subscription copies arrive. An envelope full of clippings is usually appreciated as much as a letter, and it solves a perplexing problem for civilians who are anxious to write a letter but can't think of anything to say.

I realize that I shall never be able to convince people that a few inches of newsprint from yesterday's paper can be so precious a commodity to a soldier overseas. Last Christmas Joe Thompson, an army captain who manages one of the expeditionary radio stations, sent five hundred greeting cards to friends asking them to mail him clippings which might have interest for the soldiers who listen to the radio in his theater. Up to the time when I last saw him, about two months ago, only one person had taken his request seriously. It is similarly useless, I guess, to tell people that a clipping often means more than a whole newspaper because it carries with it a personal touch, an implication that "this is about something that you and I are both interested in"; or that every newspaper and every clipping sent to the forward areas is usually read by from twenty to forty people. And I suppose I would be set down as excessively sentimental if I said that magazines that had been read and left around the house for a few days, collecting assorted fruit and egg stains, would mean more to a lot of men overseas than brand-new copies mechanically wrapped and addressed at the press.

It is hard, too, for the average civilian to realize that his letters can mean so much to overseas service men he knows only casually. But if he will close his eyes for a few minutes and try to envision himself separated from his family, thrown in with a disparate group of men whom he gets along with but never really gets to know, living out of a foot locker or barracks bag, having no conversation for weeks on end save a few words concerning the immediate problems of military life or some good-natured but repetitious banter about the weather, the chow, or the general's new car, he will begin to realize how much it would mean to him to be reminded of a fuller and richer life. The mere mention of some half-forgotten name is enough to remind him of some half-forgotten facet of his own personality, and to lift him out of the bleakness of his present rut. Most men overseas like to write letters—it is one of the most popular ways of using spare time. But pride restrains them from writing to people who answer slowly or not at all. They don't want to force themselves on people like a disabled vet selling poppies on a street corner. They want to feel that they are as big a shot as they ever were, that people still seek them out, that you need them as much as they need you.

I remember seeing a yeoman sitting in front of the operations hut at a seaplane base reading a letter and glowing with a broad smile. "You seem very happy," I said. "Is that from your girl?"

"Oh, no," he answered, "this is from the lousiest little son-of-a-bitch I know. The sort of guy who is only nice to people who can do things for him. It makes me feel wonderful to get a letter from him. I guess I'm probably going to amount to something when this war is over after all."

Failure of a Mission

BY ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Moscow, August 8

THE past week has recorded additional victories for the Soviet Union both in the military and in the economic field. A good harvest is being reaped from thirty million additional acres, twenty thousand miles of main line have been relaid to date by railway workers, there has been a 31 per cent increase in coal and a 34 per cent increase in pig iron in July 1944 over July 1943—these too are victories.

Meanwhile the Red Army advance through the Baltic states and Poland definitely cuts off the Baltic states from Prussia. Farther south the Red Army's close approach to Krakow recalls the strategy proposed by Voroshilov and rejected by the Polish government five years ago.

Nation readers recall the tense days of 1939, when the British and French military missions in Moscow discussed with the Soviets joint action against Hitler's threat to invade Poland. The Soviet Union offered to send two armies: one against East Prussia in the north, and one through Krakow against central Germany. The Polish government's refusal to accept this plan was the immediate cause of the breakdown of the Allied conference.

It is worth while to recall this, for today, when the Soviet Union is attacking East Prussia in the north and Central Germany through Krakow, the same Polish government's unresolved differences with Moscow are again the chief hindrance to Allied unity and therefore to the future stability of world peace.

The visit of the Mikolajczyk delegation to Moscow therefore gains importance beyond the actual strength of the Polish government-in-exile. They have been here over a week, dining with the British and American Ambassadors, conferring with Molotov and Stalin. They have met the Polish Committee of National Liberation.

The Poles from London are highly accessible to all American correspondents. I spent two hours with them yesterday, briefly with Mikolajczyk and exhaustively with the press representative, Karczewski, to whom Mikolajczyk referred me for a line on the position of the delegation. Hopes for mutual collaboration between the Poles and the Soviets ran high while we talked generalities but dwindled when we got down to details.

The Poles stated that the Polish government in London is not only the "legal" government but also is most widely representative of the chief political parties of Poland—Peasants, Socialists, Nationalists, and Labor. They insisted that all these four chief parties are against the 1935 constitution as "imposed by a regime of colonels who seized power," and that all these parties dislike General Sosnkowski, who is also the Soviet Union's bête noire. "He has no support in the Polish government. We'd all be glad if he would leave."

This seemed promising enough, except for mild wonder why the government waits so politely for Sosnkowski to leave instead of throwing him out. When I posed this seemingly minor technical problem, I learned that the "government" couldn't throw out Sosnkowski since the President is responsible to no one in making his appointments. The "government" is presumably a representative but actually a powerless committee.

The solution still seemed easy to one of my political inexperience. I asked whether the democratic representatives from the London "government" would be willing to desert Sosnkowski and combine with the Liberation Committee now organizing in Poland. If so, on what terms? They, however, objected equally to the leaders of the Liberation Committee as "expelled members" of the Peasant and Socialist parties. These expulsions apparently occurred in London since the outbreak of war.

Two other American correspondents who entered during the above discussion put the flat question: "Given a majority in the Liberation Committee and allowed to fix the eastern borders of Poland, would you agree to keep Sosnkowski and his clique out of Poland, where the Russians fear their influence creates fascism and enmity and civil war?" The Polish official representative sidestepped by stating that Sosnkowski is "politically unimportant since he is no longer the President's official successor but only the commander-in-chief of the army." It was plain that these "representatives of the four chief democratic parties" were unable or unwilling to drop Sosnkowski unless Stalin and the Red Army made them.

Unable to settle the question of personalities, we raised the question of Poland's eastern border. The Polish position was that friendship between Poland and Russia is very important—to this I nodded—but that the Polish people "couldn't feel friendship toward Russia if Russia took Vilna and Lvov, historic Polish cities."

Your correspondent was less impressed by the claim itself—which might be only bargaining—than by the persistent use of the term "Russia" as "taking," which completely ignores the local feeling of the inhabitants of those cities. The Moscow Press is just now reporting mass meetings in Lvov shouting "Hail the Soviet Ukraine" and passing resolutions that begin, "We, the citizens of this ancient Ukrainian city . . ." Even if the Poles consider the Lithuanian and Ukrainian Republics as Stalin's diplomatic fiction, they might wisely—under present circumstances—give lip service to Soviet terminology when asking Moscow's support.

Meanwhile the Red Army sweeps through Poland and items appear in the Moscow press about Polish girl students hanging garlands on Soviet tanks, Polish peasants bringing out bread and salt, Polish villagers lining the roads with offerings of flowers, apples, and cherries, and Polish townsfolk in mass meetings singing the Polish national anthem and cheering the Red Army.

One dramatic wire from Floront reports that a Polish girl ran across a wheatfield under German fire to warn the Red Army. She fell wounded, was picked up by Soviet surgeons, and delivered the message while being bandaged. Another describes a small-town recruiting station for the new Polish army flying two flags from the roof, "the red and white flag of Poland hidden for five years through God knows what peril and a Red flag made out of a tablecloth, to greet the liberators."

The Polish delegation from London is painfully anxious to climb on the Red Army bandwagon, which moves with the power and speed of the swiftest tank. All the Soviet leaders also want them to get on. Every Russian I have met strongly desires to combine "all democratic elements" of the Polish London government with the Liberation Committee in almost any proportion that will facilitate an immediate, harmonious, democratic civil administration in Poland. But will it succeed?

Soviet leaders feel that the situation is most important, not because the Polish government in London is important but because the slightest rift between the world democratic forces is for them today a tragic thing.

One Moscow editor expressed it to me in this way: "It is not enough to have a military victory. This is already secure. Everybody knows it, in Finland, in Hungary, in Turkey, even in Germany. Therefore the Hungarian government crisis, Finland's state emergency, Turkey's break with Hitler, and even in Germany an inner conflict. Everyone knows the Nazis are beaten.

"But in all these countries Nazi elements plan for survival and hidden rule. The world needs a long peace—the Soviet Union perhaps most of all. This can be made possible only by the political and moral smashing of fascism. This is happening now in Italy and in Yugoslavia, but in Poland the Sosnkowski faction threatens both democracy and peace."

I asked, "Would the Soviet Union and the Red Army support the extension of the American form of capitalist democracy in Europe for a long period?" He nodded. "If this is the form the people in Europe choose, then Europe would be better than before." Then he added: "Paradise is a large country. Not all of it is the same Paradise, but all of it is better than Hell."

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

SOME DAY, WE HOPE AND BELIEVE, the American people will find out what the League of Nations, as now planned, is really for. . . . Our view is, as we have repeatedly said, that the present League of Nations may become a device for enabling the economic exploitation of small and weak peoples without the risk and cost of war; . . . May the danger be guarded against soon!—August 2, 1919.

THE POWER AND SPLENDOR of Mr. Wilson's thought, the faith reposed in him by the plain people, the burning hopes and the new vision which he aroused deepen the tragedy. And the idealists throughout the world—who are indeed the plain people throughout the world, who lend a hand to an enemy in distress, and who would willingly beat their spears into pruning hooks—bewildered, defeated, betrayed, shoulder their burdens again. The braver even pluck up courage to seek anew the builder of more stately mansions. May their faith never fail!—A. A. BERLE, JR., August 9, 1919.

ALAS, POOR HUNGARY! The country seems destined to go from bad to worse: first, the administration of Karolyi, full of promise, and deliberately wrecked by the Allies; then Bela Kun and communism; and now a reaction to the monarchy under the dictatorship of Archduke Josef, with the Rumanians in control of Budapest, the whole complicated by a sudden outcropping of a most ominous anti-Jewish feeling. The challenge of this situation to the Peace Conference is most serious.—August 16, 1919.

The Supreme Court Today

BY WALTON HAMILTON

II. Nine Minds, One Law

THE Supreme Court is made up of nine diverse and independent minds. With such a personnel an old fiction has this term come into a new importance. The "opinion of the Court" is delivered by one of its members. He is a solo performer, yet he speaks with authority. In a sense the opinion is a personal statement; each of the nine exhibits his distinctive idiom of argument and of language. Yet the opinion is seldom the piece the spokesman, if left to himself, would write, for he must hold a majority or he cannot say the final word. In effect his opinion is what is in the mind of a single justice, compromised by what the brethren will let pass. The practice puts a premium upon literary expression. In a Court made up of able, informed, resourceful men, reaching for a pen becomes a general habit. And, when the urge is to address Posterity, every justice is likely to regard his own voice as that which will best carry across the decades. If the brothers are one bench, they are—and promise to remain—nine men.

In current utterance, therefore, the higher law lacks a dogmatic quality. If a step ahead is taken, a dissent at least cautions, "Watch your step." If all go along, a concurrence of opinions may display a variety of reasons or serve to hold the ruling flexible. In all the work it is direction, rather than a laying down of the law, which is uppermost. In the field of civil liberties, where in the last war it floundered badly, the Court has been rather surefooted this time. Its common sense told it that a confession of murder obtained after a police inquisition had run a thirty-six-hour course was not "voluntary." The dissent, engagingly enough, came from justices who cannot take the daily round of two two-hour sessions without signs of restlessness. In the one case in which a confession was allowed, it is impossible among diverse views to pick out the opinion of the Court. It was held, no brother to the contrary, that its official could not refuse to produce in court the records of his union—for the rule that a man cannot be compelled to testify against himself is purely "personal." The judgment is of the utmost importance, for it will apply to all executives in respect to their corporations. Its decision that the conscripted youth does not pass out of civil and under military law until he is actually inducted makes sense. A duet holding that martial law begins with the notice to report testifies to a will to dissent which cannot be quenched by a lack of reasons. On the last day of the term the sentences of two persons accused of sedition, fascist style, were reversed—one by an unanimous bench, the other by a vote of five to four. And in a case in which a lower court was reversed and spanked for taking away a man's political rights, Murphy sanely remarked that a naturalized citizen is "not required to imprison himself in an intellectual and spiritual straitjacket." The Court as a whole has been singularly immune to the war hysteria which paralyzes all civil rights.

A lack of unanimity on labor questions is alike chronic and deceptive. A vestige of the antique appears now and then. The federal employer's liability is still being interpreted as in the palmy days of due process, and the deceased—vicariously of course—must demonstrate his "master's" negligence. In a dissent, Black admits that judges are the better versed in formal logic and in legal principles, but wonders if engineers and brakemen do not have a little the edge in knowing how to operate a railroad. At least they can see the danger in leaving a broken rail opposite a derailer. The majority was clear that the miner's underground journey to and from work is a part of his employment for which he is entitled to pay. The minority forsook reality for the hypothetics of how to interpret a statute. When some years ago the Wagner Act was found constitutional, the judicial battle was shifted to an advanced front. The Court, in a shorthand summary of many cases, has just proclaimed that "the refusal of an employer to bargain collectively with the employees' chosen representatives disrupts the employees' morale, deters their organizational activities and discourages their membership in unions." And, in a case which catches up a long course of cultural change, the bench has declared null and void a series of written agreements between a corporation and its workers. "The practice and philosophy of collective bargaining," said the Court, "looks with suspicion on individual advantage"; to "reserve a field for the individual contract is contrary to the very purpose of the Wagner Act." The spokesman was Jackson; Roberts alone dissented; the age of liberty of contract is ended.

In the public control of business the law's progress has been attended by many a backward look. The Court has, so far as the cases would allow, plugged loopholes in the national tax system; in public utilities it emancipated itself from "the old hodge-podge of fair value"; indulged administrative agencies with a wide latitude of discretion. It has narrowed the patent privilege; asserted the dominance of the public interest in patent cases; almost restored patent law to the advanced position from which it lapsed in the nineties. In the patent cases the clash between the levels on which the various members operate stand sharply out. In two cases a quadrumvirate of Douglas, Black, Murphy, and Rutledge, joined by Stone, refused firmly to throw the protection of a patent about an unpatented good. In a third case, the same group of four, this time joined by Jackson, found null and void a patent obtained by fraud, when some years ago the patent had been declared valid. The dissent did not question the rulings; instead it argued that, because the cases had been up before, they were not properly before the Court for decision. If one is to understand dissent it is necessary—as such instances show—to discover the question on which the brethren divide.

The great failure of the term has been in respect to regulation. After six months of sober deliberation, the Court allowed the great "glass container case" to go over. Its order indicates that it was persuaded that patents could not be used to create a private law for an industry; but the justices were unable, without further argument, to specify how a system of private industrial government was to be liquidated. Often the brethren fought the good old fight, for positions once sought by Brandeis, Stone, Cardozo in dissent—when the battle line had gone elsewhere. The "great liberals" sought to secure the independence of board, agency, and authority from judicial control in order that it might assert the public interest. But, if administrative oversight marks a revolution, commerce has staged its counter-revolution. It has converted controls which it must obey into sanctions which give immunity to its activities. The supremacy of the judiciary has in instance after instance been replaced by fealty to the honorable company. The majority, led by Frankfurter, is still decreeing an old freedom which masks a new dependence. The minority, with Douglas or Black as its voice, insists that judicial notice be taken of current reality. The clash appears in decisions which sustain the Interstate Commerce Commission as it guards the railroads against the competition of other forms of transport. It has been even more apparent in holdings affecting the Office of Price Administration. About the general powers of OPA, even its rather effective program of rent control, there is only a murmur of dissent. But legal illusion gets in devastating licks as the Court strikes down ceilings established by OPA and sustains rate schedules fixed by local authorities. As Douglas points out, so long as a state or a city can call anything it pleases a public utility, our fight against inflation is in serious jeopardy.

The dramatic story of the term cannot in its fulness be unfolded here. But a single case, decided at the next to last session, will serve to measure the health of the Court. An anti-trust action against a united front of fire insurance companies got hung up in a lower federal court in Georgia. The local judge could not see that the Sherman Act was aimed at insurance. The appeal, Roberts and Reed not sitting, had to be decided by a bench of seven. Black, joined by Douglas, Murphy, and Rutledge, found no legal obstacle in the way of the suit. In an opinion, in which the words are fitted to the very life of the thought, Black found that insurance is commerce; that the business is carried on "among the several states"; that Congress had set down no exception to its general command. In a common-sense way he disposed of "the precedent established three-quarters of a century ago" by pointing out that at that time the Court had refused to strike down state regulation in the name of a dormant power of Congress; and that the statement "insurance is not commerce" was at the most an unfortunate way of verbalizing a desired result. To a student of economics it is obvious that insurance is an aspect of the operation of the national economy; and only persons learned in the law could aspire to dissent. Yet three members of the Court proceeded to exhibit their skills in the sacred mystery. All of them—the newspapers did not catch it—admitted the power of Congress to regulate insurance; so on the Constitutional questions there was no division. But each had a decent reason for an unrealistic position. To Stone the judgment was revolutionary; insurance is now regulated by forty-eight separate states; this is no age in which to revise federal-state relationships. To Frankfurter the Congress which passed the Sherman Act knew that the Court had said "insurance is not commerce" and did not say to the contrary. For him evidence, which four of his brethren could not discover, is "overwhelming" that Congress intended to exempt insurance from anti-trust. His position is fortified by a rigmarole which he made up two years ago by which he can put labor, however local, under the Wagner Act yet exclude insurance from commerce. To Jackson, the most direct and least conceptual of the three, the Court had erred when it put insurance out of commerce. But upon that mistake an intricate system of control has been established and it is now too late to repent. In a word, error once vested must not be disturbed. To judges who shuddered at change—especially "at a time like this"—the higher legalism is a mighty arsenal.

And thus the Court ended a stormy and fruitful term, to meet again "at the time and place appointed by law." Its occasional displays of human behavior must not obscure a constructive performance; its newsy proneness to dissent must be set against the background of the more fundamental issues on which the brethren did not divide. If often its conduct has not been in accord with our angelic notions, the reason is that the public is let in on the performance. I wonder if any other agency of state—the Executive Office, the State Department, the High Military Command, the Maritime Commission, the War Production Board—could under a like scrutiny exhibit either more brotherly restraint or a more conscientious regard for the general welfare. And in the midst of intolerance, the Court stands out as the great exponent of tolerance. The Chief Justice, by his own example as well as precept, has encouraged each of his colleagues to enrich and humanize the law that is to be by speaking his own mind. Neither the law nor the Court is to be regimented so long as Stone sits. In less than a decade the Court has been transformed. It has ceased to be a super-legislature; it stands today, more firmly than any other agency of State, in the great American tradition.

Polls, Propaganda, and Politics

Between the Elections

FOR four years and longer the decisions have been developing which will be expressed in votes next November. It is a mistake to think of political campaigns as guiding most voters' choices. Most of the choices are already made. Even among those who are not yet sure how they will vote many safe predictions can be made on the basis of occupation and other social indices. The campaign is more apt to activate latent choices than to teach people how to vote.

A study of the Presidential election in 1940 showed that about half of the change which took place between the 1936 election and that of 1940 had been completed by May of 1940. The trends established during the first three and a half years were reinforced rather than reversed by the campaign itself.

There is no proof that the same relationship will hold this year, but one clue to what will happen in November may be discovered in what has already happened during the third Roosevelt term. In grand totals here is the picture.

In 1936 Democrats received 63 per cent of the major party vote.

In 1940 Democrats received 55 per cent of the major party vote.

In 1942 Congressional elections Democrats received 49 per cent of the major party vote, which needs to be increased by about four points to allow for the difference between Democratic strength in off years and Democratic strength in Presidential elections, giving an estimated 53 per cent of the major party vote as of 1942.

Now what is the picture as of convention time in 1944?

That depends on the poll you choose. Gallup's "American Institute of Public Opinion" has found a steady decline in the proportion of Democratic voters—from 55 per cent of those with a definite choice for either Republicans or Democrats in August, 1943, to only 51 per cent of those with a definite choice in February, April, and June of 1944. (The 7 per cent of all voters polled who were not definitely Republican or Democratic are not included in these comparisons. The Republican strength was therefore 45 per cent in August, 1943, rising to 49 per cent in 1944.)

Elmo Roper's Fortune poll estimates the probable Democratic vote, as of June, 1944, at 56 per cent of the major party vote, leaving 44 per cent for Republicans (again excluding the 21 per cent of persons polled but not yet decided).

Between these two estimates lies a difference great enough to mean victory or defeat, for, as was explained last week, the Democrats with so much more than a majority in the Solid South need about 52 per cent of the total national vote to carry enough states to win.

Evidence from other polls cannot be decisive because it is not nation-wide. Minnesota gave Roosevelt 52 per cent of the major party vote in 1940, and the poll conducted by the Minneapolis Star-Journal and Tribune indicates 47 per cent for the Democrats now (excluding 23 per cent undecided). Iowa also gave Roosevelt 52 per cent of the major party vote in 1940, but the recent poll conducted by the Des Moines Sunday Register showed only 42 per cent who now "want the Democrats to win this fall" (excluding 23 per cent undecided). Gallup's "trial heat" for that region (West Central) showed 49 per cent for the Democrats in 1940 and 44 per cent today—an estimate in general accord with the regional polls.

If Gallup should be right, if support for Roosevelt has declined from 55 per cent in 1940 to 53 per cent in 1942 and 51 per cent today, and if the campaign, as usual, continues and accentuates the trend already under way, then Democratic prospects are not bright. The Gallup results are puzzling, however, in at least one respect. For some mysterious reason only 7 per cent of his respondents answered that they had not yet decided, as against 21 per cent to 23 per cent in the other polls. The latter figures are more common at this stage of the campaign—Gallup himself reported 17 per cent undecided at convention time in 1940.

How will the "undecideds" go? Even at Gallup's low estimate there are enough to swing the election. A study during the 1940 campaign showed, however, that the people who made up their minds at a late date responded to the same trends which had earlier influenced more alert voters. For example, if a drift toward the Republicans was under way in a given community, it showed first among the voters who had quickly made up their minds, and later influenced in the same direction and in about the same proportion those less interested voters who remained for a long time undecided. There is little reason to expect undecided voters to reverse a trend already apparent among those who have made their choice. One reservation may be noted. Many of the "undecided" are women in low-income homes; a large proportion usually do not vote. If the PAC or some other group activates these people, who ordinarily are not much interested in politics, that might change the picture. A later article in this series will be devoted to the probable vote among women.

It will be interesting to see in further polls whether these differences between the Gallup and Fortune polls diminish, and if so, toward which position. In 1940 the Gallup national forecast erred by 3 per cent; Fortune by less than 1 per cent.

One curious fact about the changes since 1940 is that class differences may have grown a little less acute. Labor, which gave Roosevelt 66 per cent of its major party vote in 1940, is now reported (Gallup, June 4) to be giving only 59 per cent of its voting strength to the Democrats. At the other end of the class scale, business men, who were 34 per cent for Roosevelt in 1940, are reported as 37 per cent Democratic today, when asked to choose between Roosevelt and Dewey. The relatively greater concern for foreign affairs today has probably influenced business attitudes somewhat. It will be interesting to watch the figures of the first polls after the nominating conventions. The data just cited were obtained before Dewey had been nominated. Usually the fact of nomination and the attendant publicity bring increased support for the new contender. But there is room for doubt as to whether the nomination this year aroused enough enthusiasm to boost the percentage of Republican voters above the levels of early June.

The shift in public attention from domestic controversy to foreign affairs seems to be reflected also in the regional changes that have taken place since 1940. Roosevelt has most nearly held his own in New England, where Gallup reports 52 per cent of the major party vote today as compared with 54 per cent in 1940. That is a region where there is little isolationism. He has lost most heavily in the mountain states (a drop from 56 per cent to 46 percent) and among Mid-Western farmers (a drop from 45 per cent to 34 per cent), where isolationism has been especially pronounced. Confidence in Roosevelt versus Dewey to manage foreign policy may overshadow domestic disputes in 1944.

Of course, no poll can include the soldier vote. An estimate in the Public Opinion Quarterly (Summer, 1944, p. 172) is that if six million soldiers vote along with forty million civilians, the Democratic total will probably be raised by about 1½ per cent.

In the Wind

JACQUES BARTHAUT, news commentator on the Nazi-controlled Paris radio, in a recent broadcast had this to say about Spain: "The Jew Alvarez del Vayo is in Algiers assembling troops for resumption of the revolution in the Iberian peninsula. . . . Revolutionary preparations are being completed in territory controlled by the Anglo-Saxons with the consent of Washington and London. While in Madrid they reiterate assurances guaranteeing Spain against the return of armed Bolshevism, Roosevelt and Churchill assist the plots of Bogomolov and Del Vayo. It is now felt in Madrid that the only safeguard for Spain is the collapse of Bolshevism and the Allies. The Falangists are ready." [This all goes to show! The last we heard of The Nation's editor of Political War he was vacationing up the Hudson.]

WE LEARN that two large companies doing war work are encouraging their sales and promotion staffs, who have little to do these days, to engage in a "spontaneous" campaign, urging the more conservative employees to register and vote.

REGINALD E. GILLMOR, president of Sperry Gyroscope, reports that his company's experience with Negro workers in skilled jobs has been excellent. A considerable number of them are leaders. All of them get along well with white workers. And Negro workers in general, says Mr. Gillmor, "are neither so prone to absenteeism as other workers nor do they change or lose their jobs quite so frequently."

AN EIGHT-PAGE REPRINT from Comic Cavalcade is being distributed by the National Maritime Union, CIO. It is entitled "Heroes in Dungarees," and pictures the role of merchant seamen in delivering the goods to the fighting fronts. It presents arguments, on the comic-book level, in favor of unionism and against racial and religious discrimination.

WALTER F. CROWDER, chief of the distribution division of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, writing in Printers' Ink, says distribution costs "should go even higher and thus broaden market facilities, which would mean more production and more jobs."

A RECENT "March of Time" film presented an unsubtle defense of Ireland's neutrality. We now have at hand some advance publicity for a forthcoming film by the same outfit, attacking the British Empire.

FESTUNG EUROPA: Mrs. Vidkun Quisling is in a hospital. Melancholia. Her doctor has a police escort.

[The prize for the best item received in July goes to Labor News, Long Beach, California, for the story of the formation of a policemen's union, published July 29.]

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Friends, Romans, Monarchists!

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

ON THE evening of July 13, a banquet was tendered in Rome to General Clark, commander of the Fifth Army, and to General Hume, AMG military commander of the Rome area. "The banquet was attended by several ladies of the Roman aristocracy," Progresso-Italo-Americano reported. And in one of his reports from Rome, Alexander M. Uhl, PM correspondent, made the following comment:

> The Monarchy's staunchest supporters are the old Roman aristocrats whose chief job at the moment is the charming of all the high ranking British and American officers that come their way, particularly of the Allied Control Commission and the AMG. For the most part it isn't too difficult.
>
> They have lovely apartments or houses. They have servants, and good food from the black market. And for the most part they speak excellent English, always a tremendous advantage in dealing with men who don't know Italian. Right now the Roman season is on in full swing for these charming people.

Many Italian noblemen gilded their escutcheons by marrying wealthy American women. The Rome correspondent of the Associated Press mentioned just a few of these ladies in a report on June 17: Countess Roberti, whose father is Ogden H. Hammond of New York, a former Ambassador to Spain; Countess Casardi, the former Virginia Harris of Columbia, Missouri; the Duchess of Villarosa, a friend of Churchill and Bernard Baruch (her son by a former marriage, Robert Goelet, Jr., is a grand-nephew of the late Brigadier General Cornelius Vanderbilt). The list could be swelled by hundreds of names.

In Florence, the number of American-born or English-born, or at least English-speaking, gentlewomen and noblemen is no smaller than in Rome. Even before reaching the "City of Flowers," one of the AMG officers came across Marchesa Torrigiani, wife of the late Marchese Carlo Torrigiani, a gentleman-in-waiting of the Duchess of Aosta. The Marchesa was Lucy Davies of Worcester, Massachusetts, a relative of former Governor John Davies of Massachusetts and a descendant of James Russell Lowell. Marchesa Torrigiani's town house had been taken over by General Schelwitz, the German commandant of Florence, "an awfully nice man," who paid her a visit in the country and gave her an automobile permit. The Marchesa was very much upset by an unbelievable insult she had suffered. Her insensitive chauffeur had become "mysteriously indoctrinated with subversive democratic thought" to the point of joining up with the local Partisans. The AMG officer, apparently having nothing else to do, talked with the fellow and told him that certain things simply are not done. The chauffeur grew wise and "came around asking for his job." But the Marchesa had inherited the firmness of her great-grandfather, a Boston Howard. She told him that it was not going to be as easy as all that; she would let him work for another month and then decide what to do with him.

Besides members of the Anglo-Saxon-Italian nobility, the AMG officers are meeting representatives of American firms in Italy. On July 2, Major Paul D. Shrivet, Regional Property Control Officer for the Rome area, sent the good tidings to America that forty American concerns, representing investments in Rome of about $30,000,000, are enjoying enviable health:

> Firms now under protection of the control office include the American Express, Otis Elevator, International Business Machines, Eastman Kodak, General Electric, Western Electric, Barclay's Bank of London, the Italian-American Bank, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Paramount, Warner Brothers and other film exchanges, Singer Sewing Machine, and a dog track. . . . The dog track is owned jointly by American and British interests. . . . Arrangements are being made whereby the track proceeds will be devised among the American, British, and Italian Red Cross when the course reopens. (New York Times, July 3, 1944.)

Most of these gentlewomen, noblemen, and big-business men yesterday were loyal Fascists and Nazis, and today, consequently, are loyal Monarchists. As such, they are naturally much concerned with the communist menace. Unanimously, they see but one protection against such a menace: a prolonged occupation by the American and British armies. The Associated Press has imparted to us an inkling of their forebodings and desires:

> A large part of Italy's population, especially business men and others with property, are fearful of what may happen when the country is given back to the Italians. Some think Italy will go communist; some think there will be civil war; some think the people will flounder for lack of leadership. Some Italians are saying the present Bonomi government is a Kerensky government which will lead to communism. . . . One Rome business man said: "The Allies ought to stay here and govern the country for five years. How can a > people with so little training in governing themselves take over the most difficult reconstruction job in history?" And then he said: "I'm afraid that as soon as the war is over America will go isolationist again, and the British will pull out, too. Then there's almost sure to be civil war and communism." (New York Herald Tribune, June 16.)

Other American and probably British correspondents told the same story. A journalist, essayist, and politician, once an intimate of Mussolini, who has given up his Fascist ways and, quite logically, is now a Monarchist, told Edd Johnson, correspondent of the Chicago Sun: "The United States must build up Italy as a bulwark against the Bolshevist menace. You can be sure of Italy only if you give us a strong government. It will not be necessary to do this openly. You can invest your capital in our industries and rebuild them, but you must leave a strong government to protect your interests. Through your capital you can continue to control the country and make sure that it does not fall into Bolshevism. . . . Your leaders were wise in favoring the monarchy. It will be the best thing for Italy if the monarchy continues."

Richard Morgan writes in the Chicago Daily News:

> A lot of people in Rome, from the highest authorities down, have been wondering how long the Allies will stay in Italy. "You must not leave too soon," one influential Italian said to an American official. "We need time to recover our senses. We could not stand serious internal strife after what we have been through." A Hungarian writer, who has been known in Rome intimately for eight years, gazed out of his apartment window and told me sadly: "The worst agony for Italy will be the day when the Allies depart and leave the Italians alone, all by themselves."

If that Hungarian writer was known in Rome for eight years, he went there in 1936 when the Rome-Berlin Axis was created, and if he has remained in Italy ever since, he must not have been too unfriendly to the Fascists and the Nazis. No wonder he thinks that Anglo-Saxon military occupation is indispensable.

It may not seem logical in Italy today to combine fear of Bolshevism with loyalty to the Monarchy. Was not the communist Trojan horse brought into the Italian government in April, 1944, precisely by a Prime Minister loyal to the King and to Marshal Badoglio? But probably Italian Monarchists expect the horse sooner or later to be demolished by the very men who brought it in. If American and British armies are at hand, obstacles will be easily overcome when the moment to strike arrives.

The business man who confided his fears to the correspondent of the Associated Press asked for five years of Anglo-Saxon protection. In the Vatican, longer-range views prevail. According to the New York Times, on May 11, 1944, a plan for the reconstruction of Italy was "elaborated in a special message from Pope Pius XII to Archbishop Spellman of New York." This scheme provides for "a ten-year plan of political metamorphosis. . . . During this period, civil administration would be handed back to the people at certain definite stages." By whom would it be handed back? Why, by the American and British military authorities, who keep law and order in the country. And who will be "the people"? Why, the people loyal to the House of Savoy and big business. That same General Hume, who was wined and dined by the ladies of the Roman aristocracy on the evening of July 13, told the Associated Press correspondent, on December 19, 1943, that "the AMG's task in Italy is not to squash Fascism." And this last June he said: "The problem of what to do with the Fascists, against whom many people have believed this war was directed, (italics mine), remains unresolved." (Chicago Sun, June 15, 1944.) The ladies of the Roman aristocracy need not worry. The problem seems to be in safe hands.

It is doubtful, however, whether the majority of the American and British people will agree to leave troops in Italy for five, let alone ten years after the war has come to an end, merely to please the nobility, big business, and the Vatican, especially if the threat of "Bolshevism" is used to keep them. Joseph Stalin has become our dearest friend. Will we have to break with him as soon as the war is over in order to still the fears of upper-class Italians and their American collaborators? Some more suitable argument will have to be devised to make a five- or ten-year occupation palatable.

The argument is at hand. The Italians need to be reeducated, educated to democracy. This job already is on its way. It will be interesting to see how it is carried out.

(This is the first of two articles by Dr. Salvemini. The second will deal with Allied plans for the education of the Italian people.)

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

HERE is a news story just four lines long, which might serve as prologue to a most interesting chapter in the future history of Germany. It is a dispatch from Berlin to the Stockholm Aftontidningen of July 29:

> Himmler has issued an order prohibiting the dyeing or altering of Party uniforms, and also prohibiting the changing of boots to make them look like shoes. Offenders are threatened with the death penalty.

So they are already starting that sort of thing, while Himmler is still there. When he disappears and the Allies come, the rank and file of the Party, with dizzy speed and miraculous thoroughness, will have dyed, altered, and removed all signs of the past. The insinuation that anyone had ever had anything to do with boots or brown uniforms, either on his person or in his heart, will be an undemonstrable slander and a deeply wounding insult.

More details of the latest "total mobilization" are now at hand. Among the various new measures for conserving labor are several which can only be described as scandalous. Consider, for example, this order by the "Reichsführer of the Dentists," released to the press by the official news bureau on July 31:

> Only treatment vital to health may henceforth be given. Treatment which is just desirable is no longer permitted; for instance, no bridging of gaps between teeth by insertion of fixed substitutes known as bridges. Plates may be replaced only if front teeth or several molars are missing. Crowns are permissible only when the dentist considers such work to be indispensable for the conservation of indispensable teeth. Teeth with deep cavities or affected roots should be extracted in any case, since proper treatment would take too much time.

Other measures might have some point if they were really new, if they were being applied now for the first time; but the solemn prohibition of residential construction and street repairs "except in cases of the most urgent necessity" merely makes official a condition which has actually prevailed for a long time, and a sudden tightening of the screws at this late date can't possibly have much effect. The same can be said of the measures described by the Berlin correspondent of the Stockholm Tidningen on July 28:

> Even women over sixty-five are conscripted for work in stores and for light manufactures at home. Children under fifteen are given much more responsible jobs than hitherto. Again, thousands of stores will be closed and their staffs sent to the armed forces or the factories. From now on only one barber shop and one stationery store will be permitted in each district. Many movie theaters, legitimate theaters, and restaurants will be closed. The population is urged to eat in Volksküchen (community kitchens where people bring their own food). Maid service will be permitted only in the most urgent cases.

The same paper reveals another device for increasing the output of labor:

> In factories, a food distribution system is now being introduced, scaling food allotments in accordance with piece-rate production. Those who produce more get more or better food.

The old "combing-out" procedure has been revived, once again, to catch up with "shirkers"—both real and imaginary—and to eliminate "superfluous" occupations. A dispatch to the Stockholm Tidningen reports:

> Himmler and Bormann have examined the entire Nazi organization and are sending tens of thousands of officials to the front and into factories. This is largely done to pacify the army, which for some time has maintained that many Nazi officials were simply shirkers.

And Aftontidningen of July 29 says:

> Ninety thousand post office workers have been conscripted. Even the military mail service has been reduced by half, and the soldiers will get letters only once a week.

All these things may make available a certain number of new recruits (of doubtful quality) for the army and the war industries. But such measures as the one reducing military mail service can only worsen conditions that are already critical. Measures that hit the soldiers at the front, increasing their irritation and war-weariness, are extremely dangerous. Considering how much the fighting spirit of the troops has already deteriorated, one would think the Nazis would avoid such steps. But they have already taken one more dangerous than any of these, merely because it promises the greatest numerical results: they are trying to use soldiers as workers.

Hitherto, the personnel of the army has not been employed in building fortifications, military roads, etc. Such work has been done by the "Todt Organization," the "Speer Organization," and similar outfits. Now, however, the hundreds of thousands of men in these organizations are to be released for armed service or work in the war industries, and henceforth their work is to be done by regiments of soldiers stationed on quiet fronts and inside Germany. The work is in addition to their military duties. Das Reich, Goebbels's personal organ, announced the new system on July 27:

> German soldiers, with the exception of the sappers, seem to think that they need not work physically while in uniform. These days no branch of the armed forces can merely let others serve them. The entire Wehrmacht must become an untiring work camp, where perhaps less singing will be heard but more hard work will be done.

Consider: a regiment, decimated in weeks of heavy fighting, is transferred to an inactive sector; there, against all traditions, it must work eight to ten hours a day, digging, mixing concrete, and laying track. The feelings of such a regiment are best left undescribed. The Nazis' chances will not be improved if, in the midst of obvious military disintegration, they double the soldiers' burdens.

Approaching Ur

A SKELETON KEY TO FINNEGANS WAKE. By Joseph Campbell and Henry Morton Robinson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THIS volume is the first full and painstaking attempt to translate, page by page, the dream-language of Joyce's last work into English. The authors have attempted to trace, furthermore, "in thin lines" the skeletal structure of the enormous and baffling book. They have provided a synopsis of the whole, given indicative names to the four large sections and to the chapters. They have identified and translated many of Joyce's quotations—those in identifiable human tongues. They have tried to keep his alternately looming and dissolving characters straight; listed references and cross-references in footnotes; have labored, that is, to give the reader some intelligible ground to stand on and some recognizable space to move around in. Like archaeologists, whose tasks theirs of necessity so much resemble, they have uncovered one more layer of Joyce's extraordinary verbal buried city. They also supply, in an introduction and conclusion, another fairly impassioned defense of the book as a work of art, and of Joyce as a great conscious artist.

The quality of being closed becomes more and more evident as expert attention is directed toward "Finnegans Wake." The book does not seem, like certain structures of great literature, to be a tower or high place, built on earth and open at the top and on all sides to the Nature about it. Into a limited locale (at its largest, Dublin, on the island of Ireland) are brought all ages of man and some of nature. In one narrow room and one sleeping mind, the developing human faculties, from the brute upward, grow and dissolve and re-form. The circle of Vico's history is superimposed upon the circle of Dublin. Macrocosm and microcosm, symbol and reality, inextricably mix.

The present "translation" proceeds page by page; but the translators have of necessity chosen certain passages, and what has seemed to them the core of these passages, for detailed comment. It is interesting to notice what portions of a knotty (or merely repetitive) passage the elucidators have separated out; and what portions—sometimes containing matter which another observer might consider interesting or crucial—they omit. The footnotes, too, while generally filled with the most helpful kind of information, have moments of complete blankness as to what the text seems to present in the most forcible way. The use of this "key" is therefore stimulating to the thoughtful student in more ways than one. It brings up new problems with every step of ground it clears.

Time must pass, and thorough research be made, before certain fundamental questions concerning "Finnegans Wake" can be answered. One question that comes to mind is: are we dealing with a work (always granting that it is work of incontestable genius) essentially small in inner meaning and even in essential design, a work that has nevertheless exfoliated into a semblance of growth and complexity? Are we dealing, that is, with a work, the product of a man and artist who has never come into maturity? Or are we dealing with an essentially great work, the product of a man and artist who has suffered life and transcended his suffering; who is no longer the victim of his talent, his circumstances, or the tensions within his own character, but has become master of them all? Are we getting from this fantastically distorted and interwoven speech, these amazingly contrapuntalized themes, illumination and truth; or are we being led into the mystery of a childish individual's dreaming game, with the rigmaroles and jokes and tricks of the child (or immature man) presented to us neat?

Joyce's lyric gifts, his full equipment as a trained realist, his ingenuity as a fabulist, his skill as a parodist, his sharp wit and Jesuit-trained learning, his innate musician's ear—these attributes are as clearly evident in "Finnegans Wake" as they are in any piece of writing he ever produced. What difference does it make if we are listening to the operations of neurosis, more than to the supposed operations of sleep; we have heard such operations in great pieces of literature before this. Even if Joyce was a sick man, we are listening to a writer who was in many ways a martyr to his genius and to his age. But we want to penetrate the disguises he has had to throw about himself; or the symptoms he has been forced to assume. We have this desire not out of niggling curiosity, but out of real interest: that we may receive the help and refreshment that any true artist's struggle with his material gives us, particularly when we are caught with him into the same deforming time.

The poet and the "comic fabulist" are equipped with uncommon gifts, by which they are able to get around interior "censorship." They have tricks, as it were, to get the information through. They transpose the dangerous and (actually) untellable truths of the subconscious into imaginative terms, not easy to bring, otherwise, into the light of day. What strikes the more detached observer when faced with the extreme opacities of certain portions of "Finnegans Wake" is the certainty that concealed beneath his very eyes is a submerged fable having to do directly with Joyce, with Joyce's relations to the world, with Joyce's attitude to his time. Is not the whole book a masked attempt at the fullest apologia pro vita sua that Joyce has yet given us? And this last "confession" and apology certainly must be more revealing (consciously or unconsciously) than anything written in his earlier career. Under the ostensible action, under H. C. Earwicker and Anna Livia Plurabelle, and Shem and Shaun, and the multitude of other clear or ambiguous figures, from time to time another drama shows: the drama of Joyce's own life, up to the writing of the book, and during the writing of the book. It is a drama terrifically malicious in expression; it flays one contemporary after another; it brings down all façades of learning and worship in one mass of mocked-at débris. Joyce is doing more than returning compulsively to the Dublin from which he is an exile. He is razing more than Dublin structures with the fires of his love and hatred.

What exterior situation, then, brought Joyce to the pass where, to get his secret across, he had to resort to a kind of desperate cunning? To resort, as well, to the often monotonous, often trivial, often brutal, ruses of the accomplished farceur? Or to the insistent sobbing minor lyric passage? (It seems at times that these two "tones" are the only ones in the book.) Does this work stand like a terrible half-buried monument, both to the recent past and the near future: outlining a deforming epoch when art must become oblique expression—a joking show, a wry song, a cock-eyed cinema-mythology—in order to exist at all?

"The price of virtuosity is abject slavery to a complaisant tool; that of creative artistry is wilful dominance over a recalcitrant tool." What do we finally see in Joyce: virtuoso or artist; compulsive neurotic or a writer with himself entirely in hand? This question requires a deeper analysis than has yet been dared by Joyce students and disciples. It is not a skeleton key we need, so much as eyes to see in spiritual (was it?) darkness; and ears with which to separate cunning (are they?) confusions. LOUISE BOGAN

The Gentle Anti-Fascist

GERMANY AND EUROPE: A SPIRITUAL DISSENSION. By Benedetto Croce. Translated and with an Introduction by Vincent Sheean. Random House. $1.50.

THIS small volume of 83 pages (of which 24 are taken up by an irrelevant introduction by the translator) contains four brief essays on Germany by the Italian historian and philosopher. Three of them, "The Germany We Love," "War as Ideal," and "Duties and Duty," are minor expositions of the well-meaning liberal attitude that is incapable of effective action when confronted by anti-liberal forces which challenge and mutilate the liberal spirit but promise at least, as have Nazism and Fascism, not to destroy its economic basis. In this unpleasant situation the liberal tends to stall and to compromise in the sphere of political reality while maintaining his good conscience by means of humane and courageous private conduct. This book is a distinguished expression of the liberal state of mind. This is said without malice. But respect for Croce's literary achievements and his personality must not make us overlook his political position as a "disciplined citizen." So he calls himself.

In the main essay, "Confessions of an Italian 'Germanophile,' who cannot discover within himself in this respect anything for which he should repent," Croce dissociates himself from those crude and doubtful anti-Nazis who are anti-German almost to the same degree that Hitler is anti-Semitic. But he completely accepts the thesis that a fundamental dissension exists between Germany and Europe. According to this thesis, as put forward by a "learned German," Nazism is—in Croce's formulation—"a terrible crisis which has been brooding in the history of Germany through centuries." The "learned German" fixes precisely the birth-date of this unfortunate development—in 9 B.C., on the day when Varus was defeated by Arminius. That battle "decided the Romans to renounce forever the Romanization of Germany, abandoning that country to itself." Today, almost two thousand years later, we are supposed to experience the consequences: Naz-

BORZOI BOOKS

THE TEMPERING OF RUSSIA
by Ilya Ehrenburg

The famous Soviet war correspondent here presents a memorable eye-witness record of Russia at war, on both the home and battle fronts, in the terrible days before victory was assured. A vivid and searching account of that nation's agony and heroism, and of Nazi terrorism. $3.00

POST-WAR MONETARY PLANS
by John H. Williams

Vice-President of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, Dean of the Graduate School of Public Administration, Harvard University

An analysis of the official American and British proposals for an international monetary organization, an investigation of the fundamental problems of international adjustment, and a suggestion for a more flexible and less formalized approach to currency stability. $2.50

Winner of an Alfred A. Knopf Fellowship in Biography
GEORGE BANCROFT
Brahmin Rebel—1800-1891
by Russel B. Nye

Our first major historian, who also served his country as Secretary of the Navy, acting Secretary of War, Minister to England and Minister to Prussia. The life of this remarkable man is also a political and cultural survey of America through its most formative decades. $3.50

ALFRED · A · KNOPF

ism, led by a son of Austria, surely one of the "other European regions" where an affinity exists that "emanates from the inexhaustible vitality of Latin culture." Croce does not seriously probe the perplexing fact that this vital Latin culture has been unable to protect Italy from Mussolini and Fascism, or Spain from Franco, or Austria from Dollfuss (Mussolini's friend and pupil), or France from collaborationists. He also ignores completely the fact that the lack of Roman culture in Scandinavia, England, and America produced in these countries neither Fascism nor Nazism on a grand scale, and that there conceptions of political freedom are cherished which have become, to some extent at least, realities.

To his satisfaction, it seems, Croce has solved these contradictions for Italy, by calling Fascism "a superfetation foreign to the history of Italy" and by illustrating this with a little dialogue that once took place between him and a "Nazi Greek scholar":

> Croce: All things considered, we Italians are greatly superior to the Germans.
>
> The Nazi: Superior, why?
>
> Croce: Because our Italians, which is to say those of us who play the Fascists, know that they are acting in complete bad faith, but Germans believe in it for true.
>
> The Nazi: And what is the superiority in that?
>
> Croce: This: that we, with our bad faith, at least keep the intellect lucid, and we remain bad men, but men, whereas you lose it altogether and become beasts.

This seems to me not much more than an indulgence in cynicism, which the Italian, Austrian, Ethiopian, Spanish, Greek, and Yugoslav victims of the Blackshirts will hardly be able to appreciate.

Croce's outlook on the future is, of course, brightened by humane intentions. But he answers merely the democratic victims of Hitler's propaganda when he says:

> What a misfortune it would be if race were that which the Nazis and the philosophers of Nazism believe! The Germans in that case would be outside of history and humanity, irreducible to the former and unredeemable for the latter. But this concept is a phantasm of disordered and incoherent imaginations—as are, by reaction, the excogitations which nowadays are springing up in order to diminish the number of Germans, of sterilizations on the example given by the Germans themselves, or of chopping up Germany into little states to which all union or federation would be forbidden, supposing them for this reason easier to watch over. Multiple foolishness thus replies to folly, thinking so to defeat it. But foolishness can be dissolved only by reasonableness, which alone is capable likewise of resisting the blind impulses of passion, even when those were originally set in motion by moral indignation.

Croce expects much from "the shame which it [Germany] cannot help but feel over the evil for which it has made itself the instrument." This shame "will be converted into a force of good—as with those great saints who were once great sinners." But how long will it take the Germans to get rid of an alleged character which has been formed during two thousand years? Will it be a conversion overnight, or a long historical process as Croce seems to indicate by saying: . . . "The evil to be cured has an historical nature, was historically born and will historically die." True, but the problem is what to do tomorrow.

"Germany and Europe" packs into its small space a great deal of disappointment. I am afraid it will merely add to the confusion that characterizes the debate about Germany in the wide circle of those who defend the status quo, who see no way out from the impasse apparently reached between personal liberty on one side and economic efficiency and security on the other, and who do not want to understand that Fascism and Nazism are features of the social revolution on the march everywhere, whether we like it or not. Such persons manipulate the doubtful category of a people's character, and other metaphysical and psychological concepts, as if nations as a whole had reached anywhere a level of freedom, education, and health upon which clear-cut responsibilities could be assigned. Of course historical elements do color the actions of people, but the emergence of fascist tendencies in every nation proves that they cannot be attributed to a single people.

Croce ignores completely the political consequences of industrial and technological progress, as most liberals incline to do. But neither nostalgia, nor stalling and compromise, nor a humanistic optimism will change the ugly face of present-day reality. In contrast to the tremendous developments that are taking place all over the world, this kind of inquiry and its results have already the appearance of atavism. They have as much to do with reality as the schemes of Versailles had twenty-five years ago.

FRANZ HOELLERING

Stage Business in Shakespeare

SHAKESPEARE AND THE ACTORS: THE STAGE BUSINESS IN HIS PLAYS (1600-1905). By Arthur Colby Sprague. Harvard University Press. $5.

MANY people are fascinated by antiquarian lore concerning the theater, and much of it is exceedingly curious even if there is not much else to be said about it. There seems, on the other hand, no good reason for doubting that some of the great actors of the eighteenth century, for instance, really were great, no matter how inadequate their scenic arrangements may have been and no matter how slovenly elementary stage discipline often was. And for that reason knowledge of their methods can be of interest not only to the antiquarian but to others as well.

No contemporary description survives to give us the faintest or most general idea of even the broad style of Burbage (for whom Shakespeare's major tragedies were written), but from the time of the Restoration on more or less illuminating comments on actors are available and many of them have been used again and again by historians. The author of the present volume has, nevertheless, made a genuine contribution. He set himself the laborious task of examining surviving prompt books and "acting editions" of Shakespeare's plays, as well as the contemporary criticisms of actors, and from these sources he has collected bits of information now so arranged that the reader may conveniently ascertain (in so far, of course, as the author has been able to discover) what "business" the various famous performers of a part employed in this or that important scene in twenty-three of Shakepseare's plays. The period covered is 1660-1905 and thus approximately the same as that of Odell's standard "Shakespeare from Betterton to Irving," but Mr. Sprague has limited himself to one single aspect of the subject, which he can therefore treat in fuller detail, and his book is a valuable supplement to the older one.

The plays most completely covered are "Hamlet," "Othello," and "Macbeth," these being among those which have most consistently maintained their popularity and been longest acted in versions nearest the original. "Hamlet" is accorded fifty-eight pages, "Macbeth" almost as many, and though, even so, the material thus presented is more or less fragmentary, it is full of things both surprising and illuminating. One shudders to learn that at one time Horatio used to give Bernardo his hand to illustrate his supposed meaning when Bernardo asks, "Is Horatio there?" and Horatio replies, "A piece of him." One shudders equally when one is told that Bernhardt used to knock the heads of Rosenkranz and Guildenstern together to show how little she valued them and that she caught a fly to illustrate "Buzz, buzz." But not by any means all the ingenuity which has been expended was so misplaced. Dover Wilson's insistence that Hamlet should reveal his distrust of Marcellus when he addresses Horatio in the former's presence was anticipated by Henderson and Kemble, though Garrick had overlooked the point. The problem of what to do when Hamlet says, "Look here, upon this picture and on that"—a problem which recent Hamlets have solved in diverse ways—was long ago solved in both the two ways still most current and also in a third. Hamlet may carry miniatures, he may merely imagine them, or he may (and this seems to have been the Restoration solution) point to pictures on the wall.

Mr. Sprague advances few theories and indulges in few generalizations. For the most part he is content to give fact after fact, and for his purpose the method is certainly the proper one. It does not, however, make for easy reading, and his book will probably be read from beginning to end only by those who have a very deep interest in the subject. But it will be widely useful as a reference work. Nowhere else can one find in such profusion answers to questions which inevitably arise, not only when one of the great plays is to be staged but when a careful reader tries to visualize an action. In an amazing number of instances one will be able to discover what one or more of the great actors of the past did during a scene which can be interpreted in more ways than any single reader is likely to think of.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Negro in Industry

ORGANIZED LABOR AND THE NEGRO. By Herbert R. Northrup. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

DR. NORTHRUP'S book fills an important need, for it brings together in one volume more up-to-date information on its subject than can be found elsewhere in readily accessible form. The author has not only carried on considerable field work and made extensive use of primary sources; his work also represents in large measure the fruit of an unprecedented amount of research by others during the past five years. Much of his material is based on the comprehensive manuscript prepared under the direction of Dr. Paul H. Norgren for the "Negro in America" inquiry sponsored by the Carnegie Corporation of New York. Moreover, Dr. Northrup has made good use of the valuable material accumulated by the President's Employment Practices Committee as well as recent information obtainable from other government sources and from miscellaneous publications.

As the title indicates, major emphasis is placed upon the relation of the Negro worker to trade unions. Yet adequate presentation of this subject when applied to particular industries necessarily involves a preliminary analysis of the Negro's position in the industry, or group of industries, concerned. In fact, at least one-third of the book deals with this aspect and thus a two-fold presentation is obtained. After an introductory chapter portraying the diverse policies of American trade unions with respect to Negro wage earners, nine industries or industrial groups (and the grouping is somewhat arbitrary) are discussed: construction; railroads; tobacco processing; textiles, clothing, and laundries; longshore work; coal mining; iron and steel; automobiles and aircraft; and shipbuilding.

Dr. Northrup's thesis emphasizes the importance of environmental factors in determining the racial policies of trade unions. But the very dependence of union policies upon social-economic factors means that they are flexible in the

"The invasion was launched in full accord with the Russians and the decisions reached at Teheran."— WINSTON CHURCHILL

TEHERAN
OUR PATH IN WAR AND PEACE
EARL BROWDER

Take the Teheran decisions at their face value . . . put them to work in the post war world . . . and you get continued peace — better paying jobs — a fuller life for all peoples for generations to come.

Browder believes that the Anglo-American-Soviet Partnership is a going concern. It won't go bankrupt after the war. Instead, its policies will extend to Africa, Europe, Asia and South America in business — political — and social relationships. Read this book for its clear sighted picture of what you can do to win the peace. Get your copy right away.

$1.50

TEHERAN OUR PATH IN WAR AND PEACE

by EARL BROWDER
President Communist Political Association
Author of "Victory and After" a book which sold almost 500,000 and still going strong.
Order from your bookstore, or send check or money order.

Write for Complete Catalog
INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS · 381 FOURTH AVE. · NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

long run. Thus the increased strength of the industrial unions, principally the CIO, the more clearly enunciated policy of government with respect to equality of opportunity, along with the general increase in governmental control of the labor market, are placing exclusionist unions on the defensive and making more difficult the extension of organization by discriminatory unions into new fields. The author concludes by recommending that present legislation be amended to the end that no union discriminating against workers on racial grounds may receive the protection of state or federal labor relations laws, or of agencies engaged in the mediation or arbitration of industrial disputes. He advocates that all closed shop agreements involving discriminatory unions be specifically declared illegal. The federal anti-discrimination program sanctioned by Carey McWilliams is approved.

The book contains several inaccuracies. For example, Ford has a union shop, not a closed shop agreement, which is generally construed to entail union hiring control; the Seafarers International Union does not exclude Negroes entirely but admits as members only those employed in the Stewards' Department. The United States Post Office does not bargain with the Railway Mail Association in the sense that private employers haggle with unions over wages and conditions of employment, as the author indicates. Railway mail clerks are under Civil Service, and practically the only instances in which the federal government, or its agents, does bargain in peacetime are in the operations of the Inland Waterways Corporation and the TVA. Many of these inaccuracies are due to overgeneralization and the occasional use of unreliable or incomplete sources, but do not noticeably alter the reliability of the general picture.

The concluding chapter is the most thought-provoking in the book yet one is forced to conclude that the broader implications of the proposals advanced as well as the administrative problems entailed are largely overlooked. The chapter raises more questions in the reader's mind than it answers. In fact the 250 pages allotted to the entire work are totally insufficient to do justice to a subject as complex as that chosen by the author. This indeed is the principal shortcoming of the book.

LLOYD H. BAILER

Clothes-Horse History

THE WAY OUR PEOPLE LIVED: AN INTIMATE AMERICAN HISTORY. By W. E. Woodward. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.95.

THOUGH one may quarrel occasionally with his judgments, Woodward has given us many lively and provocative books on the American scene. This is not one of them, which is our loss, for the basic idea, while not new, is excellent—a portrait of the average American down the ages.

Here are Boston three centuries ago, a Puritan village in 1680, a Virginia plantation of the early eighteenth century, New York about 1750, Philadelphia at the time of Independence, Augusta (Georgia) when King Cotton was just mounting his throne, Cincinnati as the westward surge reached flood time, the trek of the Forty-niners and early San Francisco, the Windy City at the time of the great fire of 1871, a Southern mill town in the 1880's (autobiographical and by far the best section in the book), and the gaudy splendor of New York at the turn of the century.

A varied bill of fare, to be sure, but to this reader's taste disappointingly flat and downright dull. There are many interesting details about every-day existence here and there, but the book never jells in whole or in part.

In telling his story Woodward chose to present in each sketch a cast of characters, some real and some fictitious, and then put them through their paces to make more graphic the manner of their lives. The intent was good, but more than that was required. Whatever his other talents, Woodward has not the storyteller's gift for creating characters—they are as wooden as the cigar-store Indians he speaks of—and his ear for dialogue is wretched. As he has one of his characters say after meeting McGuffey (of the famous School Readers), he "lectures us—and everybody, for that matter—just as if we were a class of college students. You can't have any conversation when he's present. He doesn't discuss anything; he just tells you what's what, and lets it go at that."

To which the "petulant" girl's mother replies (perhaps speaking also for Woodward): "I don't see any objection to that. . . . I want people to tell me whatever I don't know, and I can listen all day. Everything the professor said interested me."

Well, it didn't me.

After all, you can't get much of an idea of the way our people lived when the people never come alive. There's nothing very "intimate" or revealing about a clothes-horse.

GEORGE WILLISON

Fiction in Review

I AM not sure I know what Christopher LaFarge means when, in the preface to "East by Southwest" (Coward-McCann, $2.50), he speaks of his stories as a fictional supplement to war reporting. Perhaps he is describing only those pieces in his collection which, though superficially cast in the form of fiction, have no plot and merely trace certain recurrent patterns of war conduct—how fatigue shows itself, how gossip circulates, and so on. But on the other hand, his volume includes several perfectly orthodox short stories to which Mr. LaFarge's statement of his dependence on fact is irrelevant; these stories may suffer from being written too quickly but they wear no special documentary stamp. For instance, All the Comforts of Home, the first piece in the collection, is an account of the mounting chagrin of a French official who, having been told to arrange recreation for the incoming American forces, transforms the best hotel on his island into an officers' brothel: it is a story full of dry charm, somewhat suggestive of the manner and literary tradition of Harold Nicolson's "Some People." Or the last piece in Mr. La Farge's volume, the story of a young navy lieutenant who, because he wants to keep his girl for himself, spreads word through the island that she is a leper: By Word of Mouth has the material for a very fine short story; and although one sighs over the carelessness with which it is disposed of, one scarcely excuses its insufficiency on the ground that it was intended as an adjunct to reporting instead of as pure fiction. The point is—obviously—that a story is a story, good or bad, successful or insufficient, quite without reference to the circumstances of its composition or the practical purpose it was meant to serve.

And yet I suppose that all our war fiction so far might be described as only a fictional supplement to war reporting—in the sense that it suffers from being too close to the source of its inspiration. In the same week with "East by Southwest," I read Hobert Douglas Skidmore's "Valley of the Sky" (Houghton Mifflin, $2), a war novel which protests no factual limits on its imagination but which is actually little farther removed from its factual material than the sketchiest of Mr. LaFarge's reports. A novel about a bomber crew and a bombing mission in the Pacific, "Valley of the Sky" is both more exciting and more sorrowful than the stories in "East by Southwest"; but even its vein of drama is already familiar, having been bared, early in the war, by our war correspondents.

Having several times written in praise of the historical novels of Howard Fast, I regret having to report, now, my deep distaste for his latest book, "Freedom Road" (Duell, Sloan & Pearce, $2.75). Mr. Fast's novel is set in South Carolina during the Reconstruction years; it is the story of an experiment in communal democracy in which groups of newly freed Negroes joined with dispossessed white farmers to buy land and farm together and then try to protect themselves against the savagery of the Ku Klux Klan. I lack the knowledge to pass on the historical validity of "Freedom Road." But even if all Mr. Fast's historical facts can be documented, the novel strikes me as profoundly untrue because it bears no resemblance to human life under any circumstances. I am quite certain that no group of people—black, white, or mixed—could behave with the unmitigated virtue of Mr. Fast's Negroes.

As a matter of fact, I find "Freedom Road" a disturbing blend of piousness and condescension, a book in the least attractive spirit of present-day liberal and radical thought. It is pious because it assumes that people are good in proportion as they are oppressed, and it is condescending because, by denying oppressed people human fallibility, it in effect makes them rather less than human. And people so different from ourselves of course require even a language of special consideration. From Steinbeck on, we have been developing in this country a prose for minorities, a kind of Biblical croon, over-cadenced and putting the distance of Biblical years between writer and subject. This is the narrative prose; the dialogue prose is even more offensive. "You wonderful horse, you sure enough beautiful little horse, you got a heart like a cannon blasting, you got a heart like a big sun rising—," says Mr. Fast's young colored boy in a typical burst of lyricism: progressive fiction likes to assume this false poeticism of speech in people whose lives are unmistakably corroded or commonplace. Similarly, it likes to assign to people of little or no education a special sensitivity to art, nature, and family feeling; we should not be surprised, then, that the hero of "Freedom Road," an ex-slave who has just painfully taught himself to read, has an immediate instinct in the direction of Whitman, Emerson, and Dickens, and against Poe!

"Wives of High Pasture" by Worth Tuttle Hedden (Doubleday, Doran, $2.75) is also an historical novel, about the Oneida colony, one of the Christian-communism communities that flourished before the Civil War. Although I cannot recommend it for any special literary interest, I found very entertaining its slant on what the Oneida disciples called "amativeness."

DIANA TRILLING

Surrealist Painting

BY CLEMENT GREENBERG

III

THE Surrealist motive for a naturalistic technique is plain. The more vividly, literally, painstakingly the absurd and the fantastic are represented, the greater their shock. For the sake of hallucinatory vividness the Surrealists have copied the effects of the calendar reproduction, postal card, chromeotype, and magazine illustration. In general they prize the qualities of the popular reproduction because of its incongruously prosaic associations and because the reproduction heightens illusionistic effect by erasing paint texture and brushstroke.

Another motive is the desire to sin against decorum, violate all the rules, do the disreputable thing, and attach oneself to whatever seems discredited. Advanced painting since the Impressionists has established a certain decorum, a notion of the aesthetically relevant, which the Surrealists find pompous, as they profess to find all relevancies pompous (this makes another of the possible rationalizations of the disassociated or disconnected image). Dali turned on post-cubist painting, praised Meissonier and commercial illustrations, and asserted his contempt for "formal" values by the deliberate but just as often unconscious negligences of his own painting. Thus he made a virtue of his shortcomings. Granted that irreverence has a necessary function in our time, yet irreverence as puerile and as widely welcome as Dali's is no more revolutionary than fascism. But of course, Dali is not to be taken seriously as anything other than a symptom. He is the Ossian of our day.

IV

The decisive question is whether the Surrealist image, as illustrated in the works of Ernst, Dali, Tanguy and the other painters of their kind, provides painting with a really new subject matter. That is, must hitherto untapped possibilities of the medium be explored in order to accommodate the Surrealist image? As far as painting alone is concerned, does it involve a new way of seeing as well as new things to be seen? For such painters as Miró, Arp, Masson, and Picasso, it certainly does. But not for Ernst, Dali, Tanguy, Oelze, Roy, Magritter, Dominguez, Brauner, Delvaux, Fini, e tutti quanti, who do indeed see new things, but no differently in essence than painters of the past would have seen them had they accepted Surrealist notions of subject matter. The Surrealist image is thus a new object to be posed and arranged, but it requires no fundamental change in the conventions of painting as established by the Renaissance. Given the same subjects, Meissonier, Ford Madox Brown, or Greuze would have approached the same effects. There would be the same

MOTION PICTURES

Paramount Presents PRESTON STURGES'

"HAIL THE CONQUERING HERO"

Starring

EDDIE BRACKEN with Ella Raines and William Demarest

In Person VAUGHN MONROE AND HIS ORCHESTRA

Plus GIL MAISON Extra! GENE SHELDON

BUY WAR BONDS PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

AIR-CONDITIONED

"A commanding screen biography."
. . . Crowther, Times

DARRYL F. ZANUCK'S WILSON

A 20th Century-Fox Picture

On the Roxy stage . . .

FRED WARING and his Pennsylvanians

ROXY CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES

STAGE PLAYS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (in association with Jack H. Skirball)

JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL

The FRANZ WERFEL - S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN

LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS

J. EDWARD BROMBERG

MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED
Evenings at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

MICHAEL TODD presents

BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT

SONGS BY COLE PORTER

WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

AIR CONDITIONED

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give us at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine:
☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8 ☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

INTRODUCTORY OFFER TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS ONLY:
☐ 10 Weeks $1
Cash with order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

NAME..

ADDRESS..

....

8-19-44

modelling, shading, and spacing, and the same color schemes, although the hues themselves would be a little less saccharine or brassy and a little less unbroken.

The Surrealist image provides painting with new anecdotes to illustrate, just as current events supply new topics to the political cartoonist, but of itself it does not charge painting with a new subject matter. On the contrary, it has promoted the rehabilitation of academic art under a new literary disguise. The maxim nulla sine narratione ars is true enough, now as before, but the Surrealists have interpreted it vulgarly to mean that there can be no picture without an anecdote. The tradition of painting which runs from Manet through Impressionism, Fauvism, and Cubism has created the first original art style since the French Revolution, and the only original one our bourgeois society has been capable of. All its other styles are revivals. That style is now threatened for the first time from the inside by Surrealist painters, and by the Neo-Romantics and "Magic Realists" who bring up their train. These painters, though they claim the title of avant-garde artists, are revivers of the literal past and advance agents of a new conformist, and best-selling art.

The Surrealists have, like the Pre-Raphaelites, reinvigorated academicism by their personal gifts—which are undeniable—and by going to either a remoter or a more discredited past for guidance; in distinction from self-confessed academicists, who try to keep abreast of the times by watering down yesterday's advanced art. Taking their lead and most original impulse from Chirico—that archaizer who made a small but valid contribution—the Surrealists prefer Mantegna, Bosch, Vermeer, and Böcklin to the Impressionists. This does not make their painting any the less academic, but it does make it livelier, disturbing, and more attractive to new talents: adroit talents who read Rimbaud, have a sense of format, finish, and mise en scène—and can at least draw seriously. (The drawings of Ernst, Dali, and especially Tanguy are adventurous and original in a way that their paintings are not. The compelled economy of the line exposes their art to problems which are on the order of the day and which they otherwise evade by taking refuge in the ancient arsenal provided by the traditions of oil painting.)

Prompted by a real dissatisfaction with contemporary life, the art of these Surrealists is essentially one of vicarious wish-fulfilment. Its very horrors are nostalgic and day-dreamy, having associations with a more pleasant-seeming past, which is resuscitated in brighter, iridescent colors, smoother contours, glossier surfaces, and sharper outlines. The artist shows us how he would prefer life to look or how—as children do—he would prefer to be frightened. His wish is painted with such an illusion of super-reality as to make it seem on the brink of realization in life itself. The result is indeed a new and interesting kind of pictorial literature, but it is more literature or document than painting or art.

It is possible, I believe, to construct faithful duplicates in wax, papier maché, or rubber of most of the recent paintings of Ernst, Dali, and Tanguy. Their "content" is conceivable, and too much so, in other terms than those of paint. But the pictures of Picasso and Miró attain virtuality as art only through paint on a flat surface, and they would disappear utterly if translated elsewhere. Which is also true of the works of the old masters.

FILMS

WILSON" is by no means the first film in which one might watch Hollywood hopping around on one foot, trying to put on long pants. Nor are the immense responsibilities and potentialities of moving pictures so nearly Mr. Darryl Zanuck's personal discovery, patent applied for, as he apparently feels them to be ("Intolerance," after all, is nearly thirty years old). Yet Mr. Zanuck may be better than excused for regarding his new film as an important one, a test case. Very likely it is, not only for him but for Hollywood in general, for a long time to come. For as a hymn to internationalism, performed with all the stops pulled out, at just this time, "Wilson" becomes an extremely powerful campaigner for the Fourth Term, whether or not Mr. Zanuck so intended it. It thus undertakes more crucial and specific political responsibilities, more boldly, than any other American film to date. Still more important, from Hollywood's point of view, it represents the steepest investment, so far, in a would-be serious picture. When you count in a million dollars' exploitation costs, "Wilson" set Mr. Zanuck and the other little Foxes back about $5,200,000. No other film has ever cost so much.

If "Wilson" fails, Darryl Zanuck has promised never again to make a picture without Betty Grable. If "Wilson" fails, worse things than that may happen. It seems very possible that even any attempt at making "serious" or "idea" films of this sort might be postponed in this country for years to come. If "Wilson succeeds, on the other hand, it is likely that we will get a lot of other pictures like it, not only because a new box-office formula will have been established but also because, I feel sure, Hollywood is as full as any other place of men of fairly good will who would gladly devote some of it to the public weal so long as no risk is involved.

If this conception of maturing and seriousness becomes generally accepted, I will be more sorry than glad. Pictures like "Wilson" have little if anything to do with mature serious cinema as such, and those who think of "Wilson" as a mature film are not in the least concerned with its liveliness or deadness as a work of art; they are excited because serious ideas are being used on the screen. Something well worth excitement, I'll grant; but how much? None of the ideas used in "Wilson" is expressed in any better than primer fashion. Anyone who cares to can still get twice as much out of a newspaper and a dozen times as much out of even a mediocre book, so far as ideas are concerned. Perhaps this is a moment to be generous, as if toward a child who stumbles over unexpectedly big words; but that kind of contempt is peculiar to those who hate movies and think they like them, and is unavailable to those who love movies and are thought to loathe them. Furthermore, I believe that political ideas at their most mature and serious are still childish and frivolous as compared with those ideas or conceptions which attempt to work in, to perceive, and to illuminate, the bottoms of the souls of human beings. If political issues and a reverence for fact on the journalistic (or even the historical) level become a popular criterion for seriousness and maturity in films, the proper study of mankind is likely to be deferred even longer than by the present prospects. On the other hand, if great audiences, and those who fearfully try to give them what they want, get used to the idea that thinking and entertainment are by no means autonymous, this postponement-period may serve both ends, valuably, as a period of transition and training.

The whole business makes me a little tired when I reflect that it is 99 per cent waste motion—that a dozen really good, really mature films, each made on a B-budget or less, would be more likely to do overnight what in this way won't happen with any firmness in twenty years. But the distinguishing faculty of the realist is his preference for the longest distance between two points—a preference which becomes virtually beatitude if the second point is never reached. As a realist, then, I hope that "Wilson" grosses ten million dollars and that no matter how disastrously misleading the whole process may be, the studios will spend the next few years tearing each other's throats out over political and social issues. Seriousness and courage on a political level are infinitely preferable, heaven knows, to no seriousness and courage at all.

I have left myself very little space in which to talk about "Wilson" in detail; but perhaps that is just as well. It is essentially a very sincere and even a brave picture, and I am bound to salute even an attempt to help prevent a third world war, and to wish it well. One might at great length talk about its virtues—for on its own level, and in so far as its tight intersection of anxious showmanship, conventional talent, and journalistic conscience allows it, it has a great many more virtues than faults, and is a big, splendid, competent, resourceful show. One might at even greater length, and still with no lack of basic sympathy, analyze its extremely characteristic fits and starts down to the least evidence of the effort to give it all that money can buy and that honest research can edge it with: for in every grand effect and little mannerism it is both fascinating and instructive. They copied the cracks in the paint in the original portraits of Presidents in the White House; but they were unable to learn anything whatever of primary value from their study of 160,000 feet of relevant newsreel.

But here again, I am just as glad to shirk my duty. No matter how friendly I feel towards "Wilson" and the people who made it, any such review would amount chiefly to a specification of occupational psychosis. With the best intentions in the world, Hollywood took a character and a theme of almost Shakespearian complexity and grandeur, and reduced the character to an astutely played liberal assistant professor of economics; the theme to a few generalizations which every schoolboy has half-forgotten; the millennial, piteous surge of hope and faith which bore Wilson to Paris, to nothing at all; the colossal struggles between Wilson and Clemenceau and Senator Lodge, to one firmly written tizzy and one softly written one; Wilson's terrifying, possessed trip around the United States, to a set of pretty Thomas-Wolfean train-montages, culminating in the unprepared breakdown of a good insurance risk; the American people, to a passive murmurous backdrop; and an extraordinarily grandiose prospect of powerful and original cinema, to a high-grade sort of magazine illustration. Every major problem, opportunity, and responsibility which the picture set its makers was, in other words, flunked—now through timidity, again through habitual half-blindness, and most of all perhaps through the desire to sell and ingratiate and essentially to render a two-and-a-half-hour apology for one sustained impulse of daring and disinterestedness.

If "Wilson" fails, I believe it will be because Mr. Zanuck and his associates were not up to their subject. For I am quite sure that the tremendous audiences which may or may not accept it as it stands would have been found more than ready for the same story, maturely told.

JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

A READER has written to ask me to explain what I referred to in Heifetz's playing when, in my May 20 review of the General Motors broadcast of Mendelssohn's Concerto, I spoke of his "vulgarities." Also, not recalling any comment on Huberman in my column, and having been "astonished and captivated by [his] marvelous delivery and breadth of musicianship," he asked how I ranked him.

No recordings of Huberman performances have been issued for several years, and I happen not to have heard him in concerts; hence there has been no occasion for me to write about him recently. But in the past there were occasions for me to speak of the qualities that added up, for me, to the playing of a great artist. These were chiefly qualities of his phrasing—subtly inflected but continuously large-spanned (what I imagine my correspondent means by breadth of musicianship).

I have answered the question about Huberman first because it has enabled me to state some of the qualities of a good musician—to which I can oppose the qualities of a poor musician that I have often heard and pointed out in Heifetz's playing. Let my correspondent listen to Heifetz's recorded performances of Mozart and Beethoven sonatas: he will hear the line of the phrase constantly broken by mincing little swells on every two or three notes, often with wailing upward slides. Let him listen to the recorded performance of Franck's Sonata—the passage in the third movement beginning at a point about 1 11/16 inches in from the first groove of side 4, which Franck directs shall be played molto dolce e tranquillo, and in which therefore the notes should flow quite evenly: he will hear Heifetz's mannered, distorted delivery of the passage—the constant alternation between excessive holding back and hurrying of the notes. All this, with its effect of exaggerated, ostentatious, and obvious expressiveness, is the sort of thing one would hear in a performance of Rubinstein's Melody in F for the audience in a vaudeville or movie theater; in performances of Mozart, Beethoven, and Franck it is just as cheap, sentimental, vulgar; and it was to what I first described as Heifetz's "pretentiously mannered and sentimentally distorted phrasing" that I later applied the term "phraseological vulgarities," in my May 20 review.

One thing interests me further in my reader's letter, and that in his attitude he believed I had heard something he did not hear, and asked me to tell him what it was. This leaves me surprised, admiring, and grateful, because it is not the usual attitude of people in his situation. Most people are unable to make the distinction between Heifetz's playing of the violin and his playing of Mozart, or even to imagine or understand that distinction: what else is there in performance of music than producing the sounds the composer has written; and what can be wrong in a performance in which fast passages are produced with breath-taking speed and agility, and slow ones with breath-taking beauty of sound? As a result all performances by celebrated performers have equal validity for these people: they can understand that Schnabel plays Mozart differently from Casadesus, or Beecham differently from Koussevitzky, but not that one man plays the music well and the other poorly. And some cannot believe that anyone else can make these distinctions and evaluations; so that a reader once attributed my criticisms of Heifetz, which he characterized as "snide and ill-mannered impertinence," to personal animosity, accused me of attempting to tear Heifetz down in order to elevate Szigeti for similar personal reasons, and of doing the same thing with Koussevitzky for the benefit of Toscanini and Beecham, and assured me that only the musical public, which had put Heifetz and Koussevitzky where they were, could remove them. And even a better-mannered reader, who could conceive of my finding things to criticize in Heifetz's playing, could not understand how I could go so far as to apply a term like "vulgarities" to a violinist of Heifetz's eminence.

In addition to not understanding certain things in music and performance these readers didn't understand some very important things about the nature and purpose of criticism and about the mutual relation of critic and reader. I intend some time very soon to deal at length with the idea of the critic as a person whom one reads for the perceptions that enable one to hear and understand what one otherwise would not have heard and understood, and to develop the consequences of this idea for the reader. Right now I will only repeat my answer to those who objected: The Nation does not employ me to genuflect before eminences or before the limited perceptions of the great musical public; it employs me as an expert to hear and to report what I hear. If someone else cannot hear what I heard, or prefers to ignore it, that doesn't mean that I must not hear it or speak of it. And if what I hear from a violinist as eminent as Heifetz impresses me as a phraseological vulgarity, that is the term I have to use to describe it.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

JEROME H. SPINGARN is a Lieutenant (jg) in the United States Navy, serving in the Pacific area.

ANNA LOUISE STRONG has lived in Russia almost constantly since 1921 as a sympathetic observer of its development. Her books include "Children of Revolution," "This Soviet World," "The Remaking of an American," and "I Change Worlds."

WALTON HAMILTON, professor at the Yale Law School, has served as economic adviser to various government agencies. He was formerly head of the Brookings Graduate School of Economics, and he is the author of "The Power to Govern: The Constitution Then and Now."

GAETANO SALVEMINI, formerly professor of history at the University of Florence, is now Lauro de Bosis lecturer on the history of Italian civilization at Harvard. He is co-author with George La Piana of "What To Do With Italy."

LOUISE BOGAN has contributed verse and critcism to The Nation, the New Republic, Poetry, and other magazines. Her books include "Body of This Death" and "Sleeping Fury."

FRANZ HOELLERING was for many years editor of the Berliner Zeitung and the Arbeiter Illustrierte Zeitung. He is the author of "The Defenders," and a second novel, "Furlough," will be published shortly.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH, The Nation's drama critic, is professor of dramatic literature at Columbia University. He has written many books on the drama, including "Comedy and Conscience After the Restoration" and "The American Drama Since 1918."

LLOYD H. BAILER has taken partial leave from the Department of Economics at Howard University in order to serve with the War Labor Board.

Letters to the Editors

Soldier Preference?

Dear Sirs: I have been following with suppressed anger "The War to Keep Soldiers from Being Citizens." The soldier vote issue was one part of that war. The current attempt to prevent soldiers from having full and free access to certain books and magazines is an extension of the same campaign. A recent order requiring all "letters to the editor" to be submitted for approval to higher authority is still another limitation on soldiers' rights as citizens since in practical effect it operates as a gag on soldiers wishing to speak their minds on matters concerning the welfare of the nation—even though such discussion has nothing to do with military security.

With regard to the ban on certain magazines, the army says that they were omitted from its approved list on the basis of a test of soldier preferences as shown by sales in PX's. Yet in no PX that I have entered have I seen The Nation, the New Republic, Harper's, the Atlantic, or other quality magazines offered for sale. How can a magazine be preferred or not preferred when it is not offered for purchase? To say that soldiers are free to subscribe to anything is no defense. An enlisted man may be financially able to buy only occasional copies of the magazine he likes. Must he send to the publisher every time he wants an issue in which he is particularly interested?

Only the constant vigilance of such magazines as The Nation to prevent the unnecessary infringement on soldiers' rights is going to preserve our democracy now and avoid an aftermath of resentment on the part of service men when the war is over. PFC

Somewhere in Massachusetts, Aug. 6

Readily Available

Dear Sirs: Some of your readers may have mistakenly deduced from Charles G. Bolté's piece in the July 22 issue that servicemen are denied access to magazines like Harper's or The Nation, or books such as Mrs. Bowen's "Yankee from Olympus."

The Army may have "banned from its establishment the American Mercury, Harper's, Atlantic Monthly, New Republic, and The Nation," as Mr. Bolté states, but current issues of most of the foregoing publications are readily available here at the post library. In addition, a cursory examination of the shelves reveals the presence of "Yankee from Olympus," E. B. White's "One Man's Meat," and Beard's "Republic."

It is, perhaps, a no longer interesting revelation of Southern mores, however, that all the latest fiction best-sellers, save only one, are also on hand. The sole exception, as you may have guessed, is Lillian Smith's "Strange Fruit."

SERGEANT

Somewhere in Alabama, August 1

A Vicious Rule

Dear Sirs: Enclosed is a money order for five dollars, for which please send me The Nation for one year at the address given above.

Glad as I am to go to any length to receive your publication, I should not have had to send this money order, had not the officials of the branch post office in my home town rejected a packet of Nations which my mother was mailing to me. The magazine was rejected as "controversial."

Previously my family has always been able to mail me scores of issues of your magazine, and one would expect this precedent to be considered. But precedent or no precedent, it is obvious to all concerned that this restriction on information is undemocratic and politically dangerous. Be it noted that, although The Nation and The New Republic cannot be mailed, Time, The American Mercury, The American Magazine, Reader's Digest, Life, and Newsweek are distributed regularly to army units overseas. One finds them in company day rooms, post exchanges, service clubs, and libraries. Who is so foolish as to call these magazines unbiased and non-controversial?

I do not know whether the author of this vicious rule is the War Department or the Office of the Postmaster General. The regulation is founded on two absurdities: (1) the belief that there is literature or reporting which is not controversial; and (2) the belief that only non-controversial matter is needed by the soldier voter overseas, although his civilian fellow citizen or the soldier in the United States has access to opinions of all types as well as to varied sources of factual information. The very stuff of the election contest is debate and disagreement; if there were no controversy, there would be no election and no need for one.

Finally, if there is no controversy, the liberal forces will suffer most, for their strongest support is truth and sound opinion, as elaborated and studied through two thousand years of the very same controversy which an official regulation would now prohibit.

I hope you'll find time to comment on this postal ruling. T/4

Pacific Area, July 28

8 BOOKLETS BY BERTRAND RUSSELL

Bertrand Russell, the distinguished philosopher, mathematician, logician and Freethinker, recently said that he enjoyed writing booklets for E. Haldeman-Julius because he is given the fullest freedom of expression. In fact, it is only in essays written for Haldeman-Julius that Dr. Russell can give circulation to the mind-liberating thoughts he feels should be made known to the average person. Most standard publishers are afraid to issue works that are frowned on by the orthodox and conventional. Such a restriction is never encountered in the editorial department of the H-J Publications. In the booklets listed below Dr. Russell offers a feast of reason, information, logic, wit and rollicking humor. We present:

THE VALUE OF FREE THOUGHT. How to Become a Truth-Seeker and Break the Chains of Mental Slavery.	25¢
AN OUTLINE OF INTELLECTUAL RUBBISH. A Hilarious Catalogue of Organized and Individual Stupidity.	25¢
HOW TO READ AND UNDERSTAND HISTORY. The Past as the Key to the Future.	25¢
HOW TO BECOME A PHILOSOPHER, A LOGICIAN, A MATHEMATICIAN.	30¢
WHAT CAN A FREEMAN WORSHIP?	25¢
WHY I AM NOT A CHRISTIAN.	25¢
HAS RELIGION MADE USEFUL CONTRIBUTIONS TO CIVILIZATION?	25¢
A LIBERAL VIEW OF DIVORCE.	25¢

We offer all eight booklets by Bertrand Russell for only $1.45, prepaid. Ask for BERTRAND RUSSELL'S EIGHT BOOKLETS. Address:

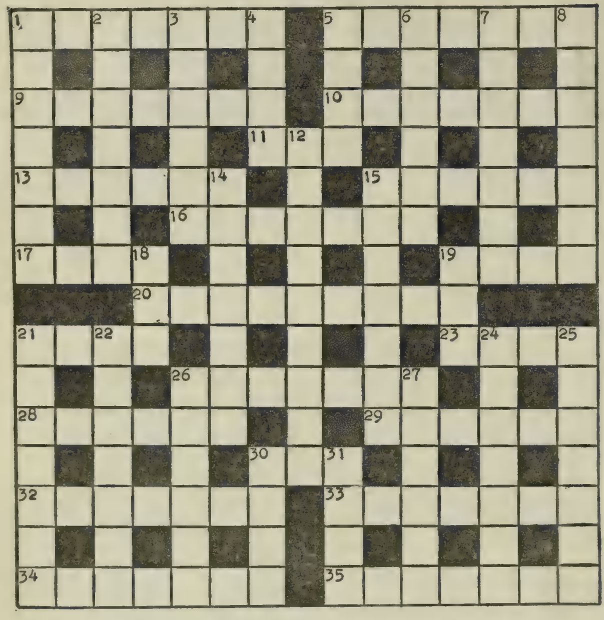
E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS,
Box R-51, Girard, Kansas.

44th Street Book Fair Gallery

To September 5
EXHIBITION OF NEW WORK
10 New York Artists
Oils . Water Colors . Drawings $5-$125
Open until 9 p.m. daily except Sunday
133 W. 44th St., near Broadway

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 77

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 We should freeze on to warm ones
5 "A little bit off the top"—but not, we hope, with this
9 More stylish in slang
10 As a sword without a button (a bit Shakespearean this)
11 There's some question as to whether it preceded the hen
13 These and lovers cry for the moon, according to Villon
15 Belgian watering-place
16 Tract that will not contract, though
17 Might stop a runaway horse
19 Black
20 Used by the carpenter to gloss things over?
21 Departed pig
23 Solo with variations abroad
26 Atrocious
28 Dickens' doctor Sam Weller calls "Mr. Sawbones"
29 Hospital accessory that ends with another
30 An object of ridicule among the masses
32 Livery
33 He rarely looks where he is going
34 "Great-hearted, brazen-voiced -------, accustomed to shout as loud as fifty other men"
35 This makes us sneer

DOWN

1 It may be Featherstonehaugh to you—it is this to the English
2 Dante's Divine Comedy, Part I
3 Does the radio effects man complain if others make them?
4 "I'll make assurance double ----, And take a bond of fate" (Macbeth)
5 It's faster [illegible] a bullet
6 A body of troops in concealment declares itself a small tree
7 Pert ant (anag.)
8 The 25th of March (hyphen, 4-3)
12 The last thing you would expect wheat fields to yield
14 Those who do this often hesitate to speak
15 The devil-fish has swallowed a top!
18 Request
19 A language without a country
21 Affected people of French extraction who produce U. S. prose
22 Whip whose name would describe the condition of your back if it were applied to it
24 "A solitary shriek, the bubbling cry of some strong ------- in his agony" (Byron)
25 Wayzgooses (or perhaps it's wayzgeese")
26 Animal, first name Billy (hyphen, 2-4)
27 "Fingers pointing towards heaven"
30 Ruler of Afghanistan, perhaps
31 The only fish, so to speak

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 76

ACROSS:—1 EVERYONE; [illegible] BORE; 10 HELEN; 11 LIE; 12 FACES; 13 PATHOS; 16 SIERRA; 17 MAUDLIN; 18 NICE; 20 BOAT; 22 APPENDS; 23 BUNK; 24 REAR; 25 POLECAT; 27 LOTION; 29 DREDGE; 34 TWIST; 35 HAP; 36 MANSE; 37 OLLA; 38 CORCORAN.

DOWN:—2 VALET; 3 RANSOM; 4 OWLS; 5 EPEE; 6 BAFFIN; 7 RACER; 8 WHIP; 9 O'SHANTER; 14 SAMPSON; 15 ADHERES; 16 SINDBAD; 18 NOBILITY; 19 CON; 21 ONE; 25 PORTIA; 26 TROMSO; 28 TRIAL; 30 DINNA; 31 EVEN; 32 CHIC; 33 SPAR.

R E S O R T S

★ STAR LAKE CAMP ★

In the Glorious Adirondacks

Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Canoeing, Swimming, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals. Dietary Laws. Rates: $35.00 a week and $37.50 per person for couples.

Send for Booklet — New York Office
320 BROADWAY Room 1301 [illegible] 7-2667
Sundays, Evenings, Holidays — PR 4-1390

FOR VACATION FUN AND REST

55 Miles from New York a vacation "heaven," breath-takingly beautiful countryside—delicious food—restful indoor activities—invigorating enjoyable outdoor sports: Tennis—swimming—ping pong—volley ball—bowling—outdoor dancing—bicycling—(horseback riding and golf nearby). You're welcome at any time and for any time. Write for booklet.

PLUM POINT
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
[illegible] Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh [illegible]

GRANITE LAKE CABINS—With private baths; Simmons beds. Water sports, excellent home cooking. Adults only, $60 a week double. Box 77, Munsonville, New Hampshire.

C H I L D R E N ' S C A M P

SMILING HILLS CAMP
EAST STROUDSBURG PENNSYLVANIA

A progressive camp for boys and girls, from [illegible] to 12 years of age. All activities. Non-sectarian. Non-regimented. Individual care. (Limited to 50 campers)
Write:
James & Nellie Dick, Modern School,
115 Cary St., Lakewood, N. J. Phone 1007

F A R M S A N D A C R E A G E

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, Chatham, New York, offers 300 New York-Massachusetts Berkshire Hills farms.

F O R S A L E

SANDS POINT, L. I.—$6,000 exceptional cottage formerly garage and living quarters. Buyer to move cottage other end of 4½ acre plot. Contractors estimate cost moving, new foundation, connect utilities, complete remodeling including two extra baths, $7,000 to $8,000. Fine trees, swimming, commuting, low taxes. P. O. 255, Fort Washington, N. Y.

L A N G U A G E S

PHONOGRAPH COURSES. BOOKLET N. Language Service, 18 East 41st St., New York City 17.

W A N T E D

LECTURER, dynamic personality. Popular subjects, large social group, N.Y.C. Series or single engagements. Moderate fee. Box 1482, c/o The Nation.

YOUNG BUSINESS COUPLE, no children, desires 3-4 room apartment. Private or apartment house, N.Y.C., near subway. Appreciates intelligent and quiet neighbors. KI 6-4352, evenings.

ARMY-WIFE and child seek home in country with couple starting September. Share expenses. Box 1481, c/o The Nation.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · AUGUST 26, 1944 NUMBER 9

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 225

EDITORIALS

France Regained 227
The War Surplus Bill 228
Rescue Hungary's Jews! by Freda Kirchwey 229

ARTICLES

Dewey's Monkey Wrench by I. F. Stone 230
Will Hague Defeat F. D. R.? by James Kerney, Jr. 232
Polls, Propaganda, and Politics 234
10 Years Ago in The Nation 234
The Trojan Horse by Karl Loewenstein 235
In the Wind 237

POLITICAL WAR

"Purifying" Italy by Gaetano Salvemini 238
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 240

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Koestler and the Political Novel by William Phillips 241
For the Third Republic by Albert Guérard 243
The Generalissimo by Agnes Smedley 246
What Americans Think by James Loeb, Jr. 247
Records by B. H. Haggin 249
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 250
CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 78 by Jack Barrett 252

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON ▪ MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act [illegible] March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

IN HIS SPEECH AT BREMERTON ON AUGUST twelfth, the President for the first time discussed the future of the Pacific bases. But he was so cautious in his approach and so sparing in details that his talk may serve chiefly to inspire loose speculation about this thorny subject. In suggesting that our interests in the Pacific require "forward bases nearer Japan than Hawaii," Mr. Roosevelt seemed to be hinting at permanent American control of the Japanese-mandated islands. That policy is, in fact, more or less taken for granted both here and abroad. What we want to know is what form that control is likely to take. Will it mean outright annexation or some kind of trusteeship which would, for instance, leave civil aviation rights in these islands open to all? With regard to the Southern Pacific islands, mostly British or French possessions, Mr. Roosevelt pointed out that they were of strategic importance in relation to the security of the Panama Canal and South America, as well as to that of Australia and New Zealand. Adding hastily that "we have no desire to ask for any possessions of the United Nations," he suggested that the problem of their protection could be solved by "friendly collaboration." Here again we feel that lack of authoritative detail gives too full a rein for interested interpretations. Some commentators on Mr. Roosevelt's speech, for instance, regard it as foreshadowing a request for perpetual leases of bases in British, French, Australian, and Dutch islands, and argue that, whatever form the cooperation of these powers took, the United States should control the defense of the whole Pacific area. We wonder if the advocates of this policy understand exactly what it would mean in terms of enlarged American responsibilities.

*

THE MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER Churchill, Marshal Tito, and Premier Subasich in Italy had a direct bearing on coming military developments in the Balkans. In Churchill's mind Tito's National Liberation Army is clearly the bridge between the Western Allies and Russia. Although Allied successes in France and Poland have diminished the importance of the Balkan front, it is still an essential part of the loop which is closing around Hitler. An Allied landing somewhere in northern or central Dalmatia may be expected at any moment. Its aim will be to cut off from Germany the dispersed German divisions in the Balkans and to separate them from the forces of the satellite nations. Turkey's new position and the imminent withdrawal of Bulgaria from the war will ease the path for the Allied armies and the Yugoslav Partisans. Tito's recent understandings with leftist and agrarian elements in Bulgaria, Greece, and Albania make him the logical center of Balkan resistance. They will facilitate Russia's descent through Rumania and Bulgaria and insure active support for Allied landings in the Adriatic aimed at the Austrian frontiers. The main blow against the Nazis will probably be concentrated in the sector between Trieste, Ljubljana, and Zagreb. Hungary, sandwiched between the Russians and Tito, can offer only weak and inefficient resistance. The Salonika front, which had such enormous importance during the last war, will not be reestablished this time. The conflict will be centered farther to the north because of Russia's advance into the Carpathians and the control by the Partisan forces of northern Yugoslavia. The Yugoslav Partisans, united with the Partisans in northern Italy and with the forces of the Maquis in southern France, form a real chain of peoples' armies holding open the door through which the Allied forces will drive to deliver the final blow to the Nazis.

*

SINCE THE BEGINNING OF AUGUST POLISH underground forces under General Bor have been battling the Germans inside Warsaw. The uprising began when the Red Army guns could be heard hammering at the suburb of Praga, but since August 3, the Poles assert, there has been no further evidence of Russian pressure. Meanwhile the Germans have regained control of much of the city and the Partisans are fighting with a growing sense of desperation. Their plight has engendered great bitterness in Polish circles which adhere to the London government-in-exile, and the accusation is being heard that the Soviets have deliberately pulled their punches on the Warsaw front. From Moscow come countercharges; the uprising, it is alleged, was timed in accordance with political rather than military strategy, with the anti-Soviet Poles seeking to gain credit for the liberation of Warsaw. Moreover, the Russians assert, the Polish government-in-exile gave the signal without any notice to the Soviet high command. This seems to be true; in fact, according to reports from London, even the British and American governments were not warned in advance. In an atmosphere of mutual suspicion it is not hard for both sides to find circumstantial evidence of bad faith. But the known facts suggest a tragic misunderstanding caused by lack of liaison. It is reasonable to assume that Bor expected the impetus of the Red Army drive would enable it to cross the Vistula at Warsaw and sought both to impede the defense of the Nazi garrison and to cut off its retreat. The Russian advance guard which struck at Praga appears, however, to have been over-extended and to have suffered a reverse. But, in any case, it is doubtful if Russian strategy called for a frontal assault on Warsaw. Red Army practice has been to outflank such obstacles, and this aim is in the process of being realized by its deep bridgehead across the Vistula a hundred miles to the south of the city.

*

PERHAPS THE ARMY DID TRY TO PUSH THE interpretation of Title V to its logical limits of absurdity. Nothing has happened in recent years that so validates the traditional army contempt for the politician as that fantastic provision which was jammed into the Soldiers' Vote Act at the behest of Senator Robert Taft. Legislation throws a great deal of light on the mind of the legislators; the Taft amendment was plainly designed to keep soldiers in the dark about the issues of the day. Because Mr. Taft and his friends are afraid of the power of ideas, they are afraid of thinking soldiers. We believe the army carried out exactly the intentions of the legislators when they banned the books, prevented English newspapers from coming into the camps in England, kept The Nation and the New Republic off the camp library shelves and out of the post exchanges. And we think that Mr. Taft and his friends got exactly what was coming to them when the general storm of protest broke over their heads. The new amendment proclaims our soldiers adult citizens, free to accept or discard the same ideas as those to which civilians are exposed, free to think about this election and the issues which they are fighting for and which the politicians are so consistently dodging.

*

WE DON'T KNOW WHAT THE DEMOCRATS would do without Senator Taft. Most Republicans would rather be caught voting for Roosevelt than admit they'd just as soon not have soldiers vote at all this year. And they would hesitate to accuse the army of conspiring to bring about a fourth term. But not Robert. He did both in one sentence of a speech he made on the Senate floor the other day, when he accused the Army of being "unduly anxious that the very moment the state ballot fails to arrive on the first of October, everyone who can possibly vote shall get a federal ballot in his hands and shall be instructed to vote it." The Senator refrained from saying "how to vote it," but that was implied in his statement that representatives of the War Deparament "cooperated 100 per cent with the extreme New Dealers and the CIO Political Action Committee" in support of a federal ballot and that the army had issued regulations which "have the soldiers organized right down to the companies and squads to vote, in a way which no political organization can hope to match." These remarks of the Republican Senator from Ohio should go far toward discouraging the whole army—including officials of the War Department as well as the last private—from voting Republican. We can hardly wait for his next move.

*

HEARINGS ON THE GEORGE BILL BEFORE THE House Ways and Means Committee have confirmed earlier indications that the Democrats are not only being sadly unrealistic regarding post-war economic policy but are missing a golden opportunity to create a vote-getting issue for themselves in the coming election. While a handful of House liberals have banded together under the leadership of Representative Celler in support of the Kilgore-Murray proposals, the majority of Democrats seems more inclined to the compromise plan suggested by War Mobilization Director James F. Byrnes. Mr. Byrnes accepts the George bill's basic proposals, that control of post-war unemployment compensation be left to the states. He suggests, however, that the federal government guarantee a minimum benefit of $20 to $25 a week for at least twenty-six weeks. From a short-term point of view this liberalization of benefits is important. Many states, including most of those in the South, now provide an average of only $10 or $12 a week for an extremely brief period. But it should be obvious to Mr. Byrnes and the other leaders of the Democratic Party that we cannot create post-war economic stability on a "states' rights" basis. We have fought this war and accepted its sacrifices on a national basis. Why should our war workers not receive equal protection and security during the transition period regardless of the part of the country in which they happen to have given their services?

France Regained

THE GERMANS have irretrievably lost France except for the rectangle which lies north and east of a line drawn from Le Havre through Paris to Belfort. This is the area which, as Charles G. Bolté pointed out last week, the enemy must hold "to protect the very approaches to Germany" and it is in immediate danger of penetration by General Patton's triumphant armor. In the rest of the country the Battle of France has become essentially a mopping-up operation, though it may be a bloody and protracted one. The German army in the south will no doubt fight delaying actions but it cannot afford to delay too long for its lines of retreat—eastward to Italy and northward to Germany—are already threatened. Isolated garrisons—and these now seem to include Marseilles and Toulon—may hold out desperately as did that at St. Malo but they must eventually surrender.

In the north-east, however, two German armies are still more or less intact—the 15th along the Channel Coast and in Belgium and the 1st behind Paris. With their backs to the Siegfried Line and with invasion of the Fatherland the penalty of defeat, they are likely to put up a fierce resistance. The decisive battles of World War II, as of World War I, may be fought out on the banks of the Aisne and the Somme, the Marne and the Meuse.

The German armies defending this area are believed to be strong in infantry but weak in armor and it seems unlikely that many of the 7th Army's tanks and guns will ever get across the Seine. That force has been effectively broken for, although a considerable part of it escaped from the trap closed south of Falaise, it is now threatened with a new encirclement as General Patton's swift columns push down the Seine valley to cut its retreat. Moreover, it is being exposed to an unprecedented pounding from the air. Beaten and disorganized, if not actually demoralized, it can be of little use in defending the vital rectangle so long as the furious pace of the Allied offensive deprives the Germans of any opportunity to rally their forces.

In a war of movement the maintenance of impetus is nine-tenths of victory. As long as the army with the initiative can keep thrusting forward, threatening first one flank and then another, the enemy is denied any chance to dig in and establish a stable line. All he can do is to fight rearguard actions and swap space for time, a disheartening experience for the best troops. And the Germans, unlike the Russians in 1941, have little space to swap: Paris is barely 200 miles from the nearest point on the German frontier. The big question now, therefore, is whether General Patton's army can thrust through and around Paris to carry its Blitz offensive onto the plains of northeastern France without a pause. If it can, the complete liberation of France will not be far distant. The answer to the question is not alone a matter of will and fighting spirit. That is in no doubt; but the army's ability to keep moving also depends on the ability of the supply services, which have hitherto performed miracles of logistics, to keep up with it.

The invading Allied army on the southern front has already established itself firmly at a surprisingly low cost in casualties. Outflanking Marseilles and Toulon its advance columns have reached Aix and are astride the great trunk road which runs north up to the Rhone valley to Lyon. In the triangle with this city at its apex and its base along the Mediterranean, there are probably no more than 6 to 8 German divisions, a very small force to hold so large an area. On the other hand, the Rhone valley, a narrow trough between two mountain ranges, would offer many opportunities for defense by the Nazis but for the fact that their positions are already outflanked. In the high and rugged country east and west of the river the Maquis—the French Forces of the Interior—have long been operating. Now they are ready for the kill and with their aid General Patch's forces should be able to turn any line the Germans may attempt to establish.

Since D-day we have learnt how ill-considered were the attempts to decry the military value of the French resistance movement. Again and again the Allied high command has paid tribute to its services. Wherever our armies go they find the French partisans already in action. They impede enemy communications, destroy his supplies, tie up his reserves, provide information about his movements. They have liberated towns and whole districts, some of them far behind the enemy lines. Above all, perhaps, they provide a psychological hazard for the Germans by their pervasive presence, depriving them of any feeling of security however far they may be from the front. A resistance movement of this kind—as the Nation has long maintained—could not exist unless it represented the majority of Frenchmen and received the general support of the population. Everywhere our armies have found that this is so and that the deep and wide division of opinion, which some pundits assured us existed in France, was a figment of wishful imaginations. And every day it becomes clearer that the Maquis does not consist of isolated groups following the whims of local leaders but is a carefully coordinated force obedient to the orders of General de Gaulle.

Nor have the fears that liberation would be the signal for horrible excesses proved well-founded. The resistance forces have been amazingly well-disciplined. In some places they have been reported as "trigger-happy" but they seem to be reserving their ammunition for the enemy. Violence against traitors has mostly been confined to shaving the heads of female collaborators—a comparatiely harmless form of safety valve for pent-up indignation. Thus after four bitter years France is regaining freedom with the aid of powerful friends but in good measure by its own efforts.

The War Surplus Bill

THE fight for full employment after the war is being lost on one sector after another. One way to achieve full employment is to maintain purchasing power through the reconversion period by the payment of adequate unemployment compensation. But the Senate has defeated the Murray-Kilgore bill and the House will probably shelve its companion measure, the Celler bill. Another weapon for the creation of a full employment economy lies in the wise disposal of government-owned surpluses of facilities, land, and goods. But the House is in the process of passing a War Property Surplus bill which will leave war surpluses securely in the hands of those who believe in scarcity economics.

This is the logical result of White House policies, which in this field have consistently appeased and served big-business forces. The appointment of Baruch and Hancock to advise on the disposal of surpluses and other reconversion problems was the first in a series of steps inevitably calculated to strengthen big business in the post-war period. The Baruch-Hancock report was followed by the appointment of Will Clayton, the world's greatest cotton merchant, a Liberty Leaguer, and a Southern reactionary, as Surplus War Property Administrator. Theoretically Congress was to guide Clayton by passing legislation laying down the basic policies for the disposal of war surpluses. Actually Clayton has been guiding Congress. The Colmer bill being passed by the House was drafted by a committee appointed by Clayton, and the right-wing coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats which rules the House has succeeded in defeating every amendment designed to safeguard small business in the disposal of surpluses and to make these surplus properties an instrument for the achievement of full employment.

These surpluses will probably amount to more than 100 billions of dollars when the war is over and might be a means of combating inflation, of ending monopoly, and of encouraging genuine enterprise in every area of our economy in the post-war period. This makes it correspondingly important for big-business interests to keep control of these surpluses securely in their own hands, which they have so far succeeded in doing. The CIO Political Action Committee proposed that the sale of government plants be conditioned on "a guaranty that the purchaser will fully utilize its entire productive capacity." Maury Maverick of the Smaller War Plants Corporation has suggested that surplus goods be sold in small lots to give smaller business men a chance to bid on them and that big war plants be subdivided for use by small enterprises. The National Farmers' Union has asked that the eight million acres of disposable land held by the government be sold in such a way as to encourage the small family farm by integrating the sale with the tenant-purchase program of the Farm Security Administration. None of these proposals stands a ghost of a chance unless labor and progressive forces make themselves felt much more strongly in the Senate than they have in the House.

Some hope of getting rid of Clayton was held out by the testimony of Assistant Attorney General Norman Littell, chief of the Lands Division of the Department of Justice, before the Truman Committee last week. Littell declared that Clayton ignored the advice of an interdepartmental advisory committee and followed the advice of the National Association of Real Estate Boards in turning disposition of farm lands over to the RFC instead of the Department of Agriculture. In doing so, Clayton provided for the use of brokers. "This decision is wrong," Littell told the committee. "Brokers are interested in high prices. You want small farmers on the land. The government ought to see that they get back to the land. The broker is not interested in social policy. His natural customer is the big industrial farmer." But Clayton represents the big industrial farmer as he does big business generally. And as long as a man of his background is in charge of surplus-property disposal, no other policy can be expected.

Rescue Hungary's Jews!

By FREDA KIRCHWEY

SEVERAL million Jews in Central and Eastern Europe have met their death as a result of Nazi ferocity and Allied indifference. Millions of non-Jews have died, too, murdered as hostages or killed in guerrilla fighting or victims of the policy of depopulation practiced in every conquered country. But the Jews have died as Jews, selected for obliteration to satisfy the race mania that underlies the whole dogma of Teutonic fascism.

Done in cold blood, on a scale more impressive than any battlefield can equal, in centers specially constructed for extermination, this systematic murder of a race is without example in history. It is too vast and too terrible for the normal mind to grasp; indeed this is its protection. People react with anger to individual acts of cruelty; they hardly react at all to the impersonal horror of mass murder.

Perhaps this accounts in part for the indifference in official Allied circles which permitted the Nazi terror to mount to its present almost complete and perfect climax. It is untrue to say that little could have been done, once the war was started, to save the Jews of Europe. Much could have been done. At most stages Hitler was willing to permit his Jewish victims to substitute migration for deportation and death. But the other countries refused to take in refugees in sufficient numbers to reduce by more than a fraction the roll of those destined to die.

The planned, systematized slaughter of Jews has now been going on for two years, but not even during this period has the tempo of rescue been speeded up. Instead, our government and the British have called conferences to discuss the problem, have set up committees, have issued warnings and appeals. And the Nazis have gone on killing Jews at the rate of about 12,000 a day.

Now, as Hitler nears the end of his fraying rope, a final opportunity has opened to save some of the Jews still in Hungary. How many are involved nobody seems to know. Three or four hundred thousand were recently deported by the Horthy government at the demand of the Nazis, but several hundred thousand more probably survive. Through the International Red Cross, the Hungarian government has offered to release three specific categories of Jews: all children under ten years of age; all Jews who can obtain British certificates of admission to Palestine; and all who hold valid visas for other "countries of reception." In rather cautious terms, the British and American governments have accepted the offer. According to an announcement issued by the State Department, they "will make arrangements for the care of such Jews leaving Hungary who have reached neutral or United Nations territory, and also . . . will find temporary havens of refuge where such people may live in safety." Nothing is said about Palestine. Nothing is said about helping the Jews to escape from Hungary or about transporting them to the "havens of refuge" promised in the statement. It is a long way from Budapest to Oswego, N. Y.

But even a qualified acceptance of responsibility is welcome after years of inaction. The need of this moment is a clear understanding of the urgency of the situation. We must demand of our governments all speed in putting their good intentions into effect. If the Allied powers fail now to carry through a great act of rescue, their promise will have been sheer cruelty.

It is known that the Hungarian offer, limited though it was, enraged the Nazi authorities. At any time the Gestapo may begin the job of extermination in Hungary itself. Only swift action can prevent this. The first need is the immediate establishment of ports of asylum, if these are not already in existence. (Will the British really refuse admission to Palestine, even on a temporary basis, to a substantial proportion of the Hungarian refugees?) The second need is means of transportation. The feeble efforts so far undertaken to rescue Jews from Rumania have all but failed through lack of available ships.

Somehow, somewhere, ships must be found for this emergency. Troopships which have delivered their loads at Mediterranean ports could be diverted for a single errand of mercy. Transport planes returning from India or the Eastern Mediterranean could carry out of Hungary the 10,000 children to whom Sweden has offered shelter. (They should be lent or leased to Sweden for the job.) The objection will be raised that such operations would upset the schedules of troop movements and the delivery of supplies. This cannot be denied. But the problem is one of balancing need against need. A spell of bad weather would also upset schedules. The last opportunity to save half a million or more lives cannot be treated as a matter of minor concern. If the death of these people is of sufficient importance to Hitler to warrant the expenditure of the men and machines and time required for their extermination, their life should be worth something to Hitler's enemies. But we must hurry, hurry! To delay for even a few days or weeks is to deliver them to the fate that has all but wiped out the Jewish community of Europe.

Dewey's Monkey Wrench

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, August 19

MR. HULL held a special "off-the-record" press conference here Thursday morning and spoke extemporaneously for an hour about the Dumbarton Oaks conference. I didn't get back from New York in time to attend it but I read the transcript at the State Department last night and I must confess that I was impressed. The Secretary does not speak well. He does not express himself clearly. He rambles and blithers. But I could not help feeling a deep sincerity in what he said, an intense desire to do what he can toward a permanent peace. He is at an age when a man is beyond personal or political ambition, and he wants very much not to fail. As an experienced politician, he is appalled, not merely by the task of conciliating diverse national points of view but by the even greater difficulty of making the public understand the problem and keeping its febrile mind focused upon it long enough to make solution possible.

At one point in the transcript a desperate sense of urgency made him unusually articulate and eloquent, and since this was pencilled "on the record" I quote it. "I wish," Mr. Hull said, "I could burn this into your minds and memories for the next fifty years at least, and that is, the human race this hour, this day, this week, this year is confronted by the gravest crisis in all its experience and that we who are here on this scene of action at this critical time have the responsibility of saying what way the world is going for fifty years to come." It is no moment for perfectionism, for political intransigence, or for ivory-tower blueprints. To create an entente with some measure of permanence among states so diverse as capitalist America, imperialist Britain, Communist Russia, and Kuomintang China, and to fit this entente into some kind of world organization satisfactory to lesser powers, is the most formidable political task of all history. It commands charity and forbearance and it requires compromise, but no one with the slightest imagination will fail to understand the dreadful necessity of groping our way, however blunderingly, toward a more stable world order.

It would be wise not to expect more than the most limited progress toward a new order at the Dumbarton Oaks conference. The principal participants are distinctly minor figures, in official position as in personal capacity, but they may succeed in clearing away some of the lesser problems. There is great disappointment here that the Soviet Union is sending neither Litvinov nor Vishinsky to the conference and that its principal spokesman will be Ambassador Gromyko. Some conclude from this that Moscow is not too interested in Dumbarton Oaks but I think they are wrong. I am inclined to believe that nowhere is the problem of creating a new world order being examined with greater care, sobriety, and sincerity than in the U. S. S. R. I was encouraged by a conversation reported "off the record" in the Hull transcript. The conversation took place abroad. I suspect it was at Moscow. The tone was far different from the "cynical power politics" to which Governor Dewey referred in his statement on the Dumbarton Oaks conference.

Governor Dewey agrees that Germany and Japan must "be wholly and conclusively defeated," that they must be "rendered permanently powerless to renew tyranny and attack," that to insure this the United States, the U. S. S. R., Britain, and China "must maintain their present unity." He agrees that the responsibility for keeping Germany and Japan disarmed "cannot immediately be delegated to a world-wide organization while such an organization is yet new and untried." He says he has consequently advocated the maintenance for some time after the war of close military cooperation among the four powers so that if the Germans or the Japanese hereafter seek to evade their disarmament, we may strike quickly, together, and with overwhelming might."

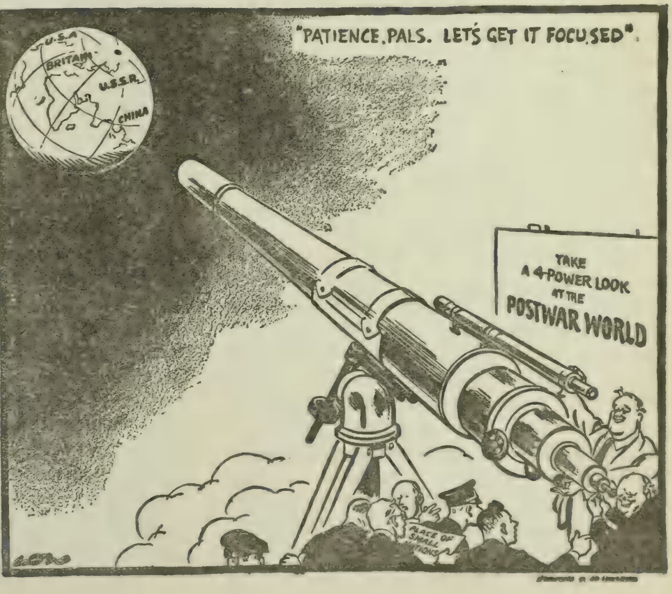
But since neither Germany nor Japan is likely to venture a new war, or to be in a position to do so, for a decade or two at least, one would like to know what Dewey means by "some time after the war." One would like to know what alternative mechanism he has in mind to enable us to "strike quickly . . . and with overwhelming might" in the event of a renewed attempt at aggression ten or twenty years hence. To say that we cannot leave the maintenance of peace "to the sanction of force alone" and that we "must promote a world opinion that will influence the nations to right conduct" will pleasantly remind the German General Staff of Warren G Harding's plea for "a new relationship to commit the moral forces of the world, America included, to peace and international justice." The new relationship turned out to be the old isolationism, and even the most determined American isolationist has never refused to give the rest of the world the benefit of this kind of high moral preachment.

Governor Dewey says that to leave "the long-term solution of international problems . . . exclusively in the hands of a permanent military alliance of four victorious powers would be immoral." If it could effectively maintain world peace, it wouldn't be half as "immoral" as drifting in a lukewarm sea of platitudes to World War III. The key word is "exclusively," which begs the question, like the rest of Dewey's statement. No one proposes to leave the long-term solution of international problems "exclusively" to a permanent military alliance of the big four. Dewey says he is "deeply disturbed" by "some of the recent reports" about the Dumbarton Oaks conference which seem to him to "indicate" a plan to "subject the nations of the world, great and small, permanently to the coercive power of the four nations holding this conference." This, too, is a straw man of Dewey's own making.

If the big four fall apart, the chances of maintaining world peace will be slim. If they stay together, does that constitute the "cynical peace" (to which Dewey objects) in which four powers "dominate the earth by force"? "As Americans," he says, "we believe with all our hearts in the equality and the rights of small nations. . . ." This is true of small nations not within our own sphere of influence. Most American governments have given a strong imperialist twist to the Monroe Doctrine, and even the American progressive is unlikely to let abstract concern for the equality of small nations override considerations of hemispheric security. What would we say to a fascist putsch in a Central American country where we suspected German influence at work? What would Dewey and his party say about the equality of small nations if Cuba expropriated American sugar mills and utility companies? What does Dewey mean when he links his plea for the smaller powers to the statement that "peace is a task of cooperation among equal and sovereign nations"? Does it mean that Sweden should have an equal voice with the United States in deciding what to do about Argentina? Does it mean the majority principle in international councils or the old rule of unanimity which crippled the League of Nations? Dewey nowhere gets down to the real issues.

No one knows just what Dewey was talking about. It is believed that he had in mind the proposals for a new international security organization put forward by N. Malinin in Zvezda, the Leningrad organ of the Union of Soviet Writers. I have obtained the full text of this article, significantly enough from the State Department, and I must say the sober and moderate ideas put forward by the Russian resemble very little the caricature so loftily denounced by Dewey. One of the factors to which Malinin, like most observers, attributes the failure of the League was the necessity for a unanimous vote in the Assembly. He agrees with President Hambro of the Norwegian Parliament "that in the future each tiny state cannot be allowed to impose an absolute veto or enjoy the right to dictate to the great powers, even if only in a negative fashion, how they must act." Malinin recalls that four small states, Switzerland, Australia, Hungary, and Albania, blocked economic sanctions against Italy during the Ethiopian war. He suggests that in the future international organization the rule of unanimity be replaced by majority vote on minor questions, a two-thirds vote on "more important decisions imposing serious obligations." Does Dewey consider majority rule coercive of the smaller nations? Does he favor the rule of unanimity?

Malinin believes that the future protection of peace against renewed aggression will require (1) quick action, (2) more than a special international police force, and (3) specific understandings among the great powers. "It is quite apparent that in all cases in which the League displayed its inactivity," Malinin says, "only the great powers, singly, in groups, or together, could have halted aggression. It must not be forgotten also that decisions regarding effective repelling of aggression must



"PATIENCE, PALS. LET'S GET IT FOCUSED".
U.S.A.
BRITAIN
U.S.S.R.
CHINA
TAKE A 4-POWER LOOK AT THE POSTWAR WORLD
PLACE OF SMALL NATIONS

be adopted and carried out in the briefest possible time, taking into account the fact that in the modern age wars are begun by aggressors without preliminary warning and that preparation for them proceeds under cover of the deepest secrecy. . . . Again, it is only the great powers . . . which have the necessary military and industrial resources. And they cannot be replaced by any union of small states, which would be shattered by the aggressor one by one." This is realism, not cynicism. If the peace of the world is to be entrusted to a kind of world diet, Polish style, in which any one member can veto action, we might as well begin preparing now for World War III.

Dewey, who was for an Anglo-American alliance to police the world, now warns us not to sink into "the abyss of power politics." A world order in which the big four played a dominant role would be "the rankest form of imperialism." The spokesman of American finance capital thunders out against "reactionary" purposes and the ex-isolationist wants a perfect world society "of cooperation and joint effort . . . based on freedom, equality, and justice." Provided it can be achieved by pulpiteering. Dewey's statement, taking into account its content, timing, and shoddy vagueness, seemed designed primarily to rally the Polish and other national minority votes for the G. O. P. ticket. That incidentally it might throw a monkey wrench into the Four Power Meeting was a risk the Republican candidate cheerfully accepted. However, his foreign policy adviser, Mr. Dulles, appears to have realized the irresponsibility of such tactics and, to mix a metaphor, has volunteered to pull Mr. Dewey's monkey wrench out of the fire.

Will Hague Defeat F.D.R.?

BY JAMES KERNEY, JR.

MAYOR FRANK HAGUE of Jersey City is a millstone around the neck of President Roosevelt. And the President probably will pay for the heavy weight of the Democratic overlord with New Jersey's sixteen electoral votes.

Three times President Roosevelt has carried New Jersey with strong help from the well-oiled machine of Mayor Hague. In 1940 the vote in Hague's own Hudson County was the deciding factor. The machine there ran up a 101,000-vote plurality, while Roosevelt carried New Jersey by only 72,000. That is the explanation for the President's feeling that he needs Hague. But Hague needs the President too, this year, for Hague is being pushed hard in his home state.

It is difficult for anyone outside New Jersey to understand the tremendous power Hague wields. Even some Jerseymen have been hard to convince. But those who live in the narrow confines of Hudson County, with its million people directly across the river from New York City, have a clear knowledge of what it means to buck "the Hall," as Hague's machine is known.

The best example of the penalty for fighting Hague on his home grounds is John R. Longo, successor to a long line of independents who either have been beaten into submission or have allied themselves with Hague in self-defense. Longo is a young Italian who rose to prominence by attacking Hague's machine as an independent Republican. In 1942, in the course of battling the Hague organization, Governor Edison appointed Longo Deputy County Clerk of Hudson County. Shortly after this appointment, Longo was indicted by a Hudson County Grand Jury for fraudulently altering his voting record. The trial was filled with perjury, some of it so open as to be outright scandalous on its face. At present under appeal to the New Jersey Supreme Court, the Longo case is by no means settled. With the active backing of Governor Edison, Longo has produced evidence indicating that the Hague prosecutors knew by the testimony of their own handwriting expert that their charge had no basis.

Such a miscarriage of justice could occur only where the political machine owned the courts. Hague has for years manipulated the juries, prosecutors, judges, election boards, and tax assessors of Hudson County. They were outright agents of the machine, and powerful ones. Any critic of His Honor was likely to find his tax assessment raised, his right to vote impugned, and he was lucky, indeed, if he wasn't arrested for fraudulent voting, or gambling, or any of a dozen other offenses.

On the other hand, members of the organization found their taxes lowered and had a soft time in their contacts with government. No member in good standing ever suffered from all the petty charges of violating city ordinances which fill the lives of ordinary city dwellers. The precinct leader took care of that. However, it was chiefly through control of tax assessments and voting records that Hague maintained his domination. Of course, he realized the need for delivering something positive. Jersey City maintains one of the finest and certainly the most expensive police departments of any large American city. Excellent, though costly to the taxpayers, are the hospitals at the disposal of all citizens. Jersey City, its ruling mayor likes to say, is a people free from vice. By vice His Honor means loose women. Hudson County has for a long time been the center of organized horse-race gambling in America. But by the simple process of expulsion, Jersey City is kept free from gangsters.

So great is the fear of Hague in Jersey City that everyone has learned not to oppose his wishes. And so much does this affect election returns that it has not been uncommon for voting districts to register three hundred votes for Democratic candidates and one vote for the opposition, despite the fact that there were two Republicans standing watch at the polling place even if no others turned up.

The Longo case, incidentally, offers evidence of the strange and strong tie-up between the Hague machine and the Administration. Satisfied that Longo was abused, Governor Edison a few days before leaving office asked Attorney General Biddle to investigate the civil-liberties aspect of the case. A month ago the Attorney General answered in a public statement, conveniently coinciding with the hearing of Longo's appeal before the New Jersey Supreme Court, in which half-truths and omitted facts were used to prove that there was never any doubt of Longo's guilt. It seemed apparent that a Presidential election year was no time to start cleaning up Hague.

The cleansing job, nevertheless, is under way. Charles Edison started it in 1940 when he resigned as Secretary of the Navy and was elected to a three-year term as Governor of New Jersey. For three years he battled Hague, always finding his way blocked by the pro-Hague Republicans from small, rural counties of South Jersey, who controlled the legislature through a rotten-borough system. Governor Edison was never entirely successful, but he dented Hague badly, partly by replacing the Hudson County Tax Board, which had been responsible for outrageous abuses in tax assessments, and even more by promoting the need for a new state constitution in New Jersey. Hague hates the suggestion of this change, although Woodrow Wilson and every Governor of New Jersey since has, at one time or another, suggested the need for revision. But Hague finds the present system fine. His followers have populated the bench and frequently gotten to be Governor, and he has never had too much trouble persuading the legislature to do what he wanted.

As Edison left office last January, his place was taken by an old-line Republican, Walter E. Edge, who had been Governor of New Jersey during the first World War and subsequently had been in the United States Senate and served as Ambassador to France. Edge returned from virtual retirement, welded the Republican Party into a unit, which it had not been for years, and laid out a progressive program which surprised the people who expected him to be a stodgy Old Guardsman.

In his first few months in office Governor Edge reorganized the Hudson County election and jury systems, and replaced Hague's men in the prosecutor's office and on the Hudson County bench. Worst of all, carrying the fight to Hague's heart, Edge pushed a new constitution through the legislature, and New Jersey voters will have a chance this November to replace their decrepit old document with a new basic law simplifying the courts, limiting the legislature's power, and strengthening the executive officers. These changes hurt Hague badly. He is fighting the new constitution with everything he's got. But since Edge stripped him he hasn't got as much as he used to have. Now he is dependent on federal patronage to boost his chances. He hopes to ride to victory on Roosevelt's coat-tails.

It was obvious, then, that Hague would take his forces in Chicago wherever the Roosevelt leadership wanted them to go. If the President was for Wallace, so was Hague. If Truman got the nod, it was fine and maybe better with the boss of New Jersey Democracy.

The only hitch, from the point of view of Roosevelt's supporters, is that the President is still saddled with Hague. He cannot have Hague's support, without bearing the stigma that goes with it.

Four years ago, when Roosevelt won by 72,000 votes in New Jersey, Edison was elected Governor by 65,000. In 1942, Albert Hawkes, a Republican big-business man, was elected United States Senator over the incumbent William H. Smathers by a 90,000 majority. The biggest campaign issue was Hagueism. Last year Governor Edge was elected by a majority of 125,000. Even worse was the beating Hague took on the referendum proposing the draft of a new state constitution. Hague lost that one by 150,000, and just about the only issue of the campaign was Hagueism.

This year Hague cannot deliver as he has in the past. The Hudson County election machinery is in new hands. The prosecutor's office won't arrest Republican election workers on election day, and the new county judges will not spend their time November 7 issuing dozens of funny and too often phony writs. Hague will still carry his home county, but the votes won't pile up as high as they once did. In addition, Hagueism has become a big issue in the national campaign, as far as New Jersey is concerned.

Unless the Roosevelt forces strain every effort, campaigning as never before, New Jersey is lost. The smart strategists working for Dewey have already started to pound the Hague-Roosevelt alliance. They can be counted on to make the most of an issue which now interests more Jerseymen than ever. The independents, always hard to decipher, expressed their approval of a new constitution last November. Every sock Hague takes at the new constitution drives more voters into the Dewey camp. Unless the trend is changed, and quickly, New Jersey will return a majority of more than 100,000 for the Republican ticket this November.

Polls, Propaganda, and Politics

Women in the Election

IN THE course of the campaign much attention is paid to the people who don't know for whom they intend to vote, but whose decisions will supposedly be crucial in the election. Actually, these people are important only in a closely contested election where 1 or 2 per cent means victory or defeat. In general, if the "Don't Knows" in the public opinion polls do vote, they will distribute their votes approximately like the people who have already made up their minds earlier.

These undecided citizens are mostly women. There are about three times as many "Don't Knows" among them as among men. This column made a special poll among two thousand five hundred women, representing a fair sample of large industrial cities in the North. About half of these women did not intend to vote or had not yet decided for whom to vote. Women who have jobs are slightly more willing to vote than the housewives, and indecision increases slightly with lower economic status.

The latent disposition of the undecided can be inferred from the intentions of women who have made up their minds. As far as big industrial centers go, Roosevelt's lead is very strong and easily stratified by economic status. The sample was divided into three strata: the upper income group, 30 per cent; the middle income group, 40 per cent, and the lower income group, 30 per cent. Eighty-five per cent in the lower group intend to vote for Roosevelt and 73 per cent in middle group. Even women in the upper group who have made up their minds intend to go 50 per cent for Roosevelt. This is true only for the large-city sample. It is well known that as one proceeds to smaller towns and then to farm areas, the proportion of Republicans increases.

Among these women one finds again a clear-cut relation between age and vote intention. Younger ones are more likely to vote for Roosevelt. If forty is taken as the dividing age, Dewey is 10 per cent more popular with the older group than with the younger. It will be interesting to see whether the argument of the Republicans that they are the party of young men will influence this age difference between Republicans and Democrats.

With millions of men in the armed forces, women constitute the majority of eligible voters and are of prime concern to both parties. It is therefore interesting to turn to an opinion poll conducted by the Woman's Home Companion. The data are based on mail returns from two thousand readers who are questioned periodically. The panel is certainly not a representative cross-section of American women. Still, on topics where their opinions are very marked, the results of the last year can offer useful leads for party managers.

The outstanding attitude shown by these women is internationalism. They were asked, "Should there be a permanent congress to act upon international disputes?" and 92 per cent said, "Yes." Then they were asked, "Should we grant such a body the power and means to enforce its decisions?" and 95 per cent said, "Yes." When asked about nine possible planks for party platforms, the highest agreement (93 per cent of those with opinions) was on a world congress for international disputes. Even when internationalism was brought down to sacrifices for their own families ("Would you be willing to accept rationing and food restrictions after the war to help feed foreign nations?") the accord was still 92 per cent. On these questions, in samples of the total population, 70 to 80 per cent usually approve.

Last week we reported a comparison between the AIPO (Gallup) estimate that in June 51 per cent of the already-decided major-party vote was Democratic and the Fortune (Roper) estimate (same time, same basis) 56 per cent. Since then the Fortune estimate has receded slightly to 53 per cent, July 8, and 54.5 per cent, August 5. (Figures in the Fortune press release have been adjusted to correspond with our consistent practice of including within 100 per cent only the people who made a choice). The most striking change has been in the proportion of undecided voters, which Fortune reported as 21 per cent in June, 8 per cent in July, and 3.6 per cent in August. The attitude type of question, "Which do you want for President?", used by Fortune in August, got many fewer "don't know" answers than the AIPO question, "How would you vote?".

BUREAU OF APPLIED SOCIAL RESEARCH
Columbia University, New York

10 Years Ago in "The Nation"

AGAIN FRANCE IS HOVERING on the verge of a crisis. Herriot and Tardieu—the liberal and conservative antipodes in the Doumergue Cabinet—are threatening each other with vengeance and destruction and the weak structure of the present government bids fair to crack under the impact of their blows.—August 1, 1934.

FOR MANY YEARS the Wisconsin Progressives have exerted their efforts within the Republican Party, seeking to capture its nominations and write its platform. Therefore, their recent decision to break away from the Republican Party and form a party of their own is of national interest and significance.—August 1, 1934.

THERE IS ONE IMPORTANT, and really encouraging, difference between the Europe of 1914 and the Europe of 1934. There is one Great Power today which is bound by no alliances, secret or open, which is genuinely determined not to become involved in a world war which would spell defeat or set-back of a domestic program to which it is passionately devoted, a Power which all the other Great Powers in varying degrees hate and fear. Soviet Russia, of course. Soviet Russia is the chief check-rein on Western Europe today; the only encouraging feature in a sky which otherwise looks so much more troubled than the horizon of 1914.—LEWIS S. GANNETT, August 8, 1934.

The Trojan Horse

BY KARL LOEWENSTEIN

THE Atlantic Charter has lost, under the impact of bitter realities, so much of its lustre that instead of being the cornerstone of a saner future it might become an insurmountable obstacle to durable reconstruction. Particularly objectionable appears Article Three, which grants to "every people the right to choose the form of government under which they will live."

The term self-determination has a double connotation. It means external self-determination, the sovereign right of a people or nation to form its own state, and it means internal self-determination, the likewise absolute right of a people when constituted as a sovereign state to organize itself internally as it sees fit.

It is submitted here that there is no absolute right of internal self-determination, and consequently, that the victorious states must be prepared to claim, and must be permitted to exercise, the right of intervention in the internal affairs of any state which "chooses" a "form of government" constituting by its nature and potential development a threat to their own security and to universal peace. This thesis is in head-on collision with firmly established theory and practice. For more than a century no responsible authority has dared to challenge the equality, sovereignty, and independence of states as the premises of the law of nations. Non-interference with the form of government of other nations is the logical corollary. Intervention in the internal affairs of another state is anathema to liberal international thinking.

Yet it may repay us to look into the little-known origins and antecedents of the doctrine. It is no older than the French Revolution, which proclaimed it as a measure of political warfare against the attacks of monarchical Europe. But in their own practices the missionaries of the democratic trinity of liberty, equality, fraternity gave it no more than lip-service. Napoleon, executor of the testament of the revolution, discarded it altogether and pushed governments like pawns over the European chessboard. Likewise the Holy Alliance most emphatically repudiated the right of internal self-determination. In order to stabilize the peace of Europe, Metternich and Alexander asserted the right to intervene in the internal government of any state within their sphere of influence in case their chosen form of government, legitimate monarchy, was threatened by "revolution," that is by liberal, democratic, or Jacobin movements. The tide turned again when Britain, in the once famous and now forgotten "Instructions" of Lord Castlereagh of January 19, 1821, disassociated itself from legitimacy. Castlereagh's successor, Canning, pointedly answered Metternich and Alexander: "Each nation for itself and God for us all." England thus became the liberal champion of internal self-determination and non-intervention, an honorable position which it has held ever since, with occasional slight deviations of imperialistic tinge. The bad odor which clings to the concept of intervention in the internal affairs or the "form of government" of other nations dates from its application in the anti-liberal policies of the Holy Alliance.

In the age of nationalism the new doctrine of non-intervention spread irresistibly over Europe and the world. Our version was the Monroe Doctrine (1823). Internal and external self-determination were fused into one. Political laissez faire became the credo of liberalism, the Gibraltar of international law and practice. Not even the most revolting outrages of a depraved government against its own people or against a defenseless minority would justify what the theorists like to style "humanitarian intervention." Persecution of Poles, Hungarians, Armenians, Jews evoked at best paper protests of public opinion abroad.

Our recent relations with the Latin-American states have been based on the solemn mutual undertaking of non-intervention in external and internal affairs as repeatedly stipulated in international treaties (Montevideo, 1933; Buenos Aires, 1936; Lima, 1938) and scrupulously observed by us. Likewise the Covenant of the League of Nations, which was to consist only of "fully self-governing" states (Article 1), bowed to the principle of strict indifference to the internal affairs of the member states. In indiscriminate generosity it gathered to its bosom unashamed or camouflaged dictatorships as well as democracies.

But, it may be asked, are we really to remain impervious to the tragic experience of our age? Hecatombs of innocent victims have been sacrificed because the despots were permitted, under protection of the dogma of internal self-determination, to extinguish the freedom of their own people and then to turn their loathsome practices of internal lawlessness against other nations.

It is axiomatic that the conduct of foreign policy is dependent on the internal form of government. Only governments are aggressive, not peoples. Peaceful peoples take to the sword only when they are attacked; they do not attack themselves. The common man is peace-loving and does not wish to go to war and die. It is incontrovertible that since the Napoleonic period all major international wars have been started by authoritarian monarchies or dictatorships which internally had succeeded in enslaving their own peoples, depriving the common man of his birthright to repudiate his government and war.

Therefore, it must be insisted that after this war there shall be no autocratic governments which, befogging the minds of their muzzled people by unopposed propaganda, can drag them and us into war. Peace and the democratic form of government are indivisible and inseparable. The world has become too small and nations too technologically interdependent to allow the peaceful living together of two systems of government so diametrically opposed as are democracy and autocracy. The League of Nations failed because it was impossible to square the circle and reconcile, within one and the same organizational frame, democratic governments believing in the rule of law internally and internationally, and autocracies which believed that they could practice violence externally because they could perpetrate it with impunity internally. Lincoln's word that the union cannot be half slave and half free holds true today for the wider union of the community of nations.

It is a salutary sign of a growing consciousness of this trouble that the President of the United States in his Lincoln's Birthday address of 1943 modified the rigor of the doctrine as follows: "The right of self-determination included in the Atlantic Charter does not carry with it the right of any government to commit wholesale murder, or the right to make slaves of its own people or of any other people in the world." But it is bewildering, to put it mildly, to read in Mr. Churchill's address of May 24, 1944, that while Germany cannot claim any rights from the Atlantic Charter, other states may choose whatever form of government they please. "The internal political arrangements in Spain are a matter for the Spaniards themselves. It is not for us to meddle in these affairs as a government." This attitude would preclude a repetition of the calamitous error committed in 1918, when the Germans promptly turned the Fourteen Points to their own advantage; but, at the same time, it would stabilize fascism and dictatorship elsewhere. Great Britain, thus, seems unable to divest itself of a dogma which, if applied, would once more split the world into incompatible systems of government. Does it mean also that the authoritarian-minded cliques-in-exile, who happen formally to represent peoples allied with us, derive from the Atlantic Charter the right to continue, after the liberation, their anti-democratic regimes? Royal dictatorship is as odious as its Caesarist counterpart.

The customary objection to interference with the internal organization of other states is that "we cannot ram our form of government down the throats of other nations." It is true that no constitution imposed by force from outside will work. Some argue that certain nations are given to authority by nature, or at least by historic habit. But the contention that any people has freely and of its own volition "chosen" autocracy is a palpable historical untruth. The peoples of the world did not choose their autocratic monarchs, nor did they choose their dictators. Even Hitler, on March 5, 1933, obtained not more than 44 per cent of the votes and this only by unprecedented election terror. In the same Lincoln's Birthday address quoted above, President Roosevelt declared: "No nation in all the world that is free to make a choice is going to set itself up under the Fascist form of government or the Nazi form of government. Such forms of government are the offspring of seizure of power followed by the abridgement of freedom." (Italics mine.)

Herein lies, in this writer's opinion, the key to the solution. Democratic and constitutional government should not be imposed by command from without, but it should be given a chance to grow from within by popular acceptance. If we are not to ram democracy down the throats of other peoples, we may, for a change, allow them to develop it. The majority of the people everywhere want autocracy as little as they want war. We must make the peoples themselves the custodians of their own freedom and their own form of government.

In order to translate the basic postulate of limiting the choice of the form of government to the democratic solution the following suggestions, tentatively formulated, are submitted:

(1) Each of the defeated Axis nations and its satellites is to undertake in the armistice or peace treaty the obligation to arrange, at a time to be determined by the United Nations, elections for a Constituent Assembly charged with the elaboration of a constitution for which the democratic-constitutional form of government is mandatory. No specific conditions as to the type of constitutional order should be imposed except that the government must correspond to the rationally ascertained will of the people and must at all times remain accountable to it.

(2) Elections are to be held under the control of the United Nations, or of an international police if by that time it has been created. Certain categories of discredited people, such as Nazi officials, prominent sympathizers, notorious turncoats, collaborationists, and so on, are to be excluded from eligibility by law. Nor are parties with anti-democratic platforms, leaders, or techniques permissible.

(3) The elaboration of the constitution is subject to supervision by what may be called here, for want of a better term, "the Inter-Allied Constitutional Control Commission." It has the right and the duty to veto such provisions as constitute a potential danger to the operation of a democratic form of government.

(4) The constitution must contain a democratic Bill of Rights endowed with the same validity as the constitution itself. Among its provisions must be included a new individual freedom, namely the right of the citizen "to participate in his government by democratic elections." This right is indispensable to make the citizens the permanent keepers of their own freedoms, and, simultaneously, to guarantee all other individual and social freedoms, which are operative and secure only in a democratic-constitutional state.

(5) At the request of the Inter-Allied Constitutional Control Commission the constitution adopted by the National Assembly is to be submitted to popular ratification. If a nation should fail to elect a National Assembly whose majority is sincerely pledged to democracy, or to write for itself a democratic constitution, or to ratify it by at least a two-thirds majority, it would indicate beyond reasonable doubt that such a nation is not qualified for self-government and thus cannot enjoy internal self-determination.

The Inter-Allied Constitutional Control Commission shall continue to operate as the "watchdog," with teeth in its mouth, over internal political developments until such time as it has satisfied itself that a government is firmly established and conducted in conformity with the principles of the constitutional, democratic state.

Technical details of this plan—of which there are many—cannot be discussed here. What is proposed is no more and no less than a political tutelage over certain nations, the duration of which will depend entirely on the nation itself. It is readily admitted that the plan is incompatible with the dogma of internal self-determination in its traditional sense. But it is not incompatible with the dignity of any nation which embraces the democratic way of life and, what is more important, adheres to it. Repentance must precede forgiveness. Public opinion seems agreed upon imposing on the aggressor nations and their satellites certain military, economic, and financial restrictions—such as disarmament, financial controls, raw materials only for peace requirements—as essential curbs on external and internal self-determination. Compared to these merely negative conditions, the plan outlined here appears positive and constructive. It will enable a nation to redeem itself by its own efforts and to regain, with its self-respect, the confidence of other nations. But the first step toward this goal is to dispel the myth that every nation has an inalienable right to choose the form of government it pleases.

In the Wind

IN VIEW of the official Dewey position that it is easy for soldiers to vote without benefit of the quick federal ballot, some Republican should have had enough political sense to kill this ad that appeared in the Charlotte, N. C., News: "It is 10,000 miles to New Guinea, so it will take months to get your soldier's or sailor's absentee ballot out there and back. HURRY! HURRY! HURRY! Apply for his absentee ballot right away. Get your official forms and information at the Dewey-For-President Club."

THE STATE, Columbia, S. C., is a newspaper of unimpeachable conservatism; its editor, Sam Latimer, is a native South Carolinian who could not by any stretch of language be called a Negrophile or a Northern Agitator. Therefore we consider this brief editorial a notable straw in the wind: "Without reference to any pending case, which, like all others, must be decided on merit, as judged by prescribed authority, we wish to say that in our opinion those Negro teachers, having similar training and doing similar work, should be paid the same as white teachers."

ON THE OTHER HAND, Senator Russell of Georgia threw this beam of light on the Philadelphia strike: "If there had been no FEPC, not a single man-hour of war production would have been lost, and there would have been no racial disturbances or bitterness."

MORE THAN TWO HUNDRED one-room schools in Oklahoma will not open this fall, for lack of teachers.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW who represents France in the United States, don't look under "Foreign Diplomatic Representatives" in the Congressional Directory. The listing there says, "France: (Diplomatic relations severed by France on November 8, 1942.)" That's all.

IN ENGLAND, the London Daily Mail reports, trade names on canned and packaged foods will not be sufficient after January 1. In order that the housewife "can see exactly what she is buying," labels will have to carry "the usual name of the food."

FESTUNG EUROPA: Poland's vodka industry has been heavily capitalized by the Nazis. Fifty million quarts a year are reserved for the exclusive use of Polish peasants. The underground movement is conducting an intensive "dry" campaign. . . . Belgium is becoming infested with bandits. A number of those who have been captured have turned out to be German deserters. . . . The Nazis recently arrested a large number of Frenchmen as hostages, and were shocked to find that they were all faithful collaborationists. Somebody had stolen the list of patriots who were to be arrested and replaced it with a list of Vichyites.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

"Purifying" Italy

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL Henry Thompson Rowell acts as Educational Officer for the AMG in Rome. He is "responsible for the purification of Rome's cultural life," as we were told by Homer Bigart, correspondent for the New York Herald Tribune, on July 16. Colonel Rowell set to work by asking Beniamino Gigli, the tenor, to sing for a gala performance in honor of the Allied Armies. Gigli had earned a good deal of money at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, but when he returned to Italy he did not hesitate to make various insulting remarks about the United States. Gigli was a loyal Fascist. During the terrible period from September, 1943, until May, 1944, when the citizens of Rome were being mowed down by the Nazis, he sang frequently for the entertainment of German officers. "Yes, it is true that I sang for the Fascists and for the Germans," Gigli told the correspondent of the Associated Press, "and now that the Americans and British are here, I would like to sing for them too."

Believe it or not, there are Italians in Rome today who do not intend to be "purified" by Lieutenant-Colonel Rowell. They raised such a rumpus that the Colonel had to rush Gigli off the scene. But the Colonel is determined to purify Rome's cultural life at any cost. Consequently, he entrusted Maestro Bernardino Molinari with the task of conducting Beethooven's Ninth Symphony. Molinari had also been a loyal Fascist and had selected an orchestra for the German high command.

Again the Romans answered the Colonel, implying that he would be wiser if he went back to teaching Latin at Johns Hopkins. As Homer Bigart informed us, "The politically-minded gallery whistled, cat-called, and made such a hubbub that Molinari was unable to proceed. 'What about that automobile Maelzer gave you?' yelled one member of the anti-Fascist claque. (Maelzer was the German commandant of Rome.) 'How about those concerts you gave for the Tedeschi (Germans)?' another shouted." Lieutenant-Colonel Rowell "tried to silence the demonstration," but he could not arrest "the flow of abuse from the gallery."

If Washington or London had been under Nazi occupation, as Rome was from September, 1943, to May, 1944, would Lieutenant-Colonel Rowell have asked pro-Nazi tenors and conductors to participate in gala performances and concerts in honor of British or American "liberators"? AMG lieutenant-colonels must come to realize that at the height of Mussolini's "benevolent despotism," when they were visiting Italy's monuments guided by wretched men who would have found themselves in jail had they not sung the praises of Mussolini, thousands of Italians were languishing in prisons or on penal islands, or were being starved and humiliated by a regime that was really the "negation of God." Whoever arranges performances in Italy today with Fascist tenors or Fascist conductors as the guest stars, whoever consorts with high officials of the Fascist military and civil hierarchy, with Fascist mayors, Fascist business men, Fascist gentlewomen, Fascist bishops, whoever does that challenges the moral code of the whole people.

The incidents in Rome are a taste of what will happen in Florence, Leghorn, and Ancona on a larger scale. As for Bologna, Genoa, Turin, Milan, and Venice, American and British officials and commandants will do well to travel about in armored cars, unless the mistakes they have made in southern Italy are corrected quickly.

As part of the purification of Rome's cultural life, Lieutenant-Colonel Rowell is responsible for "restoring the university to its former greatness," Mr. Bigart has reported. Rowell chose as temporary rector of the university Professor Giuseppe Caronia, a specialist in infectious diseases. Caronia, in addition to being a good scholar, is an honest man, who was unjustly treated under the Fascist regime and who will undoubtedly carry out his task in a spirit of justice and with common sense. One only wonders why the choice was made by Lieutenant-Colonel Rowell and not by the Minister of Public Education in the Italian Cabinet. AMG officials should supervise the work of the Italian authorities so that it does not interfere with the war effort, but they should not continue to wear the mantle that rightfully belongs to Italian authorities when the war effort cannot possibly be affected by local affairs. The Minister of Public Education, Signor De Ruggiero, no less than the other Cabinet ministers, has been blessed with the approval of the Allied Control Commission. He is a learned and honest man. The duty of "purifying" the University of Rome and all other universities should be vested in him and not in a gentleman from Baltimore, Maryland.

But Lieutenant-Colonel Rowell held the reins tightly in his hands. He announced that, like music, "the university must remain above politics." He set up a committee, not to "purge" or "purify" the university—those words, he said, were "too strong"—but to "rehabilitate" the university. And he appointed to serve on that committee two ardent Fascists: Dr. Nicola Spano and Professor Filippo Vassali. Commenting on these appointments, an Italian paper published a cartoon which showed a black-shirted man hurrying down the street, saying: "I have been appointed to the purification committee and I have not even had time to change my shirt." When he realized that he had blundered, Colonel Rowell disclosed that he had "received and accepted Vassali's resignation." As for Dr. Spano he was retained as administrative director of the university.

The more one reads about what is being done in Italy, the more one is compelled to ask oneself whether our bigwigs really intend to make America and England hateful to all democratic Italians. An American professor has been sent to Italy to take care of the Italian archives. Do the gentlemen in Washington really think that an American professor is needed for that job? Where the archives have been bombed away, there is no need to take care of them anyway. And where they still exist, their old personnel exists too. As a rule, these are good, devoted, helpful people, who know and cherish as their own children each and every paper in their custody. Putting an outsider in charge of the Italian archives is an insult to hundreds of decent and humble men to whom the archives are home and life.

Jewish communities are also being "purified." This means that the Jews are not allowed to purify themselves but that the purification is foisted on them from above. Under Mussolini everything came from above. In "liberated" Italy, everything still comes from above. Thus Commendatore Angelo Sullam has been chosen from above as head of the Jewish community of Bari. Of course, he was once a loyal Fascist. And Signor Silvio Ottolenghi has been chosen from above as commissioner for the Jewish community of Rome. Of course, he was also a loyal Fascist. On May 25, 1937, they signed a statement to the effect that "the Italians of Hebrew faith are, and in unambiguous terms announce that they are, enemies of every Hebrew and non-Hebrew, Masonic, subversive, and especially anti-Fascist internationale."

Not only Italy's cultural life, not only Italy's archives, but Italy's penal code has to be purified. This task, fortunately, can be performed in New York. PM has told us that the International Commission for Penal Reconstruction and Development has entrusted the Chief Clerk of the Court of Special Sessions in New York with the task of expurgating fascism from the Italian penal code. Do the gentlemen of that International Commission think that there are no jurists in Italy? Do they think that Italy's legal life is a vacuum to be filled with printed paper from New York? I am not a lawyer by trade, but I suspect that if those gentlemen were not allergic to common sense, they would send into Italy the draft of a bill consisting of no more than three articles: (1) political crimes committed by Fascists shall be investigated and punished according to the Fascist code; (2) all other crimes shall be investigated and punished according to the code that was in force before the March on Rome, October 28, 1922; (3) amnesties granted to political criminals after October 28, 1922, are null and void.

The underground newspaper Le Gaulois offers the following pointers on how to recognize a democracy:

"In a democracy you write your letter on a letterhead, you sign it, and the person to whom it is addressed is the first one to read it.

"Scoundrels are in prison.

"If someone whistles under your window, it can only be a friend calling you.

"You don't have to envy people who have apartments with two exits.

"And finally, the business man who displays a picture of the head of the state in his shop window can be an honest man just the same.

"Given this information, we are confident that our readers will unhesitatingly rally behind Monsieur Laval when the Allies try to destroy our democracy!"

While denouncing these blunders, we must not forget the intelligence, imagination, skill, and resourcefulness which America, Britain, and Russia are displaying in the field of production to make that war effort possible. We must not overlook the magnificent job that AMG officers are doing in Italy, against tremendous odds, in fighting epidemics, rehabilitating bridges, roads, aqueducts, and power stations, and in feeding the population. Wherever material obstacles have to be overcome, Anglo-Saxon ingenuity performs miracles. But one can admire miracles in the field of material endeavor and yet be sorry for the ineptitude that becomes apparent every time moral and political problems are tackled.

To be fair, one must admit that the blunders made in Italy in an attempt to "purify" Italian life and "reeducate" the Italian people to democracy are often prompted by a sincere desire to help a people which is in great need. But Britain and America have a queer bias toward Europe. Continental Europe, Britain and America believe, is inhabited by inferior races. There is a brutal doctrine of the German Herrenvolk and there is a suave, sugar-coated doctrine of the Anglo-Saxon Herrenvolk. Roman civilization died of consumption, and it was a great pity; it was the best the ancient world could produce, and its collapse brought about centuries of barbarism and suffering. It would be a great pity if Anglo-Saxon civilization came to an end; it is the best the modern world has produced.

If it ever comes to an end, it will die not of consumption but of presumption.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

AN ASSORTMENT of eight German army officers was hanged on August 8. That much we can believe. However, we should be wary of believing everything that Berlin has told us about the affair. It has revived a widespread tendency to swallow whatever soup is cooked in Dr. Goebbels's kitchen.

In spite of those photographs, which are supposed to have been taken in the courtroom, it cannot be said with absolute certainty that there was actually a "trial" in the dread "people's court." It is quite possible that the photographs are false. But even granting that there was a trial, we are completely in the dark as to what was proved or disproved or how much of the testimony was genuine and how much was faked. For it was a secret trial. An official "report" of two thousand words, released by Goebbels's office on August 8, is absolutely all the information we have. Now there is nothing to prevent the Ministry of Propaganda from writing such a report to suit its own convenience. It can put into the mouths of the accused any words it pleases. It is the sheerest gullibility to take its "reports" literally. Besides, this particular "report" is extraordinarily inept.

The indictment under which the eight officers were tried, according to the "report," had three counts: (1) conspiracy to kill Hitler; (2) conspiracy to usurp authority; (3) conspiracy to surrender to the enemy. Observe that the official "report" of the "trial" doesn't contain a syllable of testimony on the last count—not a single question or answer concerning the alleged conspiracy to surrender. On the conspiracy to usurp power, this idiotic story is not even consistent as to the person who was allegedly slated to succeed Hitler. On the first page it is General Beck; on the last page it is a Dr. Goerdeler. The author of the "report" got tangled in his own yarn!

But the most egregious piece of humbuggery in the whole story is the background of the alleged attempt on Hitler's life. Major General Stieff "confessed" that one Colonel von Treskow had told him last summer that Hitler would have to be killed by "explosives" during a military conference. During the succeeding months the major general was twice asked to make the attempt himself—first by General Beck and later by Colonel von Stauffenberg. He declined the honor, but volunteered to keep the explosives until they were needed. Then an unnamed relative of Colonel von Stauffenberg procured "British explosives" and "British fuses" from certain unnamed Englishmen. (All the high officers in Germany, with hundreds of thousands of tons of explosives at their command, apparently couldn't get their hands on any of them.) The unnamed relative gave the British explosives to the accused Lieutenant von Hagen, who turned them over to Major General Stieff. The latter hid them for many long months. Finally, at the command of General Olbricht, the "administrative manager of the plot," he handed them over to the alleged would-be assassin, Colonel von Stauffenberg.

It can safely be said that a person who believes this idiotic comic strip will believe anything. And the whole story of the "trial" is of the same quality from beginning to end. It is a cheap, talentless farce unskillfully pasted together, just like the story of the Reichstag fire, with which the Nazis opened their act. We read with a smile the words which the "report" puts into the mouth of the Nazi fanatic Rudolf Freissler: "Even the burning of the Reichstag is eclipsed by the deed committed by these defendants."

Contrary to general belief, this official "report" of the "trial" does not substantiate the Nazi version of the "plot," but actually discredits it more than ever. There is no doubt that countless old-line officers believe the war is lost and consider Hitler the worst obstacle to be overcome if it is to be ended while there is still something left of Germany. But notwithstanding the nonsense which the Nazis themselves have produced, there is no evidence whatsoever that this feeling had crystallized in an organized plot. The long and short of the matter is that the Nazis have once again heeded Machiavelli's advice to all autocrats: "A prince who is menaced by his followers should not give them time to do anything." To all appearances, the Nazis have succeeded in forestalling anyone and everyone who might possibly have taken part in a double-cross à la Badoglio.

At the same time they are trying to distill a usable by-product out of the mess. It has been observed on all sides that a new "stab-in-the-back" legend is being built up in Germany. The defeat of 1918 was explained by the legend that the "home front" had prevented the army from carrying the war to a successful conclusion. That story always had one disadvantage: it insulted 70 or 80 or 90 per cent of the population—until the Nazis thought to limit the blame to Jews, Catholics, and Communists. But the guilt-legend which the Nazis are now building up is aimed exclusively at the top 5 or 10 per cent of the population, and seems therefore to have a better chance of being accepted by the other 90 or 95 per cent—if not today, then tomorrow.

So far as I can see, no one has yet noted or appreciated the fact that since the alleged attempt at assassination the Nazi Party has conducted a steady and increasingly virulent agitation against the aristocracy and the upper bourgeoisie as traitors, criminals, and enemies of Germany. This agitation, which goes back to the original Bolshevik model, and which at times has a tone that seems calculated to loose a pogrom against the "blue-blooded swine," is one of the most interesting phenomena of the Nazis' death-agony. Details next time.

BOOKS and the ARTS

KOESTLER AND THE POLITICAL NOVEL

BY WILLIAM PHILLIPS

SOCIAL moods somehow find their spokesmen; and just as the political novel of the thirties worked the theme of revolutionary faith, so the current product is steeped in the skepticism of the radical movement today. But, ironically, the present phase, which was inaugurated by Silone and Koestler, is more nearly on the level of the subject in its grasp of the tensions of political life—in a way, it is a revaluation of its "proletarian" past.

It is clear by now that the failings of left-wing fiction, from the very beginning, were due largely to the factional exploitation of writers and writing; and that the type of documentation, known as social or socialist realism, which became its literary creed was nothing more than an unconscious strategy for evading the larger issues. It was really a throwback to the "slice-of-life" formula of popular fiction—a method that could not possibly carry the weight of a new sensibility and a new consciousness. As for the political reality ostensibly recorded by the left novel, it was but the official time-table of the class struggle. From Malraux down, the radical writer conceived of himself as an inspired reporter who drew the pathos of the present from the certainties of the future. But what is an inspired reporter if not an uninspired novelist, a creator of photographic unreality?

It would be a mistake, however, to write off the entire genre as a literary aberration, for it was a natural response to the radicalism of the time. The truth is that the present period is predominantly political. Not only have we come to read our fate in political terms; even our values and our versions of experience have been politically accented. Perhaps the surest index of an epoch is its image of itself as expressed in its idea of the relevant and the contemporary and there is no lack of evidence that our measure of relevancy today is largely political, while our anxiety over events has led almost to making a fetish of the contemporary.

But how was the novel to cope with this new outlook? Obviously more than a flair for the topical, which was actually the stock in trade of most left writers, was called for. Only through a more generalized or symbolic approach was it possible to convey the shadings and crossings of belief, the moral turns, the psychic plights—all the motives and meanings of the political world.

All great literary efforts have sprung from the more advanced states of consciousness in society. In fiction the strategic characters have been abstracted from those specially placed and dominant types, through whose consciousness the inner movement of society revealed itself. Thus the modern tragic hero, from Hamlet to Joseph K., has been an intellectual, or, more precisely, a man of sensibility, who has taken upon himself the burdens of civilization as a whole, and in his various guises and mutations has reflected the changing stresses of Western thought.

The political person is in this sense a central figure today. I am, of course, thinking mainly of the left orbit, where politics has taken over practically all human and theoretical concerns. And under the heading of the left we might include all varieties of belief from the faintest liberalism to the most intransigent revolutionary stance. This is not to discount the serious doctrinal differences, but, from a broader view, all liberals and radicals may be said to have a common stake in the fortunes of the left, for not only are they affected by each other's activities, but many, if not most, of them have actually made the rounds of the various movements. Hence a kind of composite type of the political personality might be drawn from the liberal and radical world. For the purposes of literature, however, the truly typical is not the composite. It is created out of extremity—out of the most critical and complete experiences. The really significant political figure is therefore a man of consciousness who has been crucially implicated in the major turns, who has been made and unmade by them. The conversion to the cause, the days of faith and the days of conscience, and, more recently, the great exodus, the atonements, and the overhauling of beliefs—all have left their mark on him.

In his most extreme form he is a victim of a kind of revolutionary trauma, having been transformed from a zealot of socialism to a martyr to an illusion. The type is actually familiar enough. He may be a functionary, a writer, a professor—it does not matter. We have all seen him at meetings and in the press, dispensing his factional sophistries with an air of messianic innocence. He is militant, high-minded, single-tracked, enormously skilled in the strategies of orthodoxy, and a master of rationalization. His thinking, which is compounded of casuistry and faith, is essentially tribal in character, with its own assumptions and norms, as though he lived in some self-sufficient culture distinct from our own. And in a way he does, for his very being is a projection of the contradictions of the Russian Revolution. This accounts for the ambiguity of his nature, which combines a strain of genuine idealism with an apparently boundless cynicism and depravity. And what is his frozen mentality, which harbors the most arbitrary and irreconcilable notions, if not the congealment of the Russian dilemma into a religious structure? Hence he is constantly at odds with the accepted intellectual and radical tradition, harassed by its moral pressures, and unnerved by doubts and anxieties. When he finally breaks with the movement, he becomes uneasy—almost neurotically guilty—about his political past; and he usually seeks either to purge himself of it through confession and expiation, or to conceal it by slipping quietly into his new position. In either case, he soon adapts himself to an ideology of realism and compromise, which nowadays passes for normality. The cycle of his career covers the depths and excesses of the radical world; yet he is truly symptomatic of the stunted idealism and panic of the last decades.

Throughout the triumphant era of revolutionary fiction, however, not one such character made his appearance in the novel. His part was filled either by the socialist man of action, who was a militant conformist, or the little man of inaction, who was a meek non-conformist, both of whom simply obeyed the laws of history, one positively, the other negatively. Thus the left novelist violated not only his own consciousness, or perhaps we should say the consciousness he should have possessed, but also the tradition of fiction. For was not the left novelist himself a political character? And he had only to follow the example of the modern novel and create the revolutionary hero in his own image to depict his true compulsions and perplexities. Yet not even in Malraux, who of all the earlier radical writers was best equipped to extend the modern tradition, do we find any one figure bearing the mentality of the left. In "Man's Fate," undoubtedly the outstanding novel of the entire period, Malraux's consciousness seemed to be dispersed in a form of atmospheric excitement and in the tenseness of his characters. In his later novels, he succumbed quite naturally to the prevailing pieties.

Not until the recent novels of Silone and Koestler do we get anything like a fusion of literary and political tradition and a maturity of approach. In fact, the taut, anxiety-ridden, and self-conscious hero of both Koestler and Silone, who seeks to salvage his identity from the remnants of his conscience, recalls the alienated and disintegrated figure of modern writing. And while the political novel obviously is still far below the standards of the art novel, still, in the hands of Silone and Koestler, it has at least become a meaningful literary expression.

Of the later works of these two writers, "Arrival and Departure" strikes me as the most meaningful. For despite its many deficiencies, which have been noted in the pages of The Nation and elsewhere—in some ways it is little more than a showpiece—Koestler's novel displays a remarkable feeling for the dilemmas of the political intelligence. And while he lacks, too, Silone's pathos of the human, Koestler is nevertheless far more sophisticated and relevant in the deployment of his material than Silone, who is mainly sensitive to the resonance of revolutionary politics in the life of the European peoples. Where Spina represented the dissolution of socialism in the mystique of mankind, both Rubashov and Peter Slavek stem directly from the sources of political consciousness. Thus Rubashov is a symbolic figure of that almost pathological combination of faith and cynicism that is at the core of the Communist movement, while Peter Slavek is the radical intellectual of today who can neither hold on to nor give up his socialist vision and finds himself acting not so much out of conviction as desperation.

In fact, the story of Peter may be taken as a parable of the revolutionary life in both its political and psychological aspects. Peter's political progress sums up the history of the radical movement, from its earlier devotional excesses to its present bafflements and frustrations, while his psychic development follows the corresponding shift from a state of compulsion to a state of paralysis. This, it seems to me, is the meaning of the confessional episode, where Peter digs into his unconscious for his political motives. Koestler's point is not, as some reviewers have construed it, that politics can be reduced to neurosis, but that the balking of the political ego is a neurotic event. For the truth is that in recent years political life has taken on a neurotic character—with the classic symptoms of disorientation, inner searchings, and the fatal ambivalence of the need both to believe and disbelieve—as the Marxist generation, reared in the school of militancy, hope, and theoretical rectitude, has been thwarted by the collapse of its cause.

This combined development of the psychic and the political is further exemplified in the primary symbolism of the novel. Thus Peter cannot walk since, as the analyst puts it, he does not know where to go; and he ransacks his childhood memories for the clues to his revolutionism because it no longer has any political meaning for him. Similarly, the theme of surrender, which appears in Peter's succumbing to a political empiricism and a practical view of the war, is echoed in Odette's refrain of submission, "After all—why not?" and in Dr. Bolgar's therapeutic advice to Peter to fulfil himself in the present, "to cultivate a garden." And there seems to be a distant affinity, too, between Dr. Bolgar's lesbianism, which is hardly typical of the profession, and Peter's last-minute decision to join the Allied armies instead of retiring to America, for both suggest an irresponsibility—or a triumph?—of the natural; in Dr. Bolgar a denial of social restraints to assert her natural libido, in Peter a casting off of theoretical restraints to satisfy a political impulse.

Also, Peter's psychic restoration amounts to more than a clinical routine. It is essentially a duel between Dr. Bolgar, who in negating all values posits the values of the present, and Peter, who tries to preserve a political perspective by distinguishing his values from his phobias. And it is true that in a literal sense Dr. Bolgar is the victor, as Peter finally abandons himself to the realities of the present. Still, a more figurative reading of this theme is possible, for there is an all too evident and disconcerting parallel between the plight of Peter and that of the radical intellectual generally, who surely cannot be said to have been stripped of his values or political ideas by psychoanalytical casuistries. After all, even after Peter has been delivered from his neurotic confinement, he is still unable to extricate himself from his political bewilderment—a predicament that has at least as much to do with history as with psychology.

Apparently Peter is a self-portrait, as politically agile and aware as Koestler himself. And though he is too schematically conceived and exists mostly on the tip of the author's tongue, he is undoubtedly the most advanced political character in recent fiction. If anything, he is almost too advanced, too typical of the present state of the left and of those modern intellectuals whose traditional alienation has acquired a political meaning and a neurotic form. Where the left writers of the thirties failed to measure up to their subject, Koestler is completely on top of it, pinning down all its implications and squeezing the last bit of historical meaning out of his characters.

Peter is a case-study of the political hero.

For the Third Republic

GALLIC CHARTER: FOUNDATIONS OF TOMORROW'S FRANCE. By J. C. Fernand-Laurent. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

FERNAND-LAURENT* is a Parisian lawyer, journalist, and politician. Long an Independent, he joined in 1938 the moderate Fédération Républicaine. A safe and sensible man, an orthodox Republican well right of center, and a true patriot: I think he would accept this as his personal equation.

Any book about "Tomorrow's France" must be mostly about the France of yesterday: no nation, not even Meiji Japan, Kemalist Turkey, or Soviet Russia, can jump away from its long shadow. Fernand-Laurent begins his story with the foundation of the Third Republic, and he devotes more than half his book to the chronicle of this drab and stodgy regime. Lafayette had recommended Louis Philippe as "the best of Republics": in return, the Orleanists in 1875 had to accept the Republic as the best available Ersatz for a monarchy. Pacifist, Revanchard, and colonialist, democratic with a Royalist constitution, "heart on the left, pocketbook on the right," the bewildered hybrid tottered for nearly seventy years. It was hardly more confused than our own, but it was exposed to infinitely greater dangers.

Fernand-Laurent shows convincingly that the Vichy coup d'état in 1940 followed a familiar pattern. MacMahon was the first Pétain. Boulanger, backed by Royalist gold and vaudeville songs, promised a "national revolution." The Nationalist movement at the time of the Dreyfus Affair was a looser Boulangism. On the sixth of February, 1934, the stage was set for another coup, and Hervé was already clamoring for Pétain. The rule of Doumergue was a pathetic imitation of an autocracy. With the exception of Napoleon I, the French have an inevitable flair for picking the weakest Strong Man in the market. MacMahon was an honest simpleton; Boulanger a black horse and a blond beard with no brains; Papa Doumergue, "Gastounet," had been for seven years a smiling King Log. In the Dreyfus crisis no man could be found: Marchand declined the job, and General Roget, whom Déroulède wanted to draft, happened to have a Republican horse which loyally refused to head for the Elysée. Of all these sorry supermen, Pétain is the feeblest. Fernand-Laurent confirms the well-known fact that the Marshal hates and despises his maker, Laval. Yet he said, "M. Laval and I are one." This is not mere senility. In 1918 the hero of Verdun was already a defeatist.

In 1938 France was no more prepared for modern war than England or America. The military deficiencies could not be blamed on Parliament but on the confusion and old-fogyism of the army leaders, the staff formed and dominated by Pétain and Weygand. Fernand-Laurent was a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and his unpartisan testimony agrees with the unspoken verdict of the Riom trial.

Fernand-Laurent gives a very intelligent and vivid summary of the discussions that led to the armistice. In that crisis Mandel appears as a tower of strength: he, Louis Marin, and Herriot are the author's favorites. Pétain, Laval,

---

* The hyphen, I take it, means that he is "the" Fernand Laurent, not just any Fernand Laurent; a kind of self-conferred Republican nobility. Cf. "Les Thibault."

A Study in the American Political System and HOW it Works

Government of the People

New and Enlarged Edition

By D. W. BROGAN
London School of Economics

A NEW and enlarged edition of the book which has become a classic in its field. There is an extended introduction, and Professor Brogan includes the innovations that have appeared on the American political scene in the last ten years.

"MR. BROGAN will, I think, be found to have written the most illuminating treatise on American government since the late Lord Bryce's famous volume of fifty years ago. His pages are not merely distinguished by a wealth of knowledge to which, probably, no living Englishman can pretend; they also have the power to describe a system in movement, the capacity to grasp the living dynamic which animates an institutional framework, which are among the rarest qualities in political science."
—Harold J. Laski, the Foreword.

$4.00

HARPER & BROTHERS • 49 E. 33rd St., N. Y. 16

ONE-SHOT-WHILE-THEY-LAST SALE OF GOOD BOOKS!

We are clearing our shelves of hundreds of books which won't be reprinted. This is necessary in order to make room for hundreds of new books now being planned. This means a wonderful chance to pick up numerous bargains AS LONG AS THE BOOKS LAST, WHICH CAN'T BE LONG. We feel it won't be necessary to reprint this advertisement. It's certain to clean out every title we want to dispose of. For that reason, act promptly. You can get a wonderful library of fine books at extremely low cost if you will go through the list below now, check off the ones you want, and rush us your order. As an added inducement we are figuring everything on a DELIVERED PRICE. Just send us the amount stated below and you'll get your parcel of books CARRIAGE CHARGES PREPAID. This sale positively closes when present stock is sold out. This is a new low in prices for these books. We promise to ship books the same day we receive your order. Remember, these books are NOT Little Blue Books. They are our larger volumes, measuring 5½ x 8½ inches in size, card-covered. Minimum order $1 worth. Take your choice of these book bargains before it's too late! This is a RED-HOT SALE, which means you have the chance of a lifetime to get the best kind of reading matter at almost give-away prices.

ALL PRICES INCLUDE CARRIAGE CHARGES.

THE PICTURESQUE AND ADVENTUROUS LIFE OF CHIANG KAI-SHEK—By Joseph McCabe. 75c.

LIFE OF JOSEPH STALIN—The Rebel and the Statesman—By Joseph McCabe. 60,000 words. 75c.

THE LIFE OF CHURCHILL—The man and his creed—By Joseph McCabe. 75c.

SAM BASS, THE TRAIN ROBBER—The Life of Texas' Most Popular Bandit. By H. N. Castleman. 25c.

KATE BENDER—THE KANSAS MURDERESS—The Horrible History of an Arch Killer—By Allison Hardy. 25c.

THE MORMON PIONEERS, or The Great Salt Lake Trail—By Allison Hardy. 25c.

HINTS ON THE ORIGINS OF BELIEFS AND BEHAVIOR—A Practical Philosophy of Life for Skeptics—By D. Milton Whiteside. 25c.

THE BALD KNOBBERS—The Story of the Lawless Night-Riders Who Ruled Southern Missouri in the 80's—By H. N. Castleman. 25c.

THE TEXAS RANGERS—The Story of an Organization That Is Unique, Like Nothing Else in America—By H. N. Castleman. 25c.

THE LIBERTY OF MAN, WOMAN AND CHILD—A Lecture—By Robert G. Ingersoll. 25c.

CONFESSIONS OF A GHOST-WRITER—Peter Nemo. 25c.

THE FACTS ABOUT BASIC ENGLISH—By Miriam Allen deFord. 25c.

ENERGY—the Creator of Thought—By Theodore J. Vollkommer. 25c.

MARRIAGE AND COURTSHIP CUSTOMS AMONG PRIMITIVES—By John H. Burma, Ph.D. 25c.

AMERICANS WHO THOUGHT THEY WERE GODS—Colorful Messiahs and Little Christs—By Vance Randolph. 25c.

GUN-FIGHTERS OF THE OLD WEST—By William Yancey Shackleford. 25c.

WILD STORIES FROM THE OZARKS—By Vance Randolph. 25c.

BELLE STARR, THE BANDIT QUEEN—The career of the most colorful outlaw the Indian Territory ever knew. 25c.

THE TRUTH ABOUT NARCOTIC DRUGS—How to avoid being a dope-fiend—By Wm. Y. Shackleford. 25c.

CONFESSIONS OF A BOOZE-FIGHTER—What happened when an alcoholic took the Keeley Cure. 25c.

THE MEANING OF ALL COMMON GIVEN NAMES—By Miriam Allen deFord. 25c.

THE RATCLIFFE MURDERS—By Thomas De Quincey. 25c.

NEWEST DISCOVERIES IN ASTRONOMY—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

NAZIS AND THE STATE OF GERMANY—By Joseph McCabe. 15c.

THE CAUSES OF THE CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN—By Joseph McCabe. 15c.

IMPERIALISTIC JAPAN AND ITS AIMS—By Joseph McCabe. 15c.

A BOOK OF PUZZLES, PROBLEMS AND BRAIN-TEASERS—Compiled by E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

TELEVISION—WHAT IT IS AND HOW IT WORKS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

YOUR BODY AND ITS FUNCTIONS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

WHAT VITAMINS AND DIET WILL DO FOR YOU—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

WOMEN WHO BECOME MEN—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

EARLIEST MAN IN AMERICA—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

OUR WONDERFUL GLANDS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

HUMAN BODY, AND HOW IT WORKS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

PHALLIC ANCIENT CIVILIZATIONS AND CULT OF LOVE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

WHAT SHOULD BE TAUGHT ABOUT SEX—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

ZADIG, OR DESTINY—Voltaire. 25c.

CANDIDE—By Voltaire. 25c.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE—Clarence Darrow. 45c.

A SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY—By Laurence Sterne. 25c.

THE FUN I GET OUT OF LIFE—Autobiography — E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

SORROWS OF YOUNG WERTHER—By Goethe. 25c.

THE WISDOM OF LIFE—Schopenhauer. 25c.

COUNSELS AND MAXIMS—Arthur Schopenhauer. 25c.

ON LIBERTY—By John Stuart Mill. 25c.

RESIST NOT EVIL—Clarence Darrow. 25c.

CLARENCE DARROW'S TWO GREAT TRIALS—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

DARROW'S PLEA FOR DEFENSE OF LOEB AND LEOPOLD—A gripping plea for the lives of the two boy murderers. 39c.

CULTURE AND ITS MODERN ASPECTS—By E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

SNAPSHOTS OF MODERN LIFE—Essays by E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

CLIPPINGS FROM AN EDITOR'S SCRAPBOOK—Essays by E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

SENSIBLE VIEWS OF LIFE—Is sex sinful?—By E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

ALGEBRA SELF-TAUGHT. 25c.

STUDIES IN RATIONALISM—By E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

CONFESSIONS OF A DEBUNKER—By E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

THE BUNK BOX—By E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

FREE SPEECH AND FREE THOUGHT IN AMERICA—By E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

AN AGNOSTIC LOOKS AT LIFE—By E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

MYTHS AND MYTH-MAKERS—By E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

THIS TYRANNY OF BUNK—By E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

THE ANTI-CHRIST—By Nietzsche. 39c.

FOUNDATION OF THE UNIVERSE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

HOW THE UNIVERSE IS CONSTRUCTED—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

HOW LIFE SPRANG FROM MATTER—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

HOW LIFE DEVELOPED — By Joseph McCabe. 20c.

DOES ATHEISM REST ITS CASE ON LOGIC?—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

WOULD A GODLESS WORLD MAKE FOR SOCIAL PROGRESS OR DECLINE?—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

MAN'S MASTERY OF LIFE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

STORY OF THE EVOLUTION OF MAN—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

LIFE AMONG THE MANY PEOPLES OF THE EARTH—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

TRUTH ABOUT AIMEE SEMPLE McPHERSON—By Louis Adamic. 29c.

MYRIAD MYSTERIES OF THE MIND—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

MAN'S STORY OF HIMSELF—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

WONDERS OF ANCIENT EGYPT AND BABYLON—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

SPLENDORS OF GREECE AND ROME—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

STRANGE CIVILIZATIONS OF INDIA AND CHINA—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

TRUE PICTURES OF EUROPE IN THE MIDDLE AGES—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

STIRRING STORY OF THE RISE OF MODERN EUROPE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

DAWN OF THE NEW AGE AND BIRTH OF MODERN SPIRIT—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

THE HISTORY OF AMERICA—By Joseph McCabe. 20c.

MAN AND HIS SUBMISSION TO BEING RULED—By Joseph McCabe. 20c.

MANUAL OF MONEY AND WEALTH—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

STORY OF HUMAN SOCIAL IDEAS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

HOW MAN ACQUIRES AND SPENDS HIS MONEY—By Joseph McCabe. 20c.

IS PHILOSOPHY OF DIALECTICAL MATERIALISM OUT OF DATE?—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

STORY OF ECONOMIC IDEALS IN MAN'S SOCIAL STATUS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

GREAT WRITERS OF ANTIQUITY—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

GREAT WRITERS OF THE MIDDLE AGES—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

GREAT MODERN WRITERS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

WRITERS OF TODAY AND THEIR MESSAGES—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

ANCIENT ART EXPLAINED—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

MEDIEVAL ART EXPLAINED—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

THE ART OF THINKING—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

STORY OF PHILOSOPHY—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

STORY OF HUMAN EDUCATION—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

THE PROGRESS OF SCIENCE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

ALL ABOUT PSYCHO-ANALYSIS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

MORALS AMONG THE GREEKS AND ROMANS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

THE MORALS OF THE SAVAGE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

MORALS OF THE ANCIENT WORLD—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

PERSONS AND PERSONALITIES—By E. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

CRITICAL REVIEW OF LATEST CLAIMS SUPPOSED TO GIVE VALIDITY TO GOD IDEA—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

MORALS IN MEDIEVAL EUROPE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

MORALS IN THE ARAB-PERSIAN CIVILIZATION—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

THE MORAL LIFE OF CHINA AND INDIA—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

LIFE IN EUROPE IN THE LATER MIDDLE AGES—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

THE EFFECT OF THE REFORMATION ON MORALS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

MORALITY IN THE 19TH CENTURY—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

CHANGING MORALS OF TODAY—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

WHAT SEX REALLY IS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

REASON OR FAITH: WHICH SHALL PREVAIL?—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

(Continued on opposite page)

HALDEMAN-JULIUS PUBLICATIONS, Box B-6, Girard, Kansas

(Continued from preceding page)

NTAGONISM BETWEEN THE EXES—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

OMAN AND MARRIAGE—By Jo- ph McCabe. 25c.

BNORMAL ASPECTS OF SEX— y Joseph McCabe. 25c.

OMAN AND THE CREATIVE RGE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

HAT IS THE "MYSTERY" OF OMAN?—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

UEST FOR SEXUAL HAPPINESS By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

ERSHWIN AND AMERICAN USIC—By Isaac Goldberg. 20c.

RE THE LATEST DISCOVERIES SCIENCE GIVING SUPPORT TO HE GOD-IDEA?—By Joseph Mc- abe. 25c.

POSITION OF ATHEISM GROW- G STRONGER?—By Joseph Mc- abe. 25c.

HAT WAR AND MILITARISM OST—By Joseph McCabe. 20c.

HE WONDERS OF THE ATOM— y Joseph McCabe. 25c.

USIC FOR EVERY MAN—By Isaac oldberg. 25c.

HE SEXUAL LIFE OF MAN, OMAN AND CHILD—By Dr. Isaac oldberg. 20c.

ONFESSIONS OF A YOUNG MAN By George Moore. 25c.

THEISM A LOGICAL PHILOSO- HY?—Debate—Rev. Burris Jenkins d E. Haldeman-Julius. 20c.

ONOCLASTIC REACTIONS — By . Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

HAT'S WRONG WITH OUR CHOOLS?—Edited by E. Haldeman- ulius. 20c.

OW TO PUBLISH YOUR OWN AGAZINE—Every phase explained, r professionals and amateurs. 20c.

REPORT OF THE REV. J. RANK NORRIS' TRIAL—By Marcet aldeman-Julius. 20c.

HE MAID OF ORLEANS—Fried- ich von Schiller. 25c.

PPEAL TO REASON, No. 1—25c.
PPEAL TO REASON, No. 2—25c.
PPEAL TO REASON, No. 3—25c.
PPEAL TO REASON, No. 5—25c.
PPEAL TO REASON, No. 6—25c.

ach of the above 5 volumes of the ppeal to Reason Library contains at east 60,000 words (128 large pages), educational, scientific, critical and istorical outlines by Joseph McCabe, e world's greatest scholar.

HE SIGN OF THE FOUR—By Sir rthur Conan Doyle. 25c.

HE STORY OF A WOMAN'S EART—By Guy De Maupassant. 25c.

UST—Mr. and Mrs. E. Haldeman- ulius. 49c.

HOULD CHURCH PROPERTY BE AX EXEMPT?—By Harry Hibsch- ann. 20c.

HE KING AND MRS. SIMPSON— y Marcet Haldeman-Julius. 20c.

VILD BILL HICKOK—King of the un-Fighters—By Alllison Hardy. 25c.

UNDAMENTALS OF A DANCE DUCATION—By Ted Shawn. 25c.

OCIAL SCIENCE THE HOPE OF EMOCRACY—By Harry E. Barnes. 0c.

SANE FOREIGN POLICY FOR HE U. S.—By Harry E. Barnes. 20c.

HE CASE FOR UNEMPLOYMENT NSURANCE—This problem is im- ortant to every American. 15c.

HE ORIGINS OF MODERN CIVIL- ZATION—By Harry E. Barnes. 20c.

HYTHM METHOD OF BIRTH ONTROL—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

OW TO KEEP YOUNG—By Marcet aldeman-Julius. 20c.

HE STORY OF MY HEART—By ichard Jeffries. 20c.

OPE'S ENCYCLICAL ON BIRTH ONTROL—Pope PIUS. 20c.

SCENTIMENTAL WIND-BREAKING—By Benjamin Franklin. 20c.

ON HOW TO CHOOSE A MISTRESS —By Benjamin Franklin. 20c.

SEX PROBLEMS IN MODERN SOCIETY—By Dr. R. S. Yarros. 25c.

AMERICAN BANDITS—20c.

THE VALUE OF FREE THOUGHT —How to Become a Truth-Seeker and Break the Chains of Mental Slavery—By Bertrand Russell. 25c.

THE SELF EDUCATOR—50 vols.—By Joseph McCabe. $2.50.

AN OUTLINE OF INTELLECTUAL RUBBISH—A Hilarious Catalogue of Organized and Individual Stupidity—By Bertrand Russell. 25c.

FROM GODS TO DICTATORS—Psychology of Religions and Their Totalitarian Substitutes—By Dr. Pryns Hopkins. 80,000 words, 160 large pages. $1.

HOW TO READ AND UNDERSTAND HISTORY—The Past as the Key to the Future—By Bertrand Russell. 25c.

AN OUTLINE OF MARXISM—A world view by Joseph Efries. 50c.

PEACE AND WAR—U. S. FOREIGN POLICY. 1931-1941—Compiled by the State Department. This much-discussed "White Book" contains about 80,000 words. Complete text. 65c.

PHOENIX—How to Rebuild the World —By H. G. Wells. 50c.

HOW TO BECOME A PHILOSOPHER, A LOGICIAN AND A MATHEMATICIAN—By Bertrand Russell. 30c.

THE NEW RIGHTS OF MAN—By H. G. Wells. 25c.

DIVIDE AND CONQUER—15c.

AUTOMOBILE USERS' GUIDE—14c.

"ASLEEP!"—Full text of official Roberts' report on Pearl Harbor. 14c.

NIETZSCHE'S ARISTOCRATIC RADICALISM—By G. Brandes. 25c.

GOD AND MY NEIGHBOR—By Robert Blatchford. 25c.

GETTING THE MOST OUT OF LIFE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

HOW TO VALUE OLD COINS—This book will help people who want to know what coins are worth. 20c.

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE LABOR PRESS—20c.

A COMEDY OF MANNERS—By Benjamin Disraeli. 20c.

MICHAEL ANGELO — TITAN OF ART—By Emil Ludwig. 25c.

REMBRANDT—HIS AMAZING LIFE AND WORK—Biography by Emil Ludwig. 25c.

A DEFENSE OF PHILOSOPHICAL SKEPTICISM—By Sir Leslie Stephen. 25c.

A STORY OF PRIMITIVE LOVE—By Robert W. Chambers. 25c.

LOVE AMONG THE HAYSTACKS—By D. H. Lawrence. 25c.

INFERIORITY COMPLEX ELIMINATED—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

INTERNATIONAL FREETHOUGHT ANNUAL—By a group of Rationalists. 25c.

GREAT AND MIND-LIBERATING THOUGHTS—25c.

DIARY OF A NIGHT CLUB HOSTESS—By Irene Dale. 49c.

HOW FREETHINKERS MADE NOTABLE CONTRIBUTIONS TO CIVILIZATION—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

WHAT WE LAUGH AT—AND WHY —By Isaac Goldberg. 39c.

FAMOUS SCANDALS IN AMERICAN HISTORY—By M. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

SHACKLES OF THE SUPERNATURAL—By Wm. J. Fielding. 39c.

POPULAR HISTORY OF THE U. S. —By Marcet Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

FAMOUS UNSOLVED MURDER MYSTERIES—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

GREAT COURT TRIALS OF HISTORY—By M. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

RELIGIOUS BELIEFS OF OUR PRESIDENTS—By Franklin Steiner. 49c.

WILD WOMEN OF HISTORY—By Henry Thomas. 25c.

FUTILITY OF BASIC RELIGIOUS IDEAS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

JUMBO JOKE BOOK—25c.

THE PRICE WE PAY BECAUSE OF VENEREAL DISEASES—25c.

HOW TO IMPROVE YOUR ENGLISH IN SPEECH AND WRITING —25c.

MODERN SEX BOOK — Contains seven sections by various authors. 49c.

JANE ADDAMS AS I KNEW HER—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

FAMOUS GUESTS AT A KANSAS FARM—By Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

THREE GENERATIONS OF CHANGING MORALS—By M. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

LOVE'S COMING OF AGE—By Edward Carpenter. 25c.

FACTS ABOUT VENEREAL DISEASE—T. Swann Harding. 25c.

GIBBON ON CHRISTIANITY—By Edward Gibbon. 25c.

McCABE'S ANCIENT GREAT MEN SERIES—In three attractive volumes. 83c.

IN PRAISE OF FOLLY—By Erasmus. 25c.

THREE BOOKS IN ONE—By Dr. Harry Elmer Barnes. 25c. This important book by Dr. Barnes contains: 1. The Lures of Sex. 2. The Beginnings of Modern Civilization. 3. How the Power of Catholicism Was Undermined.

GREAT GENIUSES OF THE MIDDLE AGES—By McCabe. In [illegible] volumes. 83c.

MISTAKES OF MOSES—By Robert G. Ingersoll. 25c.

MEN WHO MADE THE MODERN WORLD—By Joseph McCabe. $1.85.

WHAT CAN A FREE MAN BELIEVE?—By E. Haldeman-Julius. In 8 vols. 41c.

IS RELIGION NECESSARY?—Debate. Clarence Darrow vs. Rev. Robert MacGowen. 20c.

GREAT IDEAS MADE SIMPLE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

FACTS ABOUT THE U. S. GOVERNMENT—Tells about every department and function of our government. 25c.

WEAVERS OF WORDS—By Henry Thomas, Ph.D. 85c.

RISE AND FALL OF THE GOD IDEA—By Joseph McCabe. 85c.

FROM MONKEY TO MAN—By Maynard Shipley. $1.15.

STORY OF THE HUMAN RACE—By Henry Thomas, Ph.D. In five volumes. 75c.

THE HISTORY OF SEXUAL MORALS—By Joseph McCabe. $1.80.

THE KEY TO LOVE AND SEX—By Joseph McCabe. [illegible] vols. $1.55.

WHAT I HAVE LEARNED ABOUT ANIMALS—By Marcet Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

SPURTS FROM AN INTERRUPTED PEN—By M. Haldeman-Julius. 25c.

VOICE OF GENIUS DOWN THE AGES—By Victor Hugo. 25c.

LIBERTY BOOK OF QUOTATIONS —Compiled by Rex Eastman. 25c.

BOOKKEEPING AND ACCOUNTING SELF TAUGHT—25c.

A BOOK OF POPULAR SUPERSTITIONS—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

SLAYERS OF SUPERSTITION—25c.

OUTLINE OF TODAY'S KNOWLEDGE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

THE RIGHT WORD—Will Improve Your English—By W. F. Forbes. 20c.

AMERICAN RATIONALIST ANNUAL—1st edition. 29 brilliant contributors. 25c.

A BOOK OF AMAZING CONFESSIONS—By various authors. 25c.

HOW TO BECOME A WRITER—Twenty-five easy lessons in practical authorship by E. Haldeman-Julius. 49c.

DOES MAN LIVE AGAIN?—Debate. Clarence Darrow vs. Judge M. A. Musmanno. 20c.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS—By E. Haldeman-Julius.
Questions and Answers, No. 1—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 2—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 3—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 4—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 5—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 6—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 7—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 8—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 9—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 10—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 11—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 12—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 13—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 14—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 15—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 16—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 17—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 18—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 19—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 20—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 21—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 22—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 23—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 24—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 25—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 26—25c.
Questions and Answers, No. 27—25c.
CUMULATIVE INDEX—Vols. 1 to 25. 25c.

DICTATORSHIP OVER THE INTELLECT—By Isaac Goldberg. 25c.

15,000 FAMOUS DATES IN HISTORY—25c.

SIR THOMAS MORE'S "UTOPIA." 25c.

"THE STRANGE LIFE OF GEORGE BORROW—By Arthur S. Tolliver. 25c.

CHARLES DICKENS' "AMERICAN NOTES"—25c.

HENRY GEORGE'S "PROGRESS AND POVERTY." 25c.

"THE STRANGE STORY OF LAFCADIO HEARN"—By Arthur S. Tolliver. 25c.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN'S "AUTOBIOGRAPHY"—25c.

JAMES THOMSON'S "THE SEASONS"—25c.

SAMUEL BUTLER'S "EREWHON" —25c.

"THE WILD ADVENTURES OF DAVY CROCKETT"—By Arthur S. Tolliver. 25c.

BULWER-LYTTON'S "THE COMING RACE"—25c.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES' "AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST TABLE"—25c.

RICHARD WAGNER'S "JUDAISM IN MUSIC"—With an answer by Miriam Allen deFord. 25c.

"RELIGION AS A BAR TO PROGRESS"—A Digest of Andrew D. White's Famous Book, "The Warfare Between Science and Theology." 25c.

MORGAN'S "ANCIENT SOCIETY" —Human Progress from Savagery through Barbarism to Civilization. 25c.

ROBERT BLATCHFORD'S "NOT GUILTY—A DEFENSE OF THE BOTTOM DOG"—25c.

BELLAMY'S "LOOKING BACKWARD"—25c.

WILLIAM MORRIS' "NEWS FROM NOWHERE"—25c.

WINWOOD READE'S "THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN"—25c.

THOREAU'S "WALDEN"—25c.

DANIEL DEFOE'S "JOURNAL OF THE PLAGUE YEAR"—25c.

MARY WOLLSTONECRAFT'S "VINDICATION OF RIGHTS OF WOMAN"—25c.

HUMAN MORALITY — By McCabe. 25c.

MODERN ART EXPLAINED—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

MORALS IN RENAISSANCE—By Joseph McCabe. 25c.

HALDEMAN-JULIUS PUBLICATIONS, Box B-6, Girard, Kansas

Weygand were working hard for capitulation. Reynaud meant well, but, paralyzed by nefarious influences, he did not assert his authority. As for Albert Lebrun, he appears as the perfect French President—a non-entity absolute.

Even at the worst hour there still was some hope; the treachery of Chautemps and Alibert destroyed it, and made Vichy possible; it fell to minor characters to deal the decisive blow. If there are 1,500,000 French prisoners, most of them captured without a fight, Pétain almost alone is to blame: he left the armies without directions and practically ordered them to lay down their arms, before the terms of the armistice had been given. But in spite of Pétain France was "bloody but unbowed"; before the armistice was signed, she was back on the firing line, for De Gaulle had already sent forth his great Sursum Corda.

Thus we reach the penultimate chapter, 247 pages out of 280. So far, Fernand-Laurent agrees with Pierre Cot, with Raoul Aglion, with Philippe Barrés, as well as with Kérillis and Pertinax. In Chapter XVIII, The Government of Post-War France, the rift appears. "De Gaulle began in 1940 as the magnificent symbol of resistance. . . . But he became a politician." A familiar fallacy; it will be the refuge of all the Laodiceans. The Free French had to turn themselves into some kind of government if they wanted to administer the territories which had remained faithful to the Republic. They needed to form a political entity if they did not want to be treated merely as foreign mercenaries in the pay of England. The book was evidently conceived when Giraud was still a factor, although his elimination is mentioned. Today it is a trifle off key.

Fernand-Laurent raises the problem—Third or Fourth Republic? He wants the Third, the Republic headed by Albert Lebrun, the Assemblies which committed suicide at Vichy and whose powers have long expired. Naturally his opinion will be hailed with approval by the men who refused to sever relations with Pétain, and who clung to Darlan, Giraud, Boisson, Noguès, Peyrouton, the men who professed to be horror-stricken when Pucheu was executed.

Let us remember Fernand-Laurent's personal equation. It is important that a conservative should have written the first sixteen chapters; it was inevitable that he should write the seventeenth. The cause he defends is not lost by any means. The ghost of the Orleanist-plutocrat Republic is not exorcised yet, and dynamic democracy has a hard fight ahead. Fernand-Laurent is seeking allies in America; but there are quite a few Americans who believe in the Four Freedoms, not in the divine right of the bourgeoisie.

ALBERT GUERARD

The Generalissimo

CHIANG KAI-SHEK: ASIA'S MAN OF DESTINY. By Dr. H. H. Chang. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.50.

THOUGH the publisher announces that this is an unofficial biography of Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek "which does not present him as a demi-god," the sub-title alone clearly states the thesis that the Generalissimo is not only China's, but Asia's "man of destiny."

Apparently to prove this thesis, the author exhumes a prediction from the Book of Phophecy published during the Tang Dynasty that "a general will one day rule China: he will be one with grass on his head." The author explains that the Chinese words for "general" are chiang chun, the chiang being the same as the Generalissimo's family name. The sign of "grass" is also chiang, but written differently. However, if you make some extra strokes over Chiang's family name, you get the sign for "grass." Ergo: Chiang Kai-shek is that "general with grass on his head."

Should we reason in similar vein, we could omit, say, the "ill" from Churchill's name and have the word "church" left. Ergo: Winston Churchill will one day become Pope!

The book sets out to prove that from the day of his birth in Chikow in Chekiang Province, Chiang Kai-shek was extraordinary. He never made a mistake; was filled with piety; and in later years (1931-37) the whole nation was wrong and he right in appeasement of Japan, which was occupying China's whole northeast while Chiang and the German Reichswehr officers on his staff were waging a war of extermination against the Chinese Red Army.

Even in his 'teens, Chiang is pictured as the one man who realized that he was destined to rid China of the decrepit Manchu Dynasty and revive the nation. Strangely, Tseng Kuo-fan, the feudal-minded puppet of the Manchus, became one of his life-long heroes, and the Manchus not only educated him in the Paoting Military Academy, but sent him to Japan for over four years of study. Chiang's background, and his close connection with Japan before the present war, can alone explain a cast of mind that often baffles the Western world.

The author sweetens and glosses over many things in the Generalissimo's life, such as his relations with women, with the Shanghai stock exchange, and with the underworld of opium traffickers and gamblers known as the "Green Gang." This Green Gang played a major role in the so-called "Communist" purge in Shanghai in April, 1927, the story of which was told in André Malraux's novel, "Man's Fate." Dr. Chang happily declares that following this purge "the bourgeoisie" came to power and the Nanking government was founded and recognized by all powers but the Soviet Union. After the purge, Chiang became "tired" and rested his "body and soul" in a temple—and in the Imperial Hotel in Tokyo. In Japan he negotiated with Mrs. Soong for marriage with her daughter, his present wife, a marriage which put him on the map again, after which he became supreme head of the Nanking government.

Dr. Chang's interpretation of Chinese-Soviet relations from 1923 onward, and his interpretations of the teachings of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, differ greatly from that of Dr. Sun Fo, son of Dr. Sun and author of the new book "China Looks Forward." Diametrically opposed to Dr. Sun Fo and to Chinese agrarian research scholars, he states that there is no "social malady" in China's agrarian economy. He draws heavily on the absolutist ideology of "China's Destiny," the anti-democratic book published in Chungking last year under the name of the Generalissimo.

Only about one-third of the book is devoted to the Sino-Japanese war, and this most incomplete. For the first three years of the war Chiang Kai-shek emerged as the great leader of a united nation. Disunity set in after 1939 because of the growth of proto-fascist institutions such as the ubiquitous secret political police, concentration camps, censorship, suppression of civil liberties, official corruption, and war profiteering. Little or nothing is mentioned of such things, and China's liberal democrats are dismissed as men without a following, the author's information being based on a "chat" on a street corner which he had with a democratic leader.

Toward the end of the volume occurs a strange and significant episode: a friend of the author's recently traveled overland from Shanghai to Chungking. En route he saw officials and policemen who worked for the Japanese "pleasantly chatting" with representatives of "free China." The author's amazing conclusion is:

> For hard-boiled realism there is no one who can beat the common man (sic) of China. With him it is a question of three square meals a day, and if conditions are such that they cannot serve China, what difference does it make for the moment if they are pressed into the service of the puppet regime?

While writing, the author appears to have kept a jar of honey at hand, to smear over various episodes in his hero's life. He seems also to have taken a huge salt-shaker filled with Confucian proverbs, and sprinkled them over the whole manuscript, happily "chatting" all the while. His book could be better evaluated by the public had the publishers explained the author's activities in Europe during the Spanish Civil War, during which time the American press carried something about him. An objective biography of Chiang Kai-shek would be of service to the United Nations in this war for democracy, but this one fails to fill that need.

AGNES SMEDLEY

What Americans Think

MANDATE FROM THE PEOPLE. By Jerome S. Bruner. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.75.

BY WAY of high compliment one might say that 130,000,000 Americans have been co-authors of "Mandate from the People" and that their combined efforts have been brilliantly digested, analyzed, classified, and interpreted by Dr. Bruner, associate director of the Office of Public Opinion Research of Princeton University. Making full use of all the results of the recognized opinion pollers, Dr. Bruner has brought together in one modest volume the thinking of the American people on most of the social, political, and economic problems that will have to be resolved in the post-war years. He is to be particularly commended for having recognized the limitations of his basic data, public-opinion polls. Furthermore, while Dr. Bruner's own convictions are clearly progressive, he has been careful not to inject wishful thinking into his interpretations.

It is somewhat regrettable that the charts are not as self-explanatory to the layman as they should be. It is even more regrettable that the Appendix, which might have been a valuable self-contained summary of poll results, is used merely as a supplement, without page references for those polls cited in the text.

Two significant generalizations strike the reader on almost every page of this book. The first is the relative confusion, lack of understanding, and even ignorance of the public in matters of supreme importance. This is sometimes reflected in a mere lack of knowledge of the facts. Thus five months after the enunciation of the Atlantic Charter, only twenty-three of every hundred Americans had heard or read of that historic document. And only one-third of those twenty-three could name even one provision of the charter. Similarly, when the political question in North Africa had reached the boiling point, only four Americans in ten knew who De Gaulle was and only three in ten had heard of Giraud. Even more crucial, if less surprising, is the failure of the public to see the relationship between facts they know or convictions they hold. A 1943 poll shows that only 13 per cent of Americans opposed this country's participation in a world confederation. But a poll taken a few months previously showed that only 55 per cent favored joining "even if Russia had as much to say as the United States." Fifty-five per cent is still a majority, but one wonders what kind of world organization was in the minds of the 32 per cent who disapproved of an equal voice for the major powers, to say nothing of the minor powers. This sort of inconsistency appears to be a consistent characteristic of American public opinion.

The second generalization emerging from these pages is hardly surprising: Americans, like every other people, are motivated primarily by self-interest, and this self-interest is conceived in personal rather than in national terms. A job is returned from Guadalcanal

370
last week

—and only a bus met these silent, tired men!

A 100,000 more G.I.'s are coming back home every month... Are we going to let them sell apples on street corners again? Are we going to let demagogues exploit and subvert them? DO SOMETHING ABOUT THIS NOW! But first, read this book by a veteran and the son of a veteran. It's written for the veteran's family, friends and his employer...

"A thoughtful book about this complex problem that will make many of the succeeding tomes on the subject unnecessary."
—Chicago Sun Book Week

THE VETERAN COMES BACK

by WILLARD WALLER
Just published, $2.75

THE DRYDEN PRESS, 386 Fourth Ave., New York 16

MOTION PICTURES

DAVID O. SELZNICK
presents
SINCE YOU WENT AWAY
CLAUDETTE COLBERT
JENNIFER JONES
JOSEPH COTTEN
SHIRLEY TEMPLE
MONTY WOOLLEY
LIONEL BARRYMORE
ROBERT WALKER

IN PERSON!
That Ace Drummer Man
GENE KRUPA
and His Sensational ORCHESTRA
"That Swings with Strings"
Now Playing Cool Capitol B'way at 51st St.

"A commanding screen biography."
. . . Crowther, Times
DARRYL F. ZANUCK'S WILSON
A 20th Century-Fox Picture
On the Roxy stage . . .
FRED WARING and his Pennsylvanians
ROXY CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES

STAGE PLAYS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (In association with Jack H. Skirball)
JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL
The FRANZ WERFEL - S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN
LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS
J. EDWARD BROMBERG
MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED
Evenings at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK in
MEXICAN HAYRIDE
by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.
AIR CONDITIONED

far more important to the average American than an effective international organization. A poll taken this past winter showed that 53 per cent of the people were primarily concerned with domestic problems, and only 16 per cent with international affairs. (Campaign strategists, please note!) As might be expected, the concern with domestic problems increases the lower one goes in the economic scale.

Because of the inconsistency of the results, the polls cited by Dr. Bruner can, and undoubtedly will, be used by exponents of both sides of any particular argument. The attitude of Americans toward our enemies is a striking case in point. In future debates Rex Stout and Emil Ludwig will be using the following: Over 75 per cent of our people believe the peace treaty should be more severe than Versailles; 70 per cent believe that Germany will start preparing for another war if it loses this one; 63 per cent feel that reparations demanded by Versailles had nothing to do with the rise of Hitler; and 52 per cent think we should try to collect as much as possible from the Germans, even if it breaks them (8 per cent having no opinion). But Dorothy Thompson and Paul Hagen will counter as follows: Only 18 per cent of Americans hate the German people; only some 24 per cent feel that Germans always like war; 61 per cent say we should treat the Germans kindly and with consideration; only one in ten Americans favors dismemberment of Germany; and 64 per cent prefer that Germany continue intact under a new government.

In other words, "Mandate from the People" is a challenge to American educators. In view of the glaring failure of most Americans to relate economic realities to political opinions, it is a particular challenge to our economists. Every educator, economist, political analyst, propagandist, or aspirant to political office would do well to keep Dr. Bruner's book on his desk, not only because it can serve as a guide to what Americans think, but more significantly because it suggests methods of approach for any effort to make them think differently.

JAMES LOEB, JR.

CONTRIBUTORS

JAMES KERNEY, JR., editor of the Trenton Times, was appointed New Jersey State Director of the OPA by President Roosevelt. He serves on the Revision Commission, which drafted the new state constitution, and was recently appointed to the state's post-war planning group.

KARL LOEWENSTEIN is professor of Political Science at Amherst College.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS is an editor of the Partisan Review.

ALBERT GUERARD, professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University, is author of "The France of Tomorrow" and "Napoleon III."

AGNES SMEDLEY went to China at the outbreak of the Chinese revolution and lived there until recently. Her most recent book is "Battle Hymn of China."

JAMES LOEB, JR., is executive secretary of the Union for Democratic Action.

RECORDS

MY CHICAGO reader who reported on Defauw a few weeks ago made the point that in his performances one could not discover the principles which in most musicians' work account for both their successes and their failures. I was reminded of this by Serkin's recorded performance of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in E minor, which is on Columbia's August list (71594-D, $1). I have heard from Serkin beautiful-sounding and musically sensitive playing—for example in the recorded performance with Busch of Schubert's Grand Fantasia Opus 159, in the recorded Busch-Serkin Trio performance of Schubert's Opus 100, in concert performances of sonatas with Busch and concertos with Toscanini; and I can discover no principle that accounts both for this and for his clumsy and musically insensitive playing with Busch and Feuermann in a New Friends performance of a Mozart trio and with Stiedry in a performance of a Mozart concerto, or for the New Friends performance of Bach's "Goldberg" Variations, which revealed his complete unawareness of what was happening in the music while he was flinging out various forms of brilliant pianistic virtuosity. The newly issued performance of the Toccata and Fugue is like the one of the "Goldberg" Variations: while Bach is building up structural climaxes, at a couple of points in the fugue, Serkin is absorbed in building up pianissimos; and his rattling-off of the first fast section of the toccata robs the music of force and character and reduces it to insipidity. The recorded sound of the piano is dull and unresonant; surfaces are not bad.

Columbia also has issued Debussy's Sonata No. 3 for violin and piano played by Szigeti and Foldes (Set X-242; $2.50). This is Debussy's very last work, written when he was ill and could produce only a feeble patchwork of lifeless stylistic formulas and mannerisms. Into this Szigeti pumps the vitality of his playing, accompanied suavely by Foldes. The recorded sound of the violin is good; that of the piano dull; surfaces are not bad.

The rest of Columbia's August list is material from Columbia's catalogue that is newly packaged. First, in an album titled "A Wagner Concert," four single records with Wagner excerpts performed by Reiner and the Pittsburgh Symphony: the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the Preludes to Acts One and Three of "Lohengrin," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walküre" (Set 549; $4.50). I advised against these when they were first issued, because of the hurried, erratic performances or the recorded sound or both; and rehearing them has not changed my opinion. Then, in a newly illustrated album, the excellent and well-recorded Beecham-London Philharmonic performance of Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (Set X-180; $2.50). And, in another such album, Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody No. 1 played by Stock with the Chicago Symphony (Set X-203; $2.50). The performance is fair; when it was first issued I found its recorded sound noteworthy—after what Columbia had done previously with the Chicago Symphony—for its spaciousness, fidelity, and clarity; now I would add brashness, coarseness, and a little distortion to those qualities. Surfaces are not bad.

As for Victor, it has issued only one new set this summer; and the first record, placed on the turntable without identification, caused a friend to exclaim: "What is that infantile twaddle?" As it happened the infantile twaddle was the Brazilian composer Villa-Lobos's "A Próle do Bébé," or "The Child's Family," on which Artur Rubinstein saw fit to waste superb playing, and Victor to waste beautiful recording, plant, labor, and materials that might have been used for a hundred better things. Surfaces crackle and sputter a bit. (Set 970; $2.50.)

Columbia also has begun to repackage jazz records, reissuing in an album "Benny Goodman Sextet" (C-102; $2.50), eight performances chosen by Goodman himself from all that he recorded with various six-man combinations. They are "Rose Room," "Air Mail Special," "Flying Home," "I Found a New Baby," "Poor Butterfly," "Grand Slam," "Wang Wang Blues," and "As Long as I Live"; and in one after another I heard a slick going-through-motions that left me cold, until I got to the last one, in which there was the exquisite Cootie Williams solo that I remembered enjoying a few years ago, and fine playing by the others too. But this was spoiled by bad recording, which produced horrible break-ups of the sound even when the record was played with a heavy Astatic pickup.

Decca's "Ellingtonia Volume 2" in its Brunswick Collectors' Series (B-1011; $3.50) offers a few more early Ellington performances: the two-part 1931 "Creole Rhapsody" (80047); the two-part 1929 "Tiger Rag" (80048); the 1918 "Yellow Dog Blues" and "Tishomingo Blues" (80049); the 1929 "Jazz Convulsions" and 1928 "Awful Sad" (80050). The outstanding performance among these is "Tiger Rag," which is filled with brilliant and humorous solos. Of the others "Creole Rhapsody" has good moments, and "Awful Sad" one of Ellington's best tunes; the two blues are only so-so; and "Jazz Convulsions" is very dull.

As for newly recorded performances, Commodore offers the De Paris Brothers Orchestra's "Black and Blue" and "I've Found a New Baby" (552), which are quite good; and Muggsy Spanier and his Ragtimers' "Sweet Lorraine" and "September in the Rain" (1517), which are only fair. (I should add that Commodore has had its jam sessions not at Kelly's Stable but at Jimmy Ryan's.) And from Asch Records comes a set, "Mary Lou Williams" (450; $3.50), with three piano solos by Mary Lou—"New Drag" (1002), "Mary's Boogie" (1003), "St. Louis Blues" (1004)—coupled with performances by a small group that includes Frankie Newton on trumpet, Edmund Hall on clarinet, and Victor Dickenson on trombone—"Little Joe," "Roll 'Em," and "Lullaby of the Leaves." Mary Lou is a superb pianist, and much of her solo-playing in this set is excellent; but I find her "St. Louis Blues" too hectic and involved. She also gives the group performances great vitality; but the soloists are not interesting.

Ignore the notes which accompany the Ellington and Williams albums; they reach a new low even in that province of pretentious rubbish.

B. H. HAGGIN

40% off

In place of its regular yearly subscription rate of $5, The Nation offers a special 40 per cent reduced rate of $3 a year to all men now in the armed forces who have a service address in the United States or United States possessions.

to the Men in the Armed Forces

Letters to the Editors

What to Do?

Dear Sirs: What is a liberal going to do next November?

History has proved that there is no possible hope of any liberalism from the Republican Party. The greatest liberal advances in the history of the country have come under the Democratic administration of the last twelve years. Yet control of the Democratic Party has been taken over by the reactionary city bosses of the North plus the reactionaries of the deep South. Anybody with his eyes open knows that with such a control there is no possibility of a liberal program being continued even should Roosevelt be elected. The bosses now in control of the Democratic Party will not let him make good on any promises he may make—just as the Republican bosses four years ago would never have permitted Wendell Willkie to make good on his promises had he been elected.

Therefore, would it not be better to turn the country over in November to the frankly reactionary group—the Republican Party—than to turn it over to the reactionary bosses of the Democratic Party? Thus the Democratic Party could retain the reputation of being the one liberal hope in the country even in its defeat. And maybe in four years' time the liberal element of the Democratic Party can gain control once more and offer a truly liberal program and candidates in 1948.

I hate to vote for Mr. Roosevelt only to find that I have put in power the real controls of the Democratic Party at the present time—the Northern city bosses and the Southern reactionaries.

R. W. PENCE

Greencastle, Indiana, August 1

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription to your magazine.

☐ 1 Year $5 ☐ 2 Years $8
☐ 3 Years $11
☐ Remittance is inclosed ☐ Bill me

Introductory Offer to New Subscribers ONLY:

☐ 10 Weeks $1
Cash wih order

Canada $1 a year extra
Foreign $1 a year extra
Pan American Union requires no extra postage

Name ....
Address ....
8-26-44

Pretty Mad

Dear Sirs: I am beginning to get pretty mad on account of these reflections on my race.

I am a white man. So far as I know I have no Negro, Mongolian, or Indian blood. Though a Virginian by birth, I make no claim to be descended from Pocahontas. I have always thought that I was of English ancestry until recently, when a learned kinsman interested in genealogy revealed Scottish origin.

I am proud of my race, though to tell the truth I had not given the matter much thought until lately, when my race came under attack. In fact, I did not know that the white race needed any defending. I supposed that we had at least inherent equality and certainly acquired cultural superiority. That I now maintain. Against those eminent statesmen and learned anthropologists Talmadge, Bilbo, Rankin, Cotton Ed Smith, Reynolds, and others of equal eminence, who do not believe that the white race is able to hold its own in free competition with the Negro except by giving white people artificial and legal advantages in defiance of our American Constitution, I hereby assert without fear of successful contradiction that inherently the white race is equal to any other on earth, and that with centuries of cultural development behind us we can hold our own in competition with any other race.

And while I am on the subject of race, I want to defend my Anglo-Saxon and Celtic blood against the implicit charge that we are inferior to Semites. There are those who think that Jews are so much smarter than we are, that for our own protection it is necessary to close the field of free competition against Jews. Jews may be able to make money and secure teaching positions to such an extent that the rest of us will be pushed into the background. The big papers, the motion-picture industry, the banks, and department stores will be so controlled by Jews that the rest of us will have to take a back seat.

Now I resent that reflection on my race. Jews may be smarter, but they'll have to show it in a field of open and free competition. I do not fear the test. My belief in my own race is so strong that I challenge any other on earth to comparison in any worthy field.

It will be noted that these attacks on the white race and on "Nordics" come not from other races but from timid souls in our own camp who cannot trust inherent qualities and cultural tradition, but seek by force, by law, by discriminations and inequalities, by prejudice, to maintain their own supremacy. We all know that some people are superior to others in heredity, in character, in intelligence. Such persons do not usually go about proclaiming it. Others will find it out. But individuals afflicted with an inferiority complex must shout their alleged and fictitious superiority, and if they shout loud enough, there are some poor fools who will believe them and elect them to office.

JOHN C. GRANBERY
(Editor and publisher of
The Emancipator)

San Antonio, Texas, July 27

Contrary View

Dear Sirs: Yer chilluns is fighting and ye ain't seed nothing yet.

As long as unions can strike and the heads of unions can disclaim responsibility therefor, strikes will continue.

As long as heads of unions can declare the door open wide to Negroes, knowing that their members will not let them in, there will be riots and they will mostly be in the North. Down South, we let the Negroes work; that is what we bought them for, in the first place.

Ideology aside, this country is not ready for social equality between whites and blacks, nor is it ready for domination by unscrupulous union labor and only trouble and more trouble can result from trying to put them over.

This letter is meant in a kindly spirit

by one who is as anxious as you are to see the white and black races put on an equitable working basis. He just knows that social equality is simply impossible of attainment. Some segregational basis must be arrived at.

J. P. KEMPER

Baton Rouge, La., June 30

Better Late Than Never

Dear Sirs: Your issue of June 3 has just arrived and I am sufficiently impressed by the article by J. A. del Vayo, the editorial on Churchill, and the letter by a Negro private, to make a point of letting you know how much this magazine means to me. Cut off from daily papers, unable to obtain desired British political publications, I find myself more and more dependent upon The Nation, arrive though it must so late.

Permit me to echo the sentiments of B. S. in the article, Snapshot from Algiers, in so far as the attitude of American soldiers is concerned. I am much amused by the fact that B. S. thought to distinguish between American "soldiers" and "officers"—if one chooses officers on a basis including knowledge of the war and its causes, one would have too small an officer corps! But it remains an incontrovertible and sad fact that not only are American soldiers (and I include the officers) ignorant of what the war is about and what they are fighting for, but also they don't care to learn—they might be inwardly compelled to do more!

SGT. W. A. C.

Somewhere in England, July 8

Music and Politics

Dear Sirs: Judging from his letter in The Nation of August 12, Andor Foldes believes that a music critic who actually criticizes the music of his own time is a "die-hard reactionary," and therefore not the right critic for a liberal publication. Does Mr. Foldes feel that the politically conservative New York Herald Tribune must have a music editor who does not like the work of modern composers?

I find it impossible to see any relationship between a person's musical and political views. I disagree with many of Mr. Haggin's opinions, such as his admiration for Verdi's operas and his lack of admiration for Bruckner's symphonies; but I have never read an article of Mr. Haggin's which did not seem to be based on a careful and logical personal evaluation of the music being discussed.

If Mr. Foldes really believes that Mr. Haggin is "engaged in a one-man campaign against everything good written today in music," he should read what Mr. Haggin has written about the music of Ernest Bloch. If Mr. Foldes really believes that Mr. Haggin has neither patience nor understanding, he should read what Mr. Haggin has written about the string quartets of Beethoven, the piano sonatas of Schubert, the "Romeo and Juliet" of Berlioz.

S. D. R.

Pittsburgh, August 10

The Powers and the Peace

Dear Sirs: I read the editorial Churchill's Blunderbuss, in your issue of June 3 with a good deal of interest.

Your opposition to a world dominated and ruled by the big three seems to me to be a little belated as well as naive. Hasn't it been evident for a long time that the peace we were to have was a great powers peace? A peace based on the imperialistic greed of the great powers who would preserve their gains by force.

Teheran did nothing to change this outlook.

Your sharp criticism of Churchill contrasts oddly with your considerate restraint toward Stalin. Has Stalin not gone as far and farther than Churchill in his proposed "New Deal" for Europe?

Here are a few samples. Recognition of Badoglio, unilateral action in the case of Poland with resulting increase in Russian territory and the probable destruction of even the home of a free Poland, the absorption of the Baltic states without consulting the people involved or permitting them to express their preference in a neutrally supervised plebiscite. Just one or two more examples. The proposed "compensation" of Poland by purely German territory and German population and lastly the Carthaginian peace offered by Stalin to Finland, a peace designed to destroy Finland by undermining it economically, later to be gobbled up à la the Baltic states. A part of Stalin's design since the Hitler-Stalin pact.

The only puzzle is what is America's share of the booty to be. Certainly our Allies (the big two) shrug off all idealistic nonsense of a just peace. They hope for a "lasting" peace of their own design of course.

What puzzles this reader is that a paper once regarded as clinging to the truth no matter how unpleasant should now accept the fellow traveler attitude in foreign affairs.

On this day of the invasion it is more and more evident that the only menace to a just and durable peace comes from the great powers among the United Nations. Germany and Japan are doomed to defeat and are no longer a menace.

In the perhaps unjustified hope that The Nation will once more view the world more objectively I'm enclosing my renewal subscription.

ANNE KERR

Frederick, S. D., June 6

In Memoriam

Dear Sirs: August 22 brought back to me poignant memories of that black day in 1927 when Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti were executed by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. And I remember talks with the two in jail and prison, correspondence with them, speaking tours of industrial cities in their behalf, and picketing the State House in Boston with many others in the last days before Governor Fuller gave the decision that sent them to the electric chair.

Those talks with "a poor fish peddler and a good shoemaker" were rich treasure to me. Both were aware of significant happenings in the outside world. They knew, for instance, of the pretensions to power by the upstart Mussolini in their homeland before Il Duce's name was in American newspaper headlines, and they saw him not only as a social menace in Italy, but as a danger to world peace.

Our society killed them for their social opinions. They were among the first of the "premature anti-Fascists."

ROSE PESOTTA

New York City, August 11.

An Honest Critic

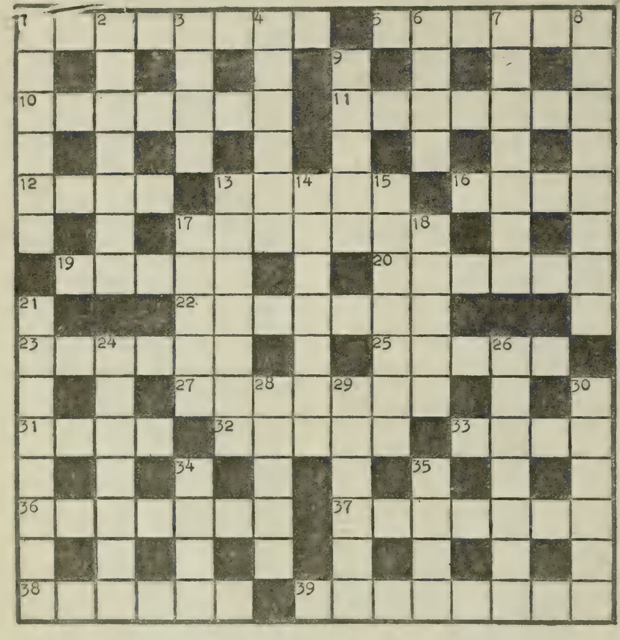
Dear Sirs: I see that one of your correspondents takes exception, in words probably intended to be humorous, to Mr. Agee as film critic. Criticisms of films in the average newspaper, like reviews of books, are inseparably linked with advertising and thus worth nothing. At a time when three-fourths of the film output is practically rubbish, an honest critic like James Agee is highly desirable.

MARC T. GREENE

Portland, Maine, August 7

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 78

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Soft words don't butter them
5 That last touch that means so much
10 One having [illegible] special liking for anything
11 Ruler of the Black Forest elves (hyphen, 3-4)
12 Flower girl
13 A pearl fisher, perhaps
16 Painting made by a dub
17 Lampoons
19 Word that makes the bus go
20 Breakfast food that sounds as though it should be continued
22 Absurd country judge in The Merry Wives of Windsor
23 Where they are hardly likely to forget Pearl Harbor
25 Poison
27 Led astray
31 "All who joy would win must share it, happiness was born a ----" (Byron)
32 He is beyond human aid
33 They have been known to drown
36 Colonies where a considerable amount of monkey business goes on 37 London district surrounded by spies
38 — — — —
39 Erroneously apprenticed to a pirate, instead of a pilot, in the operetta

DOWN

1 Very loud in the mass? Oh, nonsense!
2 Character in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered
3 Can be soaked yet still remain dry
4 A lady's order to the hairdresser to let?
6 "Ill fares the land, to hastening ---- a prey, Where wealth accumulates, and men decay" (Goldsmith)
7 Simulate
8 Welcome to the thirsty American, but not to the nervous fielder
9 Look it up, and it will be all the same if you do it now
13 Spirited
14 The penultimate chapter usually sees his finish
15 Rally
17 The Simple One sometimes mentioned in these clues
18 "Those we desire never see" (hidden)
21 Pony race
24 They spend their lives in public service
26 King's barber in If I Were King (McCarthy)
28 Eat it, or drink it
29 He lawfully opens other people's letters
30 Just what the doctor ordered, perhaps
34 A rich source, and it belongs to me
35 Pens may be driven, but pencils must be this

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 77

ACROSS:—1 FRIENDS; 5 SCALPEL; 9 NIFTIER; 10 UNBATED; 11 EGG; 13 HEROES; 15 OSTEND; 16 STRETCH; 17 WHOA; 19 INKY; 20 SATINWOOD; 21 PORK; 23 OSLO; 26 HEINOUS; 28 SAWYER; 29 SPLINT; 30 ASS; 32 UNIFORM; 33 OARSMAN; 34 STENTOR; 35 ENSURES.

DOWN:—1 FANSHAW; 2 INFERNO; 8 NOISES; 4 SURE; 5 SLUG; [illegible] AMBUSH; 7 PATTERN; [illegible] LADY-DAY; 12 GLEANINGS; 14 STUTTER; 15 OCTOPUS; 18 ASK; 19 IDO; 21 POSEURS; 22 RAWHIDE; 24 SWIMMER; 25 OUTINGS; 26 HE-GOAT; 27 SPIRES; 30 AMIR; 31 SOLE.

RESORTS

The Oaks
ELBERON, N. J.
Enjoy all outdoor sports, excellent tennis, [illegible] bathing, delicious cuisine, in this American plan country estate. On Highway 4N, only 50 miles from N.Y.C. (Jersey Central [illegible] Pennsylvania R.R. direct to Elberon.)
Phone Long Branch 2433
Mgt. of Joseph Horowitz

FOR VACATION FUN AND REST
55 Miles from New York a vacation "heaven," breath-takingly beautiful countryside—delicious food—restful indoor activities—invigorating enjoyable outdoor sports: Tennis—swimming—ping pong—volley ball—bowling—outdoor dancing—bicycling—(horseback riding and golf nearby). You're welcome at any time and for any time. Write for booklet.
plum point
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

SHADYBROOK
MAHOPAC, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 963
50 miles from N. Y. C. 140 acres rustic country, secluded, restful, homelike. Unexcelled American cuisine. Tennis, handball, etc.; swimming. Free MOVIES.
AUGUST—$40 Weekly; $7 per day
Write for Booklet N POPPER [illegible] SIMON

CHILDREN'S CAMP

SMILING HILLS CAMP
EAST STROUDSBURG PENNSYLVANIA
A progressive camp for boys and girls, from 4 to 12 years of age. All activities. Non-sectarian. Non-regimented. Individual care. (Limited to 50 campers)
Write:
James & Nellie Dick, Modern School, 115 Cary St., Lakewood, N. J. Phone 1007

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, Chatham, New York, offers 300 New York-Massachusetts Berkshire Hills farms.

FURNISHED ROOM

BROOKLYN—Newly furnished, cozy, private bath. Near subway, library, museum, Botanic Gardens. Sunshine, flowers. Jewish nutritionist offers refined home to discriminating man. $15 week; board by arrangement. Box 1484, c/o The Nation.

WANTED

WANT INTERVIEW with philanthropist interested in financing small magazine building understanding for League of Nations. Box 1483, c/o The Nation.

WANTED TO PURCHASE

PHONOGRAPH LANGUAGE SETS. Language, Room 1203, 18 East 41st St., N. Y. C. 17.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well [illegible] the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 2, 1944 NUMBER 10

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 253

EDITORIALS

Let France Clean House by Freda Kirchwey 255
The Peace Plans 257

ARTICLES

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 258
Nelson vs. Wilson by I. F. Stone 259
Moscow Looks at Dumbarton Oaks by Anna Louise Strong 261
In the Wind 262
Watch the West Coast by Carey McWilliams 263
Polls, Propaganda, and Politics 266
75 Years Ago in The Nation 266

POLITICAL WAR

Paris Rises by J. Alvarez del Vayo 267
Way Out for the Balkans by Bogdan Raditsa 267
Vargas on the Defensive 269

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Faith of Aldous Huxley by Diana Trilling 270
John L. by Philip Taft 271
Balkan Memoir by Rustem Vambery 272
The Ultimate Fanfare by James Stern 273
Sedition by Mail by Victor Riesel 275
In Brief 277
Music by B. H. Haggin 277
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 278
CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 79 by Jack Barrett 280

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Editor Political War Section J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON ▪ MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON
Director of Nation Associates LILLIE SHULTZ
Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE NEWS FROM FREED FRANCE, POURING out in exuberant abundance, is filled with the color and fierce excitement that should characterize the rebirth of a great nation of revolutionary traditions. One reads the transcript of a radio talk made from the square in front of Notre Dame. De Gaulle arrives to join the multitude in a solemn Te Deum in the ancient cathedral. Suddenly the noise of shots, shouts, breaks into the broadcast. Then silence. Then the announcer describes the flurry of gunfire, the rush of people to shelter, and the unforgettable sight of De Gaulle walking into the cathedral, slowly, with absolute calm, through a hail of shots. "It was the most extraordinary example of courage I have ever seen." . . . One meets Sacha Guitry, under arrest as a collaborationist, complaining to reporters at the Palais de Justice that really he should be treated better as "a man of refinement and cultivation." (For the interview, Guitry was dressed in a beige worsted checked suit and a shirt "of white silk with a flowery pattern in red, white, green, and purple.") . . . One reads the painful, squirming letters exchanged among the Vichy officials and their Nazi bosses—Pétain, Laval, Abetz—side by side with the dignified final protest of the great democrat, Herriot, betrayed by Laval to the Germans. (How fitting and inevitable that climax!) . . . Or Pétain's miserable last plea to his fellow countrymen to obey the leaders "who tell you to follow a policy of reconciliation and renaissance of France through reciprocal forgiveness and love of your fellow countrymen—those are the real French leaders. Be at their side." Thus the ancient gravedigger takes his departure. . . . The story piles up—jumbled, contradictory, impossible to piece together. But one thread of meaning runs through it: Victory in France is synonymous with revolution.

*

HITLER'S BALKAN EMPIRE IS NOW IN RUINS. Under the impact of the renewed Russian offensive Rumania has switched sides and with its defection the Nazi positions throughout the Balkans, already precarious, have become untenable. As we go to press Russian tanks and motorized infantry are pouring into the Ploesti oil region, and Rumanian troops are fighting their recent allies. Bulgaria has approached the Western Allies for peace terms and has promised Russia not only to get out of the war, but to disarm all German forces in the country. It is believed, though no announcement has been made, that Bulgaria has agreed to evacuate the Greek and Yugoslav territories with which Hitler had purchased its support. In Hungary, another tottering satellite, the Germans are likely to hold on desperately since Hungary is in the path of retreat for their Balkan forces. Moreover, it is their last remaining source of natural oil. Hence they are attempting to tighten their grip on the country by means of a reorganization of its quisling government. But it remains to be seen whether they can keep the Hungarian army fighting the Russians in southern Poland now that the Rumanians are moving troops to recover Transylvania. That province was Hungary's reward for joining the Axis and they are far more concerned with saving it than with helping to hold back the Red Army from the German frontier. And so the Nazis, faced with a Russian sweep endangering their whole southern flank, suddenly find allies changed to enemies. The collapse of Axis power in Rumania and Bulgaria will in turn force a German withdrawal from Yugoslavia and Greece and the time may not be far distant when Tito's Partisans will link up with the Red Army. As Bogdan Raditsa writes elsewhere in this issue, "The long, dark Balkan night is over." Soon this war-torn corner of Europe should begin to turn to the problems of the new day which he discusses.

*

THE SPEECH WHICH COUNT CARLO SFORZA delivered in Rome last week was the first public declaration of Italy's foreign policy by a member of the Bonomi cabinet and the first practical attempt to solve the long-standing difficulties between Italy and the Balkans. As far as Greece is concerned, Sforza declared that "if the population of the Dodecanese Islands wishes to be annexed to Greece," Italy will have no objection. The desire of the population on the islands—and of the entire Greek people—is overwhelmingly in favor of that annexation, of course. Sforza asks that Fiume be made "one of the seats" of a super league of nations, to link eastern and western Europe and to solace Russia for its grievances at Geneva. Certainly, Yugoslavia is unlikely to accept such a solution to the problem of the Dalmatian Coast. Yugoslavia wants not only Fiume, but Zara, Istria, Gorizia, and also Trieste, which Sforza sees as an "internationalized" port, belonging officially to Italy, but in whose administration Yugoslavia would have a hand. This last suggestion is a step forward from Sforza's attitude of some twenty years ago, and the Yugoslavs, if not the Italians, may be inclined to look favorably upon it. They will not hesitate to underline the necessity, which Sforza pointed out, of a Yugoslav federal union with Bulgaria, stretching from the Adriatic to the Black Sea. This is the Mazzinian conception of Italian foreign policy, which Sforza honestly defended during his career. It is encouraging to see it returning to life.

*

IN FORWARDING HIS LATEST LEND-LEASE report to Congress the Preident urged: "Until the unconditional surrender of both Japan and Germany, we should continue the lend-lease program on whatever scale is necessary to make the combined striking power of all the United Nations as overwhelming and as effective as we can make it." Considering the fact that we have been fighting the whole global war as a joint enterprise, the continued pooling of resources after the fall of Germany ought to be beyond argument. But such groups as the National Association of Manufacturers are insinuating that the prolongation of lend-lease will enable Britain to hold down its national debt at our expense and to obtain unfair advantages in world trade. According to some unnamed informants quoted by the Wall Street Journal, Britain will be able to supply its own military needs for a finish fight with Japan after Germany is knocked out. Therefore, it is asserted, the continuance of lend-lease would permit British industry to be more rapidly reconverted than American, giving it a head start in post-war exports. It would be more accurate to say that if Britain does not continue to receive lend-lease aid, particularly in the form of food, it will be compelled to divert industrial capacity from armament manufacture to the production of export goods in order to be able to pay for those imports it must obtain or starve. In any event, as the President's report points out, American cash exports—that is, other than lend-lease goods—have been maintained at pre-war levels and have been increasing for the past year. On the other hand, British exports have been deliberately cut to the bone in the interests of greater war production and are now barely 50 per cent of their pre-war value. In the post-war trade stakes American traders are miles in front.

*

WHEN THE NEWS OF THE RESIGNATION OF Brazil's Foreign Minister, Oswaldo Aranha, appeared in the American press, it caused an immediate sensation. Brazil has been generally looked upon in this country as one of South America's stable dictatorships; thanks both to the tight censorship of Vargas's Department of Propaganda and to the influence exercised at this end by the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, almost none of the events leading up to the present government crisis have been made public. A few of them are briefly sketched in the Political War Section this week, and The Nation plans to follow events in Brazil with close attention in the weeks ahead. Meanwhile, the question that most agitates Americans is whether Aranha's resignation will draw Brazil away from the United States and closer to Argentina. This may, of course, happen.

But a profound rivalry exists between the two leading South American countries, and Brazil's ties with the United States are cemented with many millions of dollars' worth of lend-lease material and bases. Certainly Vargas will do his best to maintain his good—and profitable—relations with us, while he attempts to bolster up his internal position with repression and every other fascist technique. He may hope to act as mediator between Argentina and the United States and he may even move closer to Argentina and try to form a common front against the spread of "communism" on the continent. But whatever course he takes in foreign relations, we can be sure that his general policy will be dictated by one aim—to keep his own crowd in power and his own head on his shoulders. This is what really lies behind his prompt acceptance of Aranha's resignation.

*

HERBERT HOOVER MUST HAVE REJOICED AS the House Ways and Means Committee reaffirmed its faith in "rugged individualism" by eliminating the last of the George bill's provisions for orderly demobilization of the country's war workers. Not satisfied with having rejected a federally sponsored retraining program for war workers and having knocked out all arrangements for helping migrant war workers to return to their homes, the committee refused to extend the benefits of unemployment insurance to the millions of emergency federal employees who will be displaced at the end of the war. With these provisions eliminated, the George bill remains little more than an empty shell. If the committee has its way, civilian demobilization is to be carried out on an each-man-for-himself basis. Regardless of the economic fallacy of supposing that an orderly adjustment to a peacetime economy can be made in such a fashion, the committee has shown incredibly poor judgment in taking this action in face of the critical situation on the manpower and production front. Manpower authorities are seriously disturbed by the fact that many war workers are quitting their jobs to seek permanent civilian positions. In recent weeks the War Manpower Commission has been making a special effort to persuade civilian workers and men thrown out of work by cut-backs to migrate to areas where there is still a shortage of manpower. By announcing that war workers will have to fend for themselves without federal assistance when hostilities end, the Ways and Means Committee is, in effect, sabotaging the manpower program. We trust that the President will intervene before too much damage has been done.

*

IT IS A CRIME, IT WOULD SEEM, FOR THE Department of Justice to attempt to enforce the law when the law is the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and the defendants are wealthy corporations. This is the only conclusion to be drawn from the unmeasured abuse hurled at the department whenever it invokes the act against really powerful vested interests. The latest instance is the reaction to a suit filed by Assistant Attorney General Wendell Berge in Lincoln, Nebraska, against forty-seven Western railroads, their New York bankers, and other coadjutors, charging them with unlawful agreements to restrict competition. Roaring defiance at the department, Charles E. Johnston, chairman of the Western Association of Railroad Executives, one of the defendant organizations, declared that the Attorney General was seeking to set up a dictatorship over industry by attempting to enforce "a revolutionary change . . . in the method of establishing freight rates." This, in a sense, is true. It will be revolutionary if the Department of Justice ends a system by which secret cabals of "competitors" fix freight rates, by which the Southern and Western states are charged discriminatory rates which hinder their industries from developing in competition with those of the East, by which improvements in railroad services and facilities are retarded in order to avoid "wasteful competition." It will be a revolutionary change but a very salutary one. The railroads, the Eastern bankers who control them, and their Eastern editorial supporters may rant and sneer but the South and West will take a very different view. As Carey McWilliams points out in his article on page 263, this question of discriminatory freight rates is a burning issue on the Pacific coast. It is no less so in the South. For in both these "colonial" regions men of all political colors are girding for battle to protect their war-born industries from destruction by Eastern monopolists.

Let France Clean House

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE hour is one for rejoicing, but for rejoicing tempered by watchfulness, for rejoicing backed by determination. Paris is free; France is being liberated; the Russian forces in the East are driving toward the walls of Hitler's inner fortress—but Hitler is not defeated. Whether his power will collapse suddenly or will gird itself for fierce, suicidal resistance, no one knows. The military factors involved in this question are discussed on another page by Charles G. Bolté. The political factors cannot be weighed; they can only be cited.

Mr. Churchill thinks the war has been growing less ideological as it nears its end. Surely he is wrong. The war is becoming more ideological. Indeed, only when the military struggle is finished will the political struggle really get under way. But even now political elements enter into every calculation. Whether or not the Nazi armies force the Allies to conquer Germany inch by inch depends not only on the weight and disposition of men and armor; it depends as greatly on the moral strength of the Nazi idea in the army and among the people. If Hitler's "sacred fanaticism" controls the behavior of both, the war will go on as long as weapons and men remain. Even if the people are as disillusioned and war-weary as reports indicate, the army might still fight hard on the frontier, as it has done with less reason in many isolated strongholds in France. But if the conviction of ultimate defeat has begun to undermine both the stamina of the people at home and the will of the soldiers to kill and to die, then collapse may come soon and suddenly. We do not know how much political strength Hitler has left and so speculation about the duration of the war, while natural, is futile. It may even prove demoralizing if the fight wears on into next winter. What is needed is a kind of tough fatalism, a determination to fight and produce as if Hitler's armies were at the peak of their power; and to back the military offensive with propaganda calculated to hurry the disintegration of Nazi arrogance and zeal.

BURLINGAM

But the morale of Hitler's cohorts is only one of the political factors that men of democratic temper must weigh. The freeing of Paris, largely through the magnificent revolt of its population, and the successful operations of the F.F.I. all over France, give notice to friends as well as foes that the future of the country will be what its resistance forces wish it to be. Do not doubt that De Gaulle knows that and accepts it. Writers who prophesy, with what sounds like a note of malicious hope, mounting difficulties between the provisional government and the resistance, offer no proof. And De Gaulle's appointed officials in France have by all accounts gone out of their way to defer to the men and women who have fought their way through the years of occupation and Nazi terror.

When the government moves to Paris, it will undoubtedly be reorganized to take in a greater number of resistance leaders. Differences will arise; political divisions have not been wiped out by the struggle for liberation. But the passionate desire in all groups for a renovated democracy is likely to give France a period of genuine cooperation among the resistance elements.

Where a political break is likely is in the ranks of the provisional government itself. The removal of the government to France will certainly necessitate a purge of dubious elements. The Algiers administration is cluttered with souvenirs of British-American diplomacy: pre-war bureaucrats as well as Vichy left-overs from the days of Darlan and Giraud. These must go if the government is to have the confidence or properly represent the revolutionary fighters of France. Even some honest patriots may be forced out of a regime which must provide a maximum of toughness, coupled with energy and efficiency, to meet the demands of a great nation laid waste by four years of slavery and looting.

Above all, the fascists and collaborationists must be cleaned out of every government office, every courtroom, every school, every newspaper in France. The purge must be thorough or the purposes of the struggle will have been lost. The French in the liberated areas have already shown their determination to do the job, and so far the Allied military authorities have had the sense to keep their hands off and let the people who have suffered mete out justice to those who betrayed them.

Is this a fixed policy or, when the French civil administration takes hold under the agreements just signed by General Eisenhower and General Koenig, will the Allies try to deflect these processes from their appointed course? It is impossible to forget that the danger of "disorder" was as often urged as the danger of "dictatorship" to justify American hostility to the Free French. It is impossible to forget Allied intervention in North Africa on behalf of collaborationists accused of treason or other political crimes. Perhaps that page in the history of our relations with France has been torn out and the new agreements inserted in its place. But if this is so, why was Robert Murphy recently made General Eisenhower's adviser on French affairs? And why do we now hear that he is being seriously considered for the post of American representative to the provisional government?

Defenders of Mr. Murphy like to remind one that he had favored the recognition of De Gaulle for some time before the General visited Washington. This may well be true. Our French expert is an old hand at expediency. Like his friend Darlan, he knows when to switch sides. But this explanation is not apt to satisfy French democrats who take seriously their fight against fascism whether of Berlin or Vichy make. To appoint Robert Murphy representative to the French provisional government would be a profound insult to the men and women who have risked their lives to exterminate the very elements whom Murphy protected and helped establish in power.

The French people know what Murphy will never know—and why should he when so great a leader as Churchill also fails to recognize it?—that this war is a fragment of an unfinished revolution. Hitler must be defeated; but also, and equally, the men who defended him and made deals with him and profits out of him—the friends of Robert Murphy—must be defeated. And the system of control, political and economic, that bred the whole fascist plague must be defeated. All this is happening in France. It will happen in other parts of Europe, even if we should use the power of food and money and diplomacy to try to prevent it. One Murphy will not stop a revolution; but the appointment of Murphy would go far to convince the people of France, and of other countries too, that even now, with our armies fighting their way to Germany, we Americans have only the foggiest idea what the war is all about.

IN BRIEF

ANNA AND THE KING OF SIAM. By Margaret Landon. The John Day Company. $3.75.

There is extremely rich material in this story of the English woman, Anna Leonowens, who in the 1860's was engaged to teach English to the children and favorite concubines of the King of Siam. Mrs. Landon has done an extraordinary amount of conscientious research, and she handles her subject with competence and taste. Having lived for ten years in Siam, she knows the background of her story very well and has filled it in with great care. In a way the trouble with the book is that Mrs. Landon has not taken enough liberties with her material, partly because of her admirable desire to stick to the facts but mainly because she lacks the artists's flair that might make of her material the Arabian Nights tale which, in essence, it is. Likewise her heroine, the frail but redoubtable Anna, whose passion for uplift had its triumphs even in Siam, fails to take on her legitimate symbolic character as foil to the Oriental splendor and sordidness of the Siamese court, and she is not particularly engaging in her own right. The book is interesting, nevertheless, and it contains some wonderfully choice items—for instance, the description of Queen Victoria by the King's ambassador to the Court of St. James's. "One cannot but be struck with the aspect of the august Queen of England, or fail to observe that she must be of pure descent from a race of goodly and warlike kings and rulers of the earth, in that her eyes, complexion, and above all her bearing are those of a beautiful and majestic white elephant."

MUSIC

THERE was an occasion last spring to formulate my ideas on the critic's function and his relations to artist and reader. The occasion was a panel-discussion of dance criticism at the Y. M. H. A., in which I participated as a critic in another field who might have ideas on criticism in general that would be applicable to criticism of the dance. The subject of the discussion was "What Is Fair and Unfair in Dance Criticism?"; and my way of answering that question was to state what I thought was possible in criticism—what a critic could and should do.

Recently, I said, there have been people who have thought themselves ideally equipped to write about music for the lay newspaper or magazine audience by the fact that they operated on a level of insight, judgment, and taste no more professional or educated than their readers' own. But the idea used to be that the man who wrote about an art should be someone who could give his readers the benefit of an ability to see or hear more than they could. And that, I think, is the correct idea. The critic, properly, is someone with superior powers of perception who says to his reader: "This is what I have seen or heard"; after which the reader looks or listens, and says: "Why yes—how true, how wonderful!" But of course he also may say: "Why no—I don't see or hear that; I see or hear this." So with the critic's evaluation of what he perceives: "Why yes," says the reader, "such qualities make the work bad." But he also may say: "Why no—."

I went on to point out that according to this conception of the critic's activity he writes for his reader, not for the artist. And I made this point because the artist has a tendency to think that the critic operates primarily for him. Aaron Copland, for example, has argued that it is the critic's duty to nurture the artist—to tell him what is good in his work and what is bad, and presumably what can be improved and how to improve it. That, I contend, is not correct. If we assume, as we should, that the artist works from inner necessities, then it is for him to produce whatever those necessities dictate, and for the critic only to report to his reader what they have dictated. It is true, I added, that in such a report the critic does have certain obligations to the artist—the obligation to bring an unprejudiced and receptive mind to the artist's work, to keep that mind entirely on that work, and to report honestly what it finds there; the obligation, in other words, to write a criticism of the work, not to misuse it and misrepresent it in an exhibition of the critic's own cleverness, his wit, his learning, his pet ideas, his amusing style. But the critic who operates with competence and with un-self-conscious absorption in the work he is dealing with—this critic operates as he should, and with fairness to artist and reader.

All of this could be elaborated; what I want to say a little more about right now is the reader's "Why no—." As I have described the critic's activity it consists in using his powers of perception and evaluation to animate those of his reader. To animate—not to dictate: what the critic tells the reader about a piece of music the reader can accept as true for himself only if his own ears and mind verify it. But if the critic may not impose his greater insights on the reader, neither may the reader impose his lesser insights on the critic.

The reader who tries to do this, as I pointed out recently, is someone who, because he cannot hear something, does not believe anyone else can. One could say that he doesn't credit even the critic with insights greater than his own; but the truth is that he isn't aware of insights being involved. And this is only one of the misconceptions that add up to his ignorance about music and everything connected with it—composition, performance, criticism. He has no understanding of what sort of personal resources—of mind, emotion, character, experience—are involved, along with mere facility in sound, in the creation of good music; or of such personal resources being involved, along with mere facility of fingers, in good performance. And he has no understanding of the fact that an equipment of the same professional caliber—both in sensitiveness to the medium and in personal resources

Will Your Car Outlast the War?

As a special wartime service to owners of ALL MAKES of cars, General Motors offers a new edition of The Automobile User's Guide, containing 196 practical suggestions on such subjects as how to get better gasoline economy, how to prolong tire life, how to keep your car in the best operating condition, etc.

THE AUTOMOBILE USER'S GUIDE WITH WARTIME SUGGESTIONS

→ You Can Get a
→ FREE COPY
→ from Any G M
→ Dealer—or by → Using Coupon.

Customer Research Dept., Room 1817
GENERAL MOTORS, DETROIT 2, MICH.
Please send FREE COPY of new 64-page
"AUTOMOBILE USER'S GUIDE"

Name..
please print

Address..
please print

City..
State

Make & Model of Car Owned..*

—is involved in good criticism. That is why he is shocked by the critic's disrespect for a composer or violinist, but feels free to be arrogant to the critic.

It is also why he is shocked by the critic's intensity about what he thinks good or bad. That is, he doesn't realize it is the intensity of the professional who cares deeply about his art. Toscanini becomes enraged when a phrase is not as it should be, because that phrase is something he cares about. And Shaw once wrote: "People have pointed out evidences of personal feeling in my notices as if they were accusing me of a misdemeanor, not knowing that a criticism written without personal feeling is not worth reading. It is the capacity for making good or bad art a personal matter that makes a man a critic."

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

ANNA LOUISE STRONG first went to Russia in 1921 and has been a sympathetic observer of its development ever since. In 1930 she organized the Moscow Daily News, the first English-language paper in Russia. Her books include "Children of Revolution," "This Soviet World," "The Remaking of an American," and "I Change Worlds."

CAREY McWILLIAMS, well-known sociologist, is the author of "Brothers Under the Skin," "Ill Fares the Land," and "Factories in the Field."

CHARLES G. BOLTE, The Nation's regular contributor on military affairs, joined the British army before Pearl Harbor and fought as a lieutenant under General Montgomery.

PHILIP TAFT teaches economics at Brown University.

RUSTEM VAMBERY was formerly professor of criminal law at the University of Budapest.

JAMES STERN is the author of two volumes of short stories, "The Heartless Land" and "Something Wrong."

VICTOR RIESEL is labor editor of the New York Post.

"HEAVEN AND HELL"
The most definite teaching on the certainty of immortality and on the life hereafter is to be found in the Writings of
EMANUEL SWEDENBORG
famed scientist, philosopher, theologian and statesman. His book on HEAVEN AND HELL, FROM THINGS HEARD AND SEEN, may be obtained by new readers at the introductory price of five cents.
SWEDENBORG FOUNDATION, INC.
Room 1636, 51 East 42nd St., New York 17

Letters to the Editors

Prophecy

Dear Sirs: In his column of July 13, cabled from London, William Philip Simms wrote as follows:

"The outstanding impression which I brought back from Normandy is not the need for the United States to recognize General de Gaulle and his committee, as that General de Gaulle should recognize the United States."

In a fantasy entitled Mr. Hull's Bad Dream, published in The Nation on August 21, 1943, Paul Winkler wrote:

"The French Committee of National Liberation held a meeting in Algiers today, deliberating whether it should recognize the State Department as a body representing American interests."

Mr. Winkler's article was written in a satirical fashion, but it had a prophetic aspect.

Simms's point was that General de Gaulle has the necessary prestige for clearing up whatever misunderstandings may exist in France concerning America and Britain. Incidentally, this was his conclusion after he had visited Normandy. He had written a number of strongly anti-De Gaulle articles before he went abroad. MINNA DELMAN

New York, August 1

Soldiers and Votes

Dear Sirs: I recall reading some time ago in Letters to the Editors a communication which recounted at length the difficulties encountered in obtaining a soldier ballot. I am naturally not in a position to say whether the writer's account was strictly accurate but I would like to mention the fact that a different situation obtains in this part of the world.

In our particular outfit the War Ballot officers have been very active and efficient. Lectures—clear and unbiased—have been given to the troops and every opportunity has been offered to satisfy our questions on soldier voting. Just recently the first applications for ballots were quickly and thoroughly circulated. In fact, if an eligible soldier does not vote I would say it is entirely because of his own inertia. That remark applies only to the situation with which I am familiar.

It would be interesting to know the reactions of other soldiers. It seems to me the California case is an isolated instance—not that it isn't important to note isolated instances.

If I may put in a blurb for you, let me say that The Nation is coming through with admirable speed. It represents a fine source of stimulating opinion. Without it I would soon feel out of the running. Thanks to you for keeping me in touch with currents elsewhere.

K. W. G.

New Guinea, August 6

The Army Does Its Part

Dear Sirs: I think you might be interested in excerpts from a letter that I have just received from my younger brother, who is a non-commissioned officer serving in the United States Army abroad. I quote:

> The powers that be are going madly at the job of advising us of our voting rights, etc. Movies telling us that we are a democracy and that voting is a right we must exercise, pointing out to us that nobody can force us to vote if we don't want to, that our ballots are secret and that they don't give a damn whom we vote for, etc., whereas (as the film shows) in the Axis countries the soldiers are forced to vote and forced to vote for the dictator. . . . I doubt if most of the soldiers are going to vote. It has been made very easy for them to vote but from appearances they seem to believe that Roosevelt will get in anyway, regardless of how they vote. They want Roosevelt to be reelected but don't realize that he may need their votes. General thought is that Roosevelt got us into this Army, now let him get us out. There has been absolutely no electioneering. The War Department is being very scrupulous about that. I guess they don't want to get into any trouble with the Republicans.

I. FERGUSON

New York, August 3

The Hitch

Dear Sirs: "Soldier Voting Poster Number Two," was recently distributed to the Armed Forces by the War Department. The poster describes the methods and procedures for obtaining state absentee ballots. Upon casual and hasty inspection of the poster I noted the following statements:

New Mexico, The District of Columbia, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Kentucky have no provisions for absentee voting or have suits pending as to whether or not absentee voting is constitutional.

Alabama, Delaware, and Louisiana

The Peace Plans

SO FAR as can be judged from the outside the Dumbarton Oaks Conference is going well. The peace plans presented by the Big Three agree not only in most essentials but, to a considerable extent, in detail as well. On the chief issue, the necessity for creating an international security organization with power to prevent aggression, there is complete unanimity. As for detail, it is agreed that the new organization should be constructed on the same general lines as the League of Nations, with an assembly made up of delegates from all nations, great and small, and a council of eleven or twelve in which America, Britain, Russia, China, and probably France, would be permanently represented. The council would be responsible, as the American plan states it, "for the peaceful settlement of international disputes and the security of the nations." It would have the duty of deciding when and how military force should be employed in suppressing aggression. No international "police force" is provided for in the American or British plans; the forces employed would presumably be drawn from the regular armies of the members of the Big Four in whose sphere the aggression was committed. These forces would be called upon only after a majority vote of the council, in which all four of the major powers must concur.

It is easy to pick flaws in the proposals. They lack the mechanical perfection of Culbertson's superstate. Idealists will find that they are not based on as lofty a conception of principle as the League of Nations. To an even greater extent than the League, the new security organization will be frankly an instrument of the great powers. But although the proposed organization bears the marks of expediency, we must not allow its obvious defects to blind us to its immense constructive possibilities. Honest isolationists rarely object to international cooperation in principle. Their isolationism consists rather of refusing to participate in any particular venture in international cooperation because it does not fit their conception of an ideal world. The war has shown that we can no longer allow ourselves this luxury.

Judged in terms of political realities rather than abstract principle, the plan on which the Big Three are seemingly agreed has merit. It provides a mechanism for making the United Nations a permanent reality. The three Western powers that have shown themselves most interested in preserving peace—the United States, Britain, and the Soviet Union—are put in a position where they can no longer dodge the responsibility that goes with strength—as all of them did, at one time or another, in the late 1930's. Moreover, the plan seems to offer these three powers—without whose cooperation peace is impossible—a common interest for working closely together. This may be sufficient, as President Roosevelt has suggested, to provide "a peaceful period for our grandchildren to grow up in."

Assurance of peace however, is most certainly not provided by any scheme which leaves each of the major powers fully armed and the sole judge of its own behavior. The League operated fairly effectively in preventing wars between smaller nations, but it collapsed completely when confronted with differences between the major powers. This problem has been met only to the extent that the war has reduced the number of major powers. No mechanism has even been proposed for curbing aggression on the part of Britain, Russia, China, or the United States. Nor is provision made for action in case any one of the Big Four is reluctant, for one reason or another, to move against an aggressor. This means that each of the powers controlling the council will, in effect, make its own law within its sphere of influence, subject only to such moral suasion as the other powers and the smaller countries are able to exercise.

These weaknesses are, of course, inescapable in a plan that depends upon national armies for the enforcement of peace. No nation is going to permit its army to be ordered about, or its boys to be sent to war, by an international agency unless it concurs in the action. Only an army that is international in personnel and direction could be used impartially against all aggressors regardless of size or political alignments. Such an army has been ruled out as "impractical" by both the United States and Great Britain, presumably out of deference to isolationist opinion in this country. Russia has proposed the creation of an international air force, but the United States, as the leading air power, has been extremely cool to the idea.

Important though it is to work for a strengthening of the mechanism of the new organization, our main efforts in the coming months will doubtless have to be exerted in defending the plan against those who oppose even this halting step toward internationalism. Already there are indications of the nature of the campaign that will be waged against it. As in the case of Lodge's successful attack on the League, the campaign will not be directed against the organization in principle. Instead, the opposition will concentrate on details, hoping to weaken it beyond hope of effectiveness. Arthur Krock has suggested, for example, that isolationists may seek to emasculate the new organization by insisting that Congress retain power to veto the use of American troops by direction of the council, even though such action is approved by the American representative on the council. Dozens of other crippling reservations doubtless will be suggested. But 1944 is not 1920. The favorable reception given to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals throughout the country indicates that America is now prepared to accept the responsibilities it rejected a quarter of a century ago. That in itself represents progress.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

Hitler's Blitzkrieg in Reverse

RISKING the wrath of official Washington and the fate of all prophets, I am prepared to guess in print that Germany will be out of the war by November 15.

Indeed, November 15 may seem a very generous date; but we've learned from this war that when Jerry's in a hopeless position everybody knows he's licked except Jerry. On the other hand, we've also learned that when he's holding a last-ditch position and that position is then broken through, he cracks up very quickly. The Wehrmacht is now in a hopeless position, but it won't admit it's licked; inside ten weeks it should have been brought to a last-ditch position, that position should have been broken through, and then the Wehrmacht should have cracked up very quickly indeed. Remember the bitter fight the Germans made in Tunisia, until Alexander's brilliant break-through of the lines guarding Tunis and Bizerte, when German resistance suddenly vanished; substitute Germany proper for Cap Bon, and you can estimate how sudden the collapse will be.

Two weeks ago in these columns I said that the Germans must hold the line following the Seine from Havre to Paris and running southeast to Dijon, which protected the flying-bomb bases of the Pas de Calais and the approaches to the Reich. That line is already gone, punctured by half a dozen armored columns, and the enemy is evacuating the Pas de Calais. This means that the Battle of France is over, no matter if the enemy's tenacious and skilful rear guards delay the Allied advance to the borders of Germany. Strategically the Battle of (Copyright in All Countries.

EVACUEE TRAIN FROM PARIS

France was won when General Patton (arch-fiend become archangel through a twist in public relations) sent a column through Sens and Troyes quickly east, when the remnants of the German Seventh Army were squeezed in the Seine pocket after having lost most of their colleagues in the Argentan pocket, and when the Allies established Seine bridgeheads between Paris and the sea. Psychologically the whole Battle of Europe was won when Paris was liberated.

Psychology aside, the military picture is overwhelmingly one-sided, both in strength and in brains. The reverse blitzkrieg is showing itself a tremendously powerful, mobile, and fast weapon. We built up the strength needed for this multi-columned drive with only a single major port to funnel through, and that not in full working order. The enemy, crossed by our refusal to land in Pas de Calais, incredibly sent part of his Fifteenth Army to retrieve the Normandy debacle; thus weakened in the key sector, and having lost about thirty divisions, he is forced by the outflanking threat of that Patton column east of Troyes to leave the Pas de Calais altogether.

Swiftest progress may still be expected in the center of the northern French front, towards Alsace and Lorraine, and in the south, where the enemy is thin on the ground and the F. F. I. strongest, towards the important Belfort Gap—a highway to the Reich which will be held with determination. In the north the rear guards will fight hard, to allow the flying-bomb crews to get in their dirty work and the Todt gang to build up the Westwall. This may be extended to the sea, possibly along the Albert Canal, the shortest line across Belgium. Then, if this line can be strengthened enough to enforce delay, there is General Brereton's new command, an entire airborne army, big enough to take any such fixed fortifications from the rear and open the route into Germany.

Meanwhile victory comes like the sun from the East, as it did twenty-six years ago. The Balkan bastion is split wide open, and although no one has to go to Berlin by way of the Iron Gate, the German and satellite divisions here are largely lost to the enemy—perhaps a hundred of them have been erased from the Oberkommando's order of battle in the past ten days.

Also lost are the Ploesti oilfields, as the highly-touted Galati Gap defenses have been swept away. As the circle constricts about the Reich, the Wehrmacht—including the Luftwaffe—is trying to wage mobile defensive warfare without gas. Buried in the headlines of the past weeks is one of the great air-power stories of the war: the attrition of synthetic-oil refineries by Allied bombers. Actually the significance of this offensive is second only to the Black Week of the Luftwaffe last February, when the USAAF crippled Germany's warplane potential on the assembly line.

That is the picture: France lost, the Balkans going, Warsaw threatened with encirclement and the way thus to be opened for a drive to the Oder, constant pressure in Italy tying down precious divisions, no gas. It is a picture without hope for Germany. But the SS seems to be in charge there, and chances of civilian collapse are remote—of revolution, negligible: there is overwhelming apathy within the Reich. The only hope is for time—time to bring V-2 into action, ten tons of rocket bomb against England; time for something else, perhaps gas. But Germany's leaders must act quickly, for the Allied arms are robbers of time, and the impetus of drives east and west will be hard to stop.

Nelson vs. Wilson

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, August 25

TO UNDERSTAND the Nelson-Wilson row one must keep in mind that there are two controversies going on here, both under the same general heading of reconversion. One, being debated in Congress, involves legislation on the planning, direction, and control of the reconversion of industry to peacetime output once the war is over, and this includes such key questions as the amount of unemployment compensation to be paid during the changeover. The other, being fought out among the military and civilian agencies concerned with war production, involves the question of when and under what conditions they should begin to release and allocate materials and manpower for the resumption of civilian production. The Nelson-Wilson row concerned the second, not the first.

This reconversion controversy involves the extent to which reconversion shall be permitted before the European war is over. This is not a question easily answered. In the controversy over conversion, at the very beginning of the war-production program, we were confronted by a clear question of fact: Could existing facilities and machinery be converted to the making of war materials? In the controversy over production scheduling, we were confronted with a clear issue of method: Was it necessary to go beyond the allocation of materials to the scheduling of production itself if we were to get maximum output from industry? Dogmatic answers were justified in both cases; as a general rule conversion was possible, and as a general rule production-scheduling was wise. But this problem of reconversion is one of timing and degree, in which dogmatism is hazardous, if not impossible.

Everyone agrees that only limited quantities of materials and manpower could be allocated at this time to the resumption of civilian output. The armed services are strongly opposed to allocating even limited amounts for that purpose. It is possible to discern three different sets of motivations behind this attitude. In the first place the procurement services of Army and Navy are dominated by men from big-business concerns. Big business, having hogged the bulk of war orders, now finds itself with backlogs much greater than those of smaller enterprises. Should reconversion begin before the war is over, and while the big concerns are still filling war orders, their smaller competitors would get back into the civilian market ahead of them.

In the second place, there are regular Army and Navy officers, in the procurement services and above them, who have a "brass-hat" contempt for civilian considerations and an arrogant attitude toward civilian agencies. Some of these officers, like General Somervell, head of the Army Service Forces, are men of ability and competence and have done a good job. They are strongly disinclined, even where it can be done without harm to the war effort, to pay any attention to those who argue the social desirability of giving smaller enterprises a chance to resume civilian output where small quantities of materials and manpower are available, and of permitting as much resumption of civilian production as possible. Obviously our difficulties in the post-war period will be lessened if reconversion has already begun before the war is over and the market for war goods collapses.

But it would be unfair to attribute the hostile attitude of the War and Navy departments to reconversion solely to big-business and brass-hat influences. The Army cannot be certain that the end of the European war is in sight. What if the Germans, behind the Rhine and the Oder, succeed in making a prolonged stand? What if many more guns, shells, tanks, and trucks may be necessary for victory? The Navy, whose major concern is the Pacific war, cannot be certain that Japan will conveniently collapse six months or so after Hitler. In Europe, the biggest job is being done by the Russians, and we share the burdens of the western front with the British. In the Pacific, after the European war is over, we may find ourselves bearing the major share of the burden. Extensive military as well as naval action may be necessary. This would require a continued Navy flow of material.

There is great and far from unjustified fear that if reconversion gets under way, it will be very difficult to keep the mind of business on the war. Workers will begin shifting to civilian plants. Business men still on war orders will worry about what their competitors are doing. If the Pacific war slowed down and it was necessary to convert a good many plants back to war work, many sections of industry might prefer a negotiated peace with Japan. These War and Navy officials remember that war orders were slighted for business-as-usual until well after Pearl Harbor, and do not trust the War Production Board to keep industry in hand if a reconversion stampede should start.

Charles E. Wilson, former head of General Electric, executive vice-chairman of the WPB, and its principal liaison with the armed services, has been going slow on reconversion. Donald M. Nelson, former head of Sears-Roebuck, chairman of the WPB, has for many months hoped to speed up the process. The former is the best production man, the latter the best politician, the WPB has had. I lean to Nelson's side in this controversy, but I cannot see him as St. George or Wilson as the dragon. The reconversion orders recently issued by Nelson are of so cautious and limited a character, and the procedure they establish so cumbersome, that they can hardly interfere with the war effort. They do, on the other hand, provide some slight possibility for helping little business to get back into the civilian market.

Despite this, I find Nelson's present posture as a champion of small business somewhat ludicrous. He has been head of the WPB from the beginning. He must bear the responsibility for the WPB's failure to give small business a fair share of war orders. His shrewd maneuvering in Congress in 1942 emasculated the Smaller War Plants Corporation Act. When he began to talk reconversion more than a year ago, it was without reference to small business.

Latterly, he has shifted to the politically powerful task of linking reconversion with aid to little business. I am inclined to believe that the main element in the Nelson-Wilson struggle was Nelson's jealousy of Wilson, his fear of losing command of the WPB. And I cannot help but feel that Nelson's covert press campaign against Wilson was an underhanded and ignoble business. Nelson is slippery and two-faced, and does not fight fair. The "love session" yesterday with Wilson, in which Nelson denied there were differences between them and deplored the very stories for which Nelson and his aides are responsible, was typical.

Now Wilson has resigned and the President this morning dodged the question of whether Nelson would resume control of the WPB on his return from China. J. A. Krug, an ex-TVA man popular with big business but not with the public power people here, is replacing Wilson. Whether Nelson returns or not, the Wilson resignation makes little, if any, real difference, except to deprive us of a man who did a good job breaking production bottlenecks. Through Byrnes, big business and the military still control the timing and extent of reconversion. Little business is still outside looking in.

Moscow Looks at Dumbarton Oaks

BY ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Moscow, August 22, by Cable

"LET there be hunger. Let there be cold. Let us freeze and starve to death in our homes. Only let there be no more war."

In these words my Moscow sister-in-law expressed the passionate wish for a stable peace that animates every Soviet citizen I have seen since my arrival six weeks ago. Her last two brothers had just left for the front. Three others are already dead, two in battle, one from overwork. Her father died from the exhaustion and strain of evacuation from the occupied area. Eight other close relatives, women and children, were murdered by the Nazis in the Ukraine.

Her husband—editor of a factory newspaper whose task is whipping up war production—was equally likely to become a casualty. He had returned from the factory at seven o'clock that Sunday morning after working all night and had dropped into bed telling his wife to call him at ten-thirty so he could return to work. Eighteen or twenty hours of responsible work daily for three years without Sunday rest or vacation had not only destroyed their home life but had reduced him physically to a nervous shadow.

Their case is quite typical. The war here has spared no one. Americans will never understand the strain endured by the Soviet people. Similarly the Soviet people cannot understand how a country engaged in war can spare the energy for election discussions. The American elections therefore somewhat disquiet people here, not because they doubt America's participation in the war to the finish but because a military victory is only half a victory. The other half is the establishment of a sound, enduring peace. Everyone knows this depends on the closest friendship with America and Britain. After three years of growing friendship and joint action with America, people here naturally dread the possible shifting of post-war policies which the American system so casually permits.

Soviet post-war policy is absolutely clear in its basic principles. It was expressed last October in the three-power declaration of the Moscow conference, recognizing the necessity of an international organization for peace and security on the basis of the equal sovereignty of peace-loving nations both large and small. No Soviet official has made any change in or addition to that declaration. All await a more concrete formulation of this basic principle by the joint conference at Dumbarton Oaks. Dewey's statement, making Dumbarton Oaks the center of an inter-party discussion, therefore seems here like playing politics with the destinies of the world.

No "Soviet plan" for Dumbarton Oaks has been published in Moscow. The first Russian assumption is that the underlying principle is Anglo-Soviet-American cooperation, which is more important than anything else. The second assumption is that the exact form of international organization is a matter for experts in international affairs. The third assumption is that all decisions must be reached jointly with American and British experts, and it would therefore have been unwise to announce a specifically "Soviet plan" before the conference.

All Soviet officials emphatically refuse to be interviewed regarding any post-war details. Comment in the Soviet press regarding post-war international organization is excessively meager and confined either to support of the general principles of Anglo-Soviet-American cooperation or to technical commentaries by unofficial but able writers who clearly state that their ideas are "only to start discussion."

The so-called Soviet plan which presumably formed the basis of Dewey's comments was contributed by Malinin, who writes on international affairs as a technical expert. It was printed in the April number of an obscure Leningrad journal, Zvezda, an organ for Soviet writers which is practically unobtainable in Moscow except in libraries. It was published "for purposes of discussion" and was obviously unofficial, with only such authority as the ideas themselves warrant. As such it has considerable merit.

Malinin's thesis is that the League of Nations failed not because of specific flaws in organization but because of unsatisfactory mutual relations between the great powers and the League and among the great powers themselves. He proposes that the draft constitution of the new international organization be worked out by the four great powers who assume responsibility to repel aggression. Then the draft constitution should go to a conference of all the United Nations who become founders and original members. Then the neutrals will be invited to join. Later, after a trial period, Germany and its satellites may also join but only if they cease to propagandize their fascist theories and to practice racial and religious and national discrimination. Malinin's plan provides for a majority vote of all member nations on general questions, a two-thirds vote on serious decisions like sanctions, but permits emergency action to halt aggressors by the four great powers alone. He considers an international army impracticable but an international air force practicable and sufficient to halt initial aggressions.

That most important journal, War and the Working Class, has just appeared with two articles on the problem of peace and security. These are undoubtedly more authoritative than the Malinin article but are also less detailed, dealing largely with general principles. The leading editorial in this journal greets the conference in America on "the working principles" adopted at the Moscow conference last autumn. Again it emphasizes cooperation between Russia, America, and Britain.

Dewey is not mentioned but his presumed argument for the smaller nations is sharply attacked. The article says that the small nations even more than the big ones need security and peace. The very existence of the small nations has been saved by the increasing cooperation of the Soviet Union with America and Britain in the present war. A stable peace, which is essential to the small nations, depends primarily on whether the great powers can resolve all the differences which stand in the way of long-time agreements.

It is clear from all this that the Soviet Union considers joint cooperation with America and Britain the necessary cornerstone of durable peace and feels worried by any suggestion of American aloofness. It is also clear that the Soviet experts have detailed and perhaps novel proposals regarding the new international organization for security; but it is most clear that no such details are considered worth the sacrifice of American friendship.

In this connection it is worth noting an editorial in Pravda a couple of days ago, which presumably answered a criticism by a Turkish writer regarding the Red Army's action in the Warsaw uprising. One might assume that the Red Army needed no justification before the Turks. Pravda, however, devoted front-page space to an explanation that the Red Army has not ceased for a single day its struggle under the walls of Warsaw but is fighting for that city as devotedly as for Kharkov and Kiev.

The Red Army thus far has taken many cities, continues Pravda, some by storm and more by outflanking. But the Red Army never took a city by the correlation of a frontal attack with an uprising within the city. The Red Army always discouraged such tactics. You cannot have a successful uprising in a city when it is filled to the limit with enemy tanks, planes, and guns.

It is difficult to believe that Pravda was sufficiently interested in the Turkish journalist to make such explanations. It is sadder to realize that American and British papers make comments requiring such explanations. It is another example of the almost painful intensity with which the Soviets today seek to clear up any questions which might disturb the understanding between themselves and the United States. Pravda obviously avoids even the mention of American critics in order not to increase the sense of division.

In the Wind

REMEMBER Dr. William Wirt, the man who in 1933 discovered that Roosevelt was playing Kerensky to the Brain Trust's Lenins, Trotskys, and Stalins? Well, John W. Anderson, president of the Motor and Equipment Manufacturers' Association, said this about him in a recent address entitled "Shall We Permit the Ism-ites of the Screw Deal to Keep Small Business Forever on Crutches?" at a meeting of the Gary, Indiana, Chamber of Commerce: "Unless this nation, within the next generation, awakens to erect a shrine to the memory of William Wirt, our national epitaph may be written for us instead by those foreign gangs who have schemed to destroy us."

NORMAN THOMAS recently released to the press an open letter to Reinhold Niebuhr and the Union for Democratic Action, asking how they could justify liberal support of Roosevelt. The letter went easy on Dewey but attacked the New Deal vigorously. It got a good play in the New York Daily News and Herald Tribune; Dr. Niebuhr's reply was not published at all. In answer to a letter to the Herald Tribune, the UDA received a profuse apology by telephone, but no space.

LUCIUS BEEBE on the home front: "While nosing into a sherry flip at the very chic Atlantic Beach Club, Herman Sartorius, just in from Hollywood, where he had gone for Clifton Webb's party for George and Valentina Schlee, reports it the most staggeringly opulent blowout in recent years, lasting from cocktails until breakfast, with every available celebrity splashing around in vintage wine."

INSTEAD OF LOUD and unseemly rejoicing on Armistice Day, the Institute for Public Service suggests religious services in homes, schools, churches, and stock exchanges. "What better stand," it asks, "against the bruit in man, totalitarianism, regimentation, mob leadership, mob noise, and mob failure to think?" Mob spelling, too.

A TRAVELER from the East brings tidings that a special mass was held in the cathedral at Rabat, capital of French Morocco, for Philippe Henriot, Vichy Minister of Propaganda, who was killed by French patriots in Paris a few months back. The priest who officiated was later arrested by the provisional government.

COLONEL McCORMICK'S Chicago Tribune is no longer "The World's Greatest Newspaper." Its front page now proclaims it merely "An American Paper for Americans."

FESTUNG EUROPA: The Nazis have forbidden a Danish circus performer to appear any more, because he introduced what he called "a new war dance." It consisted of one step forward and two backward. . . . A Nazi paper in Prague explains the military situation thus: "Soviet army movements, including those of an active nature, are determined beforehand by the German initiative."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

Watch the West Coast

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

NO AREA of the nation has felt the economic impact of the war so intensely as the west coast. In the words of Robert Elliott, financial editor of the San Francisco News, "War has revolutionized the West from an economy of agriculture, mining, forestry, shipping, and the colonial status of being a branch office of the East into a full-fledged industrial age." Industrial growth has been accelerated twenty years, and in some fields as much as fifty years, ahead of normal expectations. Although California alone has received two-thirds of all war contracts placed in the eleven western states since June 1, 1940, relatively speaking the impact of the war has been greatest in the Northwest. At the end of August, 1941, the proportion of prime military contracts to the value of manufactured products in 1939, in the Puget Sound area, was five times greater than that for the United States as a whole. It was approximately twice as great as for Los Angeles and four times higher than for San Francisco.

A spectacular population increase has accompanied the west coast's industrial revolution. The Portland metropolitan area shows a 31 per cent increase in population since 1940; the Seattle area shows an increase in population for the same period of 200,000; and an estimated 1,500,000 people have entered California since 1940. Since most industrial activity on the west coast is confined to the manufacture of aircraft and the construction of ships, sharp curtailment of employment is threatened in the post-war period. With a population increase of 14 per cent, California, for example, faces the problem of shifting 1,500,000 workers from war activities to civilian jobs after the war.

The war in Europe, it is generally assumed, will be over long before hostilities cease in the Far East, and as a result, some authorities believe, war activities will increasingly shift to the west coast. But even if this assumption proves correct and the Pacific states enjoy a prolonged war boom, that very fact would probably also mean a head start for the East and Middle West in industrial reconversion and the mad scramble for post-war consumer markets.

So great is the potential employment problem on the west coast that a maximum public works program would prove only a temporary stop-gap. Agriculture, even in the Northwest, can be expected to absorb only a small part of the enlarged population. Full industrial employment, approximating present levels of production, is essential for the maintenance of the west coast's inflated economy. On paper, the industrial prospects are exciting. For the first time, the west coast has a nascent steel industry; it has aluminum mills and magnesium plants. It has vast manpower and natural resources and great reserves of hydroelectric power. A recent study by the Bonneville Power Administration has charted these possibilities in the most convincing manner. The main problem, however, is not likely to be technical, but rather psychological and political.

Not all elements on the west coast are in an expansionist frame of mind. Important segments of the population are, in fact, reacting in a purely defensive manner toward the wartime boom. A sharp cleavage has already developed, in many areas, between migrant defense workers and settled residents who offer a form of passive resistance to the integration of the newcomers into the established pattern of community life.

One of the main factors preventing integration is the character of the housing available to most migrants. Many of the public housing projects are located on the most unpromising sites and the bulk of the shelter offered is in demountable or temporary buildings. In Portland only 458 out of 18,578 defense housing units are permanent dwellings. Of all the mushroom cities, doomed at birth to a derelict's grave, Vanport, today the second largest city in Oregon, is the most fantastic. In the words of a local housing official, it has everything that a city of comparable size should have—except a future. The residents of Vanport don't "belong." Bus drivers who take high-school youngsters to the Portland schools report that the children frequently ask to be let off before the bus reaches the school. They don't want to be identified as "Vanporters."

As for political integration, recent primary statistics are eloquent. Despite a liberal six months' residence requirement, only 1,300 citizens of Vanport (population 35,000) registered; only 179 actually voted. Nor have the industrial migrants to the Northwest become integrated industrially or socially. In the recent election of officers for the Boilermakers' Union, Portland local, 3,000 out of 45,000 members cast ballots. Approximately 75 per cent of the 100,000 shipyard workers in the Portland area have failed to affiliate with churches, lodges, or other social organizations.

One section of the community, however, has welcomed the migrant war workers—the local merchants, who have been enjoying a glorious boom. In the first ten months of 1941, new car registrations in Seattle were 50 per cent above 1940. The total value of building permits doubled; real estate transfers increased by 30 per cent; payrolls by nearly 50 per cent; sales of independent retailers and department stores by 30 per cent. Taking cognizance of the slight exodus of war workers since January 1, 1944, local businesses with a "vested interest" in the defense boom have begun to run full-page advertisements pleading with war workers to "stay on the job." Stores promise that they will provide extra-hour services to accommodate war workers, and local morticians announce that they will be delighted to arrange "distant burials" by wire. Other voices, however, constantly remind the war-workers that they are expected to vanish the moment the war is over. It is this curiously ambivalent attitude that is creating a unique post-war political situation.

Recently Portland employed Robert Moses, New York Park Commissioner, and his associates, to prepare a post-war public-works plan for the area. In his introduction to the report (released in November, 1943), Mr. Moses points out that there are two widely divergent points of view in the community: one group deeply desires and confidently expects that the war migrants will leave; the other group—made up of those having a "vested interest" in the boom—would like to feel that most of the migrants can be absorbed. The Moses Plan calls for a post-war public-works program involving the employment of 20,000 workers, on a two-year schedule of construction, at an estimated cost of $60,000,000 (premised upon federal aid). The report is quite specific on the point that such a program represents the maximum that the community can afford. If Portland therefore is to be solely dependent on public works to absorb its surplus war labor, there will be approximately 120,000 migrants unprovided for. It cannot be assumed, however, that these people will obligingly disappear.

The bulk of the white war migrants to the northwest defense communities, 64 per cent in fact, come from other areas of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana; the secondary recruitment area embraces the intermountain states and the Great Plains. The typical white defense migrant is a young man, twenty-five years of age or younger, married, from a small town or rural area in the Pacific Northwest, anxious to settle in the area, and primarily interested in industrial employment in the post-war period. A study made recently in the Kaiser yards in Portland indicates that only 23.6 per cent of the migrants expressed a definite intention to leave after the war; that only a very few have maintained economic ties elsewhere or have jobs to which they might return; that a considerable number have purchased property in the area; that a majority have their families with them; and that 86 per cent must find new employment immediately after their present employment terminates. In the Lockheed plant in Los Angeles, 89 per cent of the workers want to remain in the area after the war. The whole history of westward migration would indicate that less than 25 per cent of the migrant workers will leave. A moment's reflection is sufficient to indicate the accuracy of Dr. Clark Kerr's observation that "the great migration cannot reverse itself in exact pattern, and even if it did its effects on the local communities would not disappear."

"Thousands of persons," writes Dr. Kerr, "will be desirous of maintaining the large labor force and the large population. Many of the new workers themselves will have seniority rights, homes and furniture, friends or relatives living on the locality. The trade unions will be anxious to maintain their enlarged memberships. Local governments will have built sewers and streets, and provided transportation and hospital facilities, on the assumption of an increased population and the revenues deriving from it. Houses and apartments will have been built, boarding houses established, and land values raised, and stores, theaters, and churches opened or enlarged. Pressures will be exerted to maintain the expanded population, and to maintain it in full employment. If this proves impossible, the war-plant workers may become unwelcome residents."

Political issues of the first importance are implicit in this general situation. Largely due to prior mass migrations, the west coast has a tradition of militant protest movements in which newcomers, lining up with elements of the settled population, have forced changes in the social structure. Seattle had its general strike after the First World War; Oregon has been a stronghold of the pension movements; and California witnessed three spectacular mass movements in a decade—the Epic movement of 1934, the pension plan movements, and the Olson popular-front campaign of 1938. The failure to integrate migrants into the established community patterns during the war merely means that these same migrants will be more readily disposed to follow an aggressive, expansionist leadership in the post-war period. Already a tentative alliance has been formed between war migrants, the trade unions, and the "vested interest" elements, in opposition to the old-guard forces, in a fight over the retention of the region's newly acquired industrial status.

A sharp increase in regional consciousness is one pointer to the way in which the lines are being drawn for the struggle. Despite much talk in prior decades about regional interests, extremely little interstate solidarity developed on the west coast. But mass migration and rapid industrialization have confronted the three west coast states with an identical problem which varies only in degree from area to area. As a consequence, there is much talk of late about "regional economic self-sufficiency." "California and the whole West still are a colony of the East," complains Dr. R. L. McClung of the University of Southern California. "The West," according to Senator Pat McCarran, "has been largely a stepchild of the East, penalized by heavy freight charges—our resources shipped East to be sent back as finished goods." Familiar fallacies are beginning to echo in the west coast press: "Why should we pay freight on tires manufactured in Akron? On automobiles manufactured in Detroit?" Not infrequently this talk takes the form of an advocacy of some type of protection for west coast industry—the usual concomitant of self-sufficiency arguments.

It is already apparent that national economic considerations will not dictate the final decision, for a strictly political approach to the problem has been clearly outlined. With a large proportion of the nation's newly acquired government plant in the area, the west coast realizes that eastern and middle-western interests will make a concerted effort to scuttle this plant or to minimize its productive potential in the post-war period. To offset this ultramontane sabotage, the west coast has only one weapon: organized political action; today the most politically diverse personalities are strongly supporting proposals for a "Western States Political Conference."

Speaking in San Francisco recently, Senator Pat McCarran voiced what is already the dominant political idea on the west coast. "The problem of post-war industrialization cannot," he said, "be dealt with on a state basis. The West's twenty-two Senators belong to different parties. But they can unite upon this issue."

Attorney-General Robert W. Kenny—the outstanding personality in California politics today—is already building inter-party political fences in the western states. He speaks for Utah, intercedes for Arizona, and has shown a lively interest in Oregon and Washington. Recently the California legislature went to bat in support of an integrated steel industry for Geneva, Utah—an exhibition of western solidarity that would have been unthinkable prior to 1940. The logic of the situation calls for a western bloc in Congress and even, perhaps, for a new political party—a Party of the Pacific sensitive to the peculiar economic interests of the West.

Already the ideological basis for such a party has been partially formulated by Howard Costigan. According to this ideology, national politics have always been dominated by that section of the nation which, at the time, had the most to offer the nation. In the past this sectional dominance shifted from the South to the North; it must now shift to the West. Partisan politics, as such, have little meaning on the west coast. California, for example, is a state of wide-open political opportunism, so-called personality politics, and straight political merchandising. Not only is the West readily disposed to break away from the established parties, but it can provide the necessary dynamics for a new political movement in America, because, so the argument runs, its immediate interests coincide with our real national interests in the post-war period.

By way of illustration: the public ownership of power and water resources has become the major premise for the expansion of the economy of the west coast. Even elements in banking and financial circles on the west coast have come to realize that "cheap power," which is another way of saying "government ownership," offers the main hope for the survival of the West as an industrial area. In order to exploit its natural resources, particularly in the light-metals field, and to utilize its new and relatively more efficient industrial plant, the West will be forced into the position of opposing certain private monopolies, notably the Alcoa aluminum monopoly. To battle this and other monopolies effectively, the West must have a major voice in national politics, otherwise exploitation of its resources may be retarded for years. The West cannot adhere to the states' rights philosophy, since it is vitally dependent upon federal aid and must rely upon extensive federal intervention. Thus the West has a number of important planks to offer the nation in its bid for national political leadership: advocacy of public ownership of power, water, and other (particularly forest) resources; a philosophy of extended federal intervention in promoting economic activity; and a belief in the necessity of utilizing federally-sponsored projects, such as Bonneville, as a means of combatting private monopoly.

More important than these considerations, however, is the fact that the economic future of the west coast lies, to a large extent, in the Pacific. Speaking in Seattle on July 9, 1944, after his return from China, Mr. Wallace declared that a new North Pacific world has already begun to assume tangible form. He pointed to the Pacific Northwest states and the Amur River region in Soviet Asia as related phases of the same development.

Residents of the Northwest are already keenly interested in the revival of Harriman's great proposal: for a rail line from Seattle to Alaska and a rail route to Asia from Alaska by tunneling the Bering Straits. However much this enthusiasm is discounted, the political possibilities of such an expansionist program remain. The growing regional consciousness of the area, the repeated complaints about "the underdog West," and the possibilities that unquestionably exist in the Pacific, all suggest that the West is destined to make a strong bid for national political leadership in the post-war period. The westward shift of population merely adds weight to the threat of a western bloc in Congress; in fact, the West probably holds the balance of political power today. If middle-western isolationist elements continue to dominate the Republican Party and if the southern bloc continues to exercise a veto power over the Democratic Party, then far western leadership may, indeed, have much to offer the nation.

Polls, Propaganda, and Politics

Predicting Doubtful States

TWENTY-SEVEN of the forty-eight states can be put on ice, so far as the November election is concerned. Six, with thirty electoral votes, were consistently and safely Republican in the elections of 1940 and 1942 as well as in all the polls of 1940 and 1944. Twenty-one states with 208 electoral votes are safely in the Democratic column. The battle rages over the remaining twenty-one states, where Roosevelt must collect at least fifty-eight more votes to win.

The American Institute of Public Opinion has now (August 23) released estimates on these twenty-one doubtful states. It qualifies its poll report in two ways—first, this is the present picture, which may change by November; second, this is the civilian vote, no soldiers included. Gallup now distributes our twenty-one doubtful states as follows:

	No. of States	No. of Electoral Votes
"Safely Republican" (54 per cent or more)......	8	116
"Leaning Republican" (51 to 53 per cent)......	6	99
"Leaning Democratic" (51 to 53 per cent)......	7	78
"Safety Democratic" (54 per cent or more)......	0	0
	21	293

Gallup thus gives most of the doubtful states to Dewey. For the country as a whole, however, he predicts 286 electoral votes for Roosevelt and 245 for Dewey.

Suppose we go back four years and look at Gallup's record for these same twenty-one doubtful states. We find that his August, 1940, poll classified seven of these states (Connecticut, Delaware, Idaho, Missouri, Oregon, Wyoming, and West Virginia) as leaning Democratic and all went Democratic in that November election. Of the fourteen doubtful states which looked Republican to Gallup in August, 1940, only three (Indiana, Iowa, Michigan) gave their electoral votes to Willkie. There were thus eleven of our doubtful states which in August before the last Presidential election were listed as Republican on the basis of the Gallup poll, but which voted Democratic in November. The following table gives more details.

GALLUP ERRORS OF 1940

	——1940 Predictions——				Prediction
State	Aug. 25,'40	Sep. 20,'40	Nov. 3, '40	1940 Vote	Aug.' 44
Colorado	53% Rep.	52% Rep.	55% Rep.	51% Dem.	55% Rep.
Illinois.	57% Rep.	53% Dem.	52% Rep.	51% Dem.	54% Rep.
Massachusetts	55% Rep.	51% Rep.	51% Dem.	54% Dem.	52% Dem.
Minnesota	55% Rep.	51% Dem.	52% Rep.	52% Dem.	53% Rep.
New Hampshire ..	57% Rep.	51% Rep.	51% Rep.	53% Dem.	51% Dem.
New Jersey	51% Rep.	52% Dem.	52% Dem.	52% Dem.	51% Rep.
New York	52% Rep.	52% Dem.	51% Dem.	52% Dem.	52% Rep.
Ohio	55% Rep.	53% Dem.	51% Rep.	52% Dem.	54% Rep.
Pennsylvania	51% Rep.	52% Dem.	51% Rep.	53% Dem.	52% Dem.
Rhode Island	51% Rep.	56% Dem.	54% Dem.	57% Dem.	51% Dem.
Wisconsin	51% Rep.	51% Dem.	52% Rep.	51% Dem.	56% Rep.

Two facts stand out. One is the difficulty of predicting from polls when the margins are less than 5 per cent; the other is that in 1940 Gallup's constant error was to assign too large a percentage to the Republicans. The errors were usually larger than the margin now attributed to Dewey. Whether in 1944 he has corrected these errors or is repeating them, only time will show. But the August poll of 1944 looks surprisingly like the reports in August, 1940.

If we could assume that poll history is repeating itself and that the Gallup state-by-state poll now errs in each doubtful state by the same amount that it did in August, 1940, the present picture would have to be corrected to show Dewey carrying only eight states with forty-eight electoral votes, while Roosevelt would have forty states and 483 electoral votes. This is probably an over-correction, for Gallup has undoubtedly taken steps to correct or allow for some of his errors of 1940. The most reasonable August estimate of Roosevelt electors would lie somewhere between the current Gallup estimate of 286 (note that 266 are necessary for election) and the probably over-corrected estimate of 483. But, as Gallup points out, the situation itself may change between August and November.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE SUBJECT of removing the federal Capital to some place in the West is undergoing vigorous agitation, St. Louis being at present the principal competitor for the honor of succeeding Washington. There is really only one objection to the scheme, or rather only one thing to be said in favor of Washington, and that is, that the expense of removal would be enormous, owing to the abandonment of the Government buildings. . . . But the Capital ought undoubtedly to be a real city, having a life of its own; and we venture to say, at the risk of making Westerners laugh, that the federal government would gain more and do more good by moving to New York than to any other place.—September 2, 1869.

WE FEAR that the tribulation through which Spain must pass to her political salvation has but begun, and that the man who is to guide her out of it has not yet appeared. It is not likely that in Spain, or elsewhere, the Coming Man will arise from among the Pretenders to Crowns, even where crowns are still believed to be essential elements of public welfare. They belong of necessity to the past, and their eyes naturally turn backward rather than forward.—September 9, 1869.

THE CAUSE of female education is making progress in some odd places. A female normal school has been established at Poona, in India, and one of the English ladies taken out by Miss Carpenter takes charge of it. Moreover—and this is far more wonderful—two Bengalee ladies of good family have applied for admission to the Calcutte University. When this spirit begins to show itself among even Hindoo women, we may feel sure that the days of tyrant man's dominion are nearly numbered, and that he will before long assume his proper place in the creation he has done so much to deface.—September 16, 1869.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris Rises

IF JUSTIFICATION were ever needed for the theories of political war put forward in this section, it has been provided in overwhelming measure by the people of Paris. The fact that the city was freed by the people—the liberation forces supported by the unarmed population—makes this battle the greatest political victory of the war. Its meaning, its influence, will grow with every day that passes. It will inflame the peoples of Europe from Spain to the Balkans. It will give them not only hope but strength—and confidence in their strength. The hour that saw the Nazi troops and Hitler's armed terrorists scuttle out of Paris proclaimed the certain annihilation of every fascist power in Europe. And it should serve as a warning that just as the people resisted the foreign invader so will they resist, and defeat, any attempt to wrest from them the full reward of their fight—a people's peace and a government purged of every trace of anti-democratic poison.—J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO.

Way Out for the Balkans

BY BOGDAN RADITSA

THE long, dark Balkan night is over. With Rumania turning its guns on its former ally, with Bulgaria edging toward the same decision, with the Hungarian government tottering on its unstable foundations, the inevitable disintegration of Hitler's system of ersatz governments has begun. The meeting in Rome between Churchill and Marshal Tito, in the presence of Yugoslav Premier Subasich, presages a new and decisive blow to the Nazi military machine. And throughout the Balkans, Partisans and patriots form a chain which links the Allied armies of the east and west and speeds the day of liberation.

During this war, military and political developments in the Balkans have differed from those in France and Italy. The Balkan resistance forces have liberated substantial areas of their countries without the immediate presence of Allied armies, and the basis of popular democratic government has been laid without the aid of Allied military authorities. The tragic dilemma of the Italian government, paralyzed by the Allied Control Commission, has not been repeated in the Balkans.

In order to understand what is happening in the Balkans today, we must glance at pre-war conditions. The Balkans were not the "powder-keg of Europe" before this war, despite Mussolini's efforts to make them appear so. The assassination of King Alexander of Yugoslavia in Marseilles in 1934, done at Mussolini's behest by his Ustachi and Macedonian agents, failed to set off the explosion that had been expected, but it marked the end of Franco-British influence in the Balkans. King Alexander's death caused a swing from the previous policy of friendship toward France to one of ostensible neutrality, and it was this policy that ended, inevitably, in the bitter disillusionment of war.

Alexander's foreign policy had been based on French and British friendship, reinforced by the Little Entente and the Balkan Pact negotiated early in 1934. The absence of Bulgaria was a constant threat to this system of alliances, and Alexander had done his best to persuade Bulgaria to join the pact. His policy was sound and was supported by Titulescu in Rumania and by Benes in Czechoslovakia. But neither King Alexander nor Titulescu understood that even a sound foreign policy can function effectively only if it is backed by a healthy internal situation. They did little to foster that.

Prince Paul of Yugoslavia, Regent after the death of King Alexander until young King Peter II came of age, believed that France was doomed and that Chamberlain's England would always find a modus vivendi with Hitler. Slowly he disassociated Yugoslavia from the Little and Balkan ententes and established the policy of neutrality.

Greece's King George and General Metaxas, together with Prince Paul and King Carol of Rumania, formed a sort of Balkan Holy Alliance and decided to save themselves and the so-called independence of their countries by making concessions to the Italians and Germans. They had all been badly frightened by the popular tendencies awakened by the Spanish war. The attitude of London and Paris toward the Loyalist government in Spain encouraged them to believe that France and Great

BU LINGAM

Britain would compromise indefinitely with fascism. Munich further reassured them along this line. Their hope was to convince the governments at London and Paris that the Balkan states wanted to remain neutral but that, if necessary, they would stand on the side of the Allies in the end. At the same time, they let Hitler know that, though their desire was to remain neutral, they would support Axis policy in Europe in such a way as to harm neither themselves nor Axis plans. The coming of war shattered this fantastic illusion.

King Carol was forced to flee Rumania when the Russians took Bessarabia. King Zog of Albania, who had lost all but nominal freedom through his fatal deal with Mussolini in 1927, had to abandon his country when the Italian army invaded it on Good Friday, April 7, 1939. Shortly afterward, King George and Metaxas faced Mussolini's troops on the Greek frontier, having been driven by the indomitable will of the Greek people to defend their country.

Regent Paul of Yugoslavia could have gone to the help of Greece. The Yugoslav people would have accepted such a decision with enthusiasm, for Greece had always been considered an ally. But Paul did not choose to fight. He fancied himself a latter-day Machiavelli, never understanding that the people of Yugoslavia were not so unprincipled as he in their view of international affairs. When, in March, 1941, Paul's government signed the Tripartite Pact with the Axis, the government and the Regent were overthrown by a burst of popular resentment. The revolution of March 27, 1941, expressed the true feeling of the Yugoslav nation.

After the military conquest of Greece and Yugoslavia, the Axis policy was to reward its satellites. Hungary and Bulgaria took a hand in the dismemberment of Yugoslavia and Greece. As the Yugoslav and Greek people from the beginning had comprised the most vigorous stronghold against Italian and German infiltration, the Axis decided they must be annihilated through massacre and starvation. But the masses defeated the Axis plans.

The National Liberation Movement in Yugoslavia was started by ragged and dispersed bands which were determined to fight fascism to the death. What Tito has done in Yugoslavia symbolizes the moral and political regeneration of the popular masses throughout the Balkan region. For each of the Balkan peoples, and particularly for the South Slavs, the liberation movement represents the beginning of the truly national thought and action. Until now, the Balkan peoples have been no more than a mirror of what was going on in Western or in Central Europe. Today they feel they are, if not at the center of a democratic European revolution, then very close to the center.

The Communists in the Balkans were the chief initiators of the popular movement but the democratic elements of all classes, all religions, and all political affiliations have taken part. This union succeeded because it was agreed from the beginning that each country, once it was liberated, would be built upon the foundations of a full federal democracy. Economically, the key to a durable social and political order in the Balkans lies in combining a collectivist program of industrialization with the peasant program of land reform and the encouragement of individual small farms. Such reform is a prerequisite to all schemes for the political regeneration of the Balkans; and it is certain that in this field peasant and workers' leaders, and not reactionary generals like Mihailovich and Zervas, will have the last word.

Mihailovich and Zervas are the last representatives of the petty nationalism and imperialism which characterized the Balkan governments before and during the war of 1912-13. This policy resulted in the creation of small sovereign states, each of which sought to dominate its neighbors, and effectively frustrated Balkan unity. The governments were centralistic, in the hands of one party, and backed by the court, the army, the bureaucracy, and, in some cases, the church. Through the maneuvers of the great powers, which incited one party against another, one country against another, and the rulers against the people, the Balkans became a stormy area. Peace depended upon the inclinations of the Austro-Hungarian, Ottoman, or Russian empires, and later upon those of France or Great Britain, Germany or Italy.

The situation was complicated by the fact that the monarchies in the Balkans were at best only quasi-legitimate. The constitution, as a rule, was granted as a gift of the crown to the people. Very seldom was it a partnership agreement. Every Balkan politician knew that his career depended not upon the desires of the people but on his success in satisfying the financial and political demands of one or another of the big powers. This political outlook encouraged centralism and the domination of reactionary, corrupt cliques. It encouraged the formation of a Great Serbia or a Yugoslavia exclusively Serb-dominated; a Great Hellas, a Great Rumania, and a Great Bulgaria.

Today the disciples of this theory ask for the creation of a new Balkan axis: Athens-Belgrade. They seek a Greater Serbian state, allied with a Greater Greece, which, together, would dominate the Balkans as a whole. Their Croat and Slovene counterpart in the north is trying to prepare an anti-Russian axis—the so-called Catholic Confederation. The alternative to this dangerous plan is a democratic Balkan federation, the outlines of which are even now emerging.

What is the "way out" for the Balkans? When the Red Army crossed the Prut River, Molotov issued a note promising to preserve the status quo. This meant that Russia does not consider the Balkans its preserve, as anti-Russian propagandists have insinuated. Subsequently the agreement between King Peter and Tito was reached.

After their conversations, Mr. Subasich, the new Yugoslav Premier, declared that Tito had said that he did not want communism or revolution, but real democracy such as Yugoslavia and the Balkans have never known before. Tito's stated goal is the unity of all South Slavs in an "independent, democratic federation."

Therefore, there are two possibilities for a post-war organization of the Balkans: (1) South Slav federation comprising Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, running from the Adriatic to the Black Sea; (2) Balkan federation composed of Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Greece, Rumania, and Albania, which was recommended by democrats and liberals at the Balkan conference in 1929. From the point of view of a broader European solution, and because a unilateral South Slav bloc might put the non-Slavic nations of the Balkans in a position of self-defense and fear, the second may be the more desirable.

If the great powers will allow the Balkan peoples to settle their own destiny, the democratic forces, now united in the liberation movement, can realize the federalization, and consequently the democratization, of the Balkan region. The Balkan states can become an interdependent community of sovereign and equal nations on the economic, political, and cultural levels. Naturally, the success of this solution will depend upon the nature of Europe as a whole. A Europe of interdependent states offers the only safe basis for a federal solution in the Balkans. The decision rests largely with those great powers which in the past have manipulated Balkan affairs to suit their own interests. If they fail to achieve a secure union of European states and seek instead to mark out areas of special interest; if they impose governments made up of their own reactionary tools, they will produce only revolutions and new wars. The time has come to let the peoples work out their own destiny.

Vargas on the Defensive

WHILE the Vargas dictatorship felt secure, it encouraged a few "liberals" to enter the government. They provided a front, useful for propaganda and as a link with Brazil's democratic Allies. The most effective of all these was Oswaldo Aranha, the Foreign Minister since 1938. Aranha is a person of questionable integrity but at least he is not fascist, at least he is pro-United States and pro-Ally. He is much liked in Washington and by many Americans was considered a guaranty of the good faith of the dictatorship he served. Now Aranha has resigned his post and his resignation has been accepted by Vargas. The fact itself is sensational enough to set off rumors, and the lack of straight news from well-censored Rio has contributed to the confusion which word of his resignation produced.

Is Brazil going the way of Argentina? Will it swing away from the United States and the United Nations? What led up to the crisis?

Some of the answers to these questions appeared in an article in this section published on February 26. It gave the background of growing discontent out of which the present situation developed. Readers will do well to review the facts in that story. But later events throw even more light on today's news from Rio.

The Vargas dictatorship no longer feels strong enough to allow popular demonstrations in favor of democracy, or tolerate "liberals" in its ranks. The coming defeat of Hitler, the rebellions in half a dozen smaller Latin American states, and the unrest in Brazil itself among formerly conservative groups—all these combined to warn Vargas and his gang that their power rested on shaky ground. And no better evidence could be found than the fact that Aranha, loyal to his chief as long as the regime was secure, had agreed to accept the vice-presidency of the Society of the Friends of America. This group, composed of distinguished citizens—with our Ambassador Caffery as its honorary president—is devoted chiefly to promoting friendship with the United States. But it is looked upon as pro-democratic, too, and so, naturally, dangerous. Aranha must have known that he was challenging the goverment's position, must have been prepared to resign if Vargas got nasty. Vargas did get nasty. His Chief of Police, the pro-Nazi Coriolanos de Goes, padlocked the quarters of the society before Aranha could make his appearance at a meeting in his honor. Forced to choose, Vargas chose to lose his useful Foreign Minister, rather than side with the liberals. But Aranha's act, since he is not a man of principle, is striking proof that the regime is not as tough as its behavior.

Other examples can be given of its defensive mechanism at work: Recently some young people in the state of Ceara organized a group to collect "scrap" for the war effort. They were not Communists but they named their group "Stalingrad" in honor of the greatest collective community effort on record in this war. They made speeches of a liberal nature, praising the democracies and urging the people to contribute to the scrap pile. The movement was suppressed by the federal police, several of the boys were arrested, and their leader was sentenced to five years in prison.

In his earlier mood, Vargas appointed a rather decent, moderate man, Colonel Nelson de Mello, Chief of Police. Recently this official was fired. His job was given to Coriolanos de Goes, who had previously held the post but had been dropped because of public indignation over the machine-gunning of a demonstration of law students in Sao Paulo last November. (This story is told in The Nation article of February 26.) De Goes took as his assistant a military man known as a terrorist and fascist. These men are now in power, providing the worried Vargas with an efficient Gestapo set-up.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Faith of Aldous Huxley

IT IS pleasant to be able to report that for more than a third of its way Aldous Huxley's new novel, "Time Must Have a Stop" (Harper's, $2.75), is wonderful serious comedy—the liveliest, wittiest writing Huxley has done since "Antic Hay." But in Chapter XII the book swerves off its worldly course to become the argument for religious faith that we have learned to expect from a Huxley novel. Huxley has just snuffed out the life of his sybaritic Eustace Barnack in such a scene as might have been dreamed up by the Church fathers. It was Eustace's sin to love Degas, cigars, and women more than he loved God, therefore he must die alone and whimpering on the bathroom floor and be followed through his protracted struggle against merging with the divine light. Not that Huxley completely leaves his humor this side of the grave: even after Eustace's death, "Time Must Have a Stop" has some fine comic moments—the seances, for instance, with the medium who is so illiterate that she ludicrously garbles her ghostly messages. But despite these sops to the faithless, it is deeply disappointing to have once again been promised the consummation of Huxley's art and be given, instead, the consummation of his religion.

Of course, even by those who reject his religious conclusions, Huxley might well be studied as a moralist of contemporary life. In a period in which one often has the impression that man's whole responsibility in the world begins and ends at the polling booth, and in a culture which considers political action the cure for all diseases, Huxley dares to call a plague on all political houses and to speak of action as a self-deception and an evil. He has the courage to override all our current easy humanitarianisms. The trouble is, however, that in rejecting humanitarianism, Huxley rejects humanity. He is unable to believe that good can reside within the framework of flesh and desire.

Huxley's distaste for the human body is not a recent development, nor is it even more exacerbated today than it was in his earliest work. Now that he has taken a formal religious position, we can perhaps see more clearly than we could before that, basic to whatever other antitheses he may have suggested in his books, there was the antithesis between purity and sex. But long before Huxley openly celebrated, as he does now, the advantages of celibacy, he thought of love as lust; long before he began to move so comfortably among the dead, he saw a connection between sex and death. The instances in proof that for Huxley sexuality has always been heartless, cruel, selfish, a signpost to decay, and a reminder of mortality can be multiplied endlessly: in "Eyeless in Gaza," a scene of love is spattered with the blood of a smashed dog; in "After Many a Summer Dies the Swan," intercourse is described as a fatal seizure, an epilepsy; and in every novel there has been the counterpart of the Mrs. Thwale of "Time Must Have a Stop" whose rationalistic intelligence is wholly at the service of a destroying sensuality. If, in view of so strong a bias against sexuality, there may be a certain irony in the literary uses that Huxley has made of the charms of lubricity, there should be neither irony nor surprise that his sexual disgust has finally led him to mysticism.

Ordinarily it is off the main path of criticism to trace the subjective psychological pattern of a novelist. But in Huxley's case it is unavoidable: the pattern not only repeats itself so often, but ultimately determines the cosmic order that Huxley propagandizes. In each of his last three novels, Huxley opposes a single pure spirit to the awful run of humanity; in "Time Must Have a Stop" the pure spirit is one Bruno, an Italian bookseller. Although superficially these Huxleyan saints present certain human variations, they are essentially the same person. Each of them is an older man, wise and tolerant, gentle but firm, knowing his way in the world but immune to the demands of the world—in other words, a perfect representation of the father-person, the Oedipal ideal. And in each of the novels, it is the function of this everlasting father to undertake, in the humanness of his divinity, the education of the everlasting son. The Huxleyan sons, too, are cut pretty much from one cloth. Sebastian of "Time Must Have a Stop" is the present-day descendant of Philip Quarles of "Point Counter Point"; he is the most recent of the long line of gifted young men who wander through Huxley's novels trying to cope with their lack of connection with other human beings. We have, then, the father and the son; all that is missing from this familial Eden is the mother. But the mother, being always Eve, would enter Paradise only to turn it into an earthly shambles.

For it is the significant point about Huxley's father-people that they are always conspicuously unattached to any mother-people. Huxley has yet to imagine the female saint, or, for that matter, the woman who would not destroy the saintliness of any man. In "Time Must Have a Stop" he makes rather more explicit than he ever has before the revulsion from maternal sexuality that underlies the inability of his young men to love; only seventeen at the start of the book, Sebastian can still be exposed to what Huxley calls maternal lust, and Huxley has the boy violently repelled by the maternal overtures of a middle-aged lady of his acquaintance. He also describes the boy's dead mother as having been a modern Caroline Lamb to whom Sebastian, in early childhood, bore a "frightening" resemblance, which he fortunately outgrew under the influence of the saintly Bruno. But grown to manhood, Sebastian is shown to have been unsuccessful in his marriage, to have resisted all possibility of re-marriage after the death of his wife, to have never been in love, and to have had his only continuing sexual relationship with the sadistic Mrs. Thwale. Neither Sebastian himself, nor Huxley, is troubled by this incapacity for ordinary affection. Yet it is Sebastian who, at the end of the book, is the vessel of Huxley's ideas about the new love that will save the world.

That the world needs saving there can certainly be no doubt—especially the world which Huxley pictures so brilliantly at the close of "Time Must Have a Stop." The novel ends with an epilogue; it is 1944 and the war is drawing to its chaotic close. Just as there is no easy humanitarianism in Huxley's solutions, there is no easy optimism in his vision of mankind's future; in fact, he rubs our noses in the ever-mounting dirt of our civilization. It is a salutary activity; the lamented Huxleyan pessimism seems to me to be both a lot more searching and a lot more revealing than most of our "healthy" political thinking. Unable to see any end, national or even international, to national squabbles, Huxley pins his hope on the individuals who make up nations—on the "one chance in a million" that the infection of religion "might spread so far that the people with the big battalions would actually not wish to use them." It is a weak hope, admittedly; yet it is not because of the long chance that one refuses the gamble. Indeed, it is almost in the measure that one agrees with Huxley that only by some renovation of the spirit will the world find salvation that one rejects his spirit which denies body, that one refuses his divine love which arises out of a deficiency of human love.

DIANA TRILLING

John L.

LABOR BARON: A PORTRAIT OF JOHN L. LEWIS. By James A. Wechsler. William Morrow and Co. $3.00.

"LABOR BARON" is an attempt to explain the career of the most formidable labor leader of our time in terms of a feeling of insecurity and lust for power. Swiftly sketching his early life, the author plunges into a description of Lewis's career in the labor movement. Although most of the material is by now familiar, it is interestingly and vigorously presented. The picture that emerges is of a blind giant motivated by a restless drive for power, a skilful and adroit negotiator, a daring organizer, a man of considerable personal charm and attractiveness, and a brooding, lonesome figure with self-aggrandizement as his one certain goal.

Lewis's rise to power in his own union, his bitter quarrels and his victory over his opponents, and the decay of his organization in the 1920's are described. Seizing the opportunity offered by a pro-labor Roosevelt Administration, Lewis succeeded in bringing the entire bituminous coal industry under the union banner, a feat none of his predecessors had been able to accomplish. While Wechsler devotes too little space to this achievement, he describes in more detail the events which led to the formation of the CIO, and its dramatic victories in the citadels of open-shop industry. Lewis's contribution to these victories is recognized, but Wechsler observes that the movement was "no one-man affair." It is of course true that the gains of the CIO were due to the many devoted organizers and rank-and-file workers, but the chief credit must go to Lewis. Without his continued aid and direction the movement might have flickered and died. The crucial needs of the non-union workers were not the reorganization of the structural forms of the American labor movement—although the dispute within the American Federation of Labor centered around this issue—but the furnishing of adequate financial support and leadership for the organizing drives. No other leader of a great union would have gambled with the finances of his organization; none other would have given as freely of his time and talent as did John L. Lewis in the greatest organizing drive in American history. Whatever sins Lewis may have subsequently committed were amply atoned for by his conduct in those great days. Moreover, in the crucial period when Lewis had it within his power to influence the stream of history, he acted to strengthen and to enlarge the organized labor movement. Later he lost his grip, and he became embittered, and out of conviction or pique he parted from his former friends. The chapters dealing with Lewis's relations to Roosevelt, Murray, and his alliance with the Communists are among the most informative and interesting in the book.

Reading the story of Lewis's relation to the Communists, one begins to doubt that Lewis is the powerfully shrewd man pictured by the author. A man of great drive and talent, to be sure, but one who is obviously out of his depth when dealing with a new problem. A shrewd horse trader at the conference table with employers and an autocratic taskmaster in dealing with his subordinates, Lewis was completely "outfoxed" by the Communist brethren. It was the shrewd Lewis who raised many of them to power; it was he who negotiated the first contracts for some of their unions; but it was the Communists who stayed on and maintained control. A less "clever" labor official like Dubinsky would never have invited the Communists into the house of labor, let alone built powerful unions for them to manage.

While the author has assembled much interesting material, the study is not altogether satisfactory, especially the sections dealing with motivation. There is, moreover, too much emphasis upon Lewis's "elaborately furnished house filled with the antiques and carpeted with Persian rugs" and not enough on the meaning of the concentration of power in the hands of autocratic labor leaders. Nor is the attempt to paint Lewis as a unique phenomenon entirely correct. Lewis differs from a number of other labor leaders only in his great drive, daring, and intelligence. Shrinking violets shrink into obscurity, and do not become leaders of unions, industries, or even educational institutions. Nor is the type of autocratic control exercised by Lewis unknown in other sections of the labor movement. Lewis does it more brazenly, but he is by no means the only autocrat. Similarly, Wechsler makes too much of Lewis's lack of philosophy. It may explain the lack of direction of his leadership, but not his abnormal craving for power. The members of the Executive Council of the AFL, the chiefs of the railway brotherhoods, and even the heads of most of the CIO unions are not strong on philosophy.

The most serious defect, to the reviewer, is the failure of the book to examine the institutional conditions which make possible the rise of autocratic labor leaders. It is not enough to have a yen for power, a feeling of insecurity, and great drive. The labor movement and the constituent unions must be so constructed that a power-seeking boss has the opportunity to exploit his ambitions. Wechsler inferentially recognizes this problem at the beginning of the book where he discusses the solitude and special character of miners and mining towns. Unfortunately, Wechsler's explanation will not hold water. The United Mine Workers of America was not always a dictatorially-managed union. Nor was it always an isolated segment of labor. For many years it was one of the more democratic organizations, with an active and aggressive socialist faction. Lewis's drive for power undoubtedly helped to undermine the democratic traditions, but the shift of industry and the union to new centers made the task of the dictator easier.

It is evident that the miners' union, like many others, is not organized to resist a resourceful tyrant determined to transform it into a personal barony. A John L. Lewis is unthinkable in the English labor movement. This is no accident. As Wechsler emphasizes, Lewis is the end product of business unionism, business unionism stripped of its last shreds of idealism. There is a vast difference between the business unionism of Gompers and Lewis. For Gompers business unionism was an ideal; a policy under which organized labor could survive and progress. Consequently Gompers always thought in terms of the labor movement, and he avoided any wilful action that would threaten its strength or weaken its position. The newer and less sensitive leaders look upon business unionism as a vehicle for place and preferment. Lewis is unique only because of his great talents, and not because he has no imitators. The ability of a strong individual to transform a democratic union into an engine of personal power shows a serious weakness in the structure of the labor movement, and represents a dangerous threat to society as well.

PHILIP TAFT

Read this penetrating analysis of Russia's new decree placing a premium on unlimited births and banning birth control—

RUSSIA'S RUBLEBABIES

BY MARGARET SANGER

In Special Labor Day Issue of

The New Leader

Other Feature Articles:

SHOULD LABOR UNIONS BE REGULATED?

A SYMPOSIUM BY

George Q. Lynch
Selig Perlman
Sterling D. Spero
Philip Taft
Oswald Garrison Villard
Louis Waldman
Robert Watt
Samuel D. Wolchok
Max Zaritsky

PRAGMATIC VALUE OF LIBERTY
By William Henry Chamberlin

DEMOCRATIC COLLECTIVISM IN POSTWAR ENGLAND
By Ernest Davies

POSTWAR EDUCATION
By Bertrand Russell

THE LIBERAL FANTASY
By Matthew Woll

Send for a FREE sample copy — Yearly Subscription $3

The New Leader

America's Leading Liberal-Labor Weekly

7 East 15th Street, New York 3

Balkan Memoir

HEADQUARTERS BUDAPEST. By Robert Parker. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

WHAT one reviewer wrote of an Oppenheim thriller, that it holds up from beginning to end and contains no small amount of sound political theory, can be applied to some of the Balkan memoirs which in recent years have flooded the literary market. It is questionable, however, whether by obliterating the boundary between scoops, beats, and sensational adventures on the one side and serious political information on the other these books really contribute to a better understanding of the problems of Eastern Europe.

Mr. Parker, as a leading correspondent for the Associated Press, covered Hungary and the Balkan countries during the first two years of the war; later he headed the Coordinator's Office and afterward the OWI office in Turkey. He thus had ample opportunity to learn by experience the intricacies of politics and economics in Eastern Europe. His account of German intrigues in Rumania and Turkey is particularly brilliant. No one can question his conclusion that peasant poverty is the outstanding problem of Eastern Europe and that it cannot be solved unless the methods of production are so improved as to make the goods of this region salable in markets other than Germany.

This development, however, is subject to agreement between the United States, Britain, and Russia. Even an isolationist incarnate must share the view of the author that the victors should not impose upon these countries the old discredited regimes or, conversely, take no hand whatsoever in choosing Eastern Europe's governments. Mr. Parker hits the mark when he says that a specific state of mind is the prerequisite of democratic self-government. That entails a big job for the Allies, and Mr. Parker believes that the State Department is not living up to it, but I think it is not exact to identify military expediency with the support given to Admiral Horthy—not by Mr. Hull but J. F. Montgomery, whom Mr. Parker characterizes as the "able American minister in Budapest."

A good many errors have slipped into Mr. Parker's book. It was not General Filipovich who seized Bosnia in 1908 but Count Aehrenthal who annexed it. It was not Horthy and his government which drove "Bela Kun's Communist regime out of the country in 1921"; this regime collapsed on August 1, 1919, under the impact of the Rumanian attack. And it is unlikely that the French minister, De Monzie, "had worked for the destruction of Czechoslovakia because President Benes had once failed to invite him to a cocktail party." Mr. Parker tells us on page 297 that the Balkans are underpopulated, but on page 334 he says that the "outstanding problem of that region is overpopulation." Although the rate of suicides in Budapest was always the highest in Europe, it is an obvious misstatement to say that in the first two months of 1944 nearly 1,500 corpses were fished out of the Danube and that "most had chosen the balcony of Parliament as a jumping-off place"—the quay separating the building from the river is about twenty feet broad.

All these errors, however, are of less moment than the author's attempt to back up the legend that Horthy offered resistance to the Nazis. At least that is the impression one gets from his account of an interview he had with the Regent. Horthy told him that after his royal reception by the Führer at Kiel in 1936 they had an argument in the Berlin Chancellery. "So I started screaming myself," the Regent went on, "and I said to him, 'Herr Hitler, I have had enough of this. Please remember I am an admiral of the Austro-Hungarian navy and you are only a corporal. Please remember I am a regent of a nation which has been independent for one thousand years, and you are the Chancellor of the Third Reich which has not lasted four years yet.' " It may be that Nicolas Horthy has become the Hungarian version of Nicolas Chauvin, the braggart Napoleonic soldier, but even if he did flaunt his esprit d'escalier to the American journalist, it is hardly likely that the former aide-de-camp of Emperor Francis Joseph would have lost his self-control to the extent of being rude to a host whose favor he had to solicit. But Mr. Parker evidently believed what the Admiral told him; otherwise he would not have written that "in March, 1944, Horthy again visited Hitler . . . and shouted him down." Moreover, while Mr. Parker is very skeptical of what other dictators told him, he believes that Count Bethlen, who during ten years of his premiership did his utmost to thwart every democratic reform, declared to his friend in 1939 that "the continuance of the feudal system convinced him that sooner or later Bolshevistic ideology will again strike root in the nation."

Such flaws are all the more regrettable since in general Mr. Parker's political thinking is perceptive and clear. He has a lively style and weaves many delightful and witty stories into the accounts of his innumerable interviews. The book has the merits of its author; its failings are in part the result of that unfortunate assumption that a hasty journalistic report changes into a book if it is printed in octavo size.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

The Ultimate Fanfare

LITTLE COQUETTE. By Renée de Fontarce McCormick. The Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.75.

TO THOSE weary of plowing through newspaper reports and the continuous flood of second-rate books on war; to the lovers of France, French food, wine, and wit; to those who once knew a world "whose sole concern was pleasure," as well as to those who may insist they are glad they never did—to these this book should be as welcome, in these dry days, as a magnum of Burgundy.

Its author is an intelligent, humorous, sensible woman—French. She has waited many years before writing not only about her unusual childhood (the palmy days leading up to the last war), but before publishing anything at all. She has adopted a technique which allows her to avoid many of the pitfalls and embarrassments of straight autobiography. "Simone d'Entrement," she says in a foreword, "is a little girl such as I once was. . . . The people, the places, the events of which I tell are in essence true, but the details are drawn from many sources; hence the characters of the book and the correlation of events are really fictional."

When you have read "Little Coquette," this last statement

Special Combination Offer!

A COPY OF THE 1st EDITION OF

New Poems 1944 an ANTHOLOGY of BRITISH and AMERICAN VERSE

edited by Oscar Williams

CONTRIBUTORS

- CONRAD AIKEN
- W. H. AUDEN
- GEORGE BARKER
- R. P. BLACKMUR
- JOHN BERRYMAN
- LOUISE BOGAN
- E. E. CUMMINGS
- GENE DERWOOD
- RICHARD EBERHART
- ROBERT FROST
- ROY FULLER
- RANDALL JARRELL
- ROBINSON JEFFERS
- C. DAY LEWIS
- ARCHIBALD MacLEISH
- LOUIS MacNEICE
- MARIANNE MOORE
- MURIEL RUKEYSER
- DELMORE SCHWARTZ
- KARL SHAPIRO
- EDITH SITWELL
- STEPHEN SPENDER
- ALLEN TATE
- DUNSTAN THOMPSON
- DYLAN THOMAS
- MARK VAN DOREN
- ROBT. PENN WARREN
- VERNON WATKINS

and OTHERS

containing the latest work of the important American and English poets. This book is the fourth in a series of which the three previous volumes have been acclaimed by leading critics. Of the last volume Delmore Schwartz has written in The New York Times: "Oscar Williams comes close to complete justice in representing a manifold host of poets. He illustrates very well how an editor can be comprehensive without being undiscriminating. . . . this kind of insight illuminates not only America, but poetry." The 1944 book, the most comprehensive of the four, contains a special section devoted to POEMS FROM THE FORCES and is a decided must for every lover of modern poetry. Biographical notes, and new photographs. A splendid first edition item.

REGULAR PRICE $3.00

A YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE NATION $5.00

AN $8.00 VALUE FOR . . . $6.75

MAIL IT TODAY

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Please send me a year's subscription to THE NATION beginning with the .... issue and a copy of NEW POEMS 1944 Anthology, edited by Oscar Williams. Enclosed find $6.75.

Name ....

Address ....

.... N

may make you smile, but at least it is preferable to the usual humorless formula. It has something of the disarming quality of Simone's father, that old roué Count Maxence d'Entrement, a man with no neck, no hair, tremendous physical strength, and a passion for misquoting proverbs. The Count fought seventeen duels, all of which he won. Attacked by a butcher during a strike in Lille, the Count, then a cavalry officer, "drew his saber and cut off the man's nose with a single blow." At home, however, in his chateau near Senlis, there were no quarrels. The only occasion on which he raised his fist at his daughter was when he overheard her humming that "song of assassins and murderers," the "Marseillaise." "More royalist than the King himself," the Count spent "half his life with horses, one quarter with women, and one quarter in sleep." He was reputed to have had more mistresses than any other man in Paris. He had an ingenious way of disposing of them: instead of deserting a woman, he "arranged things in such a way that she would desert him." With one exception, it seems to have succeeded with astonishing ease. The exception was a lady who, after the Countess d'Entrement's death, tried to seduce the Count into marriage. One day he heard that she had been seen in the company of the Duke d'Argoux. The Count promptly departed for England. From there he wrote the lady a letter:

> Bless you for the immense happiness you have given me. I am returning herewith several letters which, now that they are in your possession, make you once more your own mistress. After earnest reflection I have concluded that you could be much happier with the Duke d'Argoux. This explains my present decision to withdraw from your life, with a broken heart.

Such information concerning her parents and others Simone picked up by means of eavesdropping at keyholes and telephones, stealing letters from people's pockets and "going through" her father's mail. For such practices she felt as little guilt as did her father for his numerous infidelities. Miss Hayes, Simone's imperturbable English governess, made a pretense at being scandalized; while the Countess, as in everything else, stuck to her guiding principle: "Let us make as small a scandal as possible."

The Countess was a beautiful, exceedingly selfish woman, who, "frankly infatuated with herself," tried to make her figure conform to the prevailing fashion by "stuffing herself with great quantities of sardines in oil." Children "seemed to her as things to be shown off, like the horses and the chateau." She either paid no attention to her daughter's clothes, or bought her over one hundred dresses in a day. She occupied herself with the household, kept an eye on the food, the flowers, and the servants, never had the remotest idea how much money she had or spent, and entertained lavishly. Dinners, with double service, consisted of twenty courses "with a sherbet in the middle." Every year, we are told, the Count had to go off to Marienbad to relieve himself of fifty pounds.

When the Countess died, Simone lived with "three naughty bachelors"—her father; her Uncle Louis, who every now and again, tired of sumptuous living, slipped away to seek the company of cab drivers; M. Ballou, the Count's yes-man, "the only member of the household who had tender feelings;" and, of course, the inevitable Miss Hayes. Simone's life with them was such that when it once occurred to her that she might be deprived of her uncle, she exclaimed in alarm: "Life without my three men and Miss Hayes would be impossible!"

It may seem surprising that an intelligent child brought up in such an atmosphere should have been happy; that the very luxury of her life, the pointlessness of those around her, did not lead to boredom and create in her a reaction against it; that as a woman Mrs. McCormick can write of it with so little criticism and complaint. The chief reason, it seems to me, is that hers was a family without fear; it bore no one any grudge, felt no guilt about its position in society, knew its faults, and concealed none of them. It therefore lacked the hypocrisy and greed which was to undermine the morals of so many French families of a later generation and lead that country to catastrophe. If the d'Entrements would have preferred Hitler to Blum, it would have been out of ignorance rather than of fear. The Count was blind, but he had dignity, honesty, and courage. "Woman or no woman," he said in 1914, "I would rather fight for my country than do anything else in the world." And when he clinked his spurs and went off to war, "Only those who do not know how to live do not sin," he told his daughter, "but I have tried to do the least possible harm whenever I could." This is not the voice of a "collaborator," nor sentiments that could have been sincerely expressed by many Frenchmen born into a world such as his.

The only harm I can see that Mrs. McCormick has done is to give us, as the Countess gave her guests at those fabulous dinners, too much of a good thing. I needed a nap by the time the sherbet was served.

JAMES STERN

"A PRICKLY PROVOCATIVE CONTROVERSIAL BOOK."
—Orville Prescott, N. Y. Times

ON LIVING IN A REVOLUTION

by Julian Huxley

"Excellent! Here is not only the difference between the modern theory of evolution and the Mid-Victorian; it is the difference between the German world view and that of the democracies. We are living in a tremendous revolution . . . few writers can clarify the nature of this revolution with more insight than Julian Huxley."—Sterling North, N. Y. Post.

$2.50

HARPER

Sedition by Mail

BLACK MAIL. By Henry Hoke. Reader's Book Service. $1.

IN THE early, uproarious days of the Washington marathon Nazi conspiracy trial, newspapermen found it still a novelty to watch the alleged seditionists gather and harangue each other on the wide courthouse steps. At least once during each recess some reporter would remark that it was inconceivable to him that the gaunt, sepulchral James (Kike-Killer) True, or the late deaf and aged Elmer J. Garner or the perpetually grinning Prescott Dennett really could be a danger to the government or could have plotted to undermine the morale of the armed forces. Other reporters would look about at the twisted face of David Baxter, California Nazi, the pallid, dead-end features of Peter Stahrenberg, the anti-Semitic printer, and the old-maidish Lois De Lafayette Washburn and agree that, perhaps the government was silly and should forget the prosecution.

Now, with the sedition trial in its nineteenth week, along comes Henry Hoke to prove effectively that the government was not silly at all. Hoke says that some of the defendants were responsible for what peppery little William Power Maloney, a government prosecutor, once described as "the most effective propaganda machine that this world has ever seen, so effective and so diabolically clever that it is able to reach in and use the halls of our own Congress as a sounding board for its lies and half truths. . . ."

Written in a florid, excited style, "Black Mail" is the first complete disclosure of the use the German government and its paid and voluntary agents made of the United States mails. Hoke takes apart the interlocking directorate of pro-Nazi propaganda agencies. He reveals the actual mechanics of the network which linked Congressmen to isolationists, America Firsters, German and Japanese agents and anti-Jewish pressure groups. Hoke leaves nothing to the imagination. He reports, for example, that Representative Hamilton Fish's office ordered and paid for 1,600,000 copies of anti-British, isolationist speeches and then distributed them to nationalist groups for free mailing under his Congressional frank.

Hoke discloses that the simple-looking Dennett acted as the front for George Sylvester Viereck, convicted Nazi agent, probably the top pre-war director of German propaganda in America. Viereck, a master at using the mails, was convicted on six counts. The second stated that part of his activities in behalf of Adolf Hitler included writing speeches for Congressmen and getting those speeches in the Congressional Record. These talks were reprinted at the request of one of the anti-British Congressmen, such as Senator Burton K. Wheeler. The reprints were then turned over to one of many isolationist fronts set up by friends—or outright agents—of the Reich. Hoke exposes the system which the pro-Germans developed for using Congress for its purposes.

The rest of the book is a detailed account of the anti-Semitic and nationalist propaganda which "Peace Now," the America First Party, and all the other peddlers of hate are still pouring into the mail to sucker lists from which they try to get a few dollars (and supporters) in preparation for the great revival they hope will set in for their trade when peace comes.

VICTOR RIESEL

Coming

IN EARLY ISSUES OF THE NATION

WALTER WHITE, secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, on the Negro vote in the coming election.

*

RAY JOSEPHS, author of "Argentine Diary," on the tense political situation in Chile.

*

SUMNER WELLES, former Undersecretary of State, on the future of Germany.

*

CAREY McWILLIAMS, author of "Factories in the Field" and "Brothers Under the Skin," on the Negro in the new industrial Northwest.

*

F. G. L., a well-known figure in Pennsylvania's progressive political movement, on the Democrats' chances in that key state. . . . This is one of a series of articles on key states in the election. Others will deal with New York, Ohio, California, and Texas.

Convenient Order Form

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I enclose $.................. or, Bill me ☐

☐ 1 YEAR $5 ☐ 2 YEARS $8 ☐ 3 YEARS $11

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State.........

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 per year extra.

9-2-44

MOTION PICTURES

"This riotously funny motion picture, this superlatively small-town comedy, is also one of the wisest ever to burst from a big-time studio."
—Bosley Crowther, N. Y. Times.

Paramount Presents
PRESTON STURGES'
"HAIL THE CONQUERING HERO"
Starring
EDDIE BRACKEN with Ella Raines and William Demarest
In Person VAUGHN MONROE AND HIS ORCHESTRA
Plus GIL MAISON Extra! GENE SHELDON
BUY WAR BONDS PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE
AIR-CONDITIONED

DAVID O. SELZNICK presents
SINCE YOU WENT AWAY
CLAUDETTE COLBERT
JENNIFER JONES
JOSEPH COTTEN
SHIRLEY TEMPLE
MONTY WOOLLEY
LIONEL BARRYMORE
ROBERT WALKER
Now Playing Cool Capitol B'way at 51st St.

"A commanding screen biography."
. . . Crowther, Times
DARRYL F. ZANUCK'S WILSON
A 20th Century-Fox Picture
On the Roxy stage . . .
FRED WARING and his Pennsylvanians
ROXY CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

STAGE PLAYS

"HIT MUSICAL"
Walter Winchell
"Follow the Girls"

44th St. THEA.
West of Broadway
AIR COND.
Evs. 8:30. Mats. Wed.&Sat. 2:30
Presented by
DAVE WOLPER

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (In association with Jack H. Skirball)
JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL
The FRANZ WERFEL - S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN
LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS
J. EDWARD BROMBERG
MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED
Evenings at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK in
MEXICAN HAYRIDE
by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.
AIR CONDITIONED

NATION Advertising Rates

Advertising space in The Nation, reaching a net paid sales which so far this year averages 37,400 weekly, is available at rates ranging from 62 cents per line for classified copy to $250 per page for general advertising.

If you seek a responsive, discriminating audience of well-to-do folk in communities of all size from coast to coast, here is your A-1 medium. For information, telephone BArclay 7-1066 or write

Advertising Department
THE Nation
20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

BLOOD DONORS NEEDED!

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

allow the serviceman to vote from wherever he may be providing he is properly registered. To register in those three states, however, he has to appear in person before designated local election officials in the State.

Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, South Carolina, require the serviceman to pay the State poll tax.

Arkansas has a twelve-day period from the day they fix as the earliest date of sending out State absentee ballots and the date on which they must be received in the State. Obviously even if all the ballots were sent out on the very first of these twelve days only a very small portion of domestically stationed servicemen could return their ballots in time.

PVT. M. S.

Somewhere in California, August 21

Baron Wiseacre

Dear Sirs: The New York Times of July 6 carried a dispatch from its Rome correspondent, Herbert L. Matthews, acquainting the American public with the latest phase in the efforts of the Vatican to bring about a negotiated peace "with as many elements of compromise in it as possible." It is explained that "presumptive peace negotiators" for the European Axis are actually in Vatican City, namely, the envoys to the Holy See of Germany, Hungary, Rumania, Slovakia, and Finland, led by Baron Ernst von Weizsaecker, the German Ambassador. We are, moreover, informed that "every one of these men . . . has often been in touch with Harold H. Tittman, Jr., the American Chargé d'Affaires, and Francis d'Arcy Osborne, the British Ambassador, in recent months."

This correspondent, who has not the privilege of being an American citizen, does not wish to raise the question whether for Allied diplomats to be "often in touch" with Axis diplomats at the present juncture is or is not consistent with the acknowledged policy of unconditional surrender. Since evidently the contacts exist, he deems it his duty, however, to assist Americans in getting an adequate picture of the Axis peace negotiators. He begs to differ from Mr. Matthews, who introduces these men by saying they "are all irons in the Allied fire, so to speak. Every one of them is notoriously Anglophile. Not one of them is a genuine supporter of the Axis or of the governments they represent"; and who assures us specifically that Baron von Weizsaecker "is not at all a Nazi."

True, Baron von Weizsaecker—to concentrate on the man whom Mr. Matthews describes as "the most important of all"—probably never wore a brown shirt or joined the Nazi Party, and it may well be assumed that neither in public nor in private did he ever curse a Jew, Churchill, or even the Bolsheviks. He is a gentleman of the old school, scion of a distinguished and cultured Wuerttemberg family, an accomplished musician, using the pleasant ways and mild manners that made him congenial at the gatherings of the League of Nations, where he often sat on behalf of the German government. The baron does not talk Nazi; that would be beneath his breeding and his dignity. Nor would such a man fully subscribe to a political program that includes so much shocking and in the final analysis really quite unnecessary "radicalism." At many a dinner table and also to visitors before his desk the baron has taken exception to Nazi policies.

So the baron is not a genuine supporter of the Nazi government! The Nazis apparently disagree with Mr. Matthews. While the baron has held the rank of an envoy since 1931, it was under Hitler that he rapidly rose to prominence. In 1933 he received his first major foreign assignment, when he was accredited to the Swiss government. In 1936 he was appointed to no less a post than that of an acting director of the Political Division in the Berlin Foreign Office. In 1937 he was promoted to full director, and in April, 1938, immediately after the Austrian coup, he became Secretary of State in the Foreign Office, the German equivalent, or almost, of the post of Undersecretary of State in this country. In other words Hitler gave him key positions, and his job was precisely to assist the Nazis in the diplomatic preparation for and the diplomatic conduct of their present war. Did Hitler bestow so great a responsibility on a man who did not support his government? Or can one assume that the baron faked his loyalties—faked them successfully for some ten years?

Baron von Weizsaecker's record is clear; from the outset he has freely lent his good name, his considerable talents, and his experience to Adolf Hitler. Not only has he been a supporter of his government. Like the notorious Dr. Schacht he stands out as a particularly dangerous specimen of Nazi agent. Well-groomed and well-spoken, respectable, a gentleman from top to toe, ostensibly critical of the Nazis, an "Anglophile," the baron is ideally suited for the job of befuddling those who cannot or will not see through the Nazi game.

The Stalingrad disaster brought it home to the Nazis that they could not win the war and that their only hope lay in a negotiated peace. At that time the baron left his post in Berlin for that of Ambassador to the Vatican. A clever appointment. Baron von Weizsaecker is an "honorable man," and it seems that there is no Mark Antony to show him up on the forum Romanum.

LUDWIG HAMBURGER

Washington, D. C., July 31

For Unity

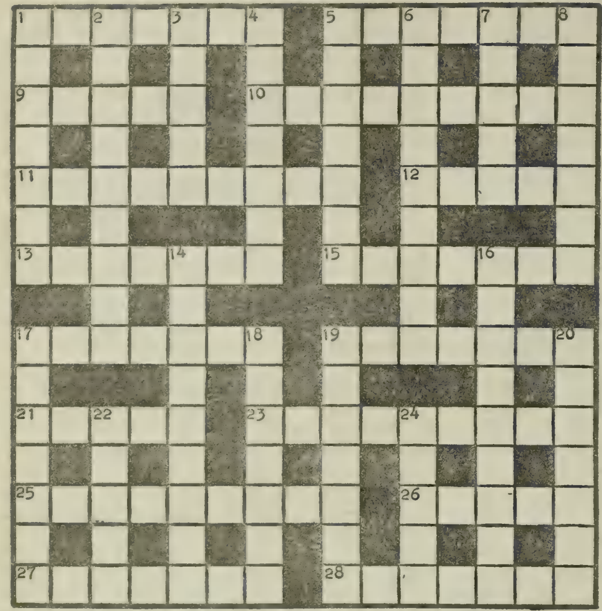
Dear Sirs: In your editorial in the issue of August 5 you write that ". . . if the progressives realize their strength in time they can shape a counteroffensive. For numbers are on their side and the hopes of ordinary men and women and the deepest requirements of our struggling civilization." That is so terribly true that the failure (aside from PAC) of progressives to unite is a sad story for us. The worst example of progressive petulance in recent months has been the decision of the Liberal Party to follow the "no, no, my way only" path to salvation. And that has been the tragic fallacy of progressive movements in America. The history of our intelligent minority movements has been a history of internal bickering, of fatal schisms. But now we have come to a time in the development of our nation when it is vital that the differences between men who place the dignity of life above the value of the dollar sign be resolved into a strong and forceful unity. The forces of reaction are gathering in full power for the kill.

To achieve that unity a congress must be held—after the November elections whether Roosevelt is elected or not, and especially if not—a congress of all the forces which have in one way or another demonstrated their adherence to the principles enumerated.

The composition of the Congress would be varied—organizations like the Union for Democratic Action, Friends of Democracy, the Communist Political Association, Socialist Party, the American Labor Party, the Liberal Party; newspapermen like Max Lerner, Sam Grafton, Freda Kirchwey, Bruce Bliven, Joseph North, Jennings Perry, Kenneth Leslie, George Seldes; union leaders like Phil Murray, Phil Carey, Joseph Curran, Albert Fitzgerald, John Green, Reid Robinson, Harry Bridges, Emil Rieve, Dan Tobin, A. F. Whitney; farm leaders, James Patton, Murray Lincoln;

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 79

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Gate with only one post
5 A family of great expectations, in Dickens
9 Suitable beverage for Haile Selassie?
10 Signally expressive, that's the long and short of it (two words, 5 and 4)
11 Characteristics peculiar to a certain class (hyphen, 4-5)
12 "Their cause I -----, ----- it in heart and mind; A fellow-feeling makes one wondrous kind" (Garrick)
13 A round figure, though it sounds like a round letter
15 Letters from a colonist
17 In bed less and consequently happy
19 Bobadil did, in Jonson's Every Man in His Humour
21 Considered as a record of the amount of seaside air required, it doesn't seem enough
23 "There is nothing new except what is ---------" (Mlle. Bertin to Marie Antoinette)
25 Parisian night club
26 "The atrocious ----- of being a young man," as Dr. Johnson once expressed it
27 System of holding land in single holdings made up of detached pieces
28 Infuriates

DOWN

1 Wild creature whose foot pollinates flowers
2 Tune is rag (anag.)
3 Where the English have their Derby
4 To be found in the Book of Numbers, no doubt
5 Sticklers for perfect speech
6 Had her nose been shorter the face of the whole world might have been changed
7 Eat away
8 Unsuccessful suitor for the hand of "Sweet Anne Page"
14 Wife of Othello
16 "But Hudibras gave him a twitch As quick as --------- in the breech" (Butler)
17 Fish we do not find in the sea
18 Precious pair in The Tale of Two Cities (she, a dangerous woman, everlastingly knitting)
19 Garnets (anag.)
20 They know all about Bobs minor, major, royal and maximus
22 Sultan of the East; conqueror of the Christians. A magnanimous man
24 It may happen that a conscientious objector turns on a dog

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 78

ACROSS:—1 PARSNIPS; 5 FINISH; 10 FANCIER; 11 ERL-KING; 12 LILY; 13 DIVER; 16 DAUB; 17 SATIRES; 19 BOGUS; 20 CEREAL; 22 SHALLOW; 23 HAWAII; 25 VENOM; 27 ENTICED; 31 TWIN; 32 GONER; 33 FISH; 36 APERIES; 37 SPECIES; 38 DASHES; 39 FREDERIC.

DOWN:—1 PIFFLE; 2 RINALDO; 3 NAIL; 4 PERMIT; 6 ILLS; 7 IMITATE; 8 HIGHBALL; 9 REFER; 13 DASHING; 14 VILLAIN; 15 RECOVER; 17 SUSIE; 18 SEWED; 21 SHETLAND; 24 WAITERS; 26 OLIVIER; 28 TOAST; 29 CENSOR; 30 PHYSIC; 34 MINE; 35 LEAD.

Negro leaders, Walter White, Clayton Powell, A. Philip Randolph; writers, Howard Fast, Ruth McKenney, Ernest Hemingway, John Dos Passos; professors, Ralph Barton Perry, R. M. Lynd, Francis McMahon, Oscar Lange; radio commentators like Frank Kingdon; and, of course, Hollywood.

And the course of action? Discussions should be held on the basic necessity for unity among all of these groups. Committees could be set up, and procedures established for cooperation. Difficulties between many progressives could perhaps be ironed out by face-to-face meetings. Fantastic? I don't know. All over the world people have discovered how basic is the need for unity against reaction. There's the story of Yugoslavia still fresh for us to read, of Italian unity, of French unity. People can come together if they are honest and talk out the difficulties which lie between them and find mutual bases for active cooperation. No one man, no one group possesses the one and only, the true way to "salvation."

For some reason there has been an awful apathy among progressives to bestir themselves from their typewriters, march out of their own lush Arcadias of democracy, and shake hands with each other. It would do a hell of a lot of people a hell of a lot of good, not to mention the country.

CORPORAL

Somewhere in New Jersey, August 10

Letters Wanted

Dear Sirs: I am compiling a book of letters written by women serving overseas in the military services of the United States and will be grateful for copies of letters. A book of such letters, describing the experiences, thoughts, and reactions of our enlisted women, I believe, will not only be of interest to men and women at home but will be a valuable historical record, inasmuch as this is the first time that women have served their country overseas in the military services. Copies of letters should be addressed to Miss Alma Lutz, 22 River Street, Boston 8, Massachusetts, and should have noted on them the name, rank, branch of service, and location of the writer; also the name and address of the sender and his or her relationship to the writer of the letter. Any originals sent for copying will receive good care and be promptly returned.

ALMA LUTZ

Boston, Mass, August 20

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK : SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 9, 1944 NUMBER 11

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 281

EDITORIALS

George W. Norris by Freda Kirchwey 283
A Plea to the President 285

ARTICLES

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 286
A Purged Press for France by Rufus Baxter 287
Pennsylvania's G. O. P. Is Worried by F. G. L. 289
In The Wind 291
Europe's Wandering Jews—and Others by Lewis S. Gannett 292
Polls, Propaganda, Politics 294
50 Years Ago in The Nation 294

POLITICAL WAR

Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 295
Inside the Fortress by Gerold Frank 296
Quislings After Defeat by T. Adam 297

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Mexican Workshop by Elizabeth Wilder 299
Pertinax on France by Lilian Mowrer 299
Philosopher-Politician by Odell Shepard 300
Josiah Wedgwood by Rustem Vambery 302
Sea Power in World War II by Stefan T. Possony 303
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 304
In Brief 305
Records by B. H. Haggin 305
LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 306
CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 80 by Jack Barrett 308

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON ▪ MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SCHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 8, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

BELGIUM, HOLLAND, LUXEMBOURG—EVEN while we set down the names whole countries are snatched out of Hitler's grasp. The edges of Germany itself are crumbling, and by the week's end the attack on the inner fortress will certainly be fully launched. All of southern France is now liberated, and in the north 100,000 German troops are supposed to be trapped between the Somme and the Belgian frontier. This in the west. In the east more than half the Balkan peninsula has been taken. Russian forces are close to a junction with Tito's army in Yugoslavia, and a million satellite troops have been lost to Germany just as its own manpower has reached a final stage of exhaustion. The Nazi débâcle in the east is almost complete; only Hungary, headed now by the fascist puppet, General Lakatos, still holds out, driven by its own suicidal determination to keep Transylvania at any cost and by the force of a full German occupation. Finland at last has accepted reality, and the guns on the Finnish front are silent. (What has that miserable country gained by its long servitude to its Nazi overlord?) The stage is now set for every sort of rumor of German collapse and capitulation. Yet areas of stubborn resistance remain to warn us that the enemy, though beaten, may still rouse himself to a final desperate struggle. In Brest the Nazi garrison hangs on, as we write, against the most concentrated air attack of the entire war, and on the Vistula front, as in the Baltic states, the Germans continue to resist Russian pressure. The first engagements on German territory will show whether the Nazi fortress is going to fall intact, as have the occupied countries, or whether there is more than words in the Angriff article by Deputy Reich Press Chief Helmut Sundermann, broadcast by the Berlin Radio, pledging that the invaders of Germany would find there "nothing but death, destruction, and hatred."

*

THE NAZIS HAVE AT LAST ADMITTED THE certainty of defeat. Although there is still talk of a secret weapon which will win the war in four to six months, it appears that few Germans place much stock in the latest whoppers. An informal poll conducted more than a month ago by a Swedish agency revealed that at least 80 per cent of the Germans questioned believed even then that military defeat was inevitable. This view has been given official sanction by none other than General Kurt Dittmar, Germany's leading military radio commentator, who declared recently that "the course of events seems to support" those who believe Germany's military defeat is near. Dittmar went on to say that Germany must fight on, not in order to win, but in the hope that the Allies can be induced to make a softer peace than is implied in the term "unconditional surrender." Civilians are being urged to make every German city a Stalingrad. Without doubt the German people will hold out for a time, but it will be because they are terrorized by secret police and a Nazi party organization that still retains its efficiency in face of the impending military collapse. But the resistance shown by the population of Stalingrad, Leningrad, and Sevastopol will not be repeated in Germany. Indeed, the necessity for terroristic methods is but an external reflection of the inherent German morale.

*

THE LATEST PROPOSALS FOR POLISH UNITY submitted by Prime Minister Mikolajczyk after approval by the exile cabinet and the underground parliament in Warsaw appear to represent an honest attempt to reach a settlement with Moscow. Mikolajczyk has declared his willingness to set up at Warsaw, immediately after its liberation, a democratic coalition government which would include representatives from the pro-Soviet Polish Workers Party. This government would renew relations with the Soviet Union, undertake the responsibility of assuring order in the rear of the Red Army, and prepare immediately for elections. The new government would also take steps to remove one of the thorniest points of friction with Russia by abolishing the post of Commander-in-Chief of the Polish forces held by the bitterly anti-Soviet General Sosnkowski. Proposals are also said to have been submitted for a compromise on the long-standing border dispute. It is not known how closely Mikolajczyk's plan approximates the proposals presented to him by the new Committee of National Liberation, but the contrast between the new plan and all those previously submitted by the Government in Exile is so great as to raise hope that an agreement may be possible. The terrible toll taken among Warsaw's brave and patriotic population because of lack of coordination between the underground and the advancing Red Army has created a dramatic urgency which should facilitate a compromise settlement

*

THE YUGOSLAV GOVERNMENT IN LONDON has made public the agreement between Premier Subasich and Marshal Tito, signed on June 16 on liberated Yugoslav soil. The agreement calls for a government which will include persons who have not "compromised themselves in the struggle against the National Liberation Movement." It recommends the unification under the leadership of Marshal Tito of all forces now fighting in the country. And it wisely postpones until after the war the solution of the organization of the state. The people will be given the right to decide whether or not they want a king to rule them. In a statement appended to the agreement, the exile government recognizes "the national and democratic achievements of the Yugoslav people during the three-year struggle, by which the foundations of a democratic federal organization of the federal states have been laid and a temporary administration of the country set up" by the National Liberation Movement. "All traitors to the people who collaborated with the enemy either openly or secretly" are condemned, and Marshal Tito is given full credit for the leadership of the resistance. Mihailovich is not mentioned at all. And so at last, the people are recognized and Marshal Tito is acknowledged as the military and political authority within Yugoslavia, empowered to communicate with the chancelleries of the other United Nations. It is to be hoped that the agreement will hasten the flow of supplies into Yugoslavia.

*

COMMENTING ON SIDNEY HILLMAN'S ABLE statement before the House Committee to Investigate Campaign Expenditures, the New York Herald Tribune admits that the CIO Political Action Committee is not violating the law. But it says "the whole business is wrong." It is wrong, in the Herald Tribune's opinion, "because it is the systematic application of heat to candidates for public office by a powerful pressure group with a distinct economic interest." But American politics, and both major parties, as the editors of the Herald Tribune well know, have long been subject to the pressures of groups with distinct economic interests. We have yet to hear the Herald Tribune or any other conservative newspaper object to the powerful pressure exerted on both parties by the New York banking community, or by American industry. It would seem that the objection is not to pressure groups in general but to the exercise of pressure by labor. The Herald Tribune says that the CIO PAC "constitutes a threat to freedom of choice in a democracy and majority rule." But it seems to us that a committee directly representing 5,000,000 workers and indirectly reflecting the Presidential choice of the overwhelming majority of America's 60,000,000 workers is far less "a threat to freedom of choice . . . and majority rule" than the activities, let us say, of the du Pont or Rockefeller families—or the $1,300,000 pre-election "educational" campaign of the National Association of Manufecturers. For the money of these few easily outweighs the votes of many. Far from being a threat to majority rule, the activities of the CIO Political Action Committee should help to reestablish majority rule by arousing millions of workers to an effective use of their ballots.

*

IN PASSING THE EMASCULATED GEORGE BILL by an overwhelming vote the House has greased the ways for the coming post-war depression. True, the Senate bill offered little that would prevent a crisis when ten million service men and fifteen to twenty million war workers scramble simultaneously for peacetime jobs which may never materialize. But the Senate bill did at least provide unemployment compensation for the several millions who are employed in federal shipyards and arsenals. And it provided a federal training program for demobilized war workers together with an allowance to enable those who have left their homes to work in war factories to return to their former place of residence. If a sufficient number of telegrams and letters go to Washington this next week from the people who will vote in November, these provisions may yet be reinstated by the Senate-House conferees. Otherwise, we face an inevitable post-war crisis because millions will lack the buying power to maintain a high level of production, either by agriculture or industry. But the failure of Congress to assure adequate compensation for displaced war workers is not its most serious shortcoming. Far graver has been its delay in setting up an agency empowered to lay plans for post-war public construction. It has begun to look as if, instead of "full employment," we are in for another protracted period of apple-selling and leaf-raking. And this time Democrats as well as Republicans are responsible.

George W. Norris

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

WHEN George W. Norris was defeated for the Senate in 1942 he believed that his usefulness was gone and his end near. Now, two years later, the great Senator has died, and from all over the land he loved so deeply men are hurrying to testify that never in his long life had he been more needed than today. For the strange fact is that Norris's defeat was also his release into a freer, broader field of action. It is true that he was weary and disheartened. But it is equally true that his retirement from the Senate transformed him into a national symbol of the country's struggle toward a more vigorously democratic future. The integrity that had stood like a fortress against the assaults of the strongest and most unscrupulous financial interests in the United States, the fierce faith in a more just and generous society—those qualities suddenly became a nucleus around which the hopes of progressives of every faction could rally.

In December, 1942, two months after the election, The Nation and the Union for Democratic Action combined to hold a great public dinner in New York in honor of the man and his record. It was an amazing affair. Instead of the usual demonstration of appreciation and respect—though these were not lacking—the dinner developed into a political rally. The audience itself was an indication of Norris's place in America: it was a "popular front" of all the progressive elements in the community. And the speakers, one after another, called upon the old Senator to use his freedom from official duties to act as leader of a new movement, non-partisan but militant, to resist reaction and fight for a people's peace, for full production and a decent American standard of living.

Philip Murray, President of the C I O, at the close of his speech struck Senator Norris on the shoulder and called out, "You lead, George, and we'll follow!" James Patton pledged the active participation of the Farmers Union. And the many unattached liberals at the speakers' table, as well as on the floor, felt a new lifting of hope, a new energy, at this sudden, warm demonstration of unity.

The attempt to create a movement out of that single event did not succeed. Perhaps the moment was not right. But an impulse of such strength, expressing such obvious need, seldom dies without issue. Last month George W. Norris accepted the post of Honorary Chairman of the National Citizens Political Action Committee. And on the board of the new organization are to be found many of the leaders who came together that night to convert defeat into victory by closing their ranks around a man who represented the best in all the groups on the left in America.

The other day I had a letter from Senator Norris. It must be one of the last he wrote for it is dated August 25, four days before his fatal attack. The letter was personal but it shows so clearly how he felt at the end of his life about the organization he headed and the issues with which it must deal, that, with a few omissions, I am going to print it here. I look upon it as a last testament, however unintended, to his political followers. Readers should remember that it was written by a man who had championed labor all his life; who was the author, with Mayor La Guardia, of the anti-injunction act outlawing "yellow-dog" contracts and protecting labor's right to strike and picket. They should realize that when Norris criticizes workers or leaders who have encouraged wartime strikes, he is speaking out of a passionate desire for a labor movement, not only strong in numbers and militant in behalf of its own interests, but statesmanlike and mature, aware of the political responsibilities that go with power.

After resigning from the Republican Party, Norris had no political affiliation. But he always hoped to see develop that unity in action between workers, farmers, and liberals of other groups out of which a national progressive coalition might arise. He believed that the PAC, with its roots in the labor movement and its branches reaching out into the community as a whole, might provide the start of such a coalition. The letter which follows should be read with this background in mind.

Dear Miss Kirchwey:

I have read your letter of August 16 with a great deal of interest. One of the reasons I hesitated about becoming the Honorary Chairman of the National Citizens Political Action Committee was that I feared it might be, in the mind of the public, coupled with a purely labor organization. I feel that it ought to be much broader than that. I have at different times talked the general subject over with Mr. Murray, and I was always greatly impressed with his fairness and with his own belief that labor, like other groups, has made its mistakes. An organization that was purely a labor organization would not be popular, especially in the West. There is a feeling among the farmers that labor organizations have not been fair and that they insist on getting a high wage for themselves, while disregarding the fact that the farmer's financial success is after all a gamble and depends entirely upon the weather and other conditions over which he has no control whatever.

I might say in passing that I do not agree with the position that many leading farmers have taken. They, like some of the leaders of labor, are, I think, unreasonable; they are jealous, they are prejudiced and do not take a broad-minded view of the situation. They are too selfish and have little regard for the feelings and rights of people not connected with their group. This of course is not true of all leaders of either group. Some of them are broad-minded, fair men, and are taking positions that seem to me very commendable. I myself have had a feeling that there have been strikes that were unnecessary and should have been avoided. I have been very much perturbed by the fact that some of these strikes have taken place against the wishes and desires of labor leaders. I feel, particularly, that the Philadelphia strike was uncalled for and that the people who were hurt by it, more than any other class, were the laborers themselves. That strike excited a feeling that it was unwarranted and, under the circumstances, even unpatriotic.

I read a report of the strike quoting from a speech by one of the leaders, that grieved me very much. I thought it injurious to our war effort and particularly to labor. This speaker seemed to have nothing else in view than the success of the strike. He had apparently no idea of the terrible condition in which the country is now placed. He evidently did not care whether bombs and other munitions of war were made in sufficient quantities so that our soldiers at the front would have the means of carrying on the fight, and I noticed in the report, that when he made the loudest claims for labor he was cheered immensely by his hearers.

I have no sympathy with that kind of behavior. I think no one will deny that I have been a friend of labor practically all my life, but I condemn such actions as bitterly as anyone else does. Labor ought to be prepared like any other group of citizens to make the sacrifices that are necessary to bring success. Sometimes these sacrifices would mean that it would have to put up temporarily with conditions that under ordinary circumstances would be unbearable, but unless we are all willing to sacrifice—and that means give up some of our own ideas and keep on fighting, even though we are not getting the right kind of treatment—we cannot hope to achieve the unity that will bring success to our cause; and that is one reason why I would have hated to become officially identified with an organization that I knew was going to be charged with representing only labor. . . .

I think the National Citizens Political Action Committee ought to let the country understand that we are a much broader organization, that we want justice and fairness for labor, and that we are equally anxious that every field of activity, including the farmers particularly, should have the same fair, honest, equal treatment. If we could get this idea abroad and could convince the people that we are asking no special favors for labor, we would go a long ways towards winning the fight.

Yesterday I wrote a letter to Mr. Clark Foreman, Secretary of the N.C.P.A.C., in which I enclosed a letter I had received from a Methodist minister in New Jersey. I enclosed also a copy of my reply. This minister had written criticising me severely for becoming Honorary Chairman of the N.C.P.A.C. He evidently thought that he was a liberal, but he was outspoken in condemnation of Roosevelt. He did not want a fourth term. He was mad at England because she had not treated India right, and he had it in for China because Chiang Kai Shek was a dictator, and he had hatred for the Communists and therefore did not like our partnership with Russia. He evidently hated everybody except that he said nothing about Hitler or any of his supporters.

Such men are scattered over the country. Many of them cannot be subdued of course, but all such men as have written me are leaders of public thought in their communities. I wanted to cause him to stop and think what he was doing. I did not express any bitterness in my reply although I think I would have been justified in doing so. It seems to me that our honest patriotic citizenship, especially the citizen inclined to the liberal cause, ought to be reminded that we have in our midst men and women, perhaps patriotic, who are opposing our cause because they do not like Russia or China or Great Britain. And we ought to be able to convince these people, not only of the righteousness of our cause, but also that citizens who hold back because they do not like Russia, China, or Great Britain are doing a great injury to their country and are disuniting our people in a fight where absolute unity is necessary for success. G. W. NORRIS.

The death of Norris has occurred at a moment when labor has finally become aware of its enormous potential strength as a factor in American politics. In the full development of that strength lies the greatest hope of our democratic future, but it must be inspired by the high sense of responsibility so earnestly stressed by the Senator in his letter.

[An article on Senator Norris by David Lilienthal, head of the Tennessee Valley Administration, will appear in an early issue. And later on The Nation will publish several chapters from Norris's autobiography, which was happily completed before his death.]

A Plea to the President

THE editors of The Nation appeal to President Roosevelt to send a special message to Congress asking the passage of the Chavez-Scanlon bill for a permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee. They believe that the President would thereby invigorate the campaign for his reelection. A courageous insistence on the application at home of the principles for which we fight abroad would give his supporters a lift their spirits badly need. A certain enervation is visible in their ranks. We are not unmindful of the necessities of so-called practical politics, but a combination of excessive caution and dubious expediency in domestic policy may turn out to be highly impractical. The invocation of Mr. Roosevelt's past achievements is running into the stage of diminishing returns, and the moment has come for a move with some admixture of the heroic.

We do not know what the Nervous Nellies of the White House palace guard are telling the President, but we cannot imagine a more favorable combination of circumstances in which to defy the right-wing Southern oligarchy which thinks it owns the Democratic Party. The Republicans, after their platform promises, and on the eve of an election in which the Negro vote may prove decisive, cannot vote against the Chavez-Scanlon bill. To ask for its passage now would be to drive a wedge, perhaps a permanent wedge, between the Republicans in Congress and their reactionary Democratic allies. The passage of the bill, under prodding from the President, would bring the great majority of Negroes back into the New Deal camp and would give new heart to listless progressives who are for the President as against Dewey but are fed up with Mr. Roosevelt's long-continued appeasement of the right.

We are not ungrateful for the President's action in establishing the Fair Employment Practices Committee or for the limited support he has given it, but we believe an unusual political opportunity presents itself at this time to make that committee permanent, to give it legal standing and power, and to write into law the principles it has applied. Mr. Justice Roberts gave those principles the sanction of the Supreme Court three years before the FEPC was set up. In the New Negro Alliance case the court extended the protection of the Norris-La Guardia act to picketing against racial discrimination and said, "The desire for fair and equitable conditions of employment on the part of persons of any race, color, or persuasion, and the removal of discrimination against them by reason of their race or religious beliefs is quite as important . . . as fairness and equity in terms and conditions of employment. Race discrimination by an employer may reasonably be deemed more unfair and less excusable than discrimination on the ground of union affiliation." Congress has full power to act, and the President should ask it to do so.

The establishment of a permanent FEPC seems to us part of any sound program for the preservation of social stability in the transition from war to peace. A permanent FEPC would help to prevent the grave racial disorders that marked demobilization after the First World War. "The homecoming Negro soldiers," Gunnar Myrdal says of that period in "The American Dilemma," "met the suspicions and fears of the Southern whites. In the North, their new footholds in industry were contested by anxious white job-seekers in the post-war depression. A wave of lynchings swept the South and even more bloody race riots swept the North." In 1919 there were race riots in twenty-six American cities, the worst in Chicago, where fifteen whites and twenty-three Negroes were killed. The field of race relations has too long been the no man's land of American law, and the firm enforcement of equality in employment opportunity will go far to prevent the festering resentment that breeds disorder.

We likewise believe that the establishment of a permanent FEPC would be an effective weapon of political warfare when Hitler is defeated and our energies turn toward the defeat of Japan. It would give the justifiably uneasy and suspicious brown and yellow peoples of the Far East concrete evidence of a progressive change in the American attitude toward the colored races. It would dissociate us in their eyes from attitudes that seem to them strikingly similar to Hitler's and thus spike the biggest gun in the arsenal of Japanese propaganda. In Latin America, long disturbed by discriminations here against immigrants from Mexico and other Latin American countries, it would give new reality to the Good Neighbor policy.

A permanent FEPC would erect a barrier against those forces which lie in wait for us at home and intend with the coming of peace to exploit for the purposes of reaction every racial and religious difference among us.

Anti-Semitism will be stronger and better organized than before, and Nazi propaganda techniques will be applied to set Americans of different racial origins apart from each other. We ask the President to act in the name of justice to the Negroes and other minority groups in our armed forces. A permanent FEPC would be some guaranty that they will not face at the employment-agency window what they thought they had defeated in Europe. Ernesto Galarza of the Pan-American Union, testifying before the House Labor Committee on behalf of Mexican Americans, summed up what the FEPC means to all minorities in this country when he said that it gives them "a feeling that they belong."

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

RADIO Tokyo has come up with a new phrase explaining defeat which belongs in the same class with Radio Berlin's "elastic defense." The phrase first appeared after the loss of Saipan, and much seems likely to be heard of it in the coming months.

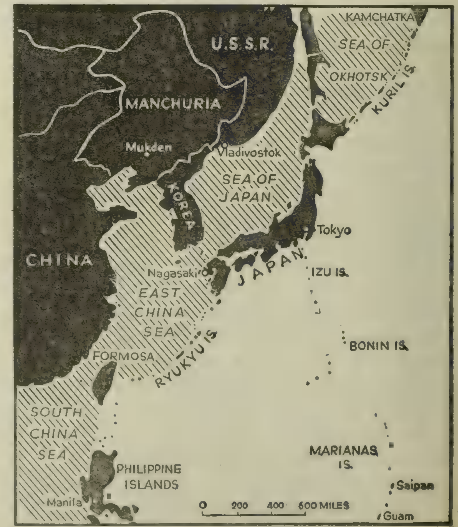
"Basic sea area" is the phrase. It is used to describe that area of the sea which is considered vital to Japan's existence as a nation, the area which Japan naturally controls and will fight for. This area runs from the Sea of Okhotsk in the north southward through the Sea of Japan and the East China Sea to the South China Sea: that is, the entire belt of seas bordering the east of Asia, from Kamchatka in the north to Sumatra in the south — a distance of more than five thousand miles.

The most obviously significant thing about this list is that it makes no mention of the Pacific Ocean—ordinarily considered quite an important body of water. Japan now claims not only no dominion but no essential national interest anywhere east of the great island chain stretching from the Kuriles through the home islands, the Ryukyus, Formosa, and the Philippines to the Netherlands East Indies. And even in the latter group, it would seem that Tokyo has written off Netherlands New Guinea, the Moluccas, the eastern Sundas, and Celebes.

It is in the "basic sea area" that the Japanese fleet is to operate; here, presumably, it is to give battle to the United States Third and Fifth Fleets, or any other Allied fleets which present themselves. The casual dismissal of the Pacific smacks more than a little of sour grapes; it is by way of being a back-handed compliment to Task Force 58, that extraordinarily mobile strategic air force, and the troops and planes of the Allied Southwest Pacific command. It may also be a prior apology for the non-appearance of the Japanese fleet at a number of threatened points: the Volcano and Bonin groups, stepping-stones from the Marianas to Tokyo; Formosa, a dagger thrust at the China coast; the Moluccas, and the Philippines themselves. All of these are approached from the Pacific, and the inaction of the Japanese fleet is thus explained.

This is an inexcusable perversion of the fleet-in-being principle—inexcusable, that is, in Western eyes. The principle requires that an inferior fleet maintain itself intact, not offering combat, but forcing the superior enemy fleet to restrict its operations until the fleet-in-being is destroyed. But the sole type of mission which justifies the fleet-in-being principle is the defense of territory in the nation's home waters; and it is inconceivable that the waters on one side of, say, Formosa are "home waters" while those on the other side are of no concern; are "outside the 'basic sea area'."

Of course the reason for this change of heart and strategic concept is not hard to find. Allied sea power began to increase relative to Japan's sea power at Mid-



Shading Shows Japan's "Basic Sea Area" way, and the difference has since increased at an almost fantastic rate. The Japanese attempted interception at Saipan, but failed in their aim to reduce our combat strength to approximate equality with their own by preliminary air attacks, which cost them four hundred planes, and fled before closing surface action. They inflicted no losses on our fleet, and suffered a defeat of magnitude themselves: a Hayataka-class carrier was definitely sunk and another was left burning; these were two of the newest carriers in the fleet and among the very few large fleet carriers in the entire Japanese navy. Two more carriers, slightly smaller but still among the largest and newest of the fleet, were listed respectively as probably sunk and badly hit.

Against this we now have seven battle fleets, plus Admiral King's own Tenth (anti-submarine) Fleet. Obviously Radio Tokyo would not care to dispute the Pacific Ocean, nor would it care to dispute Admiral Nimitz when he says: "These three islands [Guam, Saipan, Tinian] give us the very best springboard to complete the occupation of the Marianas and to enable us to keep moving. All you have to do is to look at the map to see that they are strategically located with reference to Japan, China, the Philippines, and the Southwest Pacific. We have in these islands an area which will mount a good many troops and we propose to develop the facilities for that purpose—to carry the war to the Japs."

Consequently the Japs are preparing to meet the war nearer home, along a defense line as close as they can shave it to their vital area—the natural resources of the East Indies and the Philippines. Already the Halmaheras air bases are being abandoned, runways are being obstructed with logs, and Allied air strikes are destroying grounded Jap planes without being intercepted. The Japanese ground situation in New Guinea is steadily worsening; the rest of the Marianas, the Bonins, Palau, and Truk have been reduced to vulnerable outposts, the army garrisons outside the "basic sea area" are being left to starve, and air activity everywhere has been cut to the bone, except in China.

But enemy air strength has not simply disappeared; it is being concentrated in the Philippines, where garrisons are also being strengthened, and it is still on the offensive in China, where the army regrouping has been completed and the drive toward Kweilin has started. Japan will fight hard to protect the "basic sea area," and harder to protect its "defensive triangle"—the home islands, China, and Manchuria. For behind the reluctant Japanese navy still stands the bulk of the Japanese army.

[Next week: Japanese naval concepts; the "defensive triangle"; the Cabinet and the people.]

A Purged Press for France

BY RUFUS BAXTER

THE reform of the French press, undertaken by the Algiers government as part of a vast effort to resolve the problems of liberation and reconstruction in the spirit of the Fourth Republic, has provoked a wave of criticism in this country and Britain. Many newspapers have complained that the legislation, drawn up under the auspices of M. Henri Bonnet, Commissioner of Information, will amount to a government monopoly of news in France. Some have even cited these laws as indications of a dictatorial tendency in the De Gaulle government. Frederick Kuh, in a dispatch from London published in PM, writes: "The issue involved is basic because the French policy is threatening to the progressive, enlightened plan maturing in America and Britain to insure a free flow of news throughout the world after the war." I think, however, that Mr. Kuh and the others who have criticized French policy would feel differently if they took the trouble to examine more closely the whole problem of the press in France.

One is too apt at this distance to judge the measures taken in Algiers according to conditions prevailing in Britain and the United States. But it should not be forgotten that if the venal and libelous press of pre-war France cried out for reform, four years of German occupation have made deep surgery one of the very conditions of a renovated French Republic. The official press, having served the enemy with docility or zeal, must be totally wiped out, not simply "purified." A vigorous new press has already started to come out of hidden print shops and cellars, where for four years it has led a clandestine existence. Can it for a moment be thought that this press, born in a spirit of fierce liberty of thought and expression, will submit now to anti-liberal controls imposed by the provisional government? The new legislation, drawn up to meet the peculiar conditions existing in France today, provides the weapons necessary for a legal purge of a fascist-distorted press. Neither its purposes nor its provisions should alarm democrats in any land.

One of the earliest in date of the laws which will govern the reform of the press during the transition period is the anti-libel law passed on May 6. The necessity of this law, designed to strengthen, so as to make operative, the classic French libel law of July 29, 1881, will be apparent to anyone who remembers the scurrilous and defamatory journalism that flourished before the war in papers like L'Action Française, Gringoire, and others. One of the features of the new law is that infractions of it are punishable by fines so great (up to a million francs, plus expenses, in some instances) that offending journals expose themselves to the possible seizure of their plants or capital. It is clearly up to the defendant to prove the truth of his statements—this was not the case in the law of 1881—but truth may not be offered as defense in cases involving the plaintiff's private life, facts going back more than ten years, or alleged offenses covered by amnesty, rehabilitation, or reversal. The term "diffamation" is carefully defined so as to give maximum protection; scurrilous abuse is also forbidden. The original law of 1881, "la loi Jules Ferry," which embodies basic republican guaranties, begins with the words, "L'imprimerie et la librairie sont libres." This fundamental principle is not modified but rather fortified and protected in the new legislation, which was accompanied by a measure abolishing all but military censorship in time of war.

In the Journal Officiel de la République Française for July 8 appeared a further series of laws regulating all media of information—radio, cinema, and press—during the period of liberation. Full control of these media will temporarily be exercised by the government. As regards the press, a law of June 22 provides that all newspapers which had obeyed the directives of the occupying power or of the "de facto authority calling itself the government of the French State" will, as the territory is liberated, cease publication and will be placed in public custody. All existing press organizations or unions will be dissolved outright. In their place regional press and information committees, with members representing the Ministry of Information, the resistance movement, and the newspaper trade unions, will be formed to supervise the creation of new publications, grant licenses to publish, and keep the Ministry informed on all matters concerning the press in the various regions. The local committees will be affiliated with a national one of approximately the same composition.

But it is the "Law of June 22, 1944, concerning the distribution of news in the territory of France in the course of its liberation," which has created the greatest stir abroad. This law provides that the government-subsidized news agency, the recently formed Agence Française de Presse, will alone be authorized to distribute news inside France during this period, unless the Commissioner of Information decrees otherwise for particular regions. In short, foreign agencies (or any other French agency, for that matter) will not be allowed to deal directly with French newspapers but will be obliged to use A. F. P. facilities for the distribution of news inside France. Little wonder that there was such a storm of criticism! Indeed, Mr. Kuh reports in the dispatch cited above that "with the tacit support of the Associated Press, Britain's leading news agency, Reuter, has now strongly protested to the French administration." There is no doubt that these established agencies, already operating with the Allied forces, hoped to get in on the ground floor in France with little or no local opposition. The law in question, however, gives assurance that there will at least be a French agency.

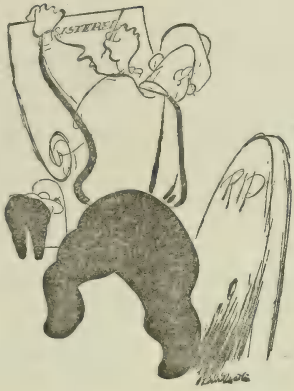
Drastic as the law may seem, there is no doubt that without it an independent French news agency would be impossible. M. Henri Bonnet, in a press conference held in Algiers some six weeks ago, explained why. The A. F. P., he said, will soon be turned into a cooperative belonging to the French newspapers themselves, according to the decree of July 21. But, he added, such an agency can function and live independently of government subsidies and control only when the French newspapers themselves again become going concerns. Pointing out the strictly temporary character of the law, M. Bonnet explained that just as soon as conditions become normal in France full liberty will be given any French or foreign news agency wishing to operate in France. But French newspapers—and France itself—will by then possess at least one agency of their own. The French government, he concluded, is not only willing but anxious to cooperate with other nations to the end that the peace treaty shall contain provisions preventing any obstacle to the free and reciprocal exchange and circulation of news throughout the world.

Thus the French government categorically rejects the formula of a permanent official news agency on the model of Havas or pre-war Reuter. Reuter itself has now become the property of the British press, the shares formerly held by the government plus some new ones having been sold to the newspapers. Havas exercised in pre-war France a virtual monopoly not only of news but of advertising, so that its demise is a double blessing. Furthermore, in discussing the efforts of the French government to insure a healthy press for France, it should not be forgotten, I think, that even in this country we have our troubles. The anti-trust action brought against the Associated Press by the Chicago Sun and the refusal of our agencies to carry political news unpleasing to the authorities—as, for example, news of the activities of the Italian partisans figuring in General Alexander's communiqués—should save us from a holier-than-thou attitude.

The remainder of the new French laws concerning the press contain various provisions, the most important of which oblige journals to make public their sources of income and the true names of their directors and backers. Taken as a whole, this legislation represents a significant advance toward a free and liberal press regime.

Pennsylvania's G.O.P. Is Worried

BY F. G. L.



THE Republican leaders of Pennsylvania are not glowing with optimism over the prospects of winning with Dewey. They don't know whether the election is worth a real fight this year. And the corporations which finance Republican victories in Pennsylvania are not overjoyed at the prospect of a Dewey victory. They are torn between a desire to take over and a fear that the Dewey forces don't begin to measure up to the job of taking over for them.

On the other hand, the Democratic leaders are sniffing victory, and they promise to put on a show reminiscent of the way they cracked forty-four years of Republican rule when they elected George Earle Governor of Pennsylvania in 1935.

The Democratic leaders have the encouragement of two previous Roosevelt victories in Pennsylvania. They believe the people haven't changed. The Republican leaders have only their old standard method of winning elections.

In the earlier editions of the "Encyclopedia Britannica" the character of Pennsylvania Republican politics is recorded. It has attained the status of a legend. And this legend has more of truth in it than most legends. It reads thus:

> On the political side, the chief feature of the state's history after the Civil War was the growth of the Cameron-Quay-Penrose political machine, founded by Simon Cameron, strengthened by his son James Donald Cameron, and continued under Matthew Stanley Quay and Boies Penrose, down to the time of the latter's death in 1921. It was based upon the control of patronage, the distribution of state funds, the support of the Pennsylvania Railway and other powerful corporations, and upon the ability to persuade the electors that it was necessary to vote the strict Republican ticket to save the protective system.

You must read into this legend that the support of Pennsylvania corporations means the huge slush funds with which the corruption of the ballot is accomplished. And the euphemistic "persuade the electors" means wholesale vote-buying and the bribing of election officials—both Republican and Democratic—so that cemetery tombstones, horses, and absentee electors may be voted.

Pennsylvania politics hasn't changed much since the piece was originally written for the "Britannica." Penrose, Quay, and Vare have passed on. They are looked upon by the present heirs of the Republican Party as crude and, if anything, a shade less effective than the present-day leadership.

Under the new leadership the corruption of the ballot has been perfected almost to a fine art. The corruptors are eminently respectable and would raise an eyebrow at the suggestion that they might have had something to do with the purchase of the margins of victory. The good church people could hold their noses at Penrose and Vare, and vote for their candidates anyway. But today they don't hold their noses, and they call the successors of these earlier political gangsters Mister, and they ring the church bells for their candidates on Election Day. And some of the most important pewholders are also officers of the corporations that provide the slush for corrupting the ballot.

There is a body of habitual Republican voters in Pennsylvania about equal to the habitual Democrats, and a large body of "independent" voters. The independents are divided into three groups—honest men, including many of the farmers, who think their interests lie generally with a Republican administration; a progressive remnant of the Pinchot followers, who continue their Republican registration but usually vote Democratic; and the wraiths and floaters and inmates of county homes and jails, who are usually taken from one polling place to another on Election Day to be voted as often as may be needed to make the margin of victory secure. There are still some few districts overlorded by feudal industrialists who force their employees to be registered as Republicans and then intimidate them on Election Day. Their numbers, however, are growing smaller each year, and they don't make much difference in a Presidential election.

The Republican edge on registration amounts to about 600,000. But a good half of that edge is composed of the real independent voters who determine elections, and the rest are probably faked registrations.

One other factor exercises some considerable influence in Pennsylvania elections at times. The Democratic Party in Pennsylvania has more than its share of "practical" politicians whose influence can be bought every time these practical ones think they can get more out of a Republican victory than a Democratic victory. They have a considerable nuisance value, for, usually by grace of Republican patronage, they are in positions where they can connive with Republican officials to corrupt the ballot. Their stooges serve as Democratic election officials. They are regular only often enough to blackmail a place for themselves in the party councils, and thereby keep themselves in a position to exploit any little friction within the party. And they are used by the opposition to assassinate the character of Democratic candidates who won't play ball with the Republican machines. But the Republican moneybags always pay them much more than they're worth.

To play an important part in a Pennsylvania election, issues must cut deeply into the body politic. And the candidates must capture the imagination of the people. Roosevelt succeeded twice in carrying Pennsylvania. He did so because the New Deal meant something to the cast-offs of Pennsylvania's ruthless industrialists, and those industrialists couldn't or wouldn't put up enough money to buy the margin of victory.

In the 1944 elections the issues cut deep enough to make a difference. Roosevelt doesn't hypnotize the voters, which accounts for his small margin in the polls of public sentiment. But the people overwhelmingly want a secure peace this time, and they want a stable economy after the war, and they realize that they haven't a chance of either with Dewey.

The Republican leaders know this. They aren't sure they can buy up enough votes or steal enough votes to bridge the gap necessary for victory. The corporations are afflicted with the out-of-state sentiment which the realists say is definitely anti-Dewey—so much so that they don't believe he can win even if he carries Pennsylvania. With such an attitude, they are not proposing to throw their money away.

Dewey has been a most uninspiring candidate for the Republican leaders. One of the most important men in Joe Pew's camp came back from Chicago convinced that the Republicans had thrown away the chance of victory for the mere prospect of getting New York's electoral votes. He suggests that with a strong platform Dewey might be elected, but he can't see a phony platform and a "trimmer" standing on such a platform. And one of Grundy's men has already passed out the word to his local organization that the game isn't worth a fight this time and they should concentrate their efforts on holding their organization together.

The Democratic leadership is united at the top. Dave Lawrence and Joe Guffey are practically inseparable these days, in spite of the fact that Guffey covered himself with glory in his fight for Wallace while Lawrence carried a third of the Pennsylvania delegation for Truman. Both are working hard to get their followers to stop fighting each other during the campaign.

The Democrats are happy because they are completely convinced that the margin of purchasable votes is negligible this year, and the price is higher than it ever was. They are convinced that the CIO Political Action Committee will be a big help in getting the voters registered. And when the voters are registered, the Democrats know that the margin always swings in their favor. One high state leader of the Democrats says the CIO Political Action Committee will choke off the Republican victory at its source. For, he says, a man who will put up his own money to help in an election won't go out and sell his vote on Election Day, and he won't sit at home.

This particular leader says that if the Democrats win Pennsylvania, it will be the result of the CIO Political Action Committee. Until a few weeks ago, however, he was fearful that the Committee in Pennsylvania wouldn't show much action. After the pep meeting held in Harrisburg on July 29, he changed his mind.

The Republicans have been banking on a strong protest vote from the farmers of Pennsylvania. It must be admitted that until very recently there has been a lot of dissatisfaction among the farmers. They have had to buy feed in the black market. They have paid excessive prices for it. But they have bought most of that feed from other farmers, and they know it. With the harvests well under way, they are realizing heavy returns from the crops, and some of the talk has switched from complaints about the high price of feed to 35-cent wheat and 87-cent milk and 12-cent eggs. Most of the bitterness about selective service has disappeared, probably because their own sons are in the fight. In early June a trip through one farming district convinced me that the farm vote would be overwhelmingly against the Administration. A return trip in late July indicated that there is a swing away from bitter complaint to considerable satisfaction with the way things are going. So the protest vote from the farmers is likely to be much less than has been expected.

Reports coming to me from the coal regions indicate that so far as Pennsylvania is concerned, the miners will not follow John L. Lewis into the Republican camp. In the anthracite region they are needling John L. Lewis whenever they get a chance. They'd like him to threaten to resign if they don't support him.

Pennsylvania's much-touted "best soldier-vote law" is still extremely difficult of administration. It is doubtful whether half of Pennsylvania's soldiers will be able to vote or will be concerned about voting. While the soldier vote from Pennsylvania may favor Roosevelt, I am inclined to believe that most of the soldier voting will be done by those who were active in politics before entering the service, and this vote will be strictly on party lines without regard for the issues.

I believe the optimism of the Democratic leaders is warranted. I don't believe the Republicans can obtain the margin of victory even if the corporations loosen up with the cash. I believe the CIO Political Action Committee and other independent groups which are forming in various parts of the state will more than offset anything the Republicans can do. I believe Roosevelt will carry Pennsylvania by a good safe margin.

But the Democratic leaders are not very optimistic about winning a Congressional majority in the state. The Reapportionment Act of 1943 gerrymandered districts in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, throwing large Democratic majorities into a few districts at the expense of districts where the Democratic majority was small. Even though they expect to carry Philadelphia and Pittsburgh for Roosevelt, the Democratic leaders think they will be lucky to hold their own in the Congressional fight in these cities. They expect to pick up a Congressman in the 21st district, comprising York, Adams, and Franklin counties, a combination of industrial and rural areas, and one in the 12th district, comprising the anthracite-mining Luzerne County. They believe a Roosevelt victory in the state might bring in two more Congressmen, in Erie and Cambria counties.

The crucial contest will be between Jim Davis and Francis Myers for the Senate. Even with Roosevelt leading, Davis can pull away from the trend. He is well-known in every corner of the commonwealth. Myers, on the other hand, is obscure. He has an excellent voting record in Congress, he is able, he is a good campaigner, but he is unknown, and up to the present the Democratic leaders have done little to get him before the people.

[Future articles in this series on key states will deal with Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Ohio.]

In the Wind

AMONG THE INVITATIONS in the morning's mail is a post card that reads in part as follows: "If you are a Native Born, White, Protestant, Gentile, American Citizen of Good Character and believe in our principles, an opportunity to join a secret organization that stands primarily for WHITE SUPREMACY awaits you. Our Organization stands for: Christianity. America First. White Supremacy. Upholding Constitution of U.S.A. Racial Segregation. Racial Purity. Pure White Womanhood. American Leadership of American Labor Unions. Closer Relationship Between American Capital and American Labor. Opposition to Communism. America for Americans. State Rights. Separation of Church and State. Freedom of Speech and Press. No Foreign Immigration, Except Pure White. Law and Order." It is at such times that one regrets not being of Good Character.

JOHN B. TREVOR, president of the American Coalition of Patriotic Societies, whose name appeared in a list of "leaders" recommended for America by a German propaganda agency in 1933, is now campaigning against the admission of anti-Nazi refugees to America. Senator Robert Rice Reynolds of North Carolina is helping him distribute his literature.

RADIO STATION WQXR, New York, having refused to accept any more singing commercials, has received a flood of thanks from its listeners.

SOME IMPERTURBABLE BRITONS are busy with plans to preserve the relics of Roman and medieval times which robot bombs have unearthed in London.

SENATOR WALSH of Massachusetts, asked by a number of constituents to state his views on American participation in an international organization to enforce peace, said, "A nation which does not pursue peace . . . will find soon enough that it is involved in the wars of other nations." He enclosed a speech of his, delivered November 11, 1943, in which he expressed the belief that this is not our war.

THE CITY OF LOUISVILLE, KY., paid $5,000 to Roy Wenzlick, one of the nation's top real-estate analysts, for a report on post-war city planning. It contains the following note on slum clearance: "The logical solution to the housing problem is to build new housing units for those who can afford to pay an economic rent. As these housing units become older and less desirable, the original owners or renters move to more modern and better located properties, leaving the older properties to be occupied by those who cannot pay a sufficient rental for new buildings."

FESTUNG EUROPA: As a solution of the fuel shortage in Holland, the Nazi administration has issued an order proclaiming that "removal of chips or pieces of wood left over from the construction of German army installations will be regarded as theft from the Wehrmacht and will be punished as such."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.]

Europe's Wandering Jews—and Others

BY LEWIS S. GANNETT

London, August 27, by Cable

AN IMPOSING-LOOKING parliament of thirty-two nations met in London last week as the "Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees." It heard a report from its chairman, Sir Herbert Emerson, former High Commissioner for Refugees of the League of Nations, enlarged its executive committee to include Soviet Russia, adopted a constitution, and set up a new committee of experts to deal with travel documents for hundreds of thousands of refugees who will emerge from the war with neither homes nor passports nor even a recognized nationality. In the course of its discussions the word Jew was seldom heard and the word Palestine never.

The fact is that despite all the hullabaloo about organization this international body will have little to do with the immediate problem of probably twenty million human beings in Europe described in official language as "displaced persons." Set up at Evian in 1938 to help political and racial groups get out of Germany, the Intergovernmental Committee's first job virtually ceased upon the declaration of war. It was reorganized after the Bermuda conference in April, 1943, with a larger field. It has since acted as a sort of international clearing house for such official organizations as the American War Refugee Board and such voluntary organizations as the American Friends Service Committee and the Joint Distribution Committee, aiding the emergency rescue operations of the Jews trickling out of Hitler's Festung Europa into Spain, Switzerland, or Turkey.

Reorganized again, its function is redefined as principally dealing with the third and ultimate stage of the refugee problem when those who have homes to go to have reached them, immediate relief has been provided, and the residue of uncertain numbers is left to be sent no one today knows whither. Then the Intergovernmental Committee will act as successor to the old Nansen Committee, which issued papers for "stateless persons," then principally White Russians.

Meanwhile the expectation in London is that some eighty million people in Europe will soon start walking home and at least twelve million more will wait for official aid. "Unorganized trekkers" is the official word for the walkers, who are expected to clog the roads, go hungry, and enormously complicate the official program. The task of helping them will be primarily the army's. Supreme Headquarters, Allied Expeditionary Force, does not approve of unorganized trekkers. It regards them as a certain interference with transportation, a probable menace to health, and a possible police problem. Its Civil Affairs Department, headed by the able Major General Allen Gullion, U. S. A., with a joint Anglo-American staff, intends to assume immediate control of the problem; when the United Relief and Rehabilitation Administration will get into the picture, if at all, is anybody's guess. UNRRA has liaison officers with the army but no direct authority, and it is believed that the army will retain control for a minimum of six months.

The army has assembled all available studies of displacements of the population of Europe, tabulated and charted them, and printed twenty-five million each of two types of registration cards—three hundred tons of cards alone—for what, fond of alphabetic symbols, it calls "DPs"—displaced persons.

According to these studies at least eight million foreigners are now in Germany doing semi-slave labor in factories and on farms. About half of these are in the eastern region, for which presumably Russia will be primarily responsible. In the territory which Britain and America are likely to control there are, the army reckons, 700,000 Belgians, one-tenth of the entire population of the country and close to half the adult male population; also about 150,000 Dutch, 650,000 Frenchmen, 200,000 Italians, 130,000 Yugoslavs, 110,000 Greeks, 700,000 Czechs, 1,500,000 Poles, more than 1,250,000 Russians, and small numbers of Hungarians, Rumanians, Bulgars, Danes, and Norwegians. Also there are more millions in the satellite countries, some of whom may have been withdrawn into Germany before it collapses.

Some DPs, working close to the borders, will get somewhere under their own steam. The army program, however, is not to permit mass migrations along roads which the military will need but to collect and concentrate DPs of Allied nationalities into assembly centers, whence they may be transferred after screening to reception centers, where they will become the responsibility of their own governments.

At the assembly centers DPs will be registered, their previous homes and desired destinations recorded. They will be medically examined, checked for military security, and, if in order, given visas for return home. They will be given pre-numbered identification cards about the size of Social Security cards, and when transportation is available will be sent to the reception centers in their own countries.

A small try-out has already been made in parts of France, where the refugees were collected by our army in assembly centers and promptly transferred to dispersal centers operated by French officials. But the army differentiates such "refugees" displaced within the borders of their own countries from "DPs" who will try to cross the frontiers.

The army belief is that its organization, fresh from its experience with the greatest logistics operation in history, is infinitely better prepared to deal with a gigantic movement of peoples than any civilian organization, official or unofficial, could be.

UNRRA had developed a large program of its own but the army has definitely assumed the responsibility for the first stage. The Czechs have formally agreed to cooperate with the army system of registration and transfer. The other exile governments have indicated their approval. Enormous supplies will be needed—if registration cards weigh three hundred tons, the tonnage of food required will be astronomic—but the army believes it has sufficient reserves. Initial supplies may be lifted by air, as has been done with the advancing armies.

The army does not regard Spanish refugees who were in France before the war, and are still there, as a military responsibility; it will leave their care to the French government and to private agencies.

While millions of Germans have been "displaced" to satellite countries during the war, the army believes that most of these will have been withdrawn close to the German borders before the war ends. Civilian Germans will be assembled and returned to Germany by a similar process and then will become the responsibility of whatever German authorities may exist.

After six months the army believes the bulk of the job will be done and mopping-up operations can be transferred to UNRRA, which likewise has a six-month relief and rehabilitation plan, presumably on a far smaller scale than that envisaged in the earlier stages of its existence before the army clarified its views of civilian operations in the military zone. What UNRRA can do will depend on what the army does first. Its planning problem is obviously extremely difficult. The army is likely to turn to it as soon as individual problems differentiate themselves from mass movements, as in the case of a couple whose former home in Poland was burned, whose passports were lost, who cannot prove their nationality, who have cousins in Palestine, children in the United States, and no jobs anywhere.

The Intergovernmental Committee comes back into the picture after the army and UNRRA have done the preliminary jobs. Although the army's registration cards provide for optional registration of religion, the army does not regard Jews as a separate problem. Its job is a mass-production one of returning people to the countries of their origin. UNRRA will do a further sifting, but there will remain a desperate residue of hundreds of thousands, possibly more, who don't want or will not be permitted to return to their pre-war homes. General assurances have been given by most exile governments that they will accept former residents regardless of nationality, but some have different ideas as to what constitutes residence; also, many people who in the course of Hitler's mad careening became almost professional refugees, fleeing from one land to another and then still another, may be stranded without recognized homes. New frontiers will further complicate the picture, notably for those Poles who were displaced westward during the war and may not wish to return under Russian sovereignty. Millions of Jews forcibly transferred to new ghettos by the Nazi regime and others who have found temporary haven in North Africa will have nothing to return to that they can call homes.

Here will be the major sphere of the Intergovernmental Committee. Its recent plenary session formed a technical sub-committee to study a new form of passports for "stateless" persons, a problem complicated enough but simple in comparison with the problem of finding homes for them.

The ultimate destination of the stateless is a delicate, difficult, probably endless problem. In some circles there has been sharp criticism of the Intergovernmental Committee because it included no representative of any Jewish group. It invited some thirty Jewish bodies, including relief committees as well as the Jewish Agency for Palestine, to attend the session without the right to participate. Nobody was asked to present the ideas of the Jews at its sessions. Palestine wasn't mentioned. The answer is that the Intergovernmental Committee is an intergovernmental committee. Its success is dependent on the cooperation of member governments. It cannot have a policy of its own. It can only explore possibilities, suggest, and administer when national policies are clear.

Whenever in the past the international conscience has been outraged by the plight of the Jews, the answer has been to reorganize the Intergovernmental Committee, thus suggesting that something is about to be done. The real answer is not a new kind of committee but havens for Jews. From a European perspective America, usually generous with money, always vocal in demanding a modification of the Palestine immigration policy, might show a more realistic generosity by modifying its own immigration policy. A free port for one thousand Jews, who are expected to return to devastated Europe after the war, doesn't seem a large contribution. Pressure for the liberalization of the Palestine policy should help, but it might be more effective if it were accompanied by the recognition of American opportunity. The present likelihood seems to be that a year hence the world, including America, will wake up to the fact that emergency measures are only emergency measures and possibly a million Jews will still be homeless.

Polls, Propaganda, Politics

Bias in the Phrasing of Questions

ONE way polls make propaganda is in the selection of what questions are to be asked when. To ask: "Should Candidate Jones return the money he stole from the townspeople?" just before election would obviously help his opponents. Professional pride tends to keep the phrasing of questions and the statistical methods scientifically acceptable most of the time. Questions of the "have-you-stopped-beating-your-wife?" type are rare. A much more difficult kind of bias to cope with is the choice of questions which in terms of the expected response must embarrass one party.

With this problem in mind, we have analyzed the questions raised by two national polls during the months of May, June, and July of this year. The Gallup Poll (American Institute of Public Opinion) published results on twenty-seven questions not directly concerned with candidates, nominations, or voting. Each question was independently evaluated by five public-opinion specialists. They rated sixteen of the twenty-seven as genuinely neutral—those dealing with such issues as beer on navy ships, Germany's plans for another war, the shortage of victory gardens, and the desirability of holding the line on prices and wages. (The omission of profits from that last question is noteworthy and perhaps not wholly neutral.)

Ten of the remaining eleven Gallup questions were judged as probably helpful to the Republican side. Only one question was considered to be the sort of thing the Democrats would like to have publicized to help their campaign. This was, "If a new Council or Union of Nations is formed after the war to take the place of the old League of Nations, should this country join?" (Yes, 72 per cent.)

Ten of the eleven questions might well have been welcomed by the Republican National Committee. The reader may judge for himself whether raising these questions at this time and publicizing the results in headlines would not tend, in effect, to discredit the Roosevelt regime: (1) What do you think of the travels of Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt? (Approved, 36 per cent; disapproved, 45 per cent); (2) From what you know about this case, which side are you more inclined to think in the right, Montgomery Ward or the government? (Montgomery Ward, 60 per cent); (3) Do you think there is need for a law to prevent strikes in war industries? (Yes, 70 per cent); (4) Is there any particular plank which you would like your party to include in its platform in the coming Presidential election? (Only the suggestions offered for the Republican Party's platform were published.)

The other questions dealt with recognition of the De Gaulle government, Administration restrictions on hiring power, a two-term Presidency limitation, the effect of CIO support on a candidate's chances, Soviet Russia's trustworthiness, and the South's one-party system. All these were questions presumably embarrassing to the Democrats. Similar questions on the opposite side might be: "Would the fact that isolationists support Mr. Dewey affect your attitude toward him?" "Would the fact that most big-business men support a candidate influence your vote?"

The present analysis does not impugn the Gallup Poll's sincerity or its desire to be fair. It is not Gallup's fault if the government had a publicity problem in the Montgomery Ward case. Criticism of the Administration's action is apt to be more newsworthy than approval. Questions whose import is hostile toward the Democrats might be asked without premeditation.

Questions asked by the Fortune (Roper) poll during the same period are not really comparable to Gallup's. They were designed to provide information for Fortune's "management" readers rather than to make newspaper headlines. One-third of them were asked only of business men.

Of the eighteen queries Fortune's interviewers put to a sample of the general public, fifteen were found by the judges to be helpful to neither side in the election. The other three seemed likely to help the Republicans because of special circumstances. One asked people to name "special groups you feel had too much influence over Congress in the past year or so" at a time when the CIO's Political Action Committee was in the headlines. The second was a question about whether unions ought to "put on campaigns themselves for the election of a particular national candidate." The absence of a parallel question about corporations or business pressure groups makes the poll's fairness doubtful.

BUREAU OF APPLIED SOCIAL RESEARCH
Columbia University, New York

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE ELECTION IN ARKANSAS on Monday was the first in which a certificate of the payment of a poll-tax was made a prerequisite to voting. "In consequence," says a despatch from Little Rock, "the Negro was practically eliminated from the contest." . . . If a Mahone ever turns up in Arkansas with a campaign fund of $25,000 or $50,000, the Negro vote will not be so thoroughly eliminated as it was on Monday. It may even happen, as it did in Virginia, that the poll-taxes of the blacks are more generally paid than those of the whites, and the Arkansas Democrats may finally feel constrained, as did those of Virginia, to repeal the tax law for the sake of their party.—September 6, 1894.

THE RECORD of railway accidents is humiliating. During the year, 2,727 employees and 299 passengers were killed, and 31,729 employees and 3,229 passengers were injured. Collisions, derailments, and accidents at stations account for the injuries and deaths of passengers. Employees were killed and injured principally by coupling cars and falling from trains, making a seriously large total.—September 6, 1894.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM adopted at Saratoga last week was evidently written by a common scold. It denounces about one thousand facts and tendencies which it observes in the Democratic Party, without saying, however, what the Republicans would do or ought to do if they had the power.—September 27, 1894.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

Hitler's Last Alibi

HERR FRIEDRICH HILDEBRAND, Gauleiter of Mecklenburg, assembled the Nazi Party leaders of his district on August 7 and imparted to them this information:

> A new phase of the National Socialist Revolution has now begun. Certain elements who have always been furiously hostile to our party, without, however, admitting it publicly, will be dealt with. Our Führer did not want to settle accounts with these negative forces in our midst until after the war. But now, thanks to the events of July 20, a new phase of the National Socialist Revolution has begun.

The leading Socialist organ of Switzerland, the Berner Tagwacht, published on August 15 an account of a conference in which Himmler, Dr. Ley, and General Sepp Dietrich, head of the Elite Guards, are supposed to have participated. At this conference it was decided "to initiate an extreme left-wing policy, liquidating all capitalistic tendencies and even the capitalists and Junkers within the Nazi Party." Actually, the dispatch adds, this "extreme left-wing policy" was already in full force when the conference was held: "Indescribable terror reigns in Germany against all those connected with the nobility and high finance."

It must be said that there has been thus far almost no concrete and reliable information concerning the details of this "new phase of the Nazi Revolution." Never has Germany been more nearly hermetically sealed than since the alleged attempt on Hitler's life. The names of the arrested, the executed, the deposed, and those who are being shadowed by the police are known only to the extent that they have been given out by the Ministry of Propaganda—and aside from those of a dozen or so members of the "small clique of traitorous officers" and the former mayor of Leipzig, Dr. Goerdeler, it has given out no names. An exception is the official announcement in Silesia that the Baron Palombini, a large landowner of that province, and his wife were arrested for allegedly harboring the fugitive Dr. Goerdeler, and that "the Palombini estates were immediately confiscated." And for unknown reasons it has been officially announced, for foreign consumption, that in Breslau a "former chairman of the commission of experts," one Professor Buhtz, "has been killed by mistake."

Even without details, however, it is absolutely certain that countless people have been sacrificed, all lumped together under the general heading of "big scoundrels." "There are continuous arrests of aristocrats in all large cities," said the Arbeiter Zeitung published in the Swiss border town of Schaffhausen on August 11; "they disappear and no one knows where they have been taken." The Journal de Genève reported on August 7: "Leading industrialists in Leipzig and Dresden, and also students of a military school, have been arrested. It is believed that they are being held as hostages." The St. Galler Tagblatt added, "A special concentration camp for officers has been opened in Spandau near Berlin." And the Weltwoche of Zurich said on August 18, "Hundreds of leading figures in Germany's economic life are no longer alive today or are being held in 'protective custody.' "

But if all these stories of the operation of the "left-wing spirit" are lacking in specific detail, at least the trend of the propaganda is clear. The tone was set by Dr. Ley. Two days after the alleged attempt on Hitler's life he dismissed the idea that only a "small clique of officers" was guilty and turned his attack on a much larger objective. The new line first appeared in an article by him in the Angriff of July 22—and it is to be noted that all the correspondents in Berlin agree that this article created as great a sensation among ordinary German newspaper readers and radio listeners as the alleged attempt itself. "Ley's article," said the Stockholm Aftonbladet, "caused a tremendous sensation in Berlin and was the chief topic of conversation in all circles." Ley fulminated not only against "some officers" but against the whole "blue-blooded, dirty, idiotic, criminal aristocracy." This is what he said about the "degenerate, conceited, idling, senile clique of reaction":

> These reactionaries thought that they could again raise their heads. But now at last they will learn that their time is up. This clique must be uprooted. It is not enough to seize the individual perpetrators of this crime; the entire brood must be eliminated. Every German must know that if he conspires against Germany in writing, in talk, or in deed, his family must die. His family as well as he himself must die. The destruction of this blasted clique means more than a battle won.

Since that day Dr. Ley's tune has been played, with a hundred variations, on all the instruments at the disposal of the Nazi Party. On July 24 the Völkischer Beobachter said, "The public feels instinctively that the conspiracy emanates from those reactionary circles which want to deprive the German people of their social gains and again deliver them up to exploitation by a small clique." The press has outdone itself with articles on that theme.

In the official report of the "trial" of the eight officers who were hanged, the accused figured in the tirades of the prosecutor and the judge not as individuals, hardly even as officers, but as "typical reactionaries." Such abuse of the upper classes is now resorted to on the most far-fetched pretexts.

The Gauleiter of Silesia, Karl Henke, regaled a mass meeting in Breslau with the theatrical story of how an "aristocratic scoundrel," one Graf von Dagenfeld, the military commandant of the province, had ordered the arrest of all the Nazi provincial leaders so that he and his "reactionary gang" could usurp all official positions. And on July 30 the Preussischen Zeitung of East Prussia published a diatribe entitled "The End of the Reactionary Rats," which was reprinted all over Germany. It should have considerable historical interest. It traced the "nefarious undermining activities of the reactionary elements" since the first days of the dictatorship. From the very beginning, it said, "the eternally retrograde Junkers and their allies in the clubs, in the restaurants, and at hunting dinners sniped at the laws and decrees of the new state." As early as 1933 there was a seditious movement in Hanover, "led by the landowner Lesmann von Oberg, which had to be stamped out." There was a Stahlhelm conspiracy; there were monarchist organizations of every conceivable type, which always laid their plans in cooperation "with certain Paris, Moscow, and London circles." But now they are finished! Through their "lack of instinct, their undignified and almost ridiculous jingoism (sic!), their jobbery and disloyalty," these "reactionary rats" have dug their own grave. The Nazi state left them "their lives, their property, and their titles"—but now its patience is at an end!

It is easy to contrive any number of theories as to the motives behind this campaign. The most obvious explanation is that the dying Nazi Party is making a desperate effort to win the greatest possible popularity with the greatest possible number. Also, the need for a scapegoat is presumably a factor; and they may have decided that the more the party is remembered for its "leftism" the better will be the chances of resurrecting it at some future time. But more important than the question of motives is that of how far the Nazis will really go with their "new phase of the revolution" in the time they have left. Discussion of that question must wait for another time.

Inside the Fortress

BY GEROLD FRANK

Jerusalem, August 20, by Cable

IF YOU want to know first-hand how Germany's morale in Festung Europa is crumbling hour by hour, speak with the refugees arriving from the heart of Nazi Europe. Their stories present a picture of a terrified, overwhelmed people awaiting an inexorable fate.

The account of Bertha Aptowitzer, who arrived here yesterday under the auspices of the Jewish Agency, is typical. Miss Aptowitzer is twenty-three. For five months she was in a concentration camp at Bergenbelzen near Hanover, where there are seven thousand inmates, mostly Jews. She left the camp on July 15 for Palestine via Passau, Vienna, Budapest, Sofia, Istanbul. She says the morale of the Nazi guards and train employees is bitterly low. They actually did favors for the refugees, hoping to be remembered later and perhaps to soften reprisals. Fires started by Allied bombings were still burning in Budapest and the railroad station was a mass of ruins. Sofia had been badly bombed. Before her internment she passed through Bremen in daylight. The city was razed to the ground.

The strain the Nazis are undergoing is indicated by the type of work the inmates of the camp were assigned to do ten hours each day: (1) ripping apart civilian shoes so that the pieces might be used again for the military; (2) ripping apart worn military uniforms—obviously those of Germans killed in battle, for the bullet holes and bloodstains were still showing—so that the cloth could be used again. Both the shoe and uniform remnants were then packed in large sacks and later removed. This was the sole work of the thousands of inmates sitting at long tables in wooden barracks.

"The day of the Normandy invasion was terrible for the Nazis," Miss Aptowitzer said. "We were not permitted newspapers or radios, but we learned the news the same day. Two women who were cleaning the commandant's apartment saw a newspaper on the bed and read the headlines. I was working in the kitchen that day. We were careful about not talking, but our SS guard was so nervous that he shouted, 'Do you think that I don't see you are whispering to each other?' That night the guards for the first time carried rifles and helmets and set up machine-gun defenses. When we departed we were permitted to take 40 kilos of possessions each. One SS guard said, "Ah, if I could leave now I'd gladly go without anything.' " And, added Miss Aptowitzer with satisfaction, "One stout guard must have lost at least ten pounds worrying during the first week of the invasion."

I have spoken to scores of refugees from the Nazi fortress. No matter from what country they come they all agree. Germany has lost the war. The Nazis know it. They expect the Russian armies to be marching into Berlin before November.

Quislings After Defeat

BY T. ADAM

[The following interview appeared originally in La Turquie, a French-language Turkish daily newspaper published in Istanbul. We offer it as an example of the strange fruits of Anglo-American foreign policy.]

QUISLINGISM is a mal de siècle. It has its variations, as in Vichyism. Those who are afflicted by this illness are in no sense romantics in search of a dream world, but realists, in truth cynics, who want to maintain the status quo despite the changes which the world is witnessing today. Here is the confession of a Vichyite to a neutral observer during a conversation about recent events:

"You think, Monsieur, that I am a lost man who has played his last card. You think that I am an obstinate man who persists in a course which can lead to nothing. I played the German card and beat the Gaullists. Now the Germans are losing the war and the Gaullists are emerging triumphant, so you think that I have lost.

"You are making a profound error, Monsieur. With the defeat of Germany wonderful perspectives are open to Vichyism, whose principles and methods remain more than ever valid under the new conquerors. For the Anglo-Americans differ very little (save in style and temperament) from the Germans. After the Germans they will rule Europe, govern the Europeans not in the name of authority (this is not the Anglo-Saxon technique) but in the name of liberty, not by brute force (this is not the Anglo-Saxon temperament) but by economic and political restraints.

"England will finish one day by becoming dependent on America, with the result that America and Russia will dominate the world. The Gaullists have never understood that. They cherish the illusion of reviving a past forever gone, a past of the independence of nations. They believe that the Anglo-Saxons are going to allow Europe to live as free and independent states. Neither the statements of Marshal Smuts nor the projects of the AMG have opened their eyes. They are lost, definitely lost, because of their persistent devotion to the chimera of a new sovereign and powerful France. Their program does not correspond to that of the liberators, so they will of necessity be shunted aside—in fact they have already been shunted aside.

"The Gaullists' second mistake is to believe in the pledge given by Churchill in 1940 to reestablish the independence and grandeur of France. Even if Churchill wanted to keep his promise, he would not be able to do so, dependent as he is on Roosevelt. On the other hand the Gaullists have in mind a subjective picture of the Anglo-Saxons as idealists and romantics like themselves . . . only the uninformed can believe that the Anglo-Saxons could be anything but practical people with a vested interest. Look at the Spanish affair. Francoism, which aided the Axis so greatly (remember the promise of millions of Spanish bayonets which were to bar the route if Germany were menaced by invasion), is today honored, blessed, sanctified. Why? Because today it offers to the Allies the services which they are demanding of it. Only the present counts. The Gaullists make the fatal mistake of hypnotizing themselves with the past and creating illusions about the future.

"We Vichyites do not make the same mistake. We see very clearly. As soon as the liberators have need of us, we shall offer our hand and be saved like the Francoists. Besides, we understand the technique of collaboration. The Gaullists have never understood how to collaborate. They have been paralyzed by pretensions to equality and independence, while we know how to submit, serve, and obey. Five years of experience have taught us to understand the mentality of the conqueror and satisfy it. These methods are perfectly useful in relations with the Anglo-Saxons, since their goal is no different from that of the Germans: to dominate Europe, at least western Europe. The Gaullists embarrass and obstruct them in this aim.

"The Germans did not operate any differently, though perhaps awkwardly at times. They promised France a happy and prosperous future in the new German order once the war was over. Until then France was to show herself deserving of that honored place in the Europe of tomorrow by present contributions of workers, services, and soldiers. The Anglo-Saxons also promise France an independent life. But in the meantime she is not to obstruct the march of the Anglo-Saxons, and is not to have a real government even though she has the interests and rights of a community of 100 million inhabitants to defend.

"We shall bring to the liberators our methods, specialized personnel, and the temperament of collaborators. It is true that certain of us who have been too prominent will have to retire for a while—for example Pierre Laval, who will no doubt be fished out later and restored to power by Sir Samuel Hoare, his old friend of the Ethiopian affair. But we shall all remain on the spot and we will be effectively protected by the Anglo-Saxon armies (witness the reaction of the Allied press when the Gaullists dared to execute Pucheu and Cristofini). No, Monsieur, we are not at all lost. We are preparing to live a wonderful life."

For lack of space I must break off at this point the confession of an enfant du siècle who was carrying a brand-new English grammar in his pocket.

HARPER BOOKS

Spearheading the Drive Toward Tomorrow's New World in Education

New Schools for a New Culture

McConnell, Melby and Arndt

The encouraging and exciting story of the notably successful experiment at the New School, Evanston, Ill., in a new kind of high school education conducted not only to teach democracy but to teach democratically. "The best presentation I have seen of the needed new secondary education."—WILLIAM H. KILPATRICK. $2.50

Education Faces the Future

By I. B. Berkson

Dr. Berkson is co-recipient of the coveted Williard Heard Kilpatrick Award for this book which the citation describes as "the most distinguished contribution to the philosophy of education during the past two years." "Nowhere," says Educational Outlook, "is there so clear and judicious an analysis of critical issues of curriculum as appear in this volume." $3.50

Liberal Education Re-examined

By Theodore M. Greene and Others

A ringing answer to those who say the war has "washed up" education in the liberal arts and the most eloquent and informed plea made thus far for the kind of alterations needed in educational methods after the war. Embodies the final conclusions of a study by the American Council of Learned Societies. "Put this on your 'imperative' list," says Journal of Higher Education. $2.50

The Role of Higher Education in the War and After

By J. Hillis Miller and Dorothy V. N. Brooks

The only book to record and appraise the amazing contribution of American colleges to the war training program. Contains a college training program for returning servicemen and supplies a challenging statement of the influences which will predominate in the reconversion of colleges to peacetime conditions. $2.50

School and Church: The American Way

By Conrad Henry Moehlman

Professor, History of Christianity, Colgate-Rochester Divinity School

A timely, brilliant, and illuminating discussion of one of the most hotly debated questions in education today: Should religious instruction be re-introduced into the classrooms of our public schools? Imperative reading for parents, educators, and church leaders who would know what pitfalls lie ahead for both church and school if current efforts continue. $2.50

Who Shall Be Educated?

By L. W. Warner, R. J. Havighurst and M. Loeb

A shocking revelation, supported by impressive evidence, of the widespread fallacy in our boast of equality of opportunity in education. Typical conditions involving students, teachers, and administrators are described, and thoughtful remedies are set forth. "Important and valuable . . . enlivened by succinct and vivid case histories."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. $2.50

Breaking the Academic Lockstep

By Frank Aydelotte

The first book to describe and appraise the experience of over 130 American colleges and universities with honors systems—one of the most important educational developments in the last twenty years. An indispensable handbook for faculty committees contemplating the improvement or the introduction of honors work. Grows out of the author's conspicuous success in this field as President of Swarthmore College. $2.50

Vitalizing Liberal Education

By Algo D. Henderson

The distinguished President of Antioch College brings the issue of tomorrow's liberal arts program into sharper focus than does any previous work. And he makes specific and convincing proposals that are dramatically in contrast to the educational philosophy expressed in Van Doren's "Liberal Education." "Eminently worth reading."—SIDNEY HOOK in The Nation. $2.50

Coming in NOVEMBER

American Education Under Fire

By V. T. Thayer

Educational Director, Ethical Culture Schools of New York City

Both sides of the outstanding controversial issues in the conduct of today's schools—the place of religion, the use of "great books," the problem of indoctrination, the use of "radicals" as teachers—are here analyzed by a nationally recognized leader in the field of secondary education to show precisely what conflicts are involved and how they may be reconciled. Probable price $3.00

HARPER & BROTHERS • 49 EAST 33rd STREET • NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Mexican Workshop

Mexico City, August 18

THE Taller de Grafica Popular is a characteristically Mexican enterprise—a Workshop for Popular Graphic Art, or perhaps it would be better to say, Graphic Art for the People. It was founded some seven years ago by a group of the younger artists, all of them members of the famous League of Revolutionary Writers and Artists. Leopoldo Méndez and Alfredo Zalce were perhaps the main instigators. It was not to be a school, or a salesroom, but a workshop; and these artists wanted to work together not merely because presses are too expensive to own individually, but because they believed that cooperative work raises the stature of the individual artist.

So they set out to do printing for the people. They made handbills and notices for the workers' groups and the unions. They designed posters and wall-newspapers decorated with woodcuts in the good Mexican tradition of Posada, urging farmers to sell their grain to the cooperatives, wakening workers to the dangers of inflation. They printed corridos, wonderful illustrated ballads on current events, which would be sung in the far places of Mexico, to inform the people why the nation was at war, or why the trolley-car employees had to strike. To say that many of these were collectors' pieces is to miss the point. They were real; they were made by artists who were playing their part like men in a real world. They were also, miraculously, keeping themselves in food and clothing, and paying the rent of the Taller.

This summer Leopoldo Méndez made a new lithograph, for the annual Salón de Grabado of a private gallery in Mexico City, the Galería de Arte Decoración. It referred to the attempt on the life of Avila Camacho. In Leopoldo's graphic version, however, the disembodied form of assassination which thrusts out its pistol is not anonymous. The initials P. A. N. identify it as the Partido Acción Nacional, which we know more intimately as the Sinarquistas. The print was rejected, on technical grounds, although Leopoldo is easily the most brilliant lithographer in Mexico. He asked frankly whether the rejection had not been for political reasons, and got the admission that this was true. The jury disliked it, and the gallery director didn't feel that it was his place to take a stand on political questions.

Leopoldo took his lithographs back to the Taller, and all the other boys went and got theirs, too. The refugee artists withdrew what they had sent—who would know better than they that anyone who is not for us is against us? Two things became clear: the Salón de Grabado of 1944 was going to be pretty dull, and, secondly, there was material wasting for a fine exhibition of graphic arts. The Taller had lately moved into new quarters, and suddenly it became clear that the prints should be shown there, in the workshop, in the last weeks of August.

An even more interesting thing happened then. Everyone wanted to be in the protest exhibition. Painters who had never worked in the graphic arts came to the Taller and took away stones to make lithographs for the show. A few topical prints, like a group of jury-faced monkeys called "Los Changos Vaciladores," were run off in sheer exuberance. Siqueiros, not to be left out, made a lithograph after his new mural. Even the Old Guard, so long isolated from the younger men, Orozco and Diego Rivera, sent prints. "The works collected in this exhibition," the catalogue said "constitute a demonstration of the solidarity of their authors against any anti-democratic discrimination in art." It constituted also a demonstration of the vitality of an art which refuses to be cut off from life.

For the purely aesthetic consequences of this exhibition promise to be excellent. The boys can hardly wait to get the exhibition down and the public out, so that they can work again in their workshop. The painters, stimulated by their excursion into the graphic technique, are eager to work there too. A portfolio on the "Drama of the War" has been projected as a collective enterprise for the Taller—an event of first importance in the graphic arts. "This whole thing has the feeling of steps ahead," an artist says. "The exhibition was not important as mere publicity—not even merely as an historical event. It is important because we stood together, and now we will work together: there is a regeneration of that cooperative spirit of the early mural-painting days." "It is important because in our own way we took a shot at the Sinarquistas," another one responds gloomily, adding a suitable epithet.

ELIZABETH WILDER

Pertinax on France

THE GRAVEDIGGERS OF FRANCE. By Pertinax. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $6.

AT THE moment when the civilized world rejoices in France's liberation, a truly great work has appeared explaining why it fell. "The Gravediggers of France" is the English version of two volumes published last year by the most distinguished and best informed of all French newspapermen, André Géraud, who for more than thirty years signed his columns in the Echo de Paris, and since 1938 in L'Europe Nouvelle, with the pen name Pertinax.

In six hundred illuminating and disturbing pages the author not only analyzes the military, political, and moral collapse as seen in the acts and policies of those chiefly responsible for it: Gamelin, Daladier, Reynaud, Pétain; but gives a detailed cross-section of France viewed in historical perspective. It is the vast range of political consideration which makes this book unique. For without the knowledge of the profound fissure existing in French national life, American readers would find it difficult to understand how and why a relatively few men could exploit a moment of mortal peril to dig the grave of 1940.

For a century and a half, "two Frances which lost no love on each other have lived side by side. . . . Under varying battle flags, those of the King, of the church, and of the Bonaparte pretender . . . strong minorities always fought against the republican idea, against parliamentary democracy," writes Pertinax. But in the past these minorities had never faltered in their patriotic duty. In the stormy period following 1934, years when "the great Fear" of social change haunted the well-to-do, "it is not so sure that many did not look with indifference at an eventual military disaster."

The author rightly differentiates between men like Gamelin, "at his wit's end" after the swift German break-through; Daladier, "dictator in spite of himself"; the "broken mechanical toy Reynaud"; and the infinitely more contemptible figures of Pétain and Laval. The first three sinned through weakness. Their intentions were good, though Gamelin led his armies to disaster, Daladier's spineless sloth outmatched his inconsistencies, and Reynaud, beset by defeatists, shirked action and frittered the war's last decisive days on "heroic incantations." But for the artificers of the National Revolution the armistice "was a means . . . a means attained by deceit . . . toward a supreme end, reshaping their country from its foundations."

Pertinax ruthlessly destroys the Pétain "myth" fostered by Allied diplomats in the "Vichy Kremlin." From his timidity and defeatism at Verdun to his last ignoble command on D-day, that the French nation "loyally stand by the German army," the old marshal is shown as a vainglorious, narrow-minded bigot, convinced that France was lost in a maze of atheism and Marxism and that only through defeat could the virtuous ancien régime be restored.

More than anyone else, Pertinax blames Pétain—Inspector-General of the Army—for the inadequacies of the French forces, giving chapter and verse of his reductions of appropriations for armaments, fortifications, and reserves. But it was when Reynaud made him Vice-Premier in the War Council in the fatal May of 1940 that his "duplicity" became evident. For it was then that he paved the way for the most dubious elements in French politics. Laval had long since made the old man his "docile tool"—Laval, whom Pertinax terms the leader of the Fifth Column. But there was another sinister faction surrounding the dotard, which by egregious flattery and cunning had succeeded in making him the dictator of its choice. This was a group of Treasury officials, big industrialists, bankers, some of them the spearhead of Nazi economic penetration in France—Baudouin, Bouthillier, Barnaud, Leroy-Ladurie, Pierre Pucheu—names almost unknown in public affairs until they all figured prominently in Pétain's first Cabinet. It was this "cabal," this "brazen gang," as Pertinax calls them, a type of official never before wielding ministerial power, who with Pétain as figurehead exerted a baleful influence during the last hundred hours of the Third Republic.

"The Gravediggers" is one of the first books to unveil this very seamy side of high finance and politics; and not a little of the opposition to General de Gaulle is due to his announced intention to purge these traitors. Very revealing too are the chapters on Allied-Vichy relations, with a passing reference to American gullibility and a devastating record of Pétain's military collaboration with the Nazis in North Africa. But in this comprehensive and extremely well-documented work every angle of France's downfall is considered: nothing, nobody is overlooked. There is the story of the Generals' quarrels, prevarications, and inertia at G. H. Q., (Weygand lied flagrantly and feared communism as much as Pétain); there are details of the corrupt press with some money flowing directly from Hitler and Mussolini into Parisian journals; the decline of the French Academy, once dominated by the country's élite only to become subservient to fascist Italy. It is rich in juicy anecdotes and racy pen-portraits of Bonnet, Flandin, Darlan, the slippery Chautemps—all the intriguants rotating in the cascade of Cabinets between 1933 and 1942. Pertinax is a conservative, writing for conservative papers; he recognizes that the "fascist rabble" existed in the extremes of both the right- and left-wing parties, and was not confined to any single stratum of society. But his is the first authoritative voice definitely indicting his country's leaders for failing in their responsibilities.

Despite the gloomy picture, Pertinax is not pessimistic about the future. He knows that France never recovered from the staggering human losses of World War I; that since the days of Poincaré and Briand second-raters have ruled the land, as indeed where have they not? Parallels of inertia, corruption, and sedition are not lacking elsewhere. Just as France's swift collapse somehow symbolized the climax to a decade of world-wide jungle politics, so her national tradition and resiliency may enable her yet to lead the universe in new forms of government and ordered life. For this great task De Gaulle will need new men to help him; clemency for Vichy, with its lure of vested interests, would be fatal, warns Pertinax. Certainly his own unflinching record of events is ample proof of the high courage and character with which Frenchmen have always offset their weakness.

LILIAN MOWRER

Philosopher-Politician

GEORGE BANCROFT: BRAHMIN REBEL. By Russel B. Nye. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

THE title is not alluring and the sub-title is highly questionable, yet here is a sound and refreshing book about one of the chief molders of the prevailing American mind and mood. Here, in little more than three hundred pages, is all that need be remembered about the long, full, and influential life of the Dean of American Historians, together with the main contemporary opinions and events by which that life was affected. Mr. Nye has a thoroughly interesting and certainly an important story to tell. It is neither diminished in the telling nor unduly magnified. If the book shows little psychological subtlety, the reason may be that George Bancroft did not show much. If there is less critical comment than one expects in good biographical writing, that is because Mr. Nye lets the facts speak for themselves, as George Bancroft seldom managed to do.

One doubts, at first, whether Bancroft deserved so compact and unified a record. For he was characteristically expansive, like the drop of oil that spreads over acres of water. Beginning as a poor clergyman's son studying at Harvard and abroad for the ministry, he became a rich man, a politician, Secretary of the Navy, and Minister Plenipotentiary first to England and then, in his old age, to the Prussia of Bismarck. Though reared a Whig and allied by marriage to New England bankers, he was in politics a Jacksonian Democrat—a fact which did not prevent him from ghost-writing the first message to Congress of the Republican President Andrew Johnson. Primarily a man of the library, he had much to do with launching his country into the war with Mexico which many thoughtful New Englanders regarded as unnecessary and unjust. Although he knew little at first hand about naval affairs, he founded the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis in the face of Congressional indifference. On the one hand Bancroft was a shrewd Yankee with strong worldly ambitions, most of which must have been fully satisfied. On the other hand he was a Transcendentalist with a set of metaphysical beliefs hardly distinguishable from those of Emerson. And it is one of the stranger paradoxes of his life that his almost chauvinistic patriotism was corroborated, during his student years at Göttingen and Berlin, by the thought of Hegel, Fichte, and Schleiermacher.

Yet Bancroft's life, thought, and work were governed by one philosophic tenet. He believed, like all other Transcendentalists, that mankind is endowed with a direct intuition of "the world of intelligence and the decrees of God." He held that this institution is not the prerogative of a few but an "attribute of the human race." Thence came his conviction that "the best government rests on the people and not on the few, on the free development of public opinion and not on authority." Quite simply and literally he believed that the voice of the people is the voice of God. History was to him the record of God's will as imperfectly exemplified in the past, and politics he understood as an effort to make that will prevail in the present. That the will of the Omnipotent must ultimately prevail was certain, and therefore Bancroft was an unquestioningly optimistic believer in Progress. It seemed to him obvious that the purposes of God would be most promptly fulfilled in the Land of the Free, where they would meet the least impediment from human authority. To him, therefore, the history of his own country was little less than a divine revelation.

Here lies one reason, if not an excuse, for the tumid and pontifical prose style which makes Bancroft's "History of the United States," once familiar to every literate American, almost unreadable today. It is written as though the author were constantly proclaiming, "Thus saith the Lord!"

Something of the same sort must be said of Bancroft's political career, with which the most valuable and interesting parts of Mr. Nye's narrative are concerned. Here too one sees the man guided by his one central tenet. Worldly considerations, to be sure, were never far from his thoughts, yet he reached Jacksonian democracy by the philosophic path. Even when floundering through the mire and squalor of political expediency, showing himself by no means averse to rough-and-tumble and name-calling, he had in mind a purpose worthy of an idealist. His own family and that of his wife, nearly all his friends, quite all of those persons who might have helped him to social and academic success, were Whigs—many of them with the inveterate virus of Federalism still in their veins. During his visit in Boston Charles Dickens wrote to Macready: "I speak of Bancroft, and am advised to be silent on the matter, for he is a black sheep, a Democrat."

By years of hard work Bancroft made himself the head of his party in Massachusetts. His party was strengthened by the prestige of his literary fame and by his determined leadership. Thus he put his philosophy to work as few other Transcendentalists were able to do. Emerson could write: "The philosopher, the poet, or the religious man will, of course, wish to cast his vote with the democrat for free-trade, for wide suffrage, for the abolition of legal cruelties in the penal code, and for facilitating in every manner the access of the young and the poor to the sources of wealth." Emerson's political activities, however, usually stopped short at phraseology. In all his comments upon his contemporaries Emerson never went farther astray than when he said: "Bancroft and Bryant are historical democrats, who are inter-

Shall we again be wise too late?

THE

Tyrants' War

AND THE

Peoples' Peace

By FERDINAND A. HERMENS

GEORGE W. SHUSTER, President, Hunter College: "A publication of extraordinary merit. . . . Dr. Hermens reveals deep knowledge of and creative insight into the facts about the tragedy of Europe. . . . I know of little which can compare with it for clarity and breadth of view."

ROBERT M. MacIVER, author of Towards an Abiding Peace: "No book could be more timely; none is more needed at this hour. . . . Exposes the disguised Naziism of those who attribute all the evil in mankind to the people of Germany and the people of Japan."

$2.75

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

walco
Tru-Trac
FLOATING
JEWEL
$2.50

NO FINER NEEDLE!

Turn the volume up to release all the full, glorious tone you want to hear. No needle noise or scraping of the record. Walco's unique design eliminates shank vibration. 10,000 plays, less wear. Ask your dealer.

ELECTROVOX CO., INC., MAPLEWOOD, N. J.

ested in dead or organized, but not in organizing, liberty."

In his political and diplomatic career Bancroft was actuated by the same motives that held him all his life to the study and writing of history. It should have been he who first said that "history is past politics," and he might have added that politics is history in the making. He saw nothing remarkable in the fact that he, a man of monumental learning with international fame as a writer, was taking a citizen's part in the running of his country. Plato's fine-spun theories about the necessity of drafting "philosopher-kings" for the government of the state must have seemed to him ridiculously aristocratic. On one of his stump-speaking tours he wrote in his journal: "The people is the sovereign. The man of letters is his counsellor."

As a politician Bancroft had to learn the truth of Burke's saying that "all government is founded on a compromise and barter." In the library, however, he could give his idealism full swing. There were, of course, the facts of history to be considered, and he always treated the facts with respect. Indeed Bancroft has had too little credit for the preference he always showed for "original sources." Yet it cannot be said that he maintained a wholly "objective" attitude toward his data. History writing, to him, was an art rather than a science, and as an art it not only allowed but demanded self-expression. Under his hand it became also a kind of preaching. The facts were his raw material, awaiting interpretation in the light of Transcendental intuition.

Mary Austin tells us that "among the Navaho there is a nine-day performance designed to make the smell of a man's own tribe seem a good smell to him." Americans of a century ago were served in a similar way by George Bancroft's "History of the United States." It gave us what we then most needed: pride in our past, confidence in our destiny, tradition, almost a mythology, and native saints and heroes. Struggling as we then were, without much help from other lands, to win and to keep and to justify our national self-respect, we were not a little comforted to find that the annals of our country—eked out, to be sure, by occasional digressions—could already fill ten large volumes written in a style at least as imposing as that of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall." We did not at first hold it against Bancroft that he habitually made his little fishes talk like great whales. That was what most Americans were doing in the Age of Andrew Jackson. Neither did we think Bancroft any the less a historian because of his conviction that history has a meaning and that a thoughtful presentation of the past can provide some guidance for the future. What we felt about Bancroft's History was that here was a noble story, nobly told. For fifty years we accepted it as orthodox, almost canonical. Today the work is nearly forgotten, but in its time it passed so completely into the heart and mind of America that it is living still in our national optimism, in the idealism that underlies our materialistic preoccupations, and in our sense that we are a dedicated people.

Tested by the criteria of the present day, Bancroft's History is seen to have many obvious defects. Even in his own time it was clear that he lacked the brilliance of Prescott, Motley, and Parkman. Now as then, however, it should be equally clear that he surpassed these younger contemporaries in the steady devotion of all his literary power to the task of understanding and interpreting his own land. Among his faults we do not find any failure to recognize, or the least tendency to shirk, the responsibilities undertaken by every writer who sets himself to narrate and evaluate his country's past.

ODELL SHEPARD

Josiah Wedgwood, Democrat

TESTAMENT TO DEMOCRACY. By the Right Hon. Lord Wedgwood. American Chapter, Emergency Council. $3.75.

AS MR. LASKI has put it, democratic government is less a matter for eulogy than for exploration. No matter whether this exploration results in the classic definition we were given by the Gettysburg address or in the more subtle explanation that democracy is government by discussion and reason, it remains, like any other political institution, an ideal dependent on the imperfection of human beings.

"Were I asked"—this is what Winston Churchill wrote—"for the best evidence of the virtues of our democracy I would cite the whole political life of my old and gallant friend Josiah Wedgwood." In his book as in his life, Lord Wedgwood's endeavor is to enhance the charms and virtues of that variety of rule which is known as British parliamentary government.

This "Testament" which Lord Wedgwood of Barlaston bequeaths to democracy is indeed a valuable heritage. He sat as a Liberal-Labor member in the House of Commons for seven and thirty years. The lesson of his life's experience was that "criticism is precisely what constitutes government by reason and the great virtue of Parliament is that there are always some to find fault with the government of the day and keep a check upon its actions." It is not hard to understand how uneasy he felt when he was muzzled in the House during the year he held a post in the MacDonald Cabinet.

Comparing Parliament with other instruments of democracy, Wedgwood considers a free press to be the most important but "Parliament must function if democracy is not to languish." No one is more competent to describe the intricacies of the British Parliament, and the late Lord Wedgwood, in spite of his predilection for the Mother of Parliaments, has done it with his characteristic wit and candor. He thinks the rigid separation of the executive from the legislature in the Constitution of the United States was "based entirely on the misconception of Parliament." Nevertheless, "with respectful deference to Mr. Churchill," he is bound to admit that the present British Parliament has become too full of executive "place-men" in spite of the control of the executive by the legislature. Most interesting is the chapter dealing with corruption, one of the weaknesses which made possible the success of fascist propaganda. Education of the electorate is, in Lord Wedgwood's opinion, the only remedy against, and the only salvation from, fascist retrogression. Accepting as the essence of all true education the dictum of Archbishop Lang, "Teach them to think, not what to think," Wedgwood gives full credit to the great public schools which taught the governing class of England courage, self-respect, and team spirit. Now, when democracy no longer consists of a Parliament of one class well trained for governing, "if democracy is to survive, the people must be taught to think as well as to read and write."

But Wedgwood's "Testament" contains more than sound advice on how to save democracy, which is asserted to be in crisis only by those who ignore the fact that both freedom and democracy are the only legitimate twins of our civilization. It is at this point that the "Testament" turns to prophecy. Predicting that the triumph of the United Nations will involve an international five-year plan for the salvage of civilization, he sets his hopes on a financial federation of Britain and America because only a supernational financial unity can check a runaway inflation. Safety, peace, and justice being the common desire of all mankind, a step would be the union of the English-speaking peoples with the door open to all democratically governed countries.

The next to the last chapter of the "Testament" deals with "Hitler's Subhumans" and suggests a larger Palestine as a self-governing state pledged to open frontiers for immigration. Wedgwood's deep sympathy with the tragedy of the Jews explains the American publication of this volume by the American Chapter of the Emergency Council of the Chief Rabbi of Great Britain. Royalties from the book will be donated to the Wedgwood Memorial Fund.

The upright character, the frank and genial personality which distinguished the author are manifest in his book. Accused once by the leader of the House of "inciting to violence," Lord Wedgwood admitted the charge. "In a sense," he wrote, "my whole life has been an incitement to think, to see, and then to act. Every idea is an incitement." That can be said of the ideas in "Testament," which is addressed to all brave and conscientious crusaders for liberty.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Sea Power in World War II

A GUIDE TO NAVAL STRATEGY. By Bernard Brodie. Princeton University Press. Revised Edition. $2.75.

THIS excellent book of a well-known naval writer is not simply a new edition of his "A Layman's Guide to Naval Strategy." For all practical purposes it is a new book, which contains not only a discussion of naval strategy but also a naval history of the present war up to our landings in Normandy and Saipan. Lieutenant Brodie has set himself the task of stating the mission of a navy under modern conditions of war. While emphasizing the revolutionary changes brought about by air power, Brodie shows that aviation will not drive warships of any category from the seas. Nor does air power deprive sea power of its basic function, which is "to control transportation over the seas during wartime."

The course of the war has fully vindicated Dr. Brodie's earlier and present analysis. In fact, the last two years have seen naval fighting of an intensity unprecedented in history. The author points out, for instance, that at the end of the Guadalcanal campaign "the tonnage of sunken warships lying off the island was considerably greater than that lost on both sides at Jutland"—and Jutland was hitherto the greatest naval engagement in history. Moreover, the navy has now assumed greater importance than ever before, because in the twentieth century war has become essentially a transoceanic affair. The greatest naval writer of the inter-war period, the French Admiral Castex, emphasized a few years ago that land power was asserting itself more and more over sea power. Yet the present war shows that sea power has influenced the course of history more than ever before: landing operations cannot be carried out without the fire power of warships; large forces of carriers constitute the only genuine air power at present in existence.

The chief value of Brodie's book lies in its modernistic orthodoxy. Most followers of Mahan have reiterated merely the old venerable principles without being able to apply them to modern conditions. Brodie is the first naval writer who has written on naval war as it is fought in the period of triphibian war. It is important, however, to bear in mind that Brodie's book is oriented almost exclusively toward Anglo-American naval problems, and is written from the point of view of a superior sea power.

The "Guide to Naval Strategy" is to be recommended to those who want to enrich their knowledge of the present war. The author describes the tools of sea power and shows what these tools can do. It is remarkable how well he succeeded in turning a rather dry matter into interesting reading. His account of the submarine war in the Atlantic is the most illuminating which has yet appeared in print (and incidentally reminds one of his prediction, published in the dark days of 1942, that the U-boat offensive would shortly be broken). Equally interesting are Brodie's analysis of the failure of German naval strategy, his description of the

Europe in America

Foreign Influences in American Life

A volume of essays and critical bibliographies dealing with the phenomena of social and cultural impact, and considering crucial phases of foreign influence in our political, economic, social, literary, and artistic life. With 16 pages of collotype illustrations of American art.

EDITED BY
David F. Bowers

Volume II in the Princeton Studies in American Civilization

DAVID F. BOWERS
STOW PERSONS
J. G. LEYBURN
FRANK D. GRAHAM
OSCAR HANDLIN
DONALD DREW EGBERT
R. P. BLACKMUR

$3.00, PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Princeton, N. J.

MOTION PICTURES

PARAMOUNT Presents
Fred MacMurray • Barbara Stanwyck
Edward G. Robinson
"DOUBLE INDEMNITY"
THE STORY OF AN UNHOLY LOVE
In Person
The Andrews Sisters plus Pat Henning
EXTRA! Mitchell Ayres and His CBS Band
BUY MORE BONDS PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

"A commanding screen biography."
. . . Crowther, Times
DARRYL F. ZANUCK'S WILSON
A 20th Century-Fox Picture
On the Roxy stage . . .
FRED WARING and his Pennsylvanians
ROXY CONTINUOUS PERFORMANCES

STAGE PLAYS

"An exciting evening in the Theatre"—Nichols, Times
JOHN WILDBERG presents
HARRY WAGSTAFF GRIBBLE'S Production
ANNA LUCASTA
A Play by PHILIP YORDAN
MANSFIELD 47th STREET, WEST OF BROADWAY
Evenings 8:40; Next Matinee Saturday, 2:40

"HIT MUSICAL" Walter Winchell
"Follow the Girls"
44th St. THEA.
West of Broadway
AIR COND.
LA. 4-4337
Evenings 8:30
Matinees
Wednesday & Saturday 2:30

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (in association with Jack H. Skirball)
JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL
The FRANZ WERFEL - S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN
LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS
J. EDWARD BROMBERG
MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED
Evenings at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK In
MEXICAN HAYRIDE
by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.
AIR CONDITIONED

HARRY GREEN presents
"THE DAY WILL COME"
A stirring new play by LEO BIRINSKI with BRANDON PETERS • ARTHUR VINTON and HARRY GREEN
NATIONAL Thea., W. 41 St. • Opens THURS., SEPT 7
SEATS NOW AT BOX OFFICE • Eves. Incl. Sun.–Mats. Sat. & Sun.

See . . .
HITLER ON THE STAGE FOR THE FIRST TIME IN A DRAMATIC THUNDERBOLT!

astonishing naval campaign in the Mediterranean, and his review of the Pacific war. The latter war is most difficult to understand because of the novel elements of geography and because problems connected with Japan are puzzling to the Western mind. It is not always fully realized that for many dreary months our forces in the Pacific were inferior to the Japanese. In Brodie's interpretation the Pacific war makes sense. His interpretation also highlights the brilliant quality of our recent Pacific strategy. Needless to add, Lieutenant Brodie, who in civilian life is professor of Political Science at Dartmouth College, has not neglected the political and human aspects of naval strategy. STEFAN T. POSSONY

Fiction in Review

FRANZ HOELLERING'S "Furlough" (Viking, $2.50), set in Germany in this last year in which Germany has been learning defeat, is unusual, among anti-Nazi novels at least, for its refusal to exploit the bloody possibilities of its material and for having as its male lead a character who couldn't be played by Gary Cooper. Far from being a virtuoso of the underground, the Hans of "Furlough" is a Nazified young brute who in earliest childhood showed the bent of fascist self-assertion; it is merely the latest outbreak of ruthlessness that Hans kills a comrade on the Russian front in order to steal his furlough papers. But vacation from war is a disappointment: conditions at home are desperate and Hans's sweetheart, Leni, is an anti-Nazi. By the end of the furlough, the stalwart Hitlerite has become a purposeful deserter. The political conversion is quick but convincing. What is not convincing is the hope Mr. Hoellering would seem to pin to the regenerated Hanses of Germany. For while I agree with "Furlough" that no amount of coercion makes a Nazi out of a decent human being, I believe, by a similar logic, that no amount of disillusionment makes a reliable human being out of someone as temperamentally susceptible to Nazism as Hans, or so deeply poisoned by it. Mr. Hoellering has let himself be pushed to a sentimental extreme if he considers even a reformed Hans anything but a problem for the future.

Warren Beck's "Final Score" (Knopf, $2.50) is another study of the fascist personality of our time—of the possible American fascist personality. A first novel, written with much quiet taste, it is the history of a small-city football idol who becomes a dangerous political demagogue. Bill Hutten was born at the wrong end of town and reared among people who are much more apt for the revenges of violent action than for the slow healings of due process; like the German Hans, he had "some dark primary evil" in his heart even as a boy. Then, on the college athletic field, and later as the front for a sporting-goods company, Hutten learns the taste for power; he graduates to the deeper satisfactions of being the front for a local political putsch. Mr. Beck unfortunately tells his story through the minds of a pair of close spectators at Hutten's rise instead of casting it into direct action—a method which reduces the dramatic effectiveness of his novel and makes it somewhat tedious. Nevertheless, "Final Score" is a firm and thoughtful American psychological-political document. DIANA TRILLING

IN BRIEF

ON LIVING IN A REVOLUTION. By Julian Huxley. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Considering its distinguished author, this book can be set down only as an undistinguished olla podrida. Professor Huxley prints here a miscellany of his essays from the magazines, and even a radio script. About half of them advance the theme that society is undergoing a "transformation toward a world more planned, more closely connected, and more internationally organized." The rest of the book is made up of things like the amusing if irrelevant piece on the original perpetrator of the Spoonerism, a personage bizarre enough to delight Julian's brother Aldous. (The man who made the remark about "occupewing my pie" happens to have been a myopic albino don, of saintly character.) The editing is so slipshod that at one place Emerson, at another Carlyle, is credited with saying, "Gad, she'd better!" when Margaret Fuller announced her acceptance of the universe. It all adds up to a footling sort of book. No one in his senses could quarrel with Professor Huxley's main theme, but he offers nothing that will implement it. That portion of the public which is on Huxley's own intellectual level surely grasped the concept of a planned world at least as long ago as the creative years of Wells and Shaw. And as for the vast uneducated public which must be won over to this idea, because only through them can it be carried out democratically, this book—so blandly donnish, so centered in sociological abstractions—will do nothing whatever to enlighten them.

DAY OF DELIVERANCE: A BOOK OF POEMS IN WAR TIME. By William Rose Benét. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

When patriotic sentiment is wanted, the poetasters can be counted on to fill every need. With this general remark, and with charity rebuking the suspicion that there is always an element of exploitation in such performances, criticism has done its full duty by Mr. Benét's latest book in saying that there is no discrepancy between its matter and manner, both of which are execrable.

Coming Soon in The Nation
"THE JEW IN OUR DAY"
By Waldo Frank
Reviewed by W. H. Auden

RECORDS

VICTOR'S September set (932; $2.50) of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins, played by Menuhin and Enesco with an orchestra under Monteux, offers the performance that has been available for about ten years on two single records, which have now been put into an album. On the whole it is an acceptable performance, and preferable to the badly recorded Szigeti-Flesch version. As for Menuhin's playing in the performance, I did not like it when I first heard it; and rehearing it now I recognize the qualities I disliked, but I also am aware of how much worse his playing has become since then. I speak, of course, of what I have heard on recently issued records; and records, in fact, document a deterioration that is both saddening and mystifying. I have Victor record 7182, issued around 1930 (it was in the Victor catalogue until recently, and I hope will be restored after the war), on which "Master Yehudi Menuhin" plays the slow movement of Mozart's Violin Concerto K.216, producing a clear, compact, and lovely tone in simply inflected, large-spanned phrases. On the records of Bach's concerto, issued about four years later, there are changes in the tone, which tends to be tremulously over-sweet (I called it "treacly" at the time), and in the phrasing, which tends toward exaggerated small-scale inflection (I called it "precious"). And on recent records the tone is coarse, the phrases chopped to bits.

Also on Victor's September list are a number of singles. On one (10-1105; $.75) is a little Corelli Sonata in F for strings and organ, of which the two slow movements are characteristically lovely and poignant, and the second of the two fast movements is superb. The performance by the Fiedler Sinfonietta and E. Power Biggs is good, and is well recorded. On another (10-1104; $.75) are the duet Bei Männern welche Liebe fühlen from "The Magic Flute," sung by Rethberg and Pinza, and Se vuol ballare from "The Marriage of Figaro," sung by Pinza. Rethberg's voice is unpleasantly acidulous in its high register but lovely in its middle and low range, and her phrasing in this range is exquisite. In the duet Pinza sings with vocal and stylistic constraint that gives the impression of his not being at ease in the music or the language; in the aria, on the other hand, he is completely at ease to the point of overdoing everything.

Sevitzky's performance of Strauss's "Frühlingsstimmen" Waltz with the Indianapolis Symphony (11-8609; $1) is gracefully straightforward most of the time, with only a few of the exaggerated retardations that are considered correct in Strauss waltzes; on the reverse side is what is described as an arrangement by Dubensky of a Waltz by Weber, which is very charming. The performances are well recorded. And finally Rachmaninov creates around Bach's E major Partita for unaccompanied violin a thick texture which not only obscures the original single line of music with its rhythms and its strands of counterpoint, but occasionally falsifies it with some of Rachmaninov's own chord progressions. The result is acceptable as an occasion for some stunning piano-playing, but not as a statement of Bach's work (11-8607; $1).

Letters have come in expressing agreement with what I wrote about Heifetz's playing recently; and a friend for whose musical judgment I have the highest respect remarked: "Your article was especially interesting to me because just recently someone took me to hear Heifetz at the Stadium. One of the things he played was Chausson's "Poème," which is a piece that I love very much and have heard a great deal and know very well. And I can tell you that I was horrified by Heifetz's performance. Everything the work does with delicacy Heifetz exaggerated and cheapened in the way you described: the slow parts he dragged and sentimentalized; the animated parts he rushed, so that they became displays of pyrotechnics. It was without any question a thoroughly vulgar performance."

The idea of the people who created "Song of Norway" seems to have been that it was legitimate to work the music of Grieg's Piano Concerto and smaller piano pieces and songs into a tuneful musical comedy score if the libretto and lyrics were concerned with a story about Grieg himself. But I don't accept that idea; and I would be outraged by the misuse of his music even if what it was misused for—action, dialogue, comedy, acting, and in particular the comic "hamming" on a grand scale that Irra Petina has done heretofore in minor comedy parts at the Metropolitan—were not of a kind to make me writhe most of the evening. Relief came only near the end, with the two little ballets which provided new and charming examples of Balanchine's fresh and imaginative use of ballet materials. His musical comedy choreography I did not care much for; and I disliked the rhythmic perversities that he introduced into the peasant dances. B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

RUFUS BAXTER is the pseudonym of an old contributor to The Nation recently returned from Algiers.

F. G. L. is a well-known figure in Pennsylvania's progressive political movement.

LEWIS S. GANNETT, book critic for the New York Herald Tribune, is now in Europe reporting the war for that paper.

GEROLD FRANK is war correspondent in the Near East for the Overseas Press Service.

ELIZABETH WILDER, assistant keeper of the Archive of Hispanic Culture, Hispanic Foundation, Library of Congress, is in Mexico as a Guggenheim Fellow, studying the sculpture of Mexico's colonial period.

LILIAN MOWRER observed French politics at close hand during several years' residence in Paris.

ODELL SHEPARD, professor of English at Trinity College, won the Pulitzer prize for biography in 1937 with his "Pedlar's Progress."

8 BOOKLETS BY BERTRAND RUSSELL

Bertrand Russell, the distinguished philosopher, mathematician, logician and Freethinker, recently said that he enjoyed writing booklets for E. Haldeman-Julius because he is given the fullest freedom of expression. In the booklets listed below Dr. Russell offers a feast of reason, information, logic, wit and rollicking humor. We present:

THE VALUE OF FREE THOUGHT. How to Become a Truth-Seeker and Break the Chains of Mental Slavery. . . . 25¢
AN OUTLINE OF INTELLECTUAL RUBBISH. A Hilarious Catalogue of Organized and Individual Stupidity. . . . 25¢
HOW TO READ AND UNDERSTAND HISTORY. The Past as the Key to the Future. . . . . 25¢
HOW TO BECOME A PHILOSOPHER, A LOGICIAN, A MATHEMATICIAN. . 30¢
WHAT CAN A FREEMAN WORSHIP? . 25¢
WHY I AM NOT A CHRISTIAN. . . . 25¢
HAS RELIGION MADE USEFUL CONTRIBUTIONS TO CIVILIZATION? . . 25¢
A LIBERAL VIEW OF DIVORCE. . 25¢

We offer all eight booklets by Bertrand Russell for only $1.45, prepaid. Ask for BERTRAND RUSSELL'S EIGHT BOOKLETS. Address:

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS,
Box R-53, Girard, Kansas.

Letters to the Editors

They Still Think

Dear Sirs: This must be a private letter inasmuch as servicemen are scarcely supposed to have political hopes and thoughts, during an election year especially. Of course this is an infantile attitude. You and I know that in order that war may become "a crusade and not a crime" there must be deep and soul-stirring emotions to rouse us into action. A person thus moved to take up arms can scarcely be asked to stop thinking simply because his superiors so command. Blind obedience, fortunately, has never been the strong point of democratic peoples. When the day comes that I feel muzzled and cannot think, hope, express, and argue my beliefs, that is the day I shall be tempted to rebel.

Until recently I was out in the Pacific theater as a combat dive-bomber pilot aboard a carrier. I was there for well over a year and of course it was a constant struggle to keep up with world developments even in a most limited sense. During this period I depended more than ever before on my Nation to supply me with the perspective that is so difficult to maintain on or near the actual war fronts.

It is very true, what Justice Holmes told us about war—that it makes the participant realize more fully the vital and passionate nature of life; and yet there is still the drawback of being too close to see the whole. My Nation has helped tremendously to supply this deficiency and consequently I am "mighty beholden." I am pained that it is not more widely read and appreciated but even at 26 I have long since discovered that most men don't wish to develop much of their brain power.

May you keep plugging along and chiseling away at the public conscience; who knows when the floodgates might be loosed? A. W. B.

Somewhere in Florida, August 13

There Are Ways

Dear Sirs: The management of the Philadelphia Transportation Company must bear its share of blame for the strike of prejudiced white employees there against the upgrading of Negro workers.

The company did nothing to stop, but apparently encouraged, anti-Negro agitation among its workers by a relatively few racial bigots, instead of making a genuine effort to sell the idea of working with Negroes as motormen. There are established techniques for handling such a situation, developed by organizations like the Urban League and by progressive employers. They include assuring the white workers that they will not lose their jobs to Negroes and stressing the patriotic and democratic aspects of providing Negroes with job opportunities according to their ability and seniority.

These methods were not used, and racial bigots among the workers were given the green light by the company because the company wanted to defeat the CIO union in a labor-board election among its employees. The company knew that the CIO union, the Transport Workers, would not permit curtailment of the right of its Negro members to be upgraded, and hoped to defeat the CIO on this issue by fanning into flame the race prejudice among its employees which otherwise would have been dormant and could easily have been overcome without a strike if the management had honestly tried to do so.

Negroes work as motormen and bus drivers in New York, and without any racial incidents.

ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

New York, August 24

Among Our Non-Readers

Dear Sirs: Some time ago I received a letter inviting me to subscribe to The Nation at a special rate of $3. While I do not care to accept this offer, I venture to reply to a question asked in the letter:

> "The battle lines have been clearly drawn, not only in the field of military combat abroad, but in another theatre of operations that affect you just as vitally—in the struggle of democracy vs. totalitarianism here on the home front.
>
> "On which side are you?"

I am on the side of democracy, whereas The Nation is on the side of totalitarianism. The position for which The Nation stands is in general that an American citizen, unless he happens to be a left-wing intellectual or a member of the CIO, has no rights that the national government is bound to respect and that the ideal political set-up would be one in which these favored classes ruled the rest of the population with a rod of iron. That is not exactly my conception of democracy.

Incidentally, I don't think it would be a very good investment to pay even $3 to ascertain "why President Roosevelt has dropped the name and abandoned much of the program of the New Deal." Mr. Roosevelt's one overmastering ambition, as everybody who reads the papers concluded long ago, is to get and hold for himself power, power, power, in ever widening circles. For as long as the cultivation of the intellectuals and of the CIO served this purpose, he was ready to do anything and everything to enlist their support. Just now he plainly feels that these elements comprise, after all, only a minority of the total population, and that there is a possibility that the disaffection of these other elements may reach the point of temporarily neutralizing their differences and uniting them to sweep out the New Deal. Under these circumstances the prospects of the fourth term will presumably be enhanced by affecting to throw the left-wingers overboard and playing up the safe-and-sane traditions of Jeffersonian democracy (sic). HAROLD S. DAVIS

Boston, August 5

Voters and Bosses

Dear Sirs: A letter from R. W. Pence in Greencastle, Indiana, poses a paradoxical question: "Would it not be better to turn the country over in November to the frankly reactionary group—the Republican Party—than turn it over to the reactionary bosses of the Democratic Party? Thus the Democratic Party could retain the reputation of being the one liberal hope in the country."

This argument reminds me of an argument which Walter Lippmann some weeks ago advanced as a reason against President Roosevelt's reelection. Mr. Lippmann—who in 1932 described Roosevelt as "a pleasant man who, without any important qualifications for the office, would very much like to be President," and who in 1936 again exhibited the profundity of his political views by urging the election of Alf M. Landon—gave as his 1944 opinion that President Roosevelt should not run for reelection because, if he should run and fail, both the war effort and the peace plans would be discredited.

It would require no great effort to expand such views into a comprehensive philosophy of action—or, rather, of inaction and reaction. Lest a cathedral go up in flames we should not, obviously, light a candle on the altar. Lest the human race should fall into fresh errors, we should practice infanticide. Lest we stumble and fall, we should not ascend a ladder, personally, politically, nationally, or internationally. Think of the colossal ignominy of forming a new and better League of Nations and perhaps having it collapse some day in the distant future! Obviously, our duty is to do nothing at all and thus avert every vestige of discredit that might ensue upon the failure of our ambitions.

As for political bosses, let Mr. Pence stop worrying about trivialities that already are over-advertised by our Republican press. Nobody is bossing my vote and nobody will be bossing Mr. Pence's vote if he doesn't permit himself to be pushed around by childish arguments incessantly advertised by reactionary newspapers. We, the voters, are the bosses. We cease to be at the very moment that we relinquish our right to vote for the best President, the best Vice-President, the best Senators, the best Representatives who are available for office.

WINTHROP PARKHURST

New York, August 28

Those Italian Prisoners

Dear Sirs: As an American who has tried to follow closely our policy toward Italy, I have been struck by the folly of our short-sighted treatment of Italian war prisoners. Thousands of these men have declared their readiness to take up arms for the United Nations cause; they have been screened by the FBI; they are not Fascists. Many of them, in fact were active anti-Fascists long before the United States entered the war. Yet they are denied the opportunity to fight, and are still paid the miserable 80 cents a day granted war prisoners—while they work long hours at war work—and while misinformed Americans write indignant letters to the papers protesting what they term the "coddling" of these men because they are given a few hours off per week during which they are able to make some contact with American life.

If this war is a simple game of cops and robbers, then one Italian is no different from another. But if, as most of us believe, the war has political meaning, if it is a war of democrats against fascism, we are under solemn obligation at all times and in all cases to distinguish between our friends and our enemies, whatever their nationality.

RICHARD N. KELLY,
Editor, Facts from Italy

New York, August 28

ALL THE NEWS
OF THE WORLD
IN CAPSULE FORM

FIRST AID TO BUSY PEOPLE

EXECUTIVES • TEACHERS
WRITERS • SPEAKERS
STUDENTS • CLERGYMEN
LAWYERS • LIBRARIANS
PUBLIC OFFICIALS, ETC.

To keep you well-informed and up-to-date, you need

FACTS-ON-FILE
World News Digest

Would you like to condense 100 hours of weekly reading into 30 minutes, without missing a single important fact or event? Do you wish to have every major subject and news event at your finger-tips—condensed, sorted, filed and indexed for ready reference? FACTS ON FILE does it for you by means of a weekly 8-page digest that covers world news in capsule form, stripped of verbiage, opinion, and comment.

FACTS ON FILE saves you hours of reading time, improves your fund of knowledge, gives you all the news of the world including World War II, National and Foreign Affairs, Latin America, Finance, Business, Arts, Science, Education, Religion, Sports, Obituaries, etc., in handy reference form. Authoritative, concise, easy to read.

With FACTS ON FILE you can discard your clippings, notes, and stacks of magazines. Acclaimed a "MIRACLE OF CONDENSATION" FACTS ON FILE is endorsed by prominent leaders in all walks of life as invaluable for quickly locating facts, checking dates, figures, speeches, and names. Busy executives, speakers, governments, schools, libraries, business firms subscribe to FACTS ON FILE as the ONLY publication of its kind in America. Each weekly Digest comes to you with a Cumulative Index that keeps FACTS ON FILE up-to-date automatically.

SPECIAL OFFER

TRY FACTS ON FILE for 5 weeks for only $1.00 (value $2.50). Regular subscribers at $25.00 a year receive a handsome loose-leaf DE LUXE BUCKRAM BINDER FREE OF CHARGE (Size 9½ x 11½ inches). Holds a year's supply of Digests and Indexes.

Send the coupon below with only $1.00 for special 5-weeks' trial, which includes latest Quarterly Index FREE OF CHARGE.

FACTS-ON-FILE
"THE NEWS OF THE WORLD IN CAPSULE FORM"
516 5TH Ave., New York 18, N. Y.

☐ I enclose $1.00 for Special 5-weeks' trial service to FACTS ON FILE, which entitles me to latest 22-page Quarterly Index FREE.
N

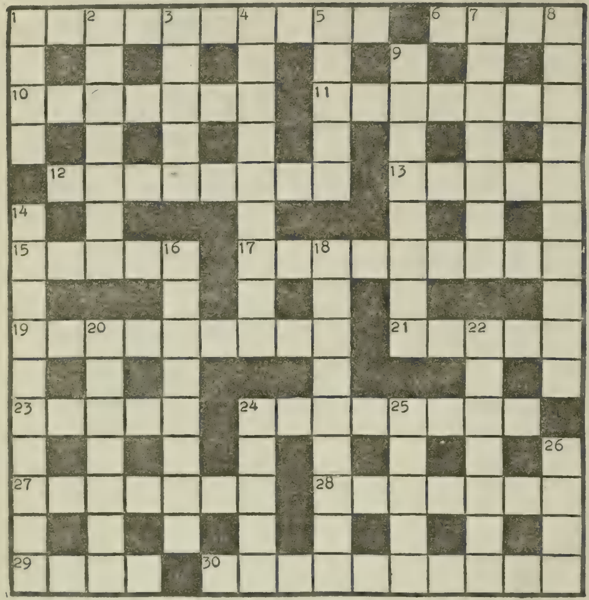
Name..

Address..

....

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 80

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

[redacted] This Treaty was written in two languages
[redacted] Nurse in Martin Chuzzlewit, fond of quoting "Mrs. Harris"
10 Hold up
11 Bouncer or chucker-out, perhaps
12 "- - - - - - - - they heard a most melodious sound" (Faerie Queen)
13 Boring part of a garden nuisance
15 Dish a boy must finish
17 French coins or cakes
19 But no breast-plates?
21 You might make this Muse orate
23 In Ipswich or Norwich
24 Anything but neat's-foot, you would think
27 I lament (anag.)
28 A letter of advice with frigid ending
29 Black
30 "Garden of Eden, nr. Babylon, Asia Minor," might have found them (three words, 4, [redacted] and 3)

DOWN

1 Garment that's rather short for a goddess
[redacted] In confusion there is naturally fluster, but it seems strange here
[redacted] Parson in Fielding's Joseph Andrews
4 Dreamland (three words, 4, 2 and 3)
5 Yet seven may be such times of day
7 Sea-captain, friend to Sebastian, in Twelfth Night
8 Leave with a girl in the midst of it
9 Bugle call the soldier dislikes most?
14 Digest this!
16 "- - - - - - - -, at his utmost need, By those his former bounty fed" (Dryden)
18 Complaint of one who has lived with an optimist?
20 The Moor of Venice
22 Wolf's-bane or monk's-hood
24 Say, Ted, have you had enough?
25 Mystic number
26 Give up

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 79

ACROSS:—1 POSTERN; 5 POCKETS; [redacted] NEGUS; 10 MORSE CODE; 11 HEADMARKS; 12 PLEAD; 13 ROUNDEL; 15 SETTLER; 17 BLESSED; 19 SWAGGER; 21 OZONE; 23 FORGOTTEN; 25 TAMBOURIN; 26 CRIME; 27 RUNDALE; 28 ENRAGES.

DOWN:—1 PANTHER; [redacted] SIGNATURE; 3 EPSOM; [redacted] NUMERAL; 5 PURISTS; 6 CLEOPATRA; 7 ERODE; 8 SLENDER; 14 DESDEMONA; 16 LIGHTNING; 17 BLOATER; 18 DEFARGE; 19 STRANGE; 20 RINGERS; 22 OSMAN; 24 OCCUR.

RESORTS

The Oaks
ELBERON, [redacted] J.
Enjoy all outdoor sports, excellent tennis, ocean bathing, delicious cuisine, in this American plan country estate. On Highway 4N, only 50 miles from N.Y.C. (Jersey Central or Pennsylvania R.R. direct to Elberon.)
Phone Long Branch 2433
Mgt. of Joseph Horowitz

FOR VACATION FUN AND REST
55 Miles from New York [redacted] vacation "heaven," breath-takingly beautiful countryside—delicious food—restful indoor activities—invigorating enjoyable outdoor sports: Tennis—swimming—ping pong—volley ball—bowling—outdoor dancing—bicycling—(horseback riding and golf nearby)
You're welcome at any time and for any time
Write for booklet
PLUM POINT
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
[redacted] Windsor, N.Y. Tel: Newburgh 4270

RUSS ALTMAN
Heart of the Catskills . . . 1,800-foot elevation. Fine hiking and hunting. Good swimming, boating and fishing near by. Comfortable beds. Modern conveniences. Limited accommodations. No children. $28 per week. Open all year. Three hours from N. Y., express stop.
Narrowsburg, N. Y. Tel. 107R20

Intimate Different Delightful OAKWOOD NEW WINDSOR, NEW YORK
Tel.: Newburgh 4477. Only 58 miles from N.Y.C.
Enjoy the charm of this Colonial Estate. Spacious grounds. Private Lake. Boating. Swimming. All sports. Unexcelled food. Limited accommodations. Open Fireplace.

SCHOOL

Opening September 26th
DOWNTOWN COMMUNITY SCHOOL
46 BARROW [redacted]
A private progressive school for boys and girls . . . age 6 thru 9
New York City CH 2-1198

SITUATION WANTED

HANDYMAN, 54, single, sober, active, wants wages and full maintenance in small town, any state, with congenial employer. Box 1486, c/o The Nation.

HELP WANTED

Non-sectarian Settlement House, N. Y. C. Experienced girl's worker full time afternoon and evening. Experienced boy's worker part time five evenings [redacted] week. Box 1485, c/o The Nation.

WANTED TO PURCHASE

PHONOGRAPH LANGUAGE SETS. Language, Room 1203, 18 East 41st St., N. Y. C. 17.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well [redacted] the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK · SATURDAY · SEPTEMBER 16, 1944 NUMBER 12

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 309

EDITORIALS
- Business and Taxes 311
- How to Keep the Peace by Freda Kirchwey 312

ARTICLES
- The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 314
- The Big-Power Peace by Louis Fischer 315
- In the Wind 317
- Free Spain Fights On by J. Alvarez del Vayo 318
- Civil Affairs Comme Il Faut by Captain Cox and Lieutenant Box 321
- Polls, Propaganda, Politics 323
- 25 Years Ago in The Nation 323

POLITICAL WAR
- Garibaldi's Return by Mario Bellini 324
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 325

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
- Karl Shapiro and the Great Ordeal by F. W. Dupee 327
- Maurois on America by Albert Guérard 328
- A Votive Stone by Betsy Hutchison 330
- Congress by Victor Riesel 332
- Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 332
- Films by James Agee 334
- Music by B. H. Haggin 335

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 81 by Jack Barrett 336

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON ▪ MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SCHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE BATTLE OF GERMANY BEGAN LAST Sunday with the firing of the first Allied artillery shell into the territory of the Reich—that "holy territory" which is about to be purified, though perhaps not sanctified. The firing of that shell was a milestone in five years of bitter war, one of the climaxes of a great and brilliant campaign which is still continuing toward new climaxes. It came at the end of a week in which the Allies had consolidated their gains into a single unbroken front from Nancy to the sea; a week in which the Germans, as anticipated, had managed to throw up temporary defenses along the main covering positions before the Siegfried Line. General Patton's Third Army, having raced ahead the fastest, was the first to be halted, along the difficult tank trap of the Moselle between Nancy and Metz, by stiffened resistance and over-extended supply lines. South of it, General Patch's Seventh Army drove up the Rhone toward the Belfort gap, leaving the ruins of the German Nineteenth Army in its wake. North of it, General Hodge's First Army moved through the "impenetrable" Ardennes and into Luxembourg. Farthest north, General Dempsey's Second Army liberated Brussels, thrust a finger into the Netherlands, wheeled east toward the flat plains of Westphalia. Behind them all lay buried Germans, Germans in hospitals, Germans in stockades—half a million of them. The Battle of Germany began with the odds heavily weighted in the Allies' favor.

*

WHAT ARE THE GERMANS' CHANCES IN THE west? The covering positions, especially in the south, may be retained long enough for the Siegfried Line defenses to be refurbished and manned. These defenses will prove difficult but not insuperable. Already four Allied armies are drawn up on the western borders of the Reich; once the Channel ports are reduced, a fifth army, the Canadian First, will be free to move in where it is most needed. This last factor is important: having many vehicles, much gasoline, and the glittering prize of air supremacy, the Allies possess both strategic and tactical mobility to the highest degree. In a few days they can concentrate overwhelming men and material against any part of the Siegfried Line. The Germans, lacking transport, out of gas, and denuded of the air umbrella, cannot counter-concentrate. They must hold the long line with what remains of their once-powerful armies in the west: hold a line whose strength depends on the ability of its defenders to counter-attack sharply and instantly. This they cannot do on anything like the necessary scale. We may expect the longest possible delaying action before the line and in it, while tank traps and blockhouses are constructed in the villages of Germany—continued fighting once the Siegfried Line is broken may thus become possible. But as for the line itself, look for the tested Eisenhower-Montgomery-Bradley pattern to unfold: careful reconnaissance, building up of great strength, then the coordinated assault with aerial bombardment, the dropping of as many as six air-borne divisions to open gaps from the rear, and frontal breakthrough. No amount of time won can save the Germans from this splintering in the west.

*

MR. DEWEY LAUNCHED HIS CAMPAIGN AT Philadelphia with a clarion call for an early return to the governmental and economic policies of Herbert Hoover. It is true that one may read his speech from beginning to end without finding a single mention of the last Republican President. But throughout his address Mr. Dewey insisted that all the difficulties with which the country is beset had their origin on March 4, 1933, when the "defeatist" policies of the New Deal were inaugurated. Warming up to this theme, he asserted that the New Deal had "kept this country in a continuous state of depression for seven straight years." Mr. Dewey did not object to any specific New Deal policy. Far from it. He called the roll of New Deal policies—security regulation, bank-deposit insurance, support for agriculture, unemployment insurance, old-age pensions, the Wagner act—and endorsed them all. But he was against "bureaucracy" and "experimentation" and a "controlled regulated society"—as if any government could operate without bureaus, occasional changes in policy, or regulations. In place of these fearsome evils Mr. Dewey would give us "an open door for every man who wants to start out in business for himself" and "government policies which encourage enterprise." Mr. Hoover's heart must have leaped as he heard those magic words—magic words that described his own administration's policy in the Golden Days of 1928 and 1929. Alas, that the New Deal intervened with its Great Depression.

*

NOW THAT HIS GOVERNMENT IS INSTALLED in the capital, General De Gaulle is tackling the tough political problems that were bound to confront him as soon as French soil was liberated. First is the major and most delicate job of reorganizing the government. He must eliminate the doubtful and weak and give representation to the various political elements that support the reborn Republic. So far he appears to have made a good start. He has drawn into the government eight men who were active in the resistance movement and seems to be making room for a few of the pre-war democratic leaders who symbolize the best of the Third Republic. The name of Jules Jeanneney is significant of this intention. By far the most encouraging change reported—it is not yet officially confirmed—is the dismissal of René Massigli from the post of Foreign Minister and the appointment in his place of Georges Bidault, the young left-wing Catholic leader, who has been president of the Council of Resistance. His selection for the top place in the De Gaulle cabinet should go a long way to satisfy the legitimate demands of the men and women who have fought the anti-Nazi battle inside France. Meanwhile, a few foreign journalists, for instance Karl H. von Wiegand in the New York Journal-American, are busy drawing pictures of terror and incipient civil war. This sort of talk is being echoed in the editorial columns of the reactionary press. Actually, responsible American reporters have been astonished at the restraint shown by both the government and the people after four years of German-Vichy rule. Talk of terror is nothing more than a new version of the vicious anti-Gaullism that poisoned American relations with Free France in the months before the invasion.

*

THAT THE GERMAN UNDERGROUND FACES much graver obstacles to effective action than any other movement of resistance must be admitted. But on the other hand it is equally true that its zero hour is striking now at the very moment when the Allied armies are fighting on German soil. No one will seriously dispute the existence of anti-Nazi sentiment in Germany. But sentiment cannot be equated with physical resistance, and until now nothing has happened in Germany that can be remotely compared with the activities of the Maquis. It is true that within the Reich the Gestapo is in a better position to suppress any resistance activity than outside Germany. But the Nazis in Slovakia these days are not treating the underground with particular indulgence; and yet uprisings, not merely among civilians but in the Slovak military garrisons, have spread like wildfire. There is something that the underground can do: promote mass desertions. As Argus points out in his column, the menace of the S. S. and the Gestapo may prevent many things, but it should not prevent the lower ranks of the army—the common soldiers and petty officers—from surrendering if they really want to. A movement arising out of such actions, a collapse of the Nazi regime due to the refusal of the German people to commit mass suicide, will not be the democratic German revolution anti-Nazi Germans and other anti-fascists have been hoping for. But, as the exiled German socialist leader

Paul Sering points out correctly, "it would be a first coming together of masses of Germans against Nazism in action, an active contribution to its destruction, a beginning of its political defeat by Germans as distinct from the strictly military defeat at the hands of the Allies."

*

IMPERIALISTS OF THE WORLD, UNITE! AT HIS press conference in London just before leaving for Holland, the Dutch Prime Minister, Pietr Gerbrandy, stated that as soon as possible after hostilities ceased the Dutch people and the residents of the Dutch East Indies would be asked whether the Dutch empire should receive a greater measure of self-government. Whereupon Brendan Bracken, British Minister of Information, who was present at the interview, urged the Dutch "not to relinquish any portion of their far-flung territories after the war." In other words, don't liquidate the empire. Brendan Bracken, former private secretary to Winston Churchill and still Churchill's close friend, wants company for the British Empire. The liquidation of the Dutch empire might amount to pressure on Britain to give freedom to India or Burma and start a whole wave of liquidation. In the same spirit, Mr. Amery, now British Secretary of State for India, once advised a tolerant attitude toward Japanese expansion in China. "Our whole policy in India," Amery said in the House of Commons, "our whole policy in Egypt stands condemned if we condemn Japan." Imperialists understand one another. It is to promote such understanding on the part of Americans that many British imperialists would welcome an American empire in the Pacific, provided, of course, it did not tread on British toes.

*

NOW THAT MR. HULL HAS BRANDED Argentina as the fascist headquarters of the American hemisphere, we can claim that our insistent warnings have been fully justified. One after another, competent observers, including many Latin Americans, have told our readers the story of fascist penetration in the various South American republics. It must have been unbelievable to many people who have not realized the true character of fascism that so insolent an offensive could be launched at the very peak of Allied power. And yet the fact remains that in the autumn of 1944 we face a worse situation in Latin America than we did three years ago. Someone must have been working pretty fast and well, and if his record in Spain does not prove Franco a good organizer, it must be admitted that he has very efficiently contributed to the growth and power of Latin American fascism. The writers who for three years in these columns, have been denouncing the state of affairs now officially admitted by Secretary Hull have been unanimous in pointing to the Spanish Falange as the chief instrument of fascist penetration. That was also what Representative Coffee of Washington concluded in his speeches in the House on February 24 and June 19, when he asked that diplomatic relations with Spain be ended. Mr. Coffee cited numerous examples of Franco's hostility to the United Nations and of his complicity in Latin American fascist intrigue. We can now mention in addition the great quantity of Nazi money that is pouring into Argentina, assigned to Spanish banks and erstwhile residents of Spain.

*

ALTHOUGH CHINA'S ECONOMIC, POLITICAL, and military situation remains grave, recent dispatches give some ground for hope that a turn for the better may soon be evident. In his speech before the People's Political Council Chiang Kai-shek reported that bumper crops had restored economic stability. True, no progress has been reported in the protracted negotiations at Chungking between the central government and Communist representatives. Nor is there any indication that the physical blockade that has been maintained against the Communists in the Northwest for the past four years has in any way been lifted. But the arrival of an American military mission at Yenan close on the heels of the first group of Anglo-American newspapermen to visit the Communist area suggests a weakening in the political blockade. Similarly, the removal of General Sheng Shih-tai as governor of Sinkiang may be regarded as an effort to improve Chinese-Soviet relations. On top of this, Sun Fo, president of the Legislative Yuan and son of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, has delivered another courageous speech, declaring that "Chinese politics cannot be divorced from the main current of international thinking, which is toward democracy and liberalism." Although Sun Fo's speeches are not permitted to be circulated in China, it is said that news of them quickly gets around and that they have had a profound effect on public opinion. If the United States and Great Britain had a clear-cut policy for supporting the rising democratic elements within China, it is quite possible that Chiang Kai-shek might find the courage to oust the fascist, pro-Japanese clique that is responsible for the recent totalitarian trend in Chungking.

Business and Taxes

OF THE various post-war tax plans suggested by business men or business groups, the recommendations of the research committee of the Committee for Economic Development are most deserving of close study. The C. E. D. is exclusively a business group, and naturally it advocates a program which it believes will be helpful to business. But, unlike most recent tax proposals put out by business men's organizations, its announced primary objective is not the promotion of "free enterprise" or more profits but maximum employment. The plan recognizes the threat to the nation as a whole in large-scale unemployment and the necessity for maintaining a high level of buying power among the masses if business is to prosper. The program is also noteworthy because it is based on a scholarly and objective survey of the whole federal tax problem by Professor Harold Groves of the University of Wisconsin and differs only slightly from his recommendations.

The sincerity and intelligence of the C. E. D. plan are shown, for example, in its forthright rejection of sales taxes on the ground that they impose a "clear inequity" upon "all low-income taxpayers, for they would have to pay a disproportionate share of their income in taxes." For similar reasons the C. E. D. would repeal all federal excise taxes except those on liquor, tobacco, and perhaps gasoline, and would eliminate the victory tax, which now falls predominantly on those with low incomes. These changes—which were also recommended recently in the Ruml and Sonne plan issued by the National Planning Association—would not only remove the chief regressive aspects of our present federal tax system (apart from the social-security taxes) but would provide a cushion against post-war depression by assuring a higher level of buying power for that part of the population whose buying habits are most sensitive to unemployment and cyclic changes.

While affording this relief to low-income groups, the C. E. D. plan treads on more questionable ground in proposing the elimination of all corporate taxes except a single flat tax corresponding to the basic normal tax on individual incomes, and in urging that the money received by individuals in dividends be exempt from the normal tax. This is a modification of the familiar business plea that corporations be freed from the income tax so as to encourage private investment in new enterprises. Messrs. Ruml and Sonne urged the complete abolition of federal income taxes on corporations, and the so-called "Twin Cities Plan," prepared by industrialists and financiers from Minneapolis and St. Paul, advocated a two-thirds reduction in the corporate load. The claim that the corporation tax hinders production by discouraging risky investments will not bear too close examination. It must be remembered that the tax falls only on profits. Men may hesitate to start new business enterprises because of fear of loss, but they will hardly abandon an enterprise that shows promise of profits because half, or less, of the profits will be absorbed in taxation. The real objection to the corporate income tax is that it is a flat levy which cannot be adjusted in accordance with the stockholder's capacity to pay. Thus the millionaire stockholder pays no more, proportionately, on the taxed portion of the corporation's earnings than the worker with one or two shares obtained through a company pay-deduction scheme. Despite this limitation, the corporation tax is not one which should be lightly cast aside. From the point of view of the Treasury it has two great advantages: (1) it costs little to collect; and (2) it cannot easily be dodged. These advantages are probably important enough to warrant retention of the corporation tax as an integral part of our tax structure.

Reduction of the tax on corporations and elimination of the normal tax on dividends would be unwise for still another reason. Studies of the causes of the world depression beginning in 1929 by Keynes and other leading economists have indicated that oversaving by American business corporations was one of the principal causes of the crisis. This tendency was encouraged by the fact that wealthy stockholders frequently preferred to leave their earnings undistributed in the corporation treasury rather than pay a high surtax on dividends. The C. E. D. plan would tend to accentuate the pressure to withhold dividends, because earnings would be larger, thus threatening to force the individual stockholder's tax into still higher brackets. A high corporation tax, on the other hand, forces a large part of the nation's business earnings back into circulation and thereby aids directly in supporting employment and business activity.

The C. E. D. has performed a useful service in emphasizing tax revision as a prerequisite to successful planning for full employment. Its plan is in many respects far more satisfactory than our present system of taxation, which rests so heavily on the low-income groups. But like all business plans, it assumes that the primary function of our fiscal system, apart from raising needed revenues, is the encouragement of private enterprise. That is a natural assumption for a business group, but, as experience in the 1920's should have shown us, it is an extremely dangerous assumption upon which to base governmental policy.

How to Keep the Peace

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

WHILE the world is still in the process of being destroyed, a new world is being built. At Quebec, at Dumbarton Oaks, in London, the representatives of the great powers are busy piecing together the Europe that lies just the other side of liberation—close now, threateningly close when you think how little has been decided and what great gaps of disagreement remain. A new world is being built and from this angle the view one gets of it is disappointing. Of course one can't tell how the finished structure will look, but its beginnings are awkward, top-heavy.

Perhaps the best hope rests in the fact that Britain and Russia and the United States are working on the job together, struggling toward arrangements which will be satisfactory at least to them. And that is a fact not to be despised, since nothing at all can be accomplished if this primary union of purpose is not achieved.

Perhaps the worst danger lies in the fact that the smaller nations are not in on the plans at all, even though they are the constituent parts of the new Europe that is being built. The three major powers—plus China—are doing the planning, with results that are exactly what you would expect. They will make the terms on which the war will end; they will set up the structure on which the peace will rest; and they will have the sole right and duty to put down threats to that peace made by any other states, large or small. The only powers that may commit aggressions are themselves.

This is discouraging. The one prospect of peace offered by Louis Fischer, in his able discussion of the Dumbarton Oaks conference elsewhere in this issue, lies in a world-wide effort to revise the new power system during the next decade or so, while the world is still recovering from this war and hasn't seriously begun getting ready for the next. Mr. Fischer has no faith at all that the big nations, each dominating its own sphere of interest, are going to maintain peace in the longer future, and history certainly supports his skepticism. But an even more discouraging aspect of the emerging plans is that, bad as they are, they are not bad enough to suit a considerable number of United States Senators. Whether they will be still worse—more lacking in teeth, more tender of national sovereignty—by the time they are completed and acceptable to two-thirds of the Senate, no one can say. But it almost seems a waste of time to worry over the manifold faults of the plans now under discussion, when you know that it will take all the mighty powers of persuasion wielded by the President and Secretary Hull to get the Senate to accept any agreement which obliges the United States to act upon the decision of an international council—even when our representative on the council has a veto. One's inclination is to say: Better let bad enough alone; if we oppose these plans or try to improve them, we won't get anything. For liberals have at least learned one lesson since 1919: The alternative to an unsatisfactory international order is not generally a satisfactory international order; it is uncontrolled power politics, international anarchy, and everything thrown into the lap of the nation with the fiercest appetite and the most brutal arrogance.

No doubt the big-power system will, after exhaustion is past, keep the peace only as long as the big powers want it kept. Its virtue is that it is a system. A corrupt police force is better than no police force. A reactionary government is better than no government. Citizens can force a clean-up or throw out an administration. It is important that people accept the fact that international government and policing of the peace are both essential. Once that is accomplished, once a sense of responsibility and participation is established, the chance of making something decent out of the new league of nations will be better. Popular support of the plans being drawn by the big powers must rest on the modest belief that something is better than nothing.

But my own hopes for the future are not really bound up in plans, good or bad. Like most people, I have little faith in organizations as such. The one thing I feel sure of is that no organization will be any more effective than its chief members want it to be. Even if the new structure were to be replanned according to my private specifications, I should expect little of it until I saw a new set of men in power and a new set of policies in effect. For it is leaders and policies that will determine the world of day after tomorrow.

I could talk about Britain or Russia. I'd rather talk about America. No statesman in the United Nations wants a peaceful world more than Franklin D. Roosevelt does. I am sure of that. He hates war and he wants to have a hand in building a lasting peace. Certainly he is more likely to make an honest try at it than Dewey, in spite of the Republican candidate's recent support of international cooperation. Dewey's record is too ambiguous, his position too shifting, his advisers too questionable, his backing too heavily charged with isolationist elements. The President is committed by act as well as word to American participation in keeping the peace. But when he makes Robert Murphy chief adviser—with the rank of ambassador—to General Eisenhower on policy toward Germany and when he puts Samuel Reber in charge of relations with France, then I know that his Administration has not shaken off the illusions that controlled its policy during the years of pre-war appeasement and have dominated its political strategy ever since.

The illusion that peace is secured by propping up reactionary governments threatens the success of a new world order far more than any form that order may take. As long as the United States connives with Britain to crush the democratic forces in Greece so that Greece can be used as a British appendage; as long as the revolutionary elements in Italy are disarmed and repressed so that British and American business interests can be reassured; as long as Franco continues to win American support while he conducts Hitler's affairs in Latin America; as long as the problems of European settlement are discussed by American agents in the sound-proof confines of the Vatican—as long as all this goes on it doesn't really make much difference what happens at Dumbarton Oaks or in London or Quebec.

The United States would do more for peace by calling off its Rebers and Murphys and backing the democrats of liberated Europe than by fabricating the best league of nations ever dreamed of. And a decent league would follow. I hope American liberals will believe this. Let us accept whatever world organization the various conferences manage to agree upon, let us accept it and try if possible to improve it. But let us also realize that it is the cart, not the horse. The horse is a democratic foreign policy, a policy designed to oust forever the gang of fascists and their hangers-on who ran Europe before 1939, who are responsible for the slaughter and horror that have followed, and who are well represented still in the governments and groups with which we do business. The cart will move along better if the horse is hitched up in front of it.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

LAST week I reported on the new phrase that Radio Tokyo has found to excuse the absence of the Japanese fleet from the Pacific—"basic sea area," which means the seas along the eastern coast of Asia, inside the great chain of islands which includes Japan and the Philippines. I pointed out that the Allies now have a tremendous superiority at sea and good springboards (Saipan, Guam, Tinian) for further advances, but warned that the Japanese air force was being husbanded for further action and that the bulk of the Japanese army still stands behind the reluctant Japanese navy. Japan's strategy of defeat and Allied opportunities for hastening that defeat require further treatment—which I propose to present as a modest reminder that, despite imminent victory in Europe, half the global war is still to be won.

I said that the inaction of the Japanese fleet in Japanese home waters on the Pacific side is inexcusable—in Western eyes. In Japanese eyes it is not only excusable but desirable, as Alexander Kiralfy demonstrates in his discussion of Japanese Naval Strategy, one of the most remarkable chapters in that excellent book "Makers of Modern Strategy" (Princeton University Press). As early as the sixth century B. C., Kiralfy says, "the Japanese became impressed with the concept of a vessel as a means of transport rather than of fighting." Japanese naval theory is based on the transport fleet and the protective squadron, the latter supposed not to destroy the enemy's ships but rather to guard the troopships as they carry men to establish a beachhead—a term which appears in Japanese history as early as 1597. Strategically, therefore, the aim was "to inflict only that amount of damage which could be counted upon to keep an enemy away from 'troopship' waters." The ideal was never the Nelsonian one of annihilating the enemy fleet, but to derange its plans, in the most economical fashion—"The Japanese fleet was a dynamic barrier rather than a javelin."

Hence the eagerness to avoid fleet action ever since Midway, where the increasing American naval strength was demonstrated. "Calculated risk," dear to Anglo-American seamen, has no place in the Japanese admiral's textbook. Rather the fleet is to be kept in check until the enemy threatens "troopship waters"—which are obviously those encompassed in the "basic sea area"—and vital land operations—which are obviously those in the "defensive triangle" of the home islands, China, and Manchuria.

This is the area where Japan lives, a fortress triangle of land-based military positions. The new Premier, Koiso, is a general, a land-power man, and long an advocate of the theory that Japan's real future lies in this triangle. If anyone is capable of leading continued resistance on the mainland after an invasion of the home islands, he is the man. That is a possibility not altogether to be dismissed: Manchuria's war industries have been intensively developed; it is the base of the Kwangtung Army, which contains the most and the best Japanese divisions; and the drive to split China in two and clean up the coastal area is making fairly good progress.

The Emperor and the Premier have told the rubber-stamp Diet that Japan faces a grave crisis, in which "the life or death of the Yamato race is at stake." The new total mobilization, labor service, and "expansion and perfection of our fighting power" are being put into effect vigorously to meet this crisis; and the present Cabinet is a strong coalition, involving the industrialists with the militarists in such a way as to produce the greatest possible unity of will and effort of production at home. It is difficult to estimate what effect future reverses will have on the home front; already there are certain signs of unrest in the Cabinet shift and the juggling of prefectural authorities, who play the chief role in police work and similar local concerns. Quite probably further Allied successes will bring further Cabinet changes; but this total mobilization is serious, and it would be unwise to count on crippling breaks in home-front morale. Japan is losing its war, but it is only just where Germany was after Stalingrad and Alamein, and still a long way from defeat.

"A long way" does not necessarily mean, however, even the two years which Germany has lasted since Alamein. Allied power in the Pacific is increasing relatively faster than it did in Europe. The disappearance of Japanese air power in outlying regions indicates a build-up of strength for an all-out battle on a new line—presumably the Philippines, to begin with. At the same time, as Secretary Forrestal has now made public, the Japanese have improved the quality of their aircraft; so that "a long and hard" fight lies ahead. The tremendous reorganization of the enemy's aircraft industry includes experiments on engines of 2,500 horse-power, multi-gunned cannon and machine-gun turrets, self-sealing fuel tanks, and improved armor. But it seems doubtful that these improved models can be brought into full production in time to achieve decisive results. Moreover, the already precarious shipping situation between the Indies and Japan has been worsened by close-in air and submarine attack; this has resulted in a worsening in the air situation, for planes are being diverted to convoy shipping. All in all, Japan faces the race for time that Germany has already lost: it must consolidate the "basic sea area" and the "defensive triangle" before the end of the European war releases unprecedented masses of ships, planes, guns, and tanks against the shrinking empire.

Finally, there is the human element, expressed to me in a recent letter from a United States naval lieutenant: "The reason we beat the Japanese out here is not because we have more or better ships or planes or guns; it's because we have more courage, daring, and imagination. Also, we're a lot crazier than the Japanese, and most of us are anxious to get home."

The Big-Power Peace

BY LOUIS FISCHER

FOR eight or ten or twelve years after the end of this war there will be no major war because no country will have the physical and moral strength to launch another world conflict. This is a safe assumption; it is a basic consideration in any discussion of the peace. By the time Germany and Japan are defeated, they will have been seriously weakened by the destruction of their industries, communications, and man-power. In fact, that is why they will be defeated. Later, Allied occupation and control as well as punitive measures will further reduce if they do not completely destroy Germany's and Japan's ability to make war.

To prevent German and Japanese aggression in the future is the first task of the peace settlement. Because of the undermining of German and Japanese might and the overwhelming power of the victorious nations, it is certain also to be the easiest task. Far more complicated, and of course no less important, is the business of removing the fundamental causes of war and organizing the world for prolonged peace and prosperity. The Dumbarton Oaks conference and various United Nations commissions have been nibbling at this great problem.

Dumbarton Oaks has served the extremely valuable purpose of revealing the basic ideas of the participating governments on future peace arrangements. In view of this clarification the complaints about the secrecy enveloping the conference are not only obviously partisan but stupid. The little reporter may regret his inability to attend sessions where diplomats haggle, bargain, and weigh the words of a document. But to the observer of the political scene the Dumbarton Oaks meeting has been a godsend; now, at last, we know what we previously suspected.

One fact that emerges from Dumbarton Oaks is more significant than anything that has emerged from any other conference or official statement about the peace settlement: in the New York Times of August 23 James B. Reston wired from Washington that he had "obtained from an unimpeachable source the following digest of the three plans" which the American, British, and Soviet governments submitted to the Dumbarton Oaks meeting. Reston's dispatch actually quoted from the texts of the official plans. "The American plan," Reston wrote," stipulates that in order to use force to prevent aggression, the four permanent members (the United States, Russia, China, and Great Britain) must vote for it unanimously." Further, "Like the British and American plans, the Russian vests the power to prevent and repel aggression in a World Council dominated by the great powers, each with a veto power." Mr. Reston repeated these statements in subsequent dispatches, and they have been confirmed by others. For instance, Senator Connally, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, declared on September 5 on the floor of the Senate that "under the American plan the United States delegate to the proposed League Council would always be able to veto any proposal to use force against an aggressor."

What does this mean? It means, unmistakably, that the new world organization could not stop the aggression of its own leading big members. For if the United States, say, committed an act of aggression it would veto measures against itself; and similarly, Great Britain, or Russia, or China—or France if admitted later as a great power—could prevent the use of force against itself if it attacked another country.

Only the Chinese plan suggests that "a party to a dispute, whether or not a permanent member of the council, shall have no right to vote in any decision relating to the dispute" (New York Times, August 31). But this deviation was put down to Chinese ignorance of Western civilization.

In other words, the new world organization would probably be in a position to prevent aggression by the defeated Axis powers—unless one great power vetoed measures even against such aggression—but could in no event interfere with American, British, Russian, or Chinese aggression. Walter Lippmann, who has made himself the spokesman of every reactionary proposal for the future peace settlement, openly urges such a limitation. In his Herald Tribune column of June 3 last he said, "In the charter of the new league open to all peace-loving states we need not and should not incorporate any commitment to use military force. We should base the new league not on the principle of enforcing world peace but on the principle of continual consultation." And what about Germany and Japan? The pledge to use force against them should be embodied in separate "treaties, by which, for the period of their probation, we settle with Germany in Europe and with Japan in Asia."

The post-war plans of the big three show clearly that the peace settlement on which the governments are laboring is designed not as a system to end aggression and war for all time, and not as a structure to solve world problems, but rather as a scheme for dealing with the vanquished. This is necessary, but it is woefully inadequate.

In granting the big four—actually only the big three, since China's admission to the exalted company is nothing more than a polite gesture—freedom to engage in aggression, these plans merely recognize existing conditions. Suppose the United States attacked Mexico or Peru or Argentina. Russia and England would not have the military means of coping with such a situation. Suppose Russia violated the territory of Rumania or Poland or Czechoslovakia. How soon and how effectively could England or America intervene? Who could stop Britain from seizing Abyssinia or Tunis?

After the elimination of Germany, Japan, Italy, and France as effective great powers, Russia, America, and the British Empire, with their enormous industrial and man-power resources, will each automatically become the arbiter of a large area beyond their frontiers. The new world organization hatched at Dumbarton Oaks and elsewhere will legalize the supremacy of each big power in its sphere. The American plan, according to Mr. Reston, "proposes that whenever possible the forces of each country shall be used in its natural region. Thus if a Balkan state committed an act of aggression or appeared to be ready to do so and the World Council decided to take action against it to prevent or repel that aggression, the security league council under the American plan would 'direct,' say, Russia, to use the stipulated quota of its army and air force against the potential aggressor. Similarly, always provided the United States representative on the council had not exercised his veto power, the council could, if aggression took place, say, in Cuba, or somewhere in the Pacific, direct the United States to apply a certain amount of its army or air force against that aggressor." Here Mr. Reston once more emphasized that the official source of his information had "seen and studied" the American and other plans.

Interestingly enough, the idea of the regional use of the armed forces of the big three is likewise found in an article in the Leningrad Star of recent date. This article, some seven thousand words long and signed by M. Malinin, was wired to the State Department in Washington, which multigraphed and distributed it in this country. It is a close forecast and justification of the Russian plan that was laid before the Dumbarton Oaks meeting.

"The responsibility for guarding the peace," writes Malinin, "must not be divided among sixty or more states, must not be intrusted to an impersonal organization, but must rest upon those few big states which have the real force necessary for this purpose. . . . We would consider it very important that the great powers take upon themselves appropriate obligations regarding active participation in the struggle with aggression not merely on the basis of such declarative pacts but also on the basis of treaties concluded with one another. [Page Walter Lippmann.—L. F.] In these treaties there must be defined as precisely as possible the role of each power in extinguishing this or that center of aggression. This role, of course, will not be the same for each power, and will depend on a number of political, geographic, and strategic conditions." This is a definite plea for the demarcation of three spheres, in each of which the military strength of one of the three big powers will be paramount and the political influence of that power, therefore, decisive.

What we are coming to is peace through dictatorship. According to the present streamlined "design," Russia will be the dictator in one large region of the earth, Britain the mistress of another, and America the colossus astride a third. (Simultaneously, of course, lip service will be paid to internationalism, and there will even be an international organization with a world court and an assembly of sixty or seventy big and small nations.) Great powers which wish to intervene in the domestic affairs of small nations in their respective spheres will at first meet little opposition. Already the tendency is toward big-power intervention to shape the policies and the personnel of the governments of lesser states. The independence of small nations after this war will depend on the benevolence of the big nations. Some countries will be independent in name and colonies in fact.

This was not always true. A greater number of nations used to be strong enough to resist outside interference in their internal affairs, and, besides, they could hope for aid from friends and neighbors. But with the de facto recognition of spheres of influence, which in turn translates into political terms the three-power cartel of war-making power, small aggrieved nations will have no means of redress. The monopolistic concentration of strength achieves the same results in the political as in the business field—it crushes the little fellow.

This is why I do not believe that any mechanism or international organization that will now be set up can advance the cause of maintaining peace. It may gather labor statistics and worry about opium traffic and codify laws, but it cannot lay the foundation of lasting peace. So let the big three make their treaties to sit on Germany and Japan, and, for the rest, nothing will be lost if the world peace society or league now contemplated is never born. It would merely be dust in the eyes of the common people of the world. Good folks everywhere would put their trust in it and think, wrongly, that humanity was making progress toward the organization of peace and economic well-being.

Some will argue that we should take what little there is in the new league and try to add to it. I see it differently: even if there is no league, maybe even if there were no treaties to keep down the Axis enemy states, there would be no war for ten years after the end of this one. This interval of peace through exhaustion will be the most decisive in world history; in this period the peace will be won or lost. During this period true democrats and internationalists in all countries must carry on a tremendous fight to create the kind of changed world in which alone there can be peace. It will be a great crusade, a crusade to save the peace. We are entering upon a bleak phase of history, but it will be brightened by rumblings of popular dissatisfaction and then open protests against the peace through dictatorship that is now crystallizing. Asia and Europe surely, and perhaps Latin America and Africa too, will not long remain passive under the new world regime. The function of free men everywhere will be to guide, organize, and otherwise aid the inevitable world revulsion against the lost peace. A peace though lost can still be won.

The beginning of this struggle must be an unwavering realization that the statesmen of the great victors have again, as in 1919, muffed the opportunity. The League of Nations, the Locarno treaties, the Kellogg Pact, and similar instruments created the illusion of successful steps toward the bolstering of peace. Let us, at least, have no illusions this time.

The new league will probably be established, and the United States will probably join it. But it will simply be camouflage for a spheres-of-influence peace. The real battle for the peace begins when the diplomats finish.

In the Wind

EVERYTHING, IT SEEMS, is a New Deal plot—even the Russo-Polish boundary dispute. Now that the Poles are beginning to make concessions, Barron's recalls that it "reported weeks ago that before election Joe [Stalin] might do something in a big way to help elect his friend Franklin. Already there seems real hope of a Polish settlement which may assuage the anger of the normally Democratic 'Polish vote' in several key states." That—wobbly syntax and all—is the sort of stuff our responsible business leaders read.

THE UNITED STATES OFFICE OF EDUCATION reports that high-school enrolments have dropped more than 300,000 every school year since the beginning of the war, and the rate of decline is becoming greater.

IN A STUDY OF ST. LOUIS, Missouri, as a possible place to locate post-war industries, the Wall Street Journal says this: "Factory labor is employed in the majority of cases on an open-shop basis. . . . Wage scales are not quite as high as in most industrial centers because of the normal plentiful supply of workers."

THE LONDON New Statesman and Nation reports that Lieutenant Colonel G. R. Gayre is being seriously considered for the post of chief education officer in the British Civil Administration of occupied Germany. In his recent book, "Teuton and Slav on the Polish Frontier," Colonel Gayre speaks highly of "German racial science" and discusses post-war problems entirely in terms of race.

NOW THAT WESTBROOK PEGLER'S column has been dropped by Scripps-Howard and picked up by Hearst, the San Francisco branch of the National Maritime Union has voted to secure a berth in the merchant marine for any Hearst editor who resigns in protest.

THIS LETTER from a soldier appeared not in a radical magazine but in Time: "Hollywood has manufactured a series of war pictures that makes soldiers overseas practically retch, and causes even entertainment-hungry troops to file out of movies before a picture ends."

FESTUNG EUROPA: Two interesting items from Belgium have come in this week, but we must pass them up, since it is quite likely that Belgium will have ceased to be a part of Festung Europa by the time this issue reaches its readers. We look forward to the day when this weekly paragraph will have to be dropped entirely. . . . In Oslo, a city of 250,000 people, there are now only four filling stations, and they are reserved for the Nazis and for "privileged persons." . . . The Norwegian underground has discovered what the Nazis' next secret weapon will be: "A large white flag on a long stick."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. A prize of $5 will be awarded each month for the best item.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Free Spain Fights On

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

I

IT IS not rhetorical license to speak of the Spanish Republic in Exile. Considering itself only temporarily defeated, the Republic went into exile at the end of the Spanish War. It went en masse, and that fact alone would distinguish the Spanish from any other political emigration.

When, in February, 1939, Germany and Italy, enjoying the advantages which the betrayal of Munich had given them, poured war material and men into Spain in sufficient quantities to smash the Catalonian front, everyone on the Loyalist side who could reach the border left Spain for France. This exodus was not like others, which have included only persons who were politically responsible or directly exposed to the danger of reprisal. This was a people's expression of its hate for fascism, a supreme gesture of repudiation. People left Spain who had not participated directly in the fight, who had not intervened in politics. But they all had a clearer idea of what was happening in Europe than many statesmen, experts in foreign affairs, or distinguished writers and commentators, who began to know the truth only a year or two later. Mingling with the retreating armies, complicating the job of the military commanders, hundreds of thousands of people poured into France—there to be interned by a reactionary French government.

And not in numbers alone has the Spanish emigration differed from others. Together with that great mass of people, every organized element of Republican political life—parties and workers' organizations—evacuated the country. Of course, a formidable number of Republicans remained, men and women whose spirit has never once broken during five years of terror and oppression, whose daily behavior since March, 1939, is the surest proof of the unreality, the ephemeral nature, of Franco's victory. Here is a people eminently Republican, democratic, pro-Allied.

Every concentration camp in France became, in its way, a continuation of the battle in Spain. Nine out of ten French officers in charge of those camps were enemies of "Red Spain"; they could never understand how the "wretched Spaniards," emaciated by hunger, wrapped in rags, with the mark of three years of terrible strain upon their bodies and faces, could continue to be so firm and so proud—and so determined not to allow the hostility of the French fascists to wear them down. The situation in the French camps became a great international scandal, but it did not succeed in defeating the Spanish exiles. In Paris, after the outbreak of the war, during the autumn of 1939 and the winter of 1940, when the examination of foreigners became very severe, the Minister of the Interior, Albert Sarraut, rather sympathetic to the Spanish Republicans, amused himself by telling the following story: "The police come into a Parisian cafe. At most of the tables the people at once become silent and frightened. They are refugees of various nationalities. The police approach them, and ask for their papers. Their papers are in perfect order. At a table in one corner there is a crowd of young men, shouting, discussing, eating, paying not the slightest attention to the police. The police come to their table, ask for their papers. Not one has papers that are in order. It is hardly necessary to say that these are Spaniards."

Every Spanish exile, in or out of a concentration camp, felt that he had fulfilled his duty to the cause of freedom, and he could not understand why a nation fighting the same enemy he had fought for three years should regard him as a suspicious character. This bewilderment increased as the battle went on. The greatest ambition of the Spanish refugee in France was to join in the fight against fascism. The fact that they had been treated in the most unconscionable way in the country of the Rights of Man did not lessen their desire. But the French administration took a different view. When a Spanish Republican—aviator, technician, or simple soldier—went to a French draft bureau to offer his services, he was lucky if he was merely thrown out into the street; in general, he risked capture and shipment to a concentration camp.

And that was the case not only in France. Without concentration camps, with better manners, the other democratic countries treated the Spanish exiles as a dangerous and unwelcome lot. Even today, in September, 1944, on the eve of victory in Europe, every Spanish Republican in England or America finds tremendous obstacles impeding his movements and the performance of his duty toward his country. During the course of years the need for personnel with a knowledge of Spanish has become increasingly pressing, and a certain number of Spanish Republicans have gone into the war agencies of the United Nations. Throwing aside any feeling of resentment, they soon gave evidence of their enthusiasm and their loyalty to the Allied cause.

Not only when they were given an opportunity to prove their sentiments, but even when every means was denied them, the Spanish Republicans continued to serve the Allies. It did not seriously worry Martínez, one of my assistants in the General Commissariat of War, when Allied officials were too slow in providing him with the papers he required to move from one country to another. He found the way out of all bureaucratic difficulties by compressing his personal effects into the compass of a water-proof belt of his own creation. Then he had only to wait for a dark night to swim across the broad river which separated one country from another. "And yet," he swore in Spanish, "the bastards will get me one day and shoot me as a spy." He was referring to the Allies. The possibility of being shot by the Fascists was too commonplace to be worth mention.

In Latin America every Spanish refugee has become an Allied propagandist fighting unceasingly against the Falange, as any truly democratic representative of the United States, like Claude G. Bowers, the ambassador in Chile, can testify.

That the Spanish Republicans were looked upon as "reds," Communists, undesirables, by many of the Allied authorities when they dared ask a consulate for a pass which would allow them to attend a meeting of Spanish Republicans in another country has neither dampened their feelings nor affected their dignity. They have not complained either in private or in public. I don't think that during these four years the New York Times has once found it necessary to decide whether or not to print a letter of complaint from a Spanish Republican. They have blinked at every kind of unfair , inaccurate, or tendencious report.

Even though they do not harbor any ill-feeling against the democracies which let the Spanish Republic down, it is easy to understand that the political émigrés have an especially warm regard for the Spanish-speaking American countries which have accepted them in great numbers. Particularly for Mexico. It is not only gratitude for material things. It is not only that in Mexico they have been able to live the life of dignified, free human beings once again. It is that in Mexico they have not heard a voice like Churchill's lauding the regime which was Hitler's ally until the imminent approach of his defeat. Nor an Archbishop Spellman, who found it possible to reconcile his Christian feelings with admiration for the dictator who has been a brutal Spanish disciple of Himmler. In Mexico, on the contrary, the highest dignitary of the state, President Avila Camacho, considered it his privilege to come before the greatest gathering of Spanish Republicans ever held in the Mexican capital and to say: "I have come here today to tell you that the Axis aggression began in Spain and that you are the only Spain that Mexico recognizes and loves."

II

From the beginning of the Spanish War it was perfectly clear to the Loyalists that they were battling for the survival of the democratic world. Therefore, after the war against the Axis in Spain became a world war, as it had to become if the Republic was defeated, Spanish refugees and anti-fascists inside Spain continued to be part of one fighting front.

All this is today not history but a matter of supreme political significance for the correct understanding of Spanish developments, present and future. The fact that the battle is still the same and that the people who have fought in exile and inside Spain were members of the same Republican army excludes any possibility of real conflict between Spanish Republicans in exile and the movement of resistance within the country. No exiled leader who is truly a leader of his people can believe that what anti-fascists inside Spain may do and think is of secondary importance. That would be patently ridiculous. On the other hand, no serious Republican fighter in Spain will pretend that he and his comrades are the only ones who can take leadership in the reconstruction, or that the exile parties and organizations of the Republic, to which they belong and from which they came, are merely refugee groups carrying no particular weight. It is the exact coincidence of the political structure and aims of the Spanish Republic in Exile and the internal movement of resistance that gives strength to the Republican cause.

If there have been political differences and disputes, they have been among the refugees themselves. The importance of these differences has been greatly exaggerated, to the distress of our friends and the joy of our enemies. But less has been heard or written about the considerable current of constructive thought and discussion which has occupied the Spanish emigration.

Out of that discussion has grown a clear image of the post-war Spain which the majority of the Spanish refugees envisage—a Spain which, by its national policy as well as by its position in international affairs, will justify the hopes which plain men everywhere placed in it during its epic struggle. Even among moderate Republican groups it would be difficult to find anyone who does not accept the inevitability of a new social structure in Spain. Most Spanish refugees believe that a radical and rapid transformation of the forms of land ownership is indispensable; they are against cartels; they are for labor; they are for collective control of basic services and resources. They believe, in one word, that politically, socially, and economically the republic of 1945 must be much more progressive than the republic of 1931.

In the domain of foreign affairs the majority of the Spanish refugees favor a world organization which will really secure a democratic peace. They are determined to speak for the rights of the peoples with the same frankness with which the Spanish Republic spoke at Geneva, when we incurred the displeasure of the great powers, whose policy of capitulation to the aggressors we considered fatal. The Spanish refugees would support any working system of world federation, but until such a project is realized, they see Spain, within the community of the United Nations, working closely with the other Latin countries—France, Italy, Portugal—and with the Ibero-American republics, which Republican Spain considers its natural allies. Here is a kind of Hispanic Americanism which is the exact antithesis to the pro-fascist Hispanidad of Franco and which flows naturally from the extraordinary feeling of kinship awakened by the Spanish War. Nowhere was the Loyalist cause more popular than among the peoples of Latin America. Nowhere is it more popular today; and the United Nations, particularly the United States, should keep that in mind, for the Spanish Republic will play an important role in the years to come in the democratic development of that part of the Western Hemisphere.

As far as Russia is concerned, the large majority of the refugees have resented bitterly the anti-Russian outbursts of a certain small minority. They are in full accord with Dr. Negrín's position that only one great state, with which Spain had not even normal diplomatic relations when the war started, knew how to honor its international engagements and to maintain intact the principle of collective security on which its foreign policy was based: the Soviet Union.

It is all very well, now that the war is nearly won, to claim that Republican refugees have exaggerated the danger to the Allies which was represented by the Franco regime. When the Axis version of the war is finally published, we shall learn whether or not, on at least two occasions, Madrid considered coming into the war on the side of Hitler. But in denouncing Franco's complicity with the Axis, first under the guise of "non-belligerency," then under the guise of neutrality, we have never given as much importance to the possibility that Spain might enter the war as to the greater services Franco was rendering Hitler in the field of sabotage, spying, deliveries of essential materials for German war industries, and especially by trying to win for the fascist idea the Spanish American republics. Even now, when the Allied armies are fighting on the German frontier, the Franco gang is still helping the Nazis. The Moscow radio was right in pointing out two weeks ago that Fascist Spain has welcomed as many fugitives from Vichy as possible and as many Germans as succeeded in slipping in before the Fighting French seized the frontier. No denial from the Franco embassy in Washington weighs a gram. As José Antonio de Aguirre, last president of the Basque government and Catholic leader, said in the New York Herald Tribune on September 6, nothing is more pitiable than to see the Franco embassy in Washington protesting a five-minutes-after-twelve love for the democracies.

III

I am not, in a spirit of childish patriotism, claiming special gifts of political intuition for the Spanish Republicans. But perhaps it will not be considered presumptuous if I point out that they have had considerable experience in the fight against reaction. Some of the older members of the Spanish emigration were active in the Spanish Socialist Party when it directed the general strike of 1917, a genuine revolutionary uprising. The Spanish Socialists were never bureaucrats; they were fighters from their earliest days. Later, they knew seven years of dictatorship under Primo de Rivera. In 1930 there was another unsuccessful revolutionary attempt to overthrow the monarchy. The following year we experienced the indescribable joy of establishing the republic. In 1934, only three years later, we were fighting fascism in the streets again, and in Asturias the Moorish troops, brought especially from Morocco, were hunting down the miners like wild beasts. But as Franco's prisoners in Madrid used to sing on the morning they were led to execution, "All our lives they have given us more beatings than a dirty rug, but the last beating will be by the people."

That is why appeasement has never flourished in the Spanish emigration, whether it was attempted by the right or the left. An inspiring proof of this was given last spring in connection with the dispute which arose between Dr. Negrín and the Spanish Communists, about which only very incomplete versions have been published in this country. In a few words, this is what happened. In response to Indalecio Prieto's creation in Mexico of the Junta de Liberación, distinctly anti-Communist and anti-Soviet in character, the Spanish Communists launched a great propaganda campaign for a Junta Suprema de Liberación Nacional in Madrid, to which they assigned the leadership and direction of the entire resistance movement. In London the Hogar Español, a Spanish refugee organization, planned a meeting in support of the Madrid Junta; in the invitation the name of Dr. Negrín was used in such a way as to create the impression that he was behind the new group. Dr. Negrín sent a very severe letter to the president of the Hogar Español, sharply criticizing the way the story of the Junta had been exploited. As a result, España Popular, the Spanish Communist weekly in Mexico, published an editorial which was considered by Negrín's followers, and even by refugees of other political groups, an outrageous attack on the head of the last Spanish Republican government. So much has been told in the American press. But more important than the recorded facts was the reaction of the Spanish refugees to the policy embodied in the "Pact of Alliance with the Catholics," signed by the new Junta in Madrid.

I arrived in Mexico in March when the controversy was at its peak. The opposition of the refugees to any alliance with the clerical elements in Spain was overwhelming. No one can pretend, in an attempt to dismiss the matter lightly, that criticism came only from political leaders who were afraid that a movement inside Spain might cost them future positions or influence. No. Most outspoken in opposition to the pact were workers with a long revolutionary tradition, men who had always favored unity of action with the Communists but who stood firmly against any political alliance with the church.

There was no dogmatic anti-religious feeling in this position. Thousands and thousands of excellent Catholics—to begin with, the entire Basque country—had fought together with other Spanish democrats against Axis aggression. What the Spanish refugees refused to do was to appease, to admit into the Republican ranks those Catholics who had been with Franco and had given their benediction to the terror which followed the war. This was not merely a national attitude. In the international field the Spanish Republicans are much alarmed to see the Vatican, with the encouragement of important elements in the Allied countries, becoming a leading factor in the political organization of Europe.

Unity, yes, but "no unity with fascists," as I said in my article in The Nation of June 3. Or, as Dr. Negrín pointed out in his letter to the president of the Hogar Español, "When I have spoken of unity for the reconquest of Spain, I have always and very clearly spoken about unity based upon the constitution and its institutions. . . . But unity without confusion and without collusion." And he urged that the ranks be held until the Republic should be restored and the people given an opportunity to choose the kind of government they want.

In spite of the opinion of some observers that the disunity among Republicans is too embittered and profound to be overcome, I am convinced that unity can be achieved. An important step in that direction may be taken not long after the publication of this article. Unity can only be built around Negrín. He is the man who holds the constitutional powers which were effective at the formal end of the war, and his government received a unanimous vote of confidence at the last meeting of the Cortes held on Spanish soil. We do not intend to make a fetish of constitutional legality. But the fact that there is at hand a person who embodies the continuity of the government, besides having other qualifications, provides the Spanish Republic in Exile with a solution of its immediate political problem. As long as the Prime Minister remains, the rest of the Cabinet can be changed to conform with the present balance of political forces.

Many things may happen in the weeks to come. I say again—the Spanish Republic in Exile is not a rhetorical conception. Very soon it may become an articulate, fully operating reality. When that moment comes, there will be no longer an excuse for the Allied chancelleries to try to prolong the existence of a fascist regime or for minority groups to improvise any last-minute substitute.

Civil Affairs Comme Il Faut

BY CAPTAIN COX AND LIEUTENANT BOX

Normandy, August, 5

OUR detachment left the organized chaos of the American Civil Affairs Center at double quick. We were the smallest type of Civil Affairs detachment—four officers, two British and two American, and six American enlisted men. Having been ground through the Sausage, an amazingly appropriate name for the marshaling area, we arrived at port to embark, our date for landing being D-14, the twentieth of June. We had not reckoned with the weather, however, which was extremely stormy, and after cruising about in the Channel for approximately a week, we finally landed on D-20. The approaches to the beach and the beach itself were strewn with the wreckage of ships of all types which had been pounded against each other and sunk. Even the big concrete breakwaters had been broken up. For all that, there were some hundreds of ships in sight, and a swarm of Ducks, LST's, and LSM's were tearing about all over the place. The Ducks were driven by colored soldiers who released at intervals loud hoots of joy. Aircraft were taking off and landing on the strips behind the beaches, their wheels blowing up clouds of dust.

Our first days ashore were spent in another Civil Affairs pool almost as well disorganized as the one we had left behind in England, with an equally irrelevant training schedule which we successfully ducked. Fortunately, in two days we were moving to corps headquarters, where we lived in a ditch and listened to the guns. The Germans were busy shelling the bridge which gave entry to the town from the north.

We, in our ditch, were waiting to go to a town assigned us some way to the south. But as this obviously would not be captured for about a fortnight, the SCAO at corps headquarters decided he would have us set up a refugee camp. Accordingly, we were instructed to take over a large farm which had a number of wooden huts in various stages of repair scattered about the grounds and had previously been used as a hospital by the Germans. The owner was the local mayor. We called upon him and took two glasses of Bordeaux apiece and half the house to live in. This rather surprised our Colonel, who didn't realize that we were going to be so comfortable while he still existed in his little foxhole. The Germans had left tables, chairs, and beds, all of the hospital variety, and we quickly made ourselves extraordinarily snug, with an office, a dining-room, a storeroom, three bedrooms, and no bath. Although the building is a really magnificent seventeenth-century farmhouse with a central staircase and high paneled rooms, the sanitation consists of an outside lavatory which would shock the hill-billies of West Virginia.

Our first refugees were an interesting group of ten Spanish Loyalists who had fled to France in 1939, been caught by the Germans in 1940, and set to work for the Todt organization. They had been in a camp run by the French in St. Sauveur, but as it appeared that they were not being properly cared for there, they were brought to our place. They were very willing to work for nothing more than food, shelter, and cigarettes, and soon had our offices and quarters, as well as their own barracks, in livable condition. Since they spoke no English and we spoke no Spanish, communication was at first difficult but was finally achieved through the medium of a bastard French containing elements of both the other languages. One of them had formerly been a captain in the International Brigade, and another described himself as third-best chess player in the world, having once been beaten by the man, whoever he was, who had been beaten by the champion, whoever he was. They are grand workers, and having elected their own boss, they are very well disciplined.

One day we went over to a big refugee camp north of Fontenay to see what conditions were like there. This camp has approximately a thousand refugees speaking thirteen languages, and the management is having a devil of a time. A number of Russian women who have married German soldiers don't know what they want except to get out of the camp and generally make trouble. There are also ten French prostitutes, registered or otherwise, who appear to be assisting the French community to return to normal under the familiar motto of "Business as usual." What with trying to feed its charges, prevent civil war, and stop people from leaving the camp at their will, the detachment at Fontenay has its hands full.

We had fond hopes of getting our place fitted out a bit better, and to that end organized daily scrounging expeditions. With the jeep and trailer we proceeded through darkest France from town to town and dump to dump, netting such valuables as several hundred square feet of tar paper, bundles of nails, stoves, beds (German), mattresses, food, mess equipment, blankets, towels, clothing, medical stores, and German notepaper, to say nothing of a case of cognac which we reserved for the staff and marked "Pour militaire seulement."

In two days we were ready for the first customers, and on the third day about 140 suddenly arrived in trucks, and all was pandemonium. Never in the course of human history have so many said so much in so little time. An interpreter being lacking, the arrivals were registered by such members of the detachment as felt they could muster enough French to inquire name, age, and occupation and understand the responses. The families seemed to breed in the very room; there was always one more child popping up from somewhere. Also, as each family prepared to leave the registration desk, it would be discovered that la grand'mère was still standing in the corner clutching her identity card, incapable of speech. By eleven o'clock, however, all were fed and put to bed.

The next day we received a stream of requests for passes to visit alleged relatives in all parts of the peninsula. Since we were expected to keep refugees off the roads in order to prevent their interfering with military traffic, we tried to sift the requests and only permitted visits to nearby villages.

After we had got the place thoroughly organized, the powers decided to send us four women French liaison officers to assist us. We were assured by the French liaison officers at headquarters that we should find them charming, at least half English, and altogether delightful companions. This, indeed, proved to be true; they were young, attractive, and intelligent. An excellent mess was organized, and as one of the girls was a superfine cook, we had a magnificent apple pie which brought tears to the eyes of all the Americans and started a furious argument as to who first thought of eating cheese with it, Yorkshire or America. We also had another most agreeable guest, Lieutenant Smith of the United States navy, a specialist in fine arts and monuments who was touring the peninsula checking up on the condition of all works of art mentioned in the special Civil Affairs list. Each day he consulted with official architects about what must be done to restore the relics of France's glorious past, and each morning before he set out he fried the bacon and eggs for our breakfast. If he was as good an art specialist as he was a cook, the cultural future of France is in safe hands.

The Spanish refugees were the backbone of our camp. We were shocked, however, to see with what hostility they were regarded by the Mayor and his wife and even by the French refugees. They were all classified as Communists, and as such were regarded with deep suspicion, despite the fact that they alone among all the people at our camp had been fighting the fascists since 1936. Our French liaison officers, those otherwise intelligent young women, also displayed prejudice against a Russian and a Polish refugee. The Russian, a soldier in the Red Army, had been captured by the Germans and forced to work for the Todt organization. The Pole, a civilian, had also been put to forced labor. Our gentle liaison officers were all for sending these two unfortunates to the Fontenay camp, where the conditions, we knew, were chaotic. It is to be feared that this attitude of the French, if it prevails throughout the country, is going to be a serious hindrance to the ultimate happiness of Europe.

Polls, Propaganda, Politics

The Polish American Vote

THE voting intentions of Polish Americans in the Presidential election are important not only for their influence on its outcome but also because this group is alleged to have a special interest in the Russian-Polish controversy. Voters of Polish birth or extraction number more than 100,000 in each of seven states—Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, Michigan, Ohio, Massachusetts, and Connecticut—whose electoral votes total 179. The Gallup poll, in its preliminary survey, has given 4 of those states, with 119 electoral votes, to Dewey and 3, with 60, to Roosevelt.

The Bureau of Applied Social Research conducted a survey of 522 Polish Americans (Catholics) in the New York area to learn how they plan to vote, how they voted in 1940, and what are their reasons for their intentions. The results show that President Roosevelt has held his strength, with almost no loss, among the Polish Americans who had made up their minds. Almost nine of every ten who had picked their candidate planned to vote for him (F. D. R., 88 per cent; T. D., 12 per cent). This represents no change from 1940, when 89 per cent voted for Roosevelt and 11 per cent for Willkie.

That there is some hesitation, however, is clear from the fact that one of every five respondents said that he was still undecided about his November choice. Indecision was more frequent in the group that had voted for Roosevelt in 1940 than in the group that had voted for Willkie: 24 per cent of formerly Democratic voters were undecided; 16 per cent of the Republicans.

Two factors probably account for this greater hesitancy of 1940 Democrats to make up their minds. One is that the Democrats are more likely to come from low-income groups; other studies have showed that low-income people make up their minds later in the campaign. The second factor relates to the current political attitude of Polish Americans. Although their vote is traditionally Democratic, they feel apprehensive at this time about Roosevelt's stand in the Russian-Polish controversy. This apprehension seems to be of a rather complex psychological nature.

When the 96 subjects who had voted Democratic in 1940 but who did not yet know for whom they would vote this fall were questioned by English-speaking interviewers, only a very few showed any concern with Polish affairs. When a Polish-speaking analyst, however, making a more detailed study, discussed current affairs with several dozen people, the Eastern European issue loomed larger. Poland's situation seems, then, to be a matter of concern to American Poles rather than a definite factor in their voting decision. This explains why the bureau found a hesitancy among some respondents to commit themselves to voting Democratic as in 1940, rather than a shift to the Republican Party.

In general, the Poles seem to follow the political mood of the community in which they live, with the superimposed tendency to vote Democratic. Thus in one of the sample areas which usually goes Republican, Long Island, indecision about a candidate was strongest. More than half the Polish Americans there have not yet made up their minds. In lower Manhattan, an old Tammany stronghold, and in New Jersey, where the Hague machine is influential, indecision is less marked and committed Roosevelt votes are more numerous.

From the more detailed case studies it appears that a kind of national sensitivity is developing among Poles in the Democratic machine, which is often controlled by Irish and other groups whose immigration preceded the Polish. The Poles apparently feel that they do not have enough influence or political jobs. Some turn therefore to the Republican organization in the hope that they will have more weight there. And when a politically active or prominent Polish American makes this shift, he is likely to carry others with him.

The Polish vote, then, in the New York metropolitan area is still overwhelmingly available to the Democratic Party, but areas of uncertainty are developing which are worth the attention of party managers.

BUREAU OF APPLIED SOCIAL RESEARCH
COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY, NEW YORK

25 Years Ago in "The Nation"

REASON, WISDOM, INTELLIGENCE, forces of the mind and heart, whom I have always devoutly invoked, come to me, aid me, sustain my feeble voice; carry it, if that may be, to all the peoples of the world, and diffuse it everywhere where there are men of good-will to hear the beneficent truth! A new order of things is born. The powers of evil die, poisoned by their crime. The greedy and the cruel, the devourers of peoples, are bursting with an indigestion of blood. However sorely stricken by the sins of their blind or corrupt masters, mutilated, decimated, the proletarians remain erect; they will unite to form one universal proletariat, and we shall see fulfilled the great Socialist prophecy: "The union of the workers will be the peace of the world." —ANATOLE FRANCE, September 6, 1919.

THIS WEEK, SO THE PAPERS SAY, General Pershing will march up Fifth Avenue at the head of the famous First Division. . . . Probably this will be the last of the great parades in New York. The chapter is closed. The world has been made safe for—democracy-in-moderation, as Ibsen would say. Except for a few thousand Americans left on the Rhine, a few other thousands in Siberia, and a few others engaged in manifestations within the territory of our southern neighbors, we are at peace with the world.—JAMES RORTY, September 13, 1919.

IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO DESCRIBE the blank pessimism which is all but universal in Germany today. People are hopeless, without faith in God, themselves, their rulers, the Allies, or the neutrals; in capitalism or Bolshevism; in democracy, revolution, or monarchy. And they are too tired and half-starved to care. The casual visitor to Berlin, Frankfurt, or other German cities today finds little change—the streets a bit dirtier, the policing laxer; but the theaters full, the cafes crowded, the main streets gay. Behind this façade is a despair such as only a people with the intense self-consciousness of the Germans can know.—LEWIS S. GANNETT, September 27, 1919.

POLITICAL WAR EDITED BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Garibaldi's Return

BY MARIO BELLINI

IN THE fateful period when the Italian underground closed ranks to prepare for the downfall of Mussolini, a slogan appeared chalked on the many statues of Garibaldi: "Return, Giuseppe!" Garibaldi has returned to the Italian people. A Garibaldi division exists today in Yugoslavia, fourteen Garibaldi brigades are active in northern and central Italy, and one is fighting in Poland.

Strange as it may seem, the Allies have consistently rebuffed this great popular force. In the liberated cities and villages notices have been posted requiring all persons carrying arms to surrender them under penalty of death. In Florence, where the Partisans suffered particularly heavy losses while fighting German snipers and Fascist traitors, the Allied authorities requested them to stop their activities. The official explanation is that the guerrilla forces are useful only behind the lines. But this leaves out the political reasons. The guerrilla forces are on the whole leftist, anti-monarchist. The Allies in Italy are on the whole rightist and monarchist. The Allied authorities are disbanding the Partisans, not out of military considerations, as they pretend, but because they fear the spread of radical political ideas.

Nothing would be easier for the Allies than to organize the Partisan forces in liberated Italy into regular units. But the King does not want an army of volunteers which refuses to swear allegiance, as the regular army has sworn, to "the King and his royal successors for the indivisible good of King and country." Nor do the Allies want such an army. Italy must not acquire too many rights through its contribution to the war effort; especially it must not acquire the right to become an ally, since the terms of the 1943 armistice must be enforced in full. In the hope of holding his crown, the King accepted those terms, one of which it is said, limits the Italian army to 14,000 men.

Logically, to justify their policy, the Allies minimize the contribution the Partisans are making to the war. Lacking information, the newspapers here give little space to their activities, and the American public is constantly kept in the dark about the facts. The Italians know all this and resent it bitterly. They believe, justly, that the Allies want to convey the impression that Italians are unable to administer their own affairs, that they were not born for self-government, and that therefore a strong monarchy is essential.

But if the Allies reject the Partisans once the battle is won, they gladly make use of their courage and organization behind the German lines. General Sir Harold Alexander's statement that the Italian Partisans are forcing the Germans to keep six divisions in the occupied zones is a most authentic tribute to the strength of the patriotic Italian movement. In a message to the Partisans, General Alexander said: "The day will come when the whole world will learn the story of the sacrifices and the heroism of the Italian Partisans. All Italy will be grateful to them."

To obtain the greatest possible cooperation from these guerrilla forces, General Alexander has subdivided occupied Italy into six zones of operation, each of which receives special instructions at opportune moments. The instructions to the patriots are issued by a mixed Allied-Italian command and are transmitted by radio and by leaflets dropped from airplanes. This command has already sent men with receiving and transmitting radio sets into the zones occupied by the patriots.

General Kesselring himself, in a broadcast to the Italian people, found it necessary to complain that General Alexander's instructions were being carried out by the Partisans. Kesselring warned the Italians that he would not hesitate to use the most violent methods to suppress the guerrillas. But in spite of everything the Germans can do the Partisan armies carry on their fight. The importance of the guerrillas' contribution to the Allied cause was documented in a recent bulletin from the Allied command which announced that patriots had captured the city of Teramo and had turned it over to the Allies intact. The principal task assigned to the patriots by the Allied command is, however, to facilitate the Allied advance by preventing Germans from blowing up bridges and by interrupting their communications.

In the north, the entire region of Lake Como is under the control of the guerrillas, and their numbers are being rapidly reinforced in the region around Lake Maggiore. The fourteen Garibaldi brigades, the best of the Italian guerrillas, are among the most active units in the north. They are organized into military cadres, under the strictest discipline, and are generally commanded by officers of the Italian army. The patriots practically control traffic on the railway lines. Various Fascists, recognized as spies or informers for the Germans, have been sentenced to death by the military courts of the brigades and shot.

Separate units of Partisans operate in the cities. By continuous attacks and by organizing strikes, these "city-operations squads" force the enemy to maintain huge garrisons, thus diverting large contingents of troops from expeditions against the guerrillas and from joining the harassed forces of Kesselring. The list of Fascist leaders who have been killed is impressive. It includes Giovanni Gentile, the philosopher of fascism; the Fascist bosses of Milan and Bologna; and hundreds of officials of the secret police. The city in which the patriots are most active is Milan, although in Genoa, Turin, and various cities of Venetia—Padua and Verona above all—they are also well organized and very effective.

The Garibaldi Division in Yugoslavia, fighting under Tito's orders, comprises 40,000 men. For military reasons the exploits of this division have not been divulged fully, but Marshal Tito has praised it as one of his best units. Immediately following the armistice of Septemper 8, 1943, several Italian divisions in the Balkans revolted against preponderant German forces and tried to attack them. Among these were the Venezia and Alpina Taurinense divisions. The Taurinense Division suffered many losses after attacking German positions in the Cattaro and Niksic zones, in Montenegro. The Alpine troops of this division then retreated toward the positions of the Venezia Division, which, in the meantime, had succeeded in making contact by radio with the Italian Supreme Command and in obtaining the first reinforcements by air. Immediately afterward, the two divisions joined the fight at the side of Marshal Tito's Partisan forces in Montenegro. On November 15 the Italians reorganized their forces along the lines of Marshal Tito's, and reduced the two divisions to one, which was called the Garibaldi Division.

In the west, the Italian Partisan forces occupy almost the entire mountainous zone that marks the Italian-French frontier. These troops are in contact with the French Forces of the Interior across the Alps. During a recent conference the forces of the two countries coordinated their activity in the entire border area.

The existence of a Garibaldi brigade fighting in Poland has been officially announced by the Polish government in London. Not many details of the activity of this brigade are known, but it is believed to be composed of anti-Fascists who had been deported by the Germans to labor camps in Poland and there succeeded in escaping and joining the Polish guerrillas.

The best proof of the strength of the Partisan movement in Italy is given by the continuous appeals and demands of the Fascist newspapers and authorities for a cessation of the "war between brothers." In their relations with the Partisans the Fascists have always alternated strong methods with those of persuasion. But both have completely failed.

In an attempt to end, once and for all, the patriots' activities, the Fascists set March 25 last as the time limit for the Partisans to surrender to the local authorities. They announced that after that date the extermination of the guerrillas would proceed inexorably. The ultimatum produced just the opposite result, because only the timid presented themselves, while the ranks of the patriots were swelled by new recruits. The Fascists kept their word and launched repeated offensives against the Partisans; but after several weeks they had to give up the undertaking, not only because their opponents knew how to retreat, saving the greater part of their forces, but also because not a few of the Fascist units went over to the side of the Partisans.

With the advance of the Allied forces toward the north, the role of the Partisans will become even more important. Properly equipped, they can control the Alpine passes, thus facilitating the Allied march over the Alps to Berlin. More, they can constitute the nucleus of a free, democratic Italy—if the Allies will recognize them not only as temporary military aids but as the true spokesmen of the political will of their people.

[Mr. Bellini's article gives the background for an analysis of the entire Italian political situation which Pietro Nenni, the Socialist leader, editor of the Roman Avanti, will contribute to this section next week.]

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IT WOULD be an error to think that the Germans, soldiers or civilians, still cherish any illusions about the outcome of the war. The shattering course of the campaign in France has demonstrated to all of them—except, perhaps, an infinitesimal percentage of fools and idiots—the Reich's hopeless inferiority in men and equipment. They know that the loss of France and the Balkans and the blocking of communications with Spain and Portugal must have a calamitous effect on the supply of food and raw materials. They know what is in store for them with Allied aviation operating from bases on the very border of the most important German provinces. Public opinion has no longer the slightest doubt that collapse is unavoidable. Foreigners who are still in Germany and able to observe conditions are agreed on this point. A Swedish consul who had just come home was quoted by the Stockholm Morgontidningen of August 25 as saying: "Deep pessimism grips the German public. Everybody, even the military and political leaders in Berlin, is convinced that the situation is hopeless. The Stimmung has sunk far below zero." On the same day the Arbeiterzeitung of Schaffhausen, Switzerland, reported: "By now not only the common people but even the active Nazis consider ultimate German defeat inevitable." Such testimony could be multiplied indefinitely.

The great riddle—and the great experience—of this war is that when a whole people is convinced of the utter hopelessness of its struggle, it can still carry on the struggle. "There is no doubt," declared the Stockholm Aftontidningen on August 24, "that the Germans would like to surrender if they could." But why can't they? The threat of the S. S. and the Gestapo is not an adequate explanation. It may explain the attitude of civilians facing in isolation the weapons of the party machine. One may grant, though not with complete conviction, that for civilians there is nothing to do but obey. One may even grant that for the high-ranking military, commanders of armies and corps and divisions, there is nothing to do but obey. Every single one of them today is certainly surrounded by "commissars" who hear every word he says and read every word he writes. But who can prevent the lower ranks, the common soldiers and lower officers, from surrendering if they really want to? Apparently it is not force but their own impulse which makes little groups of hungry stragglers, completely cut off from their fellows, fight on for days, always at the risk of their lives, in the attempt to get back to their own troops. Clearly we have here a phenomenon like that of a machine which continues to run after its fuel is used up. The fuel of the Nazi machine, faith in victory, is now used up. Nevertheless, for a while men will go on as before. In this last phase of the war Germans are most correctly described as machines which run on automatically, according to the principle of inertia.

This is true of high as well as low. The Propaganda Ministry still turns out its stuff, but let no one think that Dr. Goebbels supposes he is actually impressing any great number of persons. His newest argument is concentrated in the little words "not yet." We are not yet at the point where the retreat can be stopped. We are not yet in position definitely to destroy the enemy. But we must hold out just a little while longer; then our moment will come. Then we shall have completed the rasche Umrüstung (quick change in our armament) now in progress and shall appear with incomparably destructive new weapons. In addition, we shall have obtained millions of new soldiers through "remobilization," and this "enormous reserve" will give us superiority on the battlefield. As one of countless examples an article printed in the Westfälische Zeitung of Essen on August 20 may be cited:

> We know that for the time being the enemy is stronger than we are and that therefore we must reckon with further retreats, even though the enemy approaches painfully close to our borders. But we know that the last word has not been spoken and that one day we shall master the situation. The main thing is to preserve our liberty of operation. That is what is behind today's events in France. The times are serious, but they should make us anything but faint-hearted. The enemy is in a hurry. He wants to force a decision before our new weapons are released. Every means and measure must be used to hold the enemy until we can resume the offensive with our new weapons.

But the people understand perfectly that it is not a matter of "not yet being strong enough"; and the dervishes of the Propaganda Ministry know very well that the people understand. They no longer turn their hand-organs in the hope that somebody or other will listen but out of pure automatism—the machine still runs though the motor has no fuel.

Similarly, the measures for the defense of the "sacred soil of the Fatherland," though publicized with all the old advertising technique, cannot fail to strike all concerned as hardly more than empty gestures. On the eastern border of the Reich, in Silesia, Gauleiter Hanke in the second week of August called for voluntary workers on intrenchments. He gave the undertaking a romantic name derived from a new novel, "Vogt Barthold," which describes how eight hundred years ago the German settlers in Silesia were victorious over the Mongols. At numerous meetings he extolled his "gigantic Barthold enterprise" and told how the volunteer trench-diggers flocked to the work—"thousands of enthusiastic government officials and workers, university professors and miners, factory owners and their employees," rallying overnight to the defense of the border. He promised that as the result of these superhuman efforts the enemy standing at the gates of the Reich would be repulsed. But in a war in which the most elaborate "walls," built with the labor of years, have accomplished nothing, the improvised Silesian trenches will certainly not turn the tide: and everyone knows it—the Gauleiter who orders the trenches dug and the people whom he tries thereby to hearten.

The whole "remobilization" is a project of such a nature that both those who give the orders and those who carry them out must be convinced of its utter senselessness. Travel permits for vacations are no longer given; the length of a journey that can be taken without a special permit has been reduced from 100 to 30 kilometers; the sixty-hour week formerly decreed only for manual workers is now the minimum for clerks as well; clerks and even managers must now punch a time-clock; truck drivers must work at other jobs in the time between trips; private telephone calls are being prohibited in province after province; mail is delivered only once a day in large cities and only three times a week in small towns. "We have not yet the necessary abundance of men or materials; we must still be very economical with both," runs the official explanation. But everyone knows that a lake which is flowing away in streams cannot be filled with a few miserable drops of water.

The machine which everyone now sees can produce only ruin and more ruin will run on its own momentum for a while—after the faith that was its fuel is gone.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Karl Shapiro and the Great Ordeal

V-LETTER AND OTHER POEMS. By Karl Shapiro. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.

BY NOW most readers are probably tired of war literature and would like to get back to literature. Not only is much of the writing inferior; but we are kept from saying so by reason of the censorship inflicted on us by our war-time piety. Yet in the case of Karl Shapiro, whose new poems were written during the more than two years that he has been on active duty in the Southwest Pacific, it seems impossible not to invoke the war. By what drama of adjustment has he continued writing? The question would be irrelevant, I admit, if his adjustment had resulted in a book which was continuous in thought and quality with his earlier one, "Person, Place, and Thing." But although "V-Letter" is a remarkable performance, it is still in many ways weaker than the former book—anxious and uneven where the other one was strong and consistent.

The notable thing about "Person, Place, and Thing" was a firmness of mood and singleness of purpose. Its well-written satires on industrial society were not great poetry or even on their way to being that; they were in the best sense "minor." And Shapiro was able to be a successful minor poet in our time because, while renouncing the larger myth-making pretensions of modern poetry, he nevertheless maintained the modernist defiance of middle-class civilization. This ground of self-assurance is now giving way, it is clear, under pressure of the war and prolonged soldiering. His old conviction of identity is gone, and he is experimenting with new roles.

This is apparent in the introduction to "V-Letter," where he tries to define his relation to the great ordeal. It must be admitted that his ideas seem contradictory. On the one hand he seems anxious to diminish the war to a mere visitation of nature and thus to conjure away its terrors considered as a political or human portent. So he says that "war is an affection of the human spirit, without any particular reference to 'values,'" and that its effect on oneself is to reduce one "in size but not in meaning, like a V-letter." But this relatively complacent view is belied by what Shapiro says of the "suffering" and "private psychological tragedy" of soldiers and even more by the drastic moral effects which he ascribes to war. It "can teach us humility," he says; and by virtue of it "contemporary man should feel divested of the stock attitudes of the last generation, the stance of the political intellectual, the proletarian, the expert, the salesman, the world-traveler, the pundit-poet [and] like the youngster in the crowd make the marvelous discovery that our majesty is naked." Those "stock attitudes," or many of them, were of course at the root of his earlier poems; and in trying to cut them away he is, knowingly, risking the extinction of his old powers. And what, one wonders, is really wrong with those attitudes? They were by-products of the same civilization that produced the war; and if, as seems more and more likely, the war fails to solve the problems that begot it, then why are not the old postures still viable? Where, moreover, are the sources of this Blake-like freshness of vision, this mystical simplicity, of which Shapiro speaks and to which he aspires? Are they to be found in battle, in the pursuit of what he calls in a poem "the rat-toothed enemy"? To accept this war as a hard political necessity is one thing; to completely de-politicalize it in the interests of a confused and supine metaphysics is to leave it a mere meaningless horror. Shapiro may be right in fleeing the old attitudes; but surely he is in danger of demonstrating that a bad civilization can finally compel acceptance of itself, or at least suspension of judgment, by the simple device of becoming worse.

These arguments apply primarily to Shapiro's introduction and not to his poetry. "V-Letter" is so various and so full of excellent verse that it would resist any attempt to sacrifice it to a thesis even if I wanted so to sacrifice it. The poet's peculiar negative-positive adjustment to the war has had the advantage, apparently, of leaving him relatively free to observe, read, reflect, and labor at his poetry as before. He retains his old wry pleasure in the sights of a country—in this case Australia, not America—and his characteristic interest in religion and history. Whether he is writing poetry or merely versifying—if the distinction is clear—he is as eloquent, as fertile in apt imagery, as wedded to the concrete, as he ever was. And his verse still has its clear metrical line, even though it tends toward excessive regularity and occasionally romps off into conventional dactylics.

Yet only a few of the poems in "V-Letter" seem to me equal to the average of his earlier work. The best single production in the book is probably The Synagogue, one of a series of satiric-prophetic pieces on Judaism. The subject is the spiritual limitations and historical guilts of the Jewish religion as Shapiro conceives them; and although his point of view is Christian, his temper is that of a Jewish prophet censuring the Jews. To readers not similarly concerned, Shapiro's ideas in these poems may seem atavistic; but they clearly exercised to the utmost his faculties as a poet. In The Synagogue passion and intellect converge to form one of the great contemporary poems. There is, however, seldom such concentration of forces in the rest of "V-Letter." For the most part the great ironies and paradoxes of the war escape the satiric comment which other and lesser aspects of modern society received in "Person, Place, and Thing." Shapiro now reserves his thunder for Judaists and intellectuals. When he writes of military life, as in Troop Train or Elegy for a Dead Soldier, he is easy, reportorial, readable; hardly any other poet today could have produced so colloquially-spirited, so tragically-gay a departure scene as he depicts in the first stanza of Birthday Poem. Nevertheless it is curious how often these poems drop into commonplace or even mere folksy sentiment. ("I see you woman-size And this looms larger and more goddess-like Than silver goddesses on screens"—I love you just the way you are, dear.) And it appears that Shapiro's former satirical defiance is being displaced by new and vaguely disturbing attitudes. There is in his work a

HAVE YOU DISCOVERED

Kierkegaard?

You know his name, but have you READ him? Sören Kierkegaard has been soberly compared to Socrates, Pascal, Nietzsche, Tolstoy, Augustine, Freud, Tertullian, and William James (to give only part of the list).

TIME MAGAZINE: "Had this philosopher and mystic not written in a minor language, his fame would have resounded with that of Carlyle, Nietzsche, and Dostoevski."

MIGUEL UNAMUNO: "I learned the language in order to read Ibsen and was rewarded by reading Kierkegaard."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR: "The profoundest interpreter of the psychology of the religious life, in my opinion, since St. Augustine."

COMMONWEAL: "The greatest Protestant Christian of the nineteenth century, a man equal in spiritual stature to Cardinal Newman."

CHRISTIAN CENTURY: "Kierkegaard has inspired all those philosophers and theologians of the recent past who have concerned themselves with the doctrine of man."

W. H. AUDEN: "To Messrs. Lowrie, Swenson, Dru, Payne and others, and to the Oxford, Princeton and other presses who during the last five or six years have been making Kierkegaard available in English, we and our children shall owe a debt which we could not repay even if we remembered it."

These are the thirteen
Princeton Kierkegaard publications:

ATTACK ON "CHRISTENDOM," translated by Walter Lowrie. $2.50

THE CONCEPT OF DREAD, translated by Walter Lowrie. $2.00

CONCLUDING UNSCIENTIFIC POSTSCRIPT, translated by David F. Swenson and Walter Lowrie. (Published for American-Scandinavian Foundation.) $6.00

EITHER/OR, translated by David F. Swenson, Lillian M. Swenson, and Walter Lowrie, 2 volumes. $7.50

FEAR AND TREMBLING, translated by Walter Lowrie. $2.75

FOR SELF-EXAMINATION and JUDGE FOR YOURSELVES! Translated by Walter Lowrie. (Offset reprint of the Oxford edition.) $2.50

PHILOSOPHICAL FRAGMENTS, translated by David F. Swenson. (Published for American-Scandinavian Foundation.) $2.00

REPETITION, translated by Walter Lowrie (with a bibliographical essay, "How Kierkegaard Got Into English"). $2.75

A SHORT LIFE OF KIERKEGAARD, by Walter Lowrie. $2.75

THE SICKNESS UNTO DEATH, translated by Walter Lowrie $2.00

STAGES ON LIFE'S WAY, translated by Walter Lowrie. $6.00

TRAINING IN CHRISTIANITY, translated by Walter Lowrie. (Offset reprint of the Oxford edition.) $3.00

THE WORKS OF LOVE, translated by David F. Swenson and Lillian M. Swenson, (Spring, 1945)

Order from your bookseller or from PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS
Princeton, New Jersey

growing contempt for conscious artistry and intellect, an eagerness to present himself as passionately immersed in the folk life of the soldier, a pride in his acquired toughness.

> I smoke and read my bible and chew gum . . .
> I'd rather be a barber and cut hair
> Than walk with you in gilt museum halls . . .
> And on through crummy continents and days,
> Deliberate, grimy, slightly drunk, we crawl,
> The good-bad boys of circumstance and chance . . .

Nor are these new feelings frankly examined in the poet's conscience in such a way that the conversion process becomes itself the subject of his poetry: they are merely taken for granted. It would certainly be an irony of the war if it turned a complex and specialized poet like Shapiro into only another exponent of hard-boiled sentimentality. F. W. DUPEE

Maurois on America

THE MIRACLE OF AMERICA. By André Maurois. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

THIS brief history of the United States, I presume, was intended primarily for the French public. It is a perfect introduction. Here, the familiar limitation of André Maurois serves him as well as his very great talent. The virtues of the textbook writer are not the same as those of the citizen. In these times that try men's souls, we have little use for the Laodicean, however delicate, kindly, and urbane. But to give in four hundred pages a lucid and well-balanced history of a great foreign nation is a task that requires gentle sympathy, measure, tolerance, and a sanity so sound and safe that it is not afraid of being timid.

For Maurois, America is neither Utopia nor the land of Cockaygne. Neither is it the somber and brutal world evoked by Georges Duhamel in "America the Menace," or, more vigorously, by Anatole France in the closing chapter of "Penguin Island." On the whole, Maurois holds his conservative bias well in check. He says that on August 4 the French nobility gave up their traditional privileges "in an excess of abnegation": there speaks the distant disciple of Burke. He is more in sympathy with Hamilton than with Jefferson; but, as a good pragmatist, he recognizes that the Jeffersonian spirit won out; and he comforts himself with the thought that "Hamilton was a doctrinaire, Jefferson a politician." It would have been a scandal if principles—even the right principles—had prevailed over expediency.

There are two elements of outstanding merit in this unassuming volume. Each of the six parts ends with a Conclusion which is a very able synthesis. And some of the biographical sketches are done with the skill we had the right to expect from the author of "Disraeli." Maurois's Coolidge is particularly convincing. I always felt that nature unaided could not produce anything so purely Coolidgean as Coolidge: it was a work of art. Coolidge, like Franklin in Paris, and Theodore Roosevelt at all times, played consciously and conscientiously the part he had been cast for. Maurois's portrait of Wilson lacks sympathy and verges on the malicious; but it offers a consistent and vivid picture.

So I wish all success to the French edition of this work: heaven knows that it is necessary that the French and our-

LECTURE COURSES OF OUTSTANDING INTEREST

at the RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE

Founded 1906: Fall Term 1944

CULTURE AND THE WORLD CRISIS

A social interpretation of the arts in contemporary life.

WEDNESDAY EVENINGS AT 8:15

12 Lectures and a Symposium Beginning September 20th

Chairman: JOSEPH T. SHIPLEY, Editor, American Bookman

September 20th Crisis in Modern Culture	SIDNEY HOOK Chairman, Dept. of Philosophy, NYU
September 27th Social Character of Modern Art	MEYER SCHAPIRO Ass't Prof. Fine Arts Dept., Columbia University
October 4th Literature in a Changing World	GORHAM MUNSON Author, Member of Faculty, New School
October 11th Musical Arts in Transition	ARTHUR V. BERGER Music Critic, New York Sun
October 18th Religion in Modern Society	LAWRENCE HOSIE Chm., Social Education and Action Committee, Presbytery of New York
October 25th The Theater as Social Instrument	BURTON RASCOE Drama Critic, New York World-Telegram
November 1st The Movies as Art and Propaganda	JOHN McDONALD Editor, Film News
November 8th Mass Production of Culture	JAMES RORTY Poet, Journalist, Lecturer
November 15 Contemporary Role of the Ballet	JOHN MARTIN Dance Critic, New York Times
November 22nd Art and Community Planning	PERCIVAL GOODMAN Architect, Co-author of "Means of Livelihood and the Way of Life"
November 29th Art and Totalitarianism	(Speaker to be announced)
December 6th The Arts and Philosophy	IRWIN EDMAN Professor of Philosophy, Columbia University
December 13th Culture and Social Progress	SYMPOSIUM A summary with several speakers participating

COURSE FEE: $6.00 SINGLE ADMISSION: $.75

LABOR AND SOCIALISM IN WORLD AFFAIRS

An evaluation of the place of Labor and Socialism at home and abroad, now and in the post-war world.

MONDAY EVENINGS AT 8:15

6 Symposiums Beginning, November 13th

Chairman: ALGERNON LEE

November 13th

Capitalism Faces the Future

JOHN L. CHILDS, Prof. of Education, Columbia University
HARRY GIDEONSE, President, Brooklyn College
HENRY HAZLITT, Member of Editorial Board, New York Times
WLADISLAW MALINOWSKI, Chairman, Editorial Board, "Poland Fights"
CHARLES SOLOMON, Judge, Magistrates Court, N. Y. C.

November 20th

Russia: The Revolution and After

RAPHAEL ABRAMOVITCH, Editor, Russian Socialist Courier
MARK ALDANOV, Author, "The Fifth Seal"
JOSEPH SHAPLEN, Well Known Journalist
BERTRAM D. WOLFE, Author, Lecturer, Student of Russian Affairs

November 27th

German, Fascism and Post-War Europe

MAX ASCOLI, Author, Former Pres., Mazzini Society
RICHARD COUDENHOVE-KALERGI, Chm., Pan-European Union
EDUARD HEIMANN, Author, "Communism, Fascism or Democracy"
FREDA WUNDERLICH, Prof. of Economics, New School

December 4th

Labor and Socialism in the British Commonwealth

VARIAN FRY, Exec. Sec'y, American Labor Conference on Int'l Affairs
DAVID LEWIS, Nat'l Sec'y, C.C.F. of Canada
CORLEY SMITH, H.B.M. Vice-Consul, British Consulate General
MARK STARR, Educational Director, ILGWU

December 11th

Cooperation and the State: The Scandinavian Experience

WALLACE CAMPBELL, Ass't. Sec'y, Cooperative League
RUDOLPH ROCKER, Author, "Nationalism and Culture"
I. N. STEINBERG, General Secretary, Freeland League

December 18th

Labor, Liberalism and Socialism: An Analysis and a Forecast For Europe and America

M. J. COLDWELL, C.C.F. Member, Canadian Parliament
FELIKS GROSS, Editor, "New Europe"
HARRY LAIDLER, Exec. Dir., League for Industrial Democracy
VANNI MONTANA, Sec'y, Italian Socialist Federation
WILLIAM F. SOLLMAN, Former Member, German Reichstag
GERHART SEGER, Editor, "Neue Volks-Zeitung"

COURSE FEE: $4.00
SINGLE ADMISSION: ....$ .75

OTHER COURSES

INSTITUTE FOR RUSSIAN STUDIES

A comprehensive survey of Russia's civilization; its culture, literature, language; its geography and history and its world-shaking Revolution. This course is given by some of America's most eminent Russian scholars.

THE BASIS OF SOCIAL DEMOCRACY

A course in the elements of Democratic Socialism conducted by an outstanding exponent of this provocative philosophy.

TRADE UNION TRAINING COURSES

An inclusive training program designed to meet the day-to-day needs of active workers in the Labor Movement.

LABOR SEMINAR

A group activity giving students an opportunity to ask questions and to contribute their views in a free discussion of topics of interest to students of the Labor Movement.

YOUTH SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL STUDIES

A series of courses for young people of high school and college age designed to develop students in the essentials of history and economics.

LANGUAGE AND SPEECH COURSES

Spanish, Better English, Russian, Elementary, Advanced Public Speaking.

Send for FREE Bulletin of any of these courses

School Term Begins Monday Evening, September 18th

RAND SCHOOL OF SOCIAL SCIENCE · 7 East 15 St. New York 3, · AL 4-3094

selves should understand one another! But what is the usefulness of such a book for the American public? It is not sensational, but very real. A foreign observer may bring out facts so familiar that we are not conscious of them. It was Boutmy who emphasized the veritable revolution made by the Enclosure Acts in eighteenth-century England: yet it should have been patent at the time of "The Deserted Village." Oddly enough, I believe that the keenest interpretation of pre-war France came from three Germans, Cohen-Portheim, Curtius, and Sieburg. And André Siegfried made it plain that the vital element in our own political system was not that outworn idol, the party, but the lobby. There is no revelation of this kind in Maurois's book. Its total absence of doctrinaire commitments makes it informative rather than challenging. I missed, for instance, Maurois's own brilliant theory of the Three Ghosts—the Puritan, the Pioneer, and the Robber Baron, which, I am told, he had borrowed from Régis Michaud.

But if the book is not an epic, or an apocalypse, or a satire, or an ideological demonstration, it tells a good story very well indeed, and, with a few inevitable slips, it is as safe a primer as any on the market. We are occasionally rediscovering the sad fact that we do not know our own history: here is a chance to review the essentials with the most courteous and unobtrusive of guides. I greatly enjoyed the experience.

The translation contributed little to the enjoyment. It is adequate, but it has no style. Now the quality of Maurois's writing is elusive. Through his alertness, his lucidity, his wit, his perfect mastery of a delicate instrument, he keeps steadily just above the commonplace: a perfect recipe for narrative prose. The translators drag him down. We have the impression of a modest but perfect French dinner warmed over in a Greek restaurant. By "la noble candeur du Président Wilson," Clemenceau meant not candor, but naivete. Clemenceau had his own brand of blunt candor, but there was no trace of candeur in him.

ALBERT GUERARD

A warm and glowing biography of one of Wisconsin's greatest sons

McCARTHY

OF WISCONSIN

By EDWARD A. FITZPATRICK

"By combining first-hand knowledge, laborious research, and literary skill, Mr. Fitzpatrick has given enduring qualities to his volume on Charles McCarthy. Whether considered as an inspiring story or as a contribution to the history of the progressive age, this biography must be ranked high in our Americana."—Charles A. Beard. $3.50

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS
Morningside Heights, New York 27

A Votive Stone

CARRIE CHAPMAN CATT: A BIOGRAPHY. By Mary Gray Peck. The H. W. Wilson Company. $3.

A BIOGRAPHY of Carrie Chapman Catt is necessarily in large part a history of the last thirty years of the fight for woman suffrage, a fight which ended in 1920 when the Nineteenth Amendment took the hurdle of the thirty-sixth state legislature. Out of the annals of organization routine, political lobbying, campaign strategy, and committee hearings, a few general ideas take shape. Unquestionably Miss Peck establishes her case that the political machine is so unwieldy as almost to defeat its purpose, and that the enfranchisement of women was delayed for years after the idea had become acceptable to the public.

Indeed, the book sometimes conveys the impression that the suffrage movement was demanding a de jure recognition of the de facto equality which American women already possessed. The professional opportunities open to women in the nineties, for instance, especially in the West, came as something of a revelation to this reviewer. They were no doubt enjoying the benefits of an expanding economy; there is a tang of the prairie and free lands and opportunity for all about the early part of the book which imparts to the reader some of the optimism which the suffragists felt about their cause at the turn of the century. Perhaps the legislatures were not altogether responsible for the unexpected lag; it was not merely that they were so slow, but also that a lately pioneer society was marching so fast.

A great deal of Miss Peck's material overlaps Ida Husted Harper's "History of Woman Suffrage" and Mrs. Catt's own "Woman Suffrage and Politics." But the account of Mrs. Catt's international work, beginning with the International Woman Suffrage Alliance, and later embracing the peace movement, is an addition to the literature of the women's movement, and does much to enliven the pages of this substantial volume. The portraits of the European leaders are colorful; their gatherings have a quality of exhilaration; and Mrs. Catt herself comes to life in her relationships with the members of this cosmopolitan group, in her genuine concern for peace, which she did not confuse with appeasement, and in her horror of the loom of National Socialism. She was one of the earliest of influential Americans to recognize its dangers, and she deserves a good mark too for her protests against the Lusk committee's activities and her brush with the D. A. R. for its blacklisting of liberals.

This book is written by a votary for votaries, and it will be read chiefly by those who love to recall the old days and look at the old pictures which the publisher has furnished without stint. Miss Peck is as conscientious as the social

They all said: "America has a purpose"

Do YOU know what it is?

Tom Paine, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln and Wilson all believed that America has a purpose. That purpose, they said, is to make men free, not just here but everywhere.

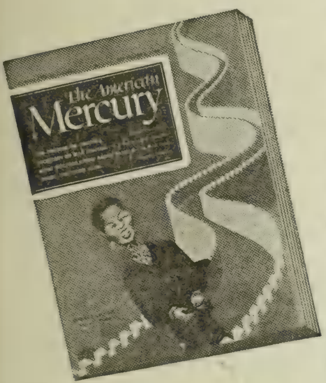
Absurd? Impractical? Another visionary idea that today would make America a knight in armor, crusading in a world of planes and tanks?

"Decidedly not," says Russell Davenport in the September MERCURY. The brilliant former managing editor of Fortune and chief editorial writer of Life, who was Willkie's personal campaign representative, demonstrates that America cannot exist in a world in which freedom is exclusively ours; that the world cannot forever remain half slave and half free.

He makes it clear that political and economic freedom are inseparable, for the Bill of Rights has little meaning for the economically insecure. Yet, because the free life must always be a life of risk, freedom and security are not synonymous but complementary.

He shows, with convincing clarity, why altruism and idealism are the most practical policies that a free America can pursue . . . why they are indeed the only policies that America can pursue and remain free.

For a truly democratic ideology—for a practical idealism—for a bright, hopeful vision of an America that makes sense . . . read Russell Davenport's "The Promise of America" in the September MERCURY.



THE ROBOT PLANE IN WAR AND PEACE

Major Alexander P. de Seversky has again pin-pointed his target in a revealing and prophetic analysis of the flying bomb—its future as a horrible engine of destruction—the one defense against it—and the useful servant it will prove to be in peace.

THE CASE AGAINST BIG GOVERNMENT

The history of many corporations has been "Big, Bigger and Bust." The reason is often over-centralization. Today a deadly parallel exists with the over-centralized federal government in Washington. Read New Dealer Charles Edison make specific suggestions for its decentralization.

NEW YORK'S FABULOUS STORK CLUB

Here is a personally conducted tour of America's most famous night club. For an intimate look behind the fabulous façade, join Russell Whelan "Inside the Stork Club" in THE MERCURY for September.

ALSO IN THIS ISSUE

Why I Don't Join the WACS
What Doctors Know About Fatigue
The First Submarine
Red Jacobsen
Secretary of War Stimson
Bubonic Plague in America
"Swapping Horses in Midstream"
Why Pick on China?
Theatre Music
Psychiatry at War

Also—Books, Fiction, Poetry, Open Forum and Alan Devoe's monthly nature feature "Down to Earth"

THE AMERICAN MERCURY AND LIBEL

Future historians writing of America's struggle to remain a democracy, will find The American Mercury rich in material exposing Fascist and Communist activities. Long before "Under Cover" swept the nation, John Roy Carlson put the searchlight on American Fascists for American Mercury readers—named names, places and dates. At the same time Max Eastman, William Henry Chamberlin and Fred Woltman kept Mercury readers informed about the Communist front organizations. Hamilton Fish, Elizabeth Dilling, Gerald L. K. Smith, George Seldes, the League Against War and Fascism, "Peace Now", "In Fact" and a long list of other people and organizations were taken apart in The Mercury . . . more than one never ticked quite so well again.

For refusing to pull its punches The American Mercury is threatened often with libel suits; but has never been sued. The reason is plain. Truth is a winning defense against claims of libel, and Mercury articles are backed by carefully documented facts. The readiness of The Mercury to strike out boldly while many others remain discreetly silent may explain why The Mercury today is at its all-time high in circulation.

Lawrence E. Spivak
PUBLISHER

The American Mercury for September...

OUT NOW!

editor of a local newspaper in including all the names. Her treatment of the militant wing of the American movement is a model of judicious restraint—if restraint was required after a quarter of a century. But the Great Healer has likewise laid his cooling hand on the buoyancy of the girls who marched in gold; to all but the survivors this is a story of long, long ago.

BETSY HUTCHISON

Congress

YOU AND YOUR CONGRESS. By Volta Torrey. William Morrow and Company. $3.

WE WERE indicted as a people, as well as bombed, on December 7, 1941, in Mr. Torrey's opinion. The country, capably led by President Roosevelt, was being badly governed by a rebellious Congress which appeared to be only vaguely aware of the forces Adolf Hitler and his Oriental allies were unleashing over Main Street, U. S. A. There were Congressmen, such as Hamilton Fish, who said that no one in Japan wanted war with the United States; and Representative Knutson of Minnesota was in Germany trying to sell lard to Hermann Göring's war industries when the Wehrmacht struck Poland. Moreover, Congress was so dominated by the hoary seniority system that when war did come Senator Robert Reynolds, admirer of the Nazis, Anglophobe, and isolationist, became chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee and the isolationist Senator David I. Walsh head of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee. No other legislature in the world would have tolerated such a situation.

Mr. Torrey, who as a Washington correspondent watched Congress at its daily table-thumping, takes apart both houses and exposes their creaking machinery. His book, obviously written for the overalls trade, is frankly propaganda for the election this November of a liberal Congress and for the reform of the electoral system. Mr. Torrey has turned out an excellent handbook for the labor-politicos whom the C. I. O., through its Political Action Committee, and the A. F. of L., through its new "get-out-the-vote" apparatus, have put into the field. His analysis of minority rule and the poll tax, which practically give the Southerners perpetual control of Congressional committees, and his discussion of the political machines, the isolationists' records, and the manner in which the people permit the nationalists to take over by default will make excellent campaign material for liberal and labor spokesmen. For Mr. Torrey has packed evidence into this book which, if it is impressed on the millions of working people this fall, will do much to help drive from Congress the Hamilton Fishes, the Dewey Shorts, the Clare Hoffmans—in general, the men who have governed so badly and whose antics and ideologies have given comfort to the enemy.

VICTOR RIESEL

The Liberal Party

ANNOUNCES A

LUNCHEON FORUM

Saturday, September 30th, 12.30 p.m.

SUBJECT:

Fiscal Policy and Full Employment

CHAIRMAN:

DR. WILLIAM WITHERS, Queens College

SPEAKERS:

DR. ALVIN HANSEN, Harvard University
MR. BEARDSLEY RUML, R. H. Macy & Co., Inc.

DISCUSSANTS:

DR. EVALINE M. BURNS, Nat'l. Planning Assn.
MR. LEO M. CHERNE, Research Inst. of America
DR. JOHN L. CHILDS, State Chairman, Liberal Party
DR. ALBERT HALASI, American Labor Conference
DR. ABBA P. LERNER, New School
DR. BROADUS MITCHELL, ILGWU
MR. EPHRAIM SCHWARZMAN, URWDSEA, CIO
MR. FRED UMHEY, ILGWU
MR. MATTHEW WOLL, Vice-President, AFL

Grand Ballroom, HOTEL COMMODORE, New York City
Tickets, $3.00 per person

Send Reservations and Checks to:
MR. HARRY UVILLER, Treasurer
THE LIBERAL PARTY
160 West 44th Street, New York 18 ■ Tel. LOngacre 5-0500

Fiction in Review

"Tender Comrade"

I HAVE been rather surprised at the dearth of novels on a theme which would seem to be particularly appealing for war-time fiction—the predicament of wives whose husbands have gone off to war. Yet now that one has finally come my way, Hannah Lees's "Till the Boys Come Home" (Harper's, $2.50), I must admit even greater surprise at its content. Miss Lees's novel may not have any artistic importance, but I find it important as a study in what the middle-brow American reading public can take, or at least be offered, in the line of realism. In manner, "Till the Boys Come Home" could perfectly well have appeared in one of the large-circulation women's magazines: it has no literary overtones or references beyond itself, and it requires little creative cooperation from the reader. But if its matter, too, should be acceptable to a large-circulation audience, then this country has gone a longer way in recent years than we commonly suppose. For Miss Lees's novel is remarkably free of the expected sentimental and patriotic clichés. And in sexual matters it is very courageous without being self-conscious. In "Till the Boys Come Home" bravery without intelligence is the object only of scorn, and the good sportsmanship of an army wife is shown to cover a wide streak of bitterness. Also, female sexuality achieves the authenticity and stature of a nuisance. Even the name of the novel's heroine strikes a new note in popular realism: she is not Sandra or Michael, but Sophie.

Miss Lees angles her story boldly by making Sophie a victim of the male urge to adventure rather than a victim of the draft; she is the wife of a doctor who has gone to war pretty much by choice. She has a job as well as two small children to occupy her, she has no financial worries, and she has a close circle of women friends in the same boat as herself; in other words, here is a heroine who should be admirably equipped to meet the popular ideal of home-front sturdiness. But, instead, Sophie comes very near to going to pieces. A normally emotional human being, she wants to share her life with another adult human being whom she loves; a normally sexual woman, she finds her enforced celibacy unendurable. By the time her husband comes home Sophie is full of resentments, guilts, and confusions. But this is only the heroine of the story; the minor characters are in equally unorthodox bad shape. Except for Julia, Sophie's priggish sister who has been created by idealizations of the service wife and who is shown to be correspondingly stupid, even vicious, all Sophie's friends either have similar experiences or, like Kate, sustain the absence of their husbands so well simply because they never loved them in the first place. We gather that the boys who come home to Miss Lees's world will encounter emotional situations such as usually lie beyond the range of any but the very best fiction.

But it is not in this broad outline, heterodox as it is, so much as in the nature of its details that "Till the Boys Come Home" is especially interesting. For instance, neither Sophie nor any of her friends is under any illusion about the political future of this country; they recognize the possibility not only of another war but of American fascism, and Miss Lees is very clear about the incipient fascism of the most heroic of her war wives. Or, quite without any intention of sensationalism, Miss Lees describes with extraordinary frankness the sexual substitutes for a husband which are available to the women left behind. Or "Till the Boys Come Home" is illuminating on the subject of war babies: it tells us that women become pregnant, or want to become pregnant, before their husbands go overseas not because they wish to preserve the image of love but in order to keep themselves out of sexual mischief and because pregnancy is so absorbing.

According to its dust jacket, the author of "Till the Boys Come Home" was educated at Vassar and the University of Colorado and is the wife of a physician; and this would seem to me to be a fairer way to define the intellectual and emotional area of the novel—to describe it, that is, as the work of a mature young woman of decent education, married to a doctor—than to try to understand it in terms of its possible audience. For it is in Miss Lees's generation and class that certain political, social, and domestic attitudes which are good have begun to take firm root, perhaps eventually to disseminate throughout our culture; even Miss Lees's psychological insights bear the stamp of her training, age, and professional connection. And although this may be a section of society that is not notable for its humor—indeed, there is something almost grim in the fervor with which Miss Lees insists that a child sucks its thumb for its own good reasons—it is a section of society which, by serving as liaison between theory and practice, has the potentiality of performing an invaluable educative function. Recently there have been several instances in which the women's magazines have recognized their educative power and broken through the old sexual taboos to tell small but difficult truths. One can guess that these steps in progress are directly to be traced to the influence of young writers and editors of the same cultural cast as Miss Lees, with perhaps no special artistic gift, but with the same simple seriousness and conscience.

DIANA TRILLING

Coming

IN EARLY ISSUES OF THE NATION

ELIZABETH HAWES is a fashion designer with a social conscience and a political writer with a sense of humor. Out of her experiences on Fifth Avenue came two books, "Fashion Is Spinach" and "Men Can Take It." When war came she gave up a prosperous salon and entered a war plant. Out of that experience came another book, "Why Women Cry, or Wenches with Wrenches." Now she is an international representative of the United Automobile Workers, CIO, and working in the UAW-CIO education department, chiefly on women's problems. She has written an article for us on the women's vote in the coming election.

*

G. A. BORGESE, author of "Goliath: The March of Fascism," is a veteran anti-Fascist fighter now teaching Italian literature at the University of Chicago. He will write an article on the peace plans of the Vatican.

*

PIETRO NENNI, editor of Avanti and a leader of the Italian Socialist Party, is back in Rome now, and has sent us an article on Italy's present struggle for democracy.

*

I. F. STONE, The Nation's Washington correspondent, is now traveling through Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, and Indiana, and will write a series of articles on the political line-up in those key states.

Convenient Order Form

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I enclose $.................. or, Bill me ☐

☐ 1 YEAR $5 ☐ 2 YEARS $8 ☐ 3 YEARS $11

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State..........

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 per year extra.

9-16-44

MOTION PICTURES

". . . a realism reminiscent of the bite of late French films." Bosley Crowther, N. Y. Times
PARAMOUNT Presents
Fred MacMurray • Barbara Stanwyck
Edward G. Robinson
"DOUBLE INDEMNITY"
In Person
The Andrews Sisters plus Pat Henning
EXTRA! Mitchell Ayres and His CBS Band
BUY MORE BONDS PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

DAVID O. SELZNICK presents
Since You Went Away
CLAUDETTE COLBERT • JENNIFER JONES • JOSEPH COTTEN
SHIRLEY TEMPLE MONTE WOOLLEY
LIONEL BARRYMORE ROBERT WALKER
Now Playing Capitol B'way at 51st St.

STAGE PLAYS

"An exciting evening in the Theatre"—Nichols, Times
JOHN WILDBERG presents
HARRY WAGSTAFF GRIBBLE'S Production
ANNA LUCASTA
A Play by PHILIP YORDAN
MANSFIELD 47th STREET, WEST OF BROADWAY
Evenings 8:40; Next Matinee Saturday, 2:40

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (in association with Jack H. Skirball)
JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL
The FRANZ WERFEL - S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN
LOUIS CALHERN—ANNABELLA—OSCAR KARLWEIS
J. EDWARD BROMBERG
MARTIN BECK THEATRE — West 45th — AIR CONDITIONED
Evenings at 8:30. Mats. Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK in
MEXICAN HAYRIDE
by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
WINTER GARDEN, B'way & 50th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

BLOOD DONORS NEEDED!

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

FILMS

NUNNALLY JOHNSON has turned the old Floyd Dell–Thomas Mitchell farce "Little Accident" into "Casanova Brown," a large slice of brisket for Gary Cooper. Mr. Cooper's role breaks into four parts for which he is peculiarly well qualified—or perhaps typed is the word. For the first few reels, very much worried, he talks to Frank Morgan as he might if the Hays office would allow him to pretend to be a young man who, a few hours before his wedding, is informed that he is the father of an illegitimate child. Then in flashback, very much embarrassed, he calls on his parents-in-law with his bride, Teresa Wright, and, by accident, burns their house down. Next, he is so farcically manhandled in a lying-in hospital that he all but loses certainty which sex he is. Last, extremely Cooperish, he kidnaps his baby (and Miss Wright's) and earnestly, laboriously takes care of it. How these tableaux of masculinity at bay fit together and are motivated is not important enough to go into; neither, perhaps, is the film itself. But like most of Johnson's screen plays it is reasonably and at times more than reasonably amusing. It is also the first production of International Pictures, a new "independent" corporation for which both Cooper and Johnson will produce from now on. I put independent in quotes without vindictiveness or deep sorrow, merely to indicate that, judging by "Casanova Brown," nothing independent in any very interesting sense is likely to come from the new studio. It's just Hollywood with its stays a little loosened; but even that is better than nothing, and far better than the bad serious stuff which independent producers sometimes attempt.

That is more than one can say for "The Seventh Cross"; Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer has used it, with every good intention I am sure, to crucify the possibilities of a very fine movie. Spencer Tracy is a sincere actor and in many respects a good one, but he is hopelessly ill-qualified to suggest a German anti-fascist who has escaped from a concentration camp; very little else in the film helps out, either. In almost every respect, in fact, the picture is an ultra-typical M-G-M "major" production; it is perhaps unnecessary to add that that style is fatal to any sort of film except the purest low-ceilinged romance. Hume Cronyn, Steve Geray, and Agnes Moorhead do manage to cut a few glints of living acid through all the glossy lard, and one street shot of coarse legs in black cotton stockings, walking with casual peculiarity, has a suddenness, sadness, and individuality which should have taught those who made this film how to create and photograph a city. One has to wonder, instead, how on earth it got into so conventional a show.

"The Impatient Years" made me very impatient indeed. The difficulties of a discharged soldier and the wife whom he had known, before he went off to war, for only four days, could have become a first-rate film. So long as the script allows them to stay within hailing distance of that idea, Jean Arthur and Lee Bowman and Charles Coburn make a semi-bearable third-rate comedy of it.

"Hail the Conquering Hero," of course, is pretty nearly the only film of the year worth talking about. I hope to try, next week.

JAMES AGEE

MUSIC

MY YOUNG Boston correspondent, when the army sent him back to Fort Bragg, doubted that he would find anything musical there to report; but a couple of hours in barracks with someone's radio going, one Sunday afternoon, left him "aghast, bludgeoned, waterlogged by the torrent of bad music in worse arrangements that poured out of popular variety programs. . . . The worst single item is those fanfares that begin variety shows —each blatant, pompous, and stupid enough to sink a battleship. And once isn't enough: we have to have about four of them before the program can start. You know: FANFARE—'Rapid Hairgrow Incorporated presents'—FANFARE—'Tommy Bingle, his basset horn and his Kansas Kretins'—DOUBLE FANFARE—'Frankie Kopak, that sterile entertainer of stage, screen, and radio'—TRIPLE FANFARE—'with a great supporting company of faded favorites'—THEME UP, TUTTI, FORTISSIMO—'What Rapid Hairgrow Lotion will do for your head will astound . . .' " And so on.

More recently he asked whether I had "bothered to notice how lax the New York Philharmonic has been this summer, even under Reiner?" I had not bothered; and from what he said I gathered that the Sunday broadcasts this summer have been as insufficiently rehearsed as the ones last summer which I did hear and write about. The one time I listened was when Reiner conducted three excerpts from Mussorgsky's original version of "Boris Godunov" as revised by Shostakovitch; and I was too intent on the substance of the music to note much about the performance. The excerpts—Boris's two monologues and his farewell—do not lend themselves to the crude orchestral underlining that Shostakovitch was reported to have done elsewhere to bring out the latent proletarian character of the work; and most of the instrumental coloring sounded as though it were Mussorgsky's own (I had only a Bessel edition of Mussorgsky's 1875 arrangement for piano and voices of his own revised version of the work); but now and then there was a line of clarinet or bass-clarinet color, characteristic of Shostakovitch but not of Mussorgsky, and so out of key with everything else in these excerpts that I was sure it had been added by Shostakovitch. As for several phrases in the farewell that were not in my score, I presumed they were in Mussorgsky's first version of the work. What I noticed in the performance was Kipnis's singing: formerly he had used his beautiful voice with ease and taste; now, with constriction in production there were melodramatic mannerisms of style. Also, he followed Chaliapin's practice of speaking instead of singing the words in the hallucination monologue. But that is something only a Chaliapin might do; and certainly in a concert performance of the Mussorgsky original that we never hear Kipnis should have let us hear the vocal sounds that Mussorgsky wrote for the words.

Most recently, on the eve of being shipped overseas, my correspondent came up for a last visit, at which he heard for the first time the records of Debussy's "Gigues" and "Rondes de printemps." I had written in my review that the recording had left some of the inner strands of the orchestral polyphony inaudible; my visitor thought they probably had not been audible in the original performance. "For all the sounds in those scores to be heard," he said, "they have to be correctly balanced against each other, the way they are by Toscanini. And my guess is that they weren't by Monteux." Having once observed the process by which Toscanini worked out those correct balances in "La Mer," I found the guess credible.

Concerning the pieces themselves I remarked that a every moment one heard something completely new in sound, produced by a new use of the orchestra, a new combination of orchestral elements, and that one marveled at it and at the ear which had imagined not only the composite sound but its components; but that no less new and wonderful was the expressive effect for which the sound had been contrived, and what one had to marvel at was the artistic imagination which had conceived both this vision of the sights, the sounds, the atmosphere of spring, and this astounding succession of sounds in which it was realized. (One can say the orchestration is in the French tradition; one can say it is in Debussy's own rich, intricate style of "La Mer"; but there remains what is different, new, and unique in "Rondes de printemps," and what is all these things because it is especially contrived for the new and unique imaginative purposes of this piece.) My visitor and I agreed that Berlioz also offered examples of this sort of thing; and since he had not heard "Romeo and Juliet" when Toscanini had performed it I pointed out in the score the things which a few strings, a pair of flutes, and a single horn did to create the enchantment of the night in Capulet's garden, and the wonders of "Queen Mab," as only a few of the innumerable freshly imagined details that had overwhelmed me in the work.

The same thing, my visitor observed at this point, was also true of Mozart's use of the orchestra in his operas. He agreed with my estimate of some of the marvels in the purely formal works—like the restatement of the second subject in the finale of the G minor Symphony. But even more wonderful, he contended, were the things which dramatic and expressive purposes caused Mozart to do with the orchestra in his operas: here one heard constantly and astoundingly new invention like that of Debussy and Berlioz. And in the concertos too, we agreed, Mozart contrived fascinating things for the orchestra in its dramatic and humorous play with the piano.

That was why, said my visitor, he wanted to write a book about the orchestration in Mozart's operas. It is a book I hope will be written.

B. H. HAGGIN

CONTRIBUTORS

LOUIS FISCHER has been a newspaper correspondent in Europe and Asia since 1921. His books include "Men and Politics," "Dawn of Victory," "Empire," "A Week with Gandhi," and "The Soviets in World Affairs."

CAPTAIN COX is a British officer, LIEUTENANT BOX an American officer, with the Civil Affairs Administration in liberated France.

MARIO BELLINI is the pseudonym of a former member of the Italian underground now in the United States.

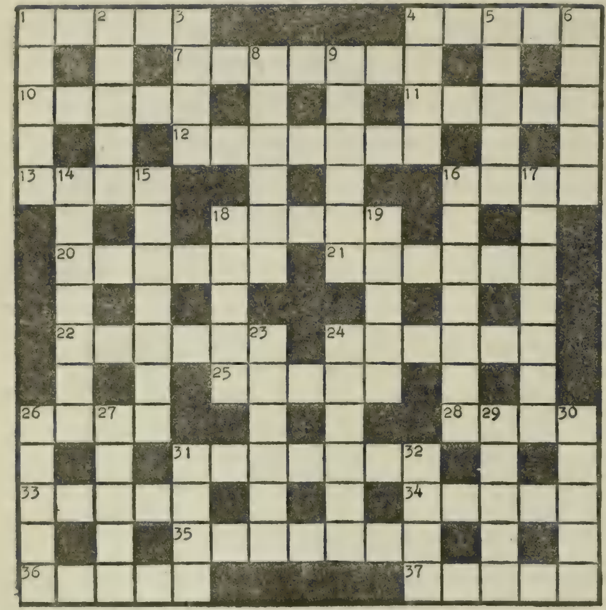
F. W. DUPEE, formerly a member of the English Department of Columbia University, is now teaching at Bard College. He will contribute a regular Verse Chronicle to The Nation.

ALBERT GUERARD, professor of comparative and general literature at Stanford University, is the author of "Literature and Society."

VICTOR RIESEL is labor editor of the New York Post.

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 81

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 It gave us opera
4 There are a hundred in The Decameron
7 A diplomatic language since Versailles
10 Town of Nebraska
11 Pat on the chest with a shovel
12 Brings to mind
13 Always getting into picnic sandwiches
16 Stronghold
18 No, sir; you shouldn't have too many in the fire
20 Repose comes to a Bachelor of Arts
21 She wrote Old Chester Tales
22 Minstrel: the last of his line (two words, 3 and 3)
24 A trying person
25 God of revelry
26 I never set eyes on this MS, old boy (hidden)
28 Obliged for new wine
31 Cause of the Titanic disaster in 1912
33 Order of architecture
34 Hunter of star parts
35 Strait between the Mediterranean and Adriatic
36 Oldest member
37 A hated thing

DOWN

1 Graven images of solid composition
2 Slight advance repeated
3 "And passing rich with forty pounds a - - - -" (Goldsmith)
4 "But thousands die without or - - - - or that —
Die, and endow a college or a cat" (Pope)
5 Ethel emerges from the river somewhat discomposed
6 Something in a description of a pilgrim
8 Self-propelled vehicle?
9 There was one of Lanterns in the celebrated satire of Rabelais
14 Easy-going nags
15 A desired change
16 There's one stag anyway in this African town
17 Ensured (anag.)
18 Father of Rebecca, in Ivanhoe
19 The French say there are three—men, women and clergymen
23 The rash are supposed to have it, but it isn't likely (two words, 2 and 4)
24 Soup dish
26 The tale of the Siege of Troy
27 What economists call the "medium of exchange"
29 Town in Tunisia—and in New York
30 Very tenacious of life, this fish
31 Here an image I study
32 Often buried with bones, according to the Bard

* * *

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 80

ACROSS:—1 VERSAILLES; 6 GAMP; 10 SUSTAIN; 11 EJECTOR; 12 EFTSOONS; 13 ENNUI; 15 SALAD; 17 NAPOLEONS; 19 IRONSIDES; 21 ERATO; 23 ICHOR; 24 SLIPSHOD; 27 AILMENT; 28 INVOICE; 29 EBON; 30 ADAM AND EVE.

DOWN:—1 VEST; [illegible] RESTFUL; 3 ADAMS; 4 LAND OF NOD; 5 EVENS; 7 ANTONIO; 8 PERMISSION; 9 REVEILLE; 14 ASSIMILATE; 16 DESERTED; 18 PESSIMISM; 20 OTHELLO; 22 ACONITE; [illegible] SATED; 25 SEVEN; [illegible] CEDE.

RESORTS

RELAX, REJOICE WITH SUMMER AT
Lakecrest
on Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.
90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings. Library. All seasonal sports. Via N.Y.C. R.R. to Amenia, N.Y. Open all year.
WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATION
EVA BERG, Director Stanfordville 4108

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK N.Y.
[illegible] MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village [illegible]

FARMS AND ACREAGE

BERKSHIRE FARM AGENCY, Chatham, New York, offers 300 New York-Massachusetts Berkshire Hills farms.

FURNISHED ROOM

Sunnyside, L. I. Fifteen minutes Times Square. 43-08 40th St. Apt. 3L. Large attractive studio room. Elevator. Business woman. Breakfast privileges $10. Call after 7 o'clock.

LANGUAGES

PHONOGRAPH COURSES. BOOKLET N. Language Service, 18 East 41st St., New York City 17.

POSTWAR PLAN

HUNDREDS OF BILLIONS of Dollars! Hundreds of thousands of human lives! That's what we sacrifice to win the war! For ten cents I will send you a booklet suggesting not only how to win the war but win everlasting peace, prosperity, democracy. D. Ornsteen, Box 29, Englewood, Colorado.

SITUATION WANTED

HANDYMAN, 54, single, sober, active, wants wages and full maintenance in small town, any state, with congenial employer. Box 1486, c/o The Nation.

Cultured Russian born woman desires position as housekeeper companion to congenial person or child. Would take care of semi-invalid. Box 1487, c/o The Nation.

WANTED

Nursery School teachers (two) desire two rooms, exchange four nights child-watching weekly. Belle Harbor 5-1462, Friday, Saturday mornings.

WANTED TO PURCHASE

TRANSFORMER for toy electric trains. Box 1488, c/o The Nation.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address [illegible] well [illegible] the [illegible] required for change of address.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 159 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 23, 1944 NUMBER 13

IN THIS ISSUE

NOTICE TO READERS 337

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 338

EDITORIALS

History and Mr. Dewey 340

China at Dumbarton Oaks and Quebec by Louis Fischer 340

ARTICLES

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 342

Senator Norris and the TVA by David E. Lilienthal 343

What Women Vote For by Elizabeth Hawes 344

To Henry David Thoreau A Poem by Irwin Edman 346

In the Wind 346

Uprising in Warsaw by W. R. Malinowski 347

Polls, Propaganda, Politics 348

Europe's Children by Gerold Frank 349

10 Years Ago in The Nation 350

POLITICAL WAR

The Rebirth of Italy by Pietro Nenni 351

Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 353

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Children of Abraham by W. H. Auden 355

The Negro American by E. Franklin Frazier 356

Points East by Marcus Duffield 358

Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 359

Films by James Agee 361

Dance by B. H. Haggin 362

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 363

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 82 by Jack Barrett 364

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor J. KING GORDON
Washington Editor I. F. STONE
Literary Editor MARGARET MARSHALL
Editor Political War Section J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO
Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]
Assistant Editor J. MITCHELL MORSE
Music Critic B. H. HAGGIN
Drama Critic JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager HUGO VAN ARX
Advertising Manager MARY HOWARD ELLISON
Director of Nation Associates LILLIE SCHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1944, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

Notice to Readers

THE problems confronting Americans in this Presidential campaign so far transcend the ordinary political issues that The Nation Associates has called a special pre-election conference to be held at the Hotel Astor in New York on Saturday and Sunday, October 7 and 8. To this meeting are invited, first of all, members of The Nation Associates in the Eastern area, and as many from other parts of the country as can attend; second, delegations from civic organizations and liberal political groups; third, guests representing valuable points of view and areas of activity.

The conference will discuss the major issues under the broad title of "America's Opportunity to Create and Maintain Lasting Peace." In more specific terms, it will take up questions of foreign policy and world organization; economic security; social welfare—including housing, social security, and health insurance; equality of right and opportunity and the protection of democracy; education for the responsibilities of citizenship.

The full program of the meetings will be printed in next week's issue, but among the speeches and speakers so far arranged for are the following: Education for Citizenship, Archibald MacLeish; America's Foreign Policy and its Relation to World Peace, Reinhold Niebuhr; World Organization and Permanent Peace, Manley O. Hudson; Foreign Policy and World Organization, Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam; How Full Employment May Be Secured, Alvin Hansen; The Role of Small Business in Providing Employment, David Podell; Fiscal Policy and Employment, Beardsley Ruml; Protection of Labor, Philip Murray; The Negro Question, Charles H. Houston; Subversive Movements, Frank Kingdon; Anti-Semitism as a Fascist Weapon, Norman M. Littell; Government Responsibility for Housing, Charles Abrams; Health Insurance, Michael M. Davis. Various editors of The Nation will also take part in the discussions.

This preliminary announcement will serve to remind members of The Nation Associates and representatives of interested organizations to send us notice of their intention to attend the conference so that we can accredit them as delegates. A limited number of guest tickets are available to Associates. We count most confidently on the full participation of our membership; it is their conference, the first major activity of The Nation Associates.

FREDA KIRCHWEY

The Shape of Things

THE QUEBEC CONFERENCE CLOSED ON mighty events. American troops of General Hodges's First Army after punching a ten-mile-wide hole in the Westwall were driving toward the Rhine. In England General Brereton's Allied airborne army was poised for its spectacular assault on the Netherlands. On the eastern front, Red Army forces poured steel into flaming Warsaw while to the south another Russian army fought its way through Transylvania toward the Hungarian border. In Italy, the Eighth Allied Army was engaged in heavy fighting in many sectors of the Gothic Line. Rumania had just concluded peace terms with the Allies. Finland was reported to be on the verge of a declaration of war agianst Germany. In London, the lights went on to end a five-year darkness. Clearly, the war in Europe was "now approaching its final stages" and President Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill could plan with some confidence "the destruction of the barbarians of the Pacific." The vast distances in the Pacific theater pose logistical and tactical problems of enormous magnitude. How some of these problems are being met was demonstrated by the simultaneous assaults launched by General MacArthur and Admiral Nimitz, from the south and the east, against Morotai and the Palau group, island bases near the Philippines. But beyond the intensification of the amphibious strategy so brilliantly carried out to date there is the problem of destroying the well-trained Japanese army of two millions, whose chief blows have so far been felt in China. This suggests a number of reasons why Moscow may next be consulted.

*

